Maynard, SIR JOHN (b. 1602, d. 1690), was born at Tavistock, educated at Exeter College, Oxford, entered the Middle Temple in 1619, and represented Chippenham in the first Parliament of Charles I. He speedily obtained eminence as a lawyer, and was in consequence appointed by the Long Parliament one of the managers in the prosecution of Strafford, and also of Laud. In 1648 he vehemently opposed the vote of non-addresses, and when it passed in spite of his opposition, for a time seceded from Parliament. Thus he took no part in the measures which led to the king's execution and the foundation of the Republic, nor did he again sit in a Parliament until 1656. During the Protectorate, Maynard was committed to the Tower by Cromwell for his argument in Cony's case, showing the illegality of the customs' duties levied by the Protector. To obtain his release he was compelled to sign a submission acknowledging his fault. In spite of this incident Maynard was offered, and consented to accept from Cromwell in May, 1658, the post of Sergeant to the Commonwealth. In 1659 Maynard steered his course with great skill; he did not take his seat in the first restoration of the Rump, but waited till the second, and then used his influence to pave the way for the return of the king. Thus he easily made his peace, was knighted, and appointed one of the king's sergeants. In that capacity he frequently took part in the State trials, and he also acted as principal manager for the Commons in the trial of Lord Stafford. In the solitary Parliament of James II., Maynard opposed the encroachment of the king, and he refused to appear for the crown against the Seven Bishops. In the Convention Parliament Maynard took a prominent part, conducted the conference with the Lords on the question of the "abdication" of James, and was nominated the first of the Commissioners of the Great Seal.

Poem, Judges of England.

Mayne, CUTHBERT, a Catholic priest, was executed Nov., 1577, for having denied the queen's supremacy, and celebrated mass. The trial is remarkable for the fact that no proof was obtained, and the prisoner was actually convicted on the ground of strong presumption only.

Mayo, RICHARD SOUTHWELL BOURKE, 6TH LORD (b. 1822, d. 1872), eldest son of the fifth Lord Mayo, entered Parliament in 1847, as member for Kildare. He was Chief Secretary for Ireland under Lord Derby in 1852, and again in 1856 and 1866. In 1868 he was appointed Governor-General of India. His reign was a period of peace, and was marked by the inauguration of numerous enterprises for the improvement of the social and material condition of the natives. Lord Mayo was assassinated Feb. 8, 1872, by a Mohammedan fanatic at Port Blair, in the Andaman Islands.

Mayor. The title "Mayor" symbolises municipal self-government—the possession of those rights which were implied in the recognition of a town as a "communa." The first certain instance of its use appears to be in London. Here the concession of the communa by Earl John and Walter of Rouen in 1191 is followed at once by the appearance of a mayor, Henry Fitz-Alwyn. Three years after the death of Henry Fitz-Alwyn, who had retained the office for life, John in 1215, in order to win the support of the citizens, conceded to the barons of London by charter the right of annually choosing their mayor. The person elected was, however, to be approved by the king. Though chosen only for a year it was usual until 1319 to re-elect the same person for several years; from that year dates the practice of an annual election. According to the evidence of the Rolls, it is to the reign of John that the possession of a mayor in the other great towns, such as Bristol, York, Norwich, Lincoln, and Winchester is due. Local lists of mayors giving earlier dates are scarcely trustworthy. During the thirteenth century town politics turn chiefly on the question who was to elect the mayor—the aldermen, representing the propertied class, or the populace. This struggle is particularly important in London during the Barons' War, when the commons sided with De Montfort's party, the magnates with the king. The popular party were successful, and secured the election of their own candidate in 1263—65, but the royal victory in 1266 brought with it a suspension of the city constitution altogether, and the town remained under a "custos," and not a mayor, till 1270. The contest was renewed in 1272, but in 1273 the aldermen, supported by the Royal Council, regained their power. The suspension of the town constitution was the penalty not only for popular violence, but also for attempts of the magistracy to extend its power. Thus London was without a mayor, and under a custos, from 1285 to 1298, because the mayor had endeavoured to gain exemption for the city from the jurisdiction of the justices in eyre. The fourteenth century sees the rise of the craft guilds, and their efforts to gain control of the administration, including the election of the mayor. In these efforts they are entirely successful in the reign of Edward IV. The same general lines of development are seen in the other great towns; the struggle of the magnates against the commons for the election of the mayor, against royal interference, the occasional nomination of a custos, and the increasing importance of the trade societies. The struggle between the aldermen and the people of York happened curiously enough in 1381; whether it had any connection with the Peasant Rising has not been ascertained. In conferring a new charter in 1389 Richard II. gave the mayor his own sword: after this he assumes the title of Lord Mayor, hitherto only borne by the mayor of London. Another point of interest is offered in the conflicts between the mayors, representing town self-government, and the lords of such towns as were in the demesnes of prelates. The most notable instance is that of Reading, when in the thirteenth century mayor and abbot struggle concerning the merchant guild, and in the fourteenth concerning the nomination of constables, and when as late as the fifteenth century the abbots claimed a voice in the choice of the mayor.

Meal-Tub Plot, THE (1679), was a pretended conspiracy fabricated by the inflexible Dangerfield, who hoped thereby to emulate Oates and Bedloe. He declared that the Presbyterians were conspiring to raise an army and establish a republic. At first he was believed, but his imposture being discovered, he was committed to Newgate, when he suddenly turned round and declared that the pretended conspiracy was an imposture concocted by the Papists to hide a real Popish Plot, which had for its object the murder of the king. The papers relating to this plot were, he declared, concealed in a Meal-tub in the house of Mrs. Cellier, a Roman Catholic lady, who was tried with Lady Powys for the alleged plot, but acquitted.

Measures, THE ASSIZE OF (1197), was issued for the purpose of securing the uniformity of weights and measures throughout the kingdom. But it was found impossible to break down local custom, and even Magna Charta was not obeyed in this respect. Indeed, it is only just now that any serious attempt is being made to secure that uniformity which would be so beneficial.

Meath, THE KINGDOM OF, is said to have been formed about 150 A.D., by Tuathal Techmar, a chieftain of the Scoti tribe (probably allied to the Brigantian Gauls) as the demesne land of the ard ri, or over-king of Ireland. For this purpose he took pieces of land from each of the four kingdoms; from Connaught the hill of Usnech, the old religious centre of the Irish, from Munster the mound of Tlachtga, from Ulster, Tailti (Teltown), and from Leinster the hill of Tara. The last became his principal residence, and the place of assembly of the under-kings of Ireland, while each of those places became a religious centre where great festivals were held. Meath now comprised the present county of Meath, Westmeath, and parts of Longford and King's County. Tuathal made Leinster completely subservient, and is said to have created a standing army, which afterwards became celebrated as the Fenians. The power of the ard ri was soon menaced by that of the rival kingdom of Munster, and Tuathal's grandson, Conn, "of the hundred battles," was forced by Mug of Munster to divide Ireland into two parts, the north being Conn's half, the south Mug's half. The power of the ard ri seems to have been precarious, and the over-kings were chosen from various branches of the Milesian race, until in the fifth century Miall "of the nine hostages," of the race of Elimon, founded the Hui-Neill dynasty, which from 483—when Lugaid, the son of Laeghairé, established himself upon the throne—was dominant in Ireland for five hundred years, the sovereignty alternating between the two branches. In 558 the ard ri deserted Tara in consequence of a curse pronounced upon it by St. Rodanus, or Ruadan, because of the violation of his sanctuary by King Diarmaid (Dermot), and their residence became unsettled, the kings of the southern Hui-Neill dynasty, whose settlements were in Meath, living in Westmeath, those of the northern race, whose possessions were in Ulster, establishing themselves in Derry. There was therefore no central power, and hence the weak resistance offered to the Teutonic invaders of whom the Fingals, or Norwegians, founded a considerable colony in Meath, and by whom a tribute was imposed upon the southern Hui-Neills. In 980, however, Malachi II., of the clan Colmain, King of Meath, became ard ri, on the extinction of the direct branches of the Hui-Neills or O'Neills as they now called themselves, and he was the last of his race who held that dignity without dispute. During his lifetime it was usurped for a time by Brian Boru, and after his death it was assumed more than once by the Kings of Leinster, and by the O'Loughlins of Ailech. In fact, from the beginning of the eleventh century, the power of the O'Melachlins (sons of Malachi) of Meath was, as a rule, at a low ebb, and after the Anglo-Norman invasion the province was bestowed on Hugh de Lacy, through whose great-granddaughters it passed into the families of De Gennerville, lords of Trim, and of De Verdon, barons of Dundalk. The lordships of Trim passed by marriage into the hands of Mortimer, Earl of March, and vested in the crown, while the De Verdon property went to the Talbots, Earls of Shrewsbury, by whom it was forfeited to the crown under the statute against absentees. In the reign of Elizabeth, Meath, now reduced to its present dimensions, was added to the province of Leinster. It received a large English colony during James I.'s later plantations, and again during the Cromwellian settlement. The ancient tumuli with which Meath is covered are thought to be relics of the Tuatha dé Danarus (tribes of Dia and Ara), the fourth of the invading tribes, a branch of the Nemidians, who were probably of Gaulish origin.

Meaux, ANNALS OF, is the name given to the records of the Cistercian abbey of Meaux, in Yorkshire, which extend from 1150 to 1406, and were collected by Thomas de Burton, the nineteenth abbot. They have been published in the Rolls Series.

Meer Cossim was the son-in-law of Meer Jaffier. Raised to the musnud of Moorshedabad by Mr. Vansittart on the deposition of Meer Jaffier (1760), he quarrelled with the English about the revenue laws, and murdered an embassy sent to effect a pacification. War was declared; Moorshedabad was taken, and the Nabob was compelled to fly. Before he fled he caused the whole of the English residents in the Patna factory (150 in number) to be imprisoned, shot down, and cut to pieces, their mangled remains being thrown into wells. Meer Cossim fled to Oude. Sujah Dowlah, the vizier, received him with favour; but the terrible defeat of Buxar, and the return of Clive to India, so alarmed the vizier that he compelled Meer Cossim to leave the country (1765).

Meer Jaffier was appointed Nabob of Moorshedabad, or Bengal, by Clive after Plassey (1757), and granted the zemindary of Calcutta to the English. On the death of his son Meerun, during the Mogul invasion, he lost his reason, and his affairs fell into anarchy. His son-in-law, Meer Cossim, took advantage of this to obtain the throne from

Mr. Vansittart, Governor of Bengal, at the price of the cession of Midnapore, Chittagong, and Burdwan, to the Company, and a gratuity of twenty lacs to his benefactors.

Meeting, THE RIGHT OF PUBLIC, as opposed to rioting, first became important in 1768, when the Middlesex electors, supported by the most prominent politicians of the day, assembled to protest against the infringement of their rights by the House of Commons. Meetings were also held in their support in no less than seventeen counties. The question, which became intimately connected with that of petition, was again raised in 1779—80, when an agitation began in Yorkshire and spread over England, in favour of economical and Parliamentary reform. The House of Commons at this time protested against the practice of sending delegates to London with petitions, but were unable to prevent it. The right of meeting was grievously abused by the Protestant associations which led to the Lord George Gordon riots of 1780; but the Anti-Slave Trade Association of 1787 carefully kept within the law. The terror caused by the French Revolution at length determined ministers to have recourse to repressive measures. Several societies already established, chief among which were the Revolution Society, the Society for Constitutional Information, and the London Corresponding Society, had received a fresh impulse from events occurring on the other side of the Channel, and members of the latter especially had indulged in violent language. This was met by several trials for sedition both in England and Scotland, in which the sentences imposed, especially in the northern country, were of terrible severity, and the cases invariably prejudged. The acquittal of Horne Tooke, Thomas Hardy, and other members of the great societies on the charge of treason, in 1794, was, however, a severe blow to the government, which nevertheless continued the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and procured the conviction of Henry Redhead Yorke on a charge of conspiracy. The London Corresponding Society continued to hold meetings, one of which, being followed by an attack on the person of the king (1795), resulted in the passing, in company with a Treason Practices Bill, of a Seditious Meetings Bill, which provided that no political meeting of more than fifty persons could be held without previous notice to a magistrate, who was to attend in person, and might disperse them according to the Riot Act if he thought them dangerous. In spite of the vehement opposition of Fox and his friends, these bills became law by large majorities. The only result was that the societies had resort to secret conspiracy in conjunction with the French clubs and the United Irishmen, and were in consequence suppressed by the stringent Corresponding Societies Bill (1799). In 1817, when discontent, want, and zeal for Reform had caused riots in various parts of the country and an attack on the Prince Regent, the Acts of 1795 and 1799 against corresponding societies were extended to other associations, such as the Hampden and Spencean clubs. Meetings, however, only became larger and more revolutionary, especially in the manufacturing districts; and the rash action of the military resulted in the "Manchester Massacre" of 1819, and that criminal blunder was followed by the "Six Acts," one of which placed rigorous restrictions on all meetings of more than fifty persons, and entrusted magistrates with the amplest powers for their suppression and adjournment. In the following year, Orator Hunt, Sir C. Wolesey, the Rev. Joseph Harrison, and others, were tried for unlawfully meeting together, and sentenced to various periods of imprisonment. From that time onwards the right of meeting has been generally recognised by government, and lawful agitation is no longer confounded with riotous and disorderly assemblies. The Catholic Association in Ireland was allowed to continue, restrictions being placed alone on the proposal to appoint managers of petitions as being a violation of the Irish Convention Act of 1793, until it threatened to supersede Parliament. It was thereupon suppressed (1825), but continued in another form; and, being revived on the expiration of the Act, was again suppressed, but not until its objects had been completely gained (1829). The great Reform Bill was ushered in by the agitation of political unions throughout the country, and on the rejection of that measure by the House of Lords, these organisations exceeded their lawful limits by sending delegates to a national union in London. They were in consequence proclaimed, but continued nevertheless; and the surrender of the Lords alone prevented much violence and consequent coercion. The agitation for the Repeal of the Irish Union produced some monster meetings, such as that on the Hill of Tara (1843), which were so dangerous to the peace that the government had to repress them. A similar fate attended the Orange lodges, which, established about 1795 in opposition to the Catholic Association, spread into England, especially into the army, and dabbled in plots for placing the Duke of Cumberland on the throne (1836). The trades unions' procession, the object of which was the release of the Dorchester labourers, dispersed upon the refusal of Lord Melbourne to receive a deputation which relied to some extent on the exhibition of physical force (1834). A similar attitude was adopted towards the Chartists, who were not allowed to appear in large numbers at Westminster under pretence of presenting their huge petition, but whose meetings were tolerated as long as they were orderly. The agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws was happily unaccompanied by any attempts at terrorism or rioting. In Ireland the Land Agitation of 1880 and the subsequent years unfortunately compelled the government to place restrictions on the right of public meeting. The Land League was suppressed in (October, 1881, as "an illegal and criminal association," and the Prevention of Crimes Act of the following year empowered the Lord-Lieutenant to disperse assemblies calculated to disturb the peace; which power was frequently exercised in 1883 and 1884, in the case of Land League, Nationalist, and Orange assemblies. Megasotas, THE, were a Saxon tribe occupying the present county of Hereford.

Mellitus, Archbishop of Canterbury (619—624), was sent over by Gregory in 601 to assist Augustine in the conversion of the English. He preached the Gospel in Essex, baptised King Sebert, and became the first Bishop of London. On the death of Sebert, his sons re-established Paganism, and Mellitus fled to France, but returned to England in 618. On the death of Laurence in 619, Mellitus succeeded him, and held the archbishopric five years.

Melun, TREATY OF (1593), was concluded between Elizabeth and Henry IV. of France (after the latter had embraced the Catholic faith), and bound both sovereigns to maintain an offensive and defensive war against Philip as long as he should remain in hostility to either England or France.

Melville, ANDREW (b. 1545, d. 1622), entered the University of St. Andrews in 1560, and subsequently studied at Paris and Poitiers. In 1569 he was appointed Professor of Humanity at Geneva, and held that appointment till 1574. In the latter year he returned to his own country and was appointed Principal of Glasgow University (1574), and subsequently Principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews (1580), and Rector of the University in 1590. He was moderator of the General Assembly, 1587—94. In 1606 he was summoned to London in company with seven other of the leading Scottish ministers to discuss the question at issue between the king and the Scotch Church. A conference took place, which ended in an explosion of rage on Melville's part against the Primate. He was ordered to be imprisoned in the Tower and kept there for four years. In 1611 he was released at the request of the Duke of Bouillon. He passed the remaining years of his life as Professor of Divinity at Sedan.

Melville, SIR JAMES (b. 1530, d. 1606), a gentleman of Halhill in Fife, entered the service of the Elector Palatine, and was employed in several diplomatic missions. In 1531 he returned to Scotland, and was appointed a privy councillor and gentleman of the bedchamber to Mary Queen of Scots. He was continued in his employment about the court by James VI. His Memoirs, first printed in 1683, are of much value, and exceedingly interesting.

Members of Parliament. The House of Commons has no right to decide the eligibility of members; it can merely insist on the performance of those conditions under which alone it is lawful to sit and vote. In 1769 Wilkes, having been expelled the House, was declared "incapable of being elected a member to serve in this present Parliament," and Colonel Luttrell, though defeated by him at the poll, was admitted as member for Middlesex, but in 1782 the resolution against Wilkes was, on his own motion, expunged from the journals of the House as subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors. This principle was not acknowledged in earlier times, for in 1711 Sir Robert Walpole was declared ineligible in consequence of a previous expulsion. Nevertheless, a member though duly returned cannot sit and vote, until he has taken the oath provided by 31 and 32 Vict., c. 72, in place of the oaths of supremacy, allegiance, and abjuration settled by 30 Car. II., s. 2, though Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists are allowed to affirm instead. On May 3, 1880, Mr. Bradlaugh, member for Northampton, claimed to affirm, and his claim being rejected by a Select Committee, offered to take the oath. As, however, he had declared that an oath was not binding on his conscience, the House refused to allow him to do so. His claim to affirm was referred to the law courts, and the High Court of Justice decided that it was invalid. Any member sitting or voting before taking the oath, incurs a penalty of £500 for each offence besides vacating his seat. But though a member who refuses to be sworn may not take his seat, he does not cease to be a member of the House; he generally sits within its walls, though he must take care that his seat is below the bar, which for this purpose is held to be without the House; and he may, like Baron Rothschild in 1868, be called on to serve on committees. A member having been sworn, subscribes the oath in the test-book, and is presented to the Speaker by the Clerk of the House. The personal privilege of members formerly extended to freedom from arrest or molestation for themselves, their servants, and their goods. This privilege was founded on a law of Æthelberht, and was recognised by statute (5 Hen. IV., c. 6) in the case of Chedder. For the reign of George III. this privilege was dropped as regards servants, and now extends only to the person of members for forty days before, during, and for forty days after a session. It never covered treason, murder, felony, or breach of the peace, and since the House in 1753 took a less liberal view of its own privileges—by refusing in Wilkes's case to extend them to seditious libel—than was held by the Court of Common Pleas, it has not covered any indictable offence. It is the duty of a judge on committing a member to prison to inform the House of the fact, that it may satisfy itself as to the question of privilege. A member is not exempted from punishment for contempt of court, for in 1831 Lord Chancellor Brougham committed Mr. Long Wellesley for contempt, and the House refused to interfere in his behalf. More lately, in 1882, Mr. Gray, member for Dublin, was imprisoned for contempt at the end of the session. His imprisonment ended before the next meeting of Parliament, and a Select Committee reported that the case did not demand the attention of the House. A member may be expelled, and expulsion may be said to follow such ill-conduct as would render a man unfit to sit in the House, while it is also inflicted on any member absconding from justice, as in the case of Sadleir in 1857. By a standing order of 1880 suspension is incurred by wilful obstruction of the business of the House. All members are bound by 5 Rich. II., c. 4, to render personal service in Parliament, and their attendance may be enforced by a call of the House, though there has been no instance of such a proceeding since 1836. When, therefore, a member wishes to remain in the country he should obtain leave of absence. A member vacates his seat by elevation to the peerage, and since 6 Anne, c. 7, by the acceptance of a lucrative office under the crown. If, however, he has already vacated his seat by taking office, and has been re-elected, he does not again vacate it by the acceptance of a new office. No member can relinquish his seat, and since 1750 the custom has obtained that a member wishing to retire from Parliament should apply to the crown for a nominal office, such as the Stewardship of one of the three Chiltern Hundreds. These offices are in the gift of the Treasury. They are generally granted to all members applying for them, and are surrendered as soon as they have worked the desired end. The grant of these offices, however, is in the discretion of the minister, and in 1775 Lord North refused the Chiltern Stewardship to a member wishing to be relieved of his seat in order that he might stand against a ministerial candidate at Abingdon. Mepham, SIMON (or SIMON OF MEOP-HAM), Archbishop of Canterbury (1328—1333), was a canon of Chichester, and was elected to the primacy by the influence of Queen Isabella, whose chaplain he probably was. His five years' tenure of office was uneventful.

Merchant Adventurers, THE, were a trading guild established in Brabant in 1296, and having numerous branches in England. In the latter country they received the title by patent of Henry VII. in 1505. In 1564 the Merchant Adventurers were incorporated by Elizabeth, and received some extensive privileges of trade to the East.

Merchants, THE CHARTER OF THE (1303), was granted by Edward I. to the foreign merchants, and gave them certain important privileges, in return for which he received from them a considerable sum of money in the shape of duties on wool and other articles.

Merchants, THE STATUTE OF (1283), known also as the Statute of Acton Burnell, from the place where the Parliament which enacted it was held, was one of Edward I.'s important commercial measures. It provided for the registration of merchants' debts, their recovery by distraint, and the debtors' imprisonment.

Mercia was the great Anglian kingdom of central England. Originally the term seems to have been confined to that particular Anglian settlement which occupied the district round Tamworth and Lichfield, and the Upper Trent Valley. West of this a range of moorlands checked the progress of the invaders for a considerable period. Their proximity to the unconquered Welsh gave them the title of Mercians, or Men of the March. Nothing definite can be determined as to the date of this original Mercian settlement, but it must have been later than that of the more eastern Anglian settlements in mid-England. It was, however, probably made in the latter half of the sixth century. Nothing is known of its first king, Crida, who died in 600; Wybba (600—610) and Ceorl (610—626) were of equal insignificance. But in 626 a great king, Penda, son of Wybba, began to reign. He found Middle England split up into a large number of independent Anglian settlements. These had, perhaps, been already dependent on Ethelbert of Kent and Rædwald of East Anglia. Penda reduced them to a permanent dependence on the men of the March. Henceforth Lindiswaras and Gyrras, Middle English and South English, Pecosætan, Hwiccas, Hecanas, and Megasetas were but under-kingdoms of the Mercian monarch. They were still centres of local feeling. Lines of subreguli, or hereditary ealdormen, continued to reign in them. But for great political purposes, Mercia is henceforth synonymous with Middle England. Penda, the creator of this greater Mercia, was also the representative of the heathen re-action which followed Augustine's mission. He was, moreover, the uncompromising foe of the rising power of Northumbria. In alliance with the Welshmen he defeated and slew Edwin the Bretwalda. Oswald, the sainted king, was equally unable to withstand him. But at last Oswiu, his successor, destroyed the power of Mercia at the battle of Winwood (655). Penda fell on the field. Oswiu gave law to all England. The greater Mercia began to break up, and some parts were even conquered by Oswiu. But in 659, on the death of Penda, the next king, the Mercians seized arms in despair, and led by Wulfhere, nephew of Penda, drove out the Northumbrians, and effectually consolidated the greater Mercia. It may have been now that the Mercian boundary was pushed southward to the Thames. Meanwhile Christianity had silently become the religion of Mercia, and Theodore of Tarsus found in Wulfhere and his brother and successor, Ethelred (675—704), active and powerful auxiliaries. In 704 Ethelred withdrew to a monastery. His nephew Cenred, son of Wulfhere, reigned over the Mercians till 709, when Ceolred, son of Ethelred, succeeded, and in 715 sustained the great defeat of Wanborough from Ine of Wessex. He died in 716. His successor, Ethelbald, son of Alweo, brother of Penda (716—755), took advantage of Ine's abdication, and the growing anarchy of Northumbria, to establish that Mercian overlordship that was to endure for fully a century. A series of successful wars subdued all the neighbouring States, and Ethelbald with good reason claimed to be rex non solum Mercensium sed et omnium populorum qui generali nomine Sutatangi dicuntur. But the end of his reign was unfortunate. In 754 the revolt of the conquered people was followed by the defeat and flight of Ethelbald at Burford. Next year he died, and even the genius of Offa (757—795), who, after a year of anarchy, became King of the Mercians, could not wholly undo this great disaster. Yet Offa became the greatest king of his day. He put his dependents in the neighbouring kingdoms, and established a series of alliances that made his power irresistible; conquered eastern Powis from the Welsh, and built the dyke that goes by his name to protect his western frontier: established at Lichfield a short-lived archbishopric that made Mercia ecclesiastically independent, and corresponded on equal terms with Charles the Great himself. Cenwulf, a successor (796—819), was hardly less powerful. But soon after his death the collapse of the Mercian power at Ellandun—where Beornwulf was defeated by Egbert—handed over the supremacy of Britain to Wessex. The power of Mercia had been based on nothing but the prowess of its kings. It retained that want of centralisation which flowed naturally from its origin; and if remarkable for military ability, was behindhand in culture and civilisation. The failure of the royal house, combined with the great invasion of the Danes, completed the Mercian overthrow. Ludecan and Wiglaf were mere puppet kings. When the struggle was over, half Mercia was regularly settled by Norse Vikings; the other half, that to the west and south of Watling Street, was a mere ealdormanship under the West Saxon kings. Ethelred, the new ealdorman of the Mercians, and after his death his wife Ethelflaed, "Lady of the Mercians," the daughter of Alfred the Great, were strong and vigorous rulers; but they ruled in the West Saxon interest. On the latter's death, Mercia, enlarged by the gradual re-conquest of the Danish portion, ceased to have a ruler of its own. Yet it retained for many generations its local patriotism. The policy of Dunstan may have conciliated it; the policy of Edwy led to its revolt, and the setting up a king for itself in Edgar. But on Edwy's death conquered Mercia gave a king to the victorious West Saxons. The establishment of the great earldoms revived local Mercian feeling. Elfgar, Leofric, Edwin, and Morcar became in a sense new rulers of Mercia. Had not the Norman Conquest intervened they might have re-established Mercian independence. But the Norman administrative system for ever put an end to dreams of particularism. Despite the schemes of Earls Ralph and Roger to revive the Heptarchy in the interests of feudalism, despite the distinction of law that survived down to the days of the Dialogus De Scaccario, Mercia ends its political existence with the Norman Conquest. There are no peculiarly Mercian Chronicles of early date, so that its early history is very obscure. It has to be pieced together from casual references in West Saxon and Northumbrian Chronicles, and from charters and laws. J. R. Green, Making and Conquest of England, and Palgrave's English Commonwealth may be referred to for modern account.

Merciless, or WONDERFUL PARLIAMENT, THE (1388), was summoned by the Lords Appellant after the defeat of De Vere and the royalist party, for the purpose of obtaining a sanction to their acts. Gloucester declared his innocence of any attempt to depose the king; the judges who had declared the commission of regency illegal were arrested and banished to Ireland; the royal ministers were impeached and sentenced to death, and other offenders were punished, and £20,000 was voted to the Lords Appellant. The legislative work was undertaken by this Parliament, and its acts, as Dr. Stubbs says, "fully establish its right to the title [of "merciless,"] and stamp with infamy the men who, whether their political crimes were or were not salutary to the constitution, disgraced the cause by excessive and vindictive cruelty."

Merton. THE STATUTE OF (1236), was enacted by the barons in a great council assembled at Merton, January 23, 1236, shortly after the marriage of Henry III. and Eleanor of Provence. The barons declared in it that they were unwilling to change the laws of England, which would seem to intimate a fear on their part of the foreign influences which might be expected from the marriage.

Merton, WALTER DE (d. 1277), one of the clerks in Chancery, was in 1261 appointed Chancellor, continuing in his office till 1263, and in 1272, on the death of Henry III., he was chosen by the council of regency to fill the office once more. He resigned the post on his appointment to the see of Rochester in 1274, and during these two years he may be said to have practically ruled the kingdom. But it is not as Chancellor that Walter de Merton is best known; he was the founder of Merton College, and consequently it is to him that Oxford owes the collegiate system, a system in its later developments peculiar to the two ancient English universities. In 1277 he was accidentally drowned while crossing the Medway.

Metcalf, CHARLES, LORD (b. 1784, d. 1846), entered the East India Company's service, and was trained up in the school of Lord Wellesley (q.v.). In 1808, at the early age of twenty-four, he was selected by Lord Minto to negotiate the alliance with Runjeet Singh. He carried out his mission successfully, and succeeded in concluding the Treaty of Umritsir (1809). Subsequently he negotiated the treaty with Ameer Khan in 1817 during the Mahratta War, and conducted the delicate negotiations with Toolsye Bhye, the regent of the Holkar State, during the same war. In 1820 he was appointed Resident at Hyderabad. On the resignation of Sir David Ochterlony (1825), Sir Charles Metcalfe was appointed Resident at Delhi for Rajpootana. In 1834 he was appointed Governor of the newly-created Presidency of the North-West Provinces, and in 1835, in consequence of the premature departure of Lord William Bentinck, he was obliged to return to Calcutta, and assume the provisional Governor-Generalship, which he continued to hold for a year. On the arrival of Lord Auckland he proceeded to Agra. Soon after his arrival (1836) he learned that the press law carried by him during his Governor-Generalship had exasperated the India House, and that in consequence his name had not been even mentioned in connection with the vacant governorship of Madras. He resigned his appointment. His services were fully appreciated by the crown. He was appointed Governor of Jamaica (1839—41), and Canada (1842—45) successively, and for his eminent services was raised to the peerage as Lord Metcalfe in 1846. The difficulties which he experienced from factious opposition, and his own ill-health, produced his resignation (1846), and he returned to England to die in 1846. "During the space of forty-five years," says Mr. Kaye, "he had toiled unremittingly for the good of the State in foreign lands and under hostile skies."

Methuen Treaty, THE, was a commercial convention between England and Portugal, concluded on Dec. 27, 1703, by Paul Methuen. Portugal bound itself to admit English woollen manufactures on the same terms as before the late prohibition of them. England agreed to admit Portuguese wines on payment of two-thirds of the duty imposed on French wines. Adam Smith judges that this treaty was eminently advantageous to Portugal, and disadvantageous to Great Britain. But it was generally regarded at the time as "a master-piece of commerce and policy." It was expected that England would annually sell more than she would buy, and that a balance in gold and silver would be returned for it, and this expectation was realised. The treaty, however, was dictated as much by political as commercial considerations, in order to diminish the trade with France, and secure the alliance of Portugal. In this object also it was successful. It was finally annulled by the supplementary treaty of 1835.

Military System. In the earliest times, the military system of the Teutonic races reposed on the broadest and most national basis. Even in the general assembly, the freemen always appeared armed. Their army was in fact the popular assembly in its military aspect. Ruled over by elective duces, encouraged to valour by the presence of kindred and neighbours, the old Teutonic host, described by Tacitus, was in a very intimate sense the army of the people. Yet even in those days the comitatus of the princeps, which, by devoting its whole energies to fighting, was probably the most efficient military force, was of other than popular origin. It was the body-guard, the personal following of the king or leader. After the migration to England, the same system continued. It was a primary principle of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence that every landholder was obliged to serve in the fyrd, as the popular host was now called. Fyrdbot was part of the trinoda necessitas. Arranged by the sheriff, the fyrd was simply the county court in arms. But want of cohesion between various localities made its operations uncertain, and the want of discipline in a citizen militia frequently rendered it ineffective. The glorious fight of Brihtnoth and the East Anglian fyrd against the Danes at Maldon, shows what the fyrd of a limited district could do; but attempts to aggregate the national militia of the whole nation in a single body were in those early times nearly impossible. Yet, when well led, the fyrd fought well, and its national character was of great political importance as keeping alive national feeling. Still the West Saxon kings would hardly have attained to their imperial position, if, in addition to the forces of the allodial system, they had not also to rely upon the services of their gesiths and thegns. These personal retainers of the monarch, the comites in a developed form, formed a body-guard of trained soldiers, always at hand. But as time went on, the thegn became more of a feudal noble, dwelling on his estate, and only serving his lord on occasion. Thus the *thegn*hood became untrustworthy also, until its revival in a more primitive form, in the huscarls of Cnut, gave the king again the services of a standing body-guard of highly-trained professional soldiers.

Such was in outline the old English military system. In it we have the germ of most of the later developments of the English army, the national militia, the feudal levies, and even permanent mercenary troops. The Norman Conquest largely developed the feudal element by the wholesale introduction of tenure by military service, and by gradually dividing the land of England into "knights' fees," held by the tenure of providing and equipping a heavy-armed horseman to serve his lord for forty days in the year. William the Conqueror himself saw clearly the constitutional danger and the military worthlessness of the feudal army. In want of discipline, irregularity, and incapacity for development, it surpassed the fyrd. It was, moreover, largely composed of the disloyal party of the feudal baronage, ever anxious to destroy the royal power, and consequently a source of weakness more than of strength. Henry II. saw this, and by the institution of scutage, largely superseded the direct service of the feudal array by a money composition. This enabled him to carry out still farther the policy of the Norman kings, and depend for the most part on Flemish or Brabançon mercenaries, who, bound to their lord by no tie but good pay and the rough loyalty of a soldier to his general, and often composed of the very scum of society, were yet efficient military instruments.

But mercenaries were expensive, unpopular, and frequently treacherous. They were unpleasant necessities, rather than welcome ones. The Norman and Angevin monarchs consequently sought, by the maintenance of the fyrd-system, to retain the services of a body which always supported the crown against the feudal party. The history of the national militia subsequently to the Conquest, strongly illustrates the continuity of English constitutional development. William I. exacted from every freeman the old national oath to join in defending the king, his lands and his honour both at home and beyond sea. In 1073 the fyrd took a prominent share in the conquest of Maine. William II. cheated the fyrd out of the ten shillings a-piece which the shires had given them for their maintenance. Yet it was always faithful to the crown in its struggle against the feudalists. The defeat of Robert of Belesme, the repulse of David of Scotland at Northallerton, the suppression of the feudal revolt of 1173 were largely due to its valour and patriotism.

Still, the heavy cavalry of the barons was, from the military point of view, a necessary supplement to the infantry of the fyrd, and with the political importance of feudalism annihilated, there was less danger in the feudal array. Yet Henry II., while relying for foreign service mainly on mercenaries paid for by the scutages of the barons, trusted to the fyrd for home defence. His Assize of Arms (1181) revived and reorganised that ancient body, and devised an excellent machinery for compelling every citizen (tota communia liberorum hominum) to possess the arms appropriate to his station in life. The increased dread of mercenaries, through their misuse by John, and their attempts to control the destinies of the kingdom during his son's minority, gave an increased importance to the re-issue of the Assize of Arms by Henry III. in close connection with the system of Watch and Ward. In the Statute of Winchester, Edward I. (1286) still further developed the same system, which a series of later measures of Henry IV., Philip and Mary, and James I. has brought down to our own days.

The vague power, never perhaps formally taken away from the sheriff, of summoning the posse comitatus, was from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century supplemented by more definite commissions of array, empowering those addressed to muster and train all men able to bear arms within the counties included in the commission: while in the reign of Philip and Mary the institution of lord-lieutenants in every county practically deprived the sheriff of his command of the national forces. Henceforth, the lord-lieutenant was the deputy of the crown for all military matters, and the ultimate custodian of law and order. But the Act of 1 Jac. I., c. 25, had to some extent repealed the long series of statutes which enforced the obligation of keeping sufficient arms on each citizen. The Artillery

Company of London, which still continues to exist, sprang from a voluntary association during Henry VIII.'s reign, and the "train bands" of the seventeenth century, which the Act of James I. substituted for the mediæval system, though in a sense the continuation of the fyrd, were also largely of voluntary origin. The difficulties caused by the militia question in 1642, between Charles I. and his Parliament, the prominent part taken by the train bands in the Great Rebellion, rendered it necessary for the Restoration Parliament to reorganise the national forces, and reconstitute the militia under the headship of the crown. Up to 1757 this force was, however, quite neglected, when the absence of the regular army on the Continent caused it to be revived as a local organisation for internal defence. Its importance as a recruiting ground for the army was also a great reason for its revival. Under George III. and Victoria a series of Acts of Parliament have modified the militia laws. During these reigns army reforms were effected that brought the militia into organic relation with the standing army, without destroying its local basis. Previous to these reforms, service was nominally compulsory, though a Militia Ballot Suspension Act made it practically voluntary. As a means of national defence, the militia has been at various times supplemented by a volunteer system, self-supporting and unpaid. The Artillery Company is an early example of such a force. In 1803 the fear of French invasion caused nearly half a million of men to enrol themselves into volunteer regiments; but the cessation of the panic led to the gradual dying out of the movement. In 1859 a more permanent volunteer organisation was started, which has continued to flourish until the present day, and which now includes nearly 200,000 effective citizen soldiers. An Act of 1863 gave this organisation a legal status, and the tendency of recent military reform is to connect them more closely with the militia and the regular army, as essential factors of the British military system.

Thus far the non-professional and irregular military forces have mainly been dealt with. But even in mediæval times the national militia became gradually both unfit and unwilling for foreign service, for which the shortness of the service of the feudal levies still more disqualified them. The mercenary system of the Normans and Angevins became impossible with the development of constitutional government. The need of regular forces became greater with the development of the political power of England. During the Middle Ages the feudal tenants, or the militia of the neighbouring shires, were enough to repel a Scotch or Welsh inroad; but the systematic wars with France which the fourteenth century witnessed required more systematic forces. The armies which fought in the Hundred Years' War, though to a small extent composed of feudal tenants and of forced levies of pressed men, were mainly raised by indentures or contracts made with some great noble or experienced general, who agreed to serve the king abroad with a certain number of men at a fixed rate. The pay was very high, and there was never any difficulty in raising the men. The contract generally ended with the war, so that these armies, though composed of trained troops, were not permanent. Penalties for desertion and disobedience were inflicted by statutes which anticipated the later Mutiny Acts.

The germ of a standing army is found in the Yeomen of the Guard instituted by Henry VII., and in the small garrisons of Calais, Berwick, and Dover. In the reign of Elizabeth there were anticipations, in the reign of Charles I. the beginnings, of a larger standing force. The complaints of martial law and illegal impressment now became general. The struggle of the crown for the right of maintaining a standing army had now begun. It was to last until the principle was unwillingly accepted at the end of the seventeenth century.

The abortive armies of Charles I. and the commencement of a military law that marked his reign were soon eclipsed by the great army levied by Parliament [NEW MODEL], which the genius of Cromwell moulded into the most efficient fighting machine known in English history. Under the Restoration several regiments of Cromwell's army were still maintained. At first, these numbered only 3,000 men, but during Charles II.'s reign not only were temporary armies levied for emergencies, but several new regiments added to the permanent forces. The abolition of the feudal levies by the Act 12 Car. II., long after they had ceased to be of any great value, though they were summoned so late as 1640, made a standing army the more necessary. James II. largely increased these troops, and the French war, which the Revolution involved, prevented their disbandment. But a standing army was very unpopular with all parties. To the Whigs it suggested tyranny and popery, to the Tories the military despotism of Cromwell. Only after a great struggle was an army of 7,000 men retained after the Peace of Ryswick. But those debates practically decided the question. Henceforth England has always had a standing army. The constitutional difficulty had been got over by passing an annual Mutiny Act, which alone empowered the sovereign to govern the troops by martial law. Despite popular jealousy, the numbers of the army have steadily risen. After the Peace of Utrecht the army numbered 8,000. In 1750 it was nearly 19,000. In 1792 it had decreased to 17,000 in time of peace, though in 1777 it had been 90,000; and in 1812 nearly a quarter of a million of men were under arms. The East India Company had been allowed to levy a separate army for the defence of the Indies. After the Indian Mutiny it was incorporated with the royal forces. In the years 1871 and 1872 important changes were made which had the effect of joining together all the various branches of the English military system into a single whole. In 1871 the purchase of commissions by officers was abolished by royal warrant.

The modern standing army of England has always been mainly raised by voluntary enlistment. But so late as the American War "idle and disorderly persons" were impressed for the army as well as for the navy. Difficulties in the way of recruiting were often felt. Perhaps this partly accounts for the survival of the contract system of the Edwards as late as the eighteenth century. So great was the constitutional difficulty suggested by the standing army that only 5,000 men were allowed to live in barracks at the beginning of this century.

The administration of the modern military system is still complicated by the double powers of the Commander-in-chief and the Secretary of State for War. Up to the Crimean War it was extraordinarily cumbersome. The Commander-in-chief, responsible to the crown; the "Secretary of State for War and the Colonies," whose power was limited to war time; the "Secretary at War," the Parliamentary representative of the army; the Treasury, which controlled the Commissariat; the Home Office, which governed the Militia—all exercised clashing jurisdictions. The piecemeal growth of our military system is in no way better illustrated. All modern reforms have been in the direction of simplicity.

MILL, JAMES (b. 1773, d. 1836), was licensed a preacher in the Scotch Church, but came to London and devoted himself to literature. He received an appointment in the India Office, and rose to be head of the revenue department. Mill was one of the most prominent of those who understood and developed the views of Bentham on government and legislation. [BENTHAM.] Besides numerous works on metaphysics, economics, and political theory, which have exerted great influence on the thought of the century, Mill wrote a History of British India (1817—18), which, though somewhat unhappy in point of style, and coloured by the author's desire to illustrate his own theories, is a very valuable work, compiled with great industry and research.

Prof. A. Bain, Biography of James Mill.

MILL, JOHN STUART (b. 1806, d. 1873), son of the above, after a very careful education by his father, entered the India House in 1823, and in 1856 became head of the Examiner's department, from which he retired in 1858. In 1865 he was elected member for Westminster, but was defeated in 1868. In Parliament he was an advanced Liberal, and supported with much earnestness Woman's Suffrage. Mr. Mill wrote numerous works, including A System of Logic, 1843; The Principles of Political Economy, 1848; On Liberty, 1859; Dissertations and Discussions, 1859—75; The Subjection of Women, 1869; Three Essays on Religion, 1874. In almost all departments of political, social, and moral philosophy, Mr. Mill's influence has been very great. As the thinker who attempted to develop and adapt the utilitarianism of Bentham to the complicated needs of modern society, his place is specially important. While as a political economist he forms one in the line of succession of great English writers on the subject, which began with Adam Smith.

Mill's Autobiography, an interesting and fascinating work, appeared after his death in 1873.

MILNER-GIBSON, THOMAS (b. 1807, d. 1884), was returned (Aug. 1837) as member for Ipswich in the Conservative interest. In a short time, however, he changed his opinions, vacated his seat, and was defeated on seeking re-election. He remained some time out of Parliament, devoted himself to the great movement against the Corn Laws, and was one of the most active promoters of the Anti-Corn Law League. In 1846, at the conclusion of the Anti-Corn Law agitation, Mr. Milner-Gibson was appointed Vice-President of the Board of Trade. In April, 1848, he resigned. He identified himself so completely with the "Peace Party," during the great struggle with Russia, that he was defeated at Manchester at the general election of 1861, caused by the success of his vote of censure on Lord Palmerston. In 1867, however, he was returned for Ashton-under-Lyne. In 1869 he was appointed President of the Board of Trade, which post he held till the dissolution of the Russell ministry in June, 1866.

MINDEN, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 1, 1759), was fought during the Seven Years' War. Ferdinand of Brunswick, the commander of the allies, had under him 10,000 or 12,000 British soldiers, under Lord George Sackville. He had previously made an unsuccessful attempt to recapture Frankfort from the French. The French commanders, De Broglie and Contades, pushed after him, and rapidly took Cassel, Münster, and Minden. Ferdinand maintained his position on the right bank of the Weser, and left a detachment of 5,000 men, seemingly unguarded, to lure Contades from his strong position at Minden. The Duke de Broglie was despatched to attack this body of men, but he was compelled to summon Contades to his assistance. The French generals were thus obliged to accept battle on unfavourable ground. After a furious but ineffectual cavalry attack on the allied horse, the French were compelled to retreat. Orders were sent three successive times from Ferdinand to Lord George Sackville, who was with the cavalry on the right of the allies, ordering him to charge, and annihilate the enemy; but he declined to obey. A vigorous charge was, however, made by the Marquis of Granby with the second line of cavalry; and though this was now too late to be effectual, the retreating French were broken by a body of 10,000 men, whom Ferdinand had despatched to cut off their communications.

Minorca was taken (1708) during the War of the Succession in Spain. The object of the English commanders was to acquire a harbour in which the fleet could pass the winter. Stanhope prevailed on Sir John Leake, much against his will, to join him in the enterprise. The natives were found to be well disposed, and, though considerable difficulty was experienced in dragging the guns up the rocks, the walls were soon battered down, and the Spanish garrison surrendered. The island was ceded to England by the Treaty of Utrecht. In 1756 it was recaptured by the French. Although it was known that the French were meditating an expedition against the island, no adequate measures were taken to defend it. When 16,000 troops under the Duc de Richelieu arrived at the island, General Blakeney, with his 2,800 men, withdrew into the citadel of St. Philip. Admiral Byng, after a feeble attempt to relieve the town, left it to its fate. It was battered day and night from sixty-two cannon, twenty-one mortars, and four howitzers, besides the small arms. A breach was made, and the garrison, seeing no hope of rescue, surrendered (June 28). The island was restored to England by the Treaty of Paris (1762). In 1781 it was again recaptured by 12,000 French and Spaniards, although General Murray and his men, reduced by sickness to 700, made a resolute defence. In the following year it was ceded to Spain, and in 1783 formally given up to her. In 1798, in the midst of the struggle with Napoleon, it was re-taken by General Stuart, but finally given up to Spain by the Treaty of Amiens (1802).

Minorities, REPRESENTATION OF. Provision was made for the representation of minorities in large constituencies by the insertion into the Reform Bill of 1867 of two clauses declaring that in three-cornered constituencies no elector should be allowed more than two votes; and that no elector of the city of London should be allowed more than three votes. It has been found possible, however, for one party to carry three members in a three-cornered borough. This has happened especially at Birmingham. On the formation of School Boards under the Education Act of 1870, minority representation was secured by the system of cumulative voting. In 1884 a society, including members of Parliament of both parties, was formed to promote the representation of minorities by a system of proportional representation.

Minto, Lord (b. 1751, d. 1813), after having filled the office of President of the Board of Control, was appointed Governor-General of India in 1806. His first task was to deal with the Vellore Mutiny, and punish the mutineers. He then devoted himself to the establishing of order in India, and to securing the frontiers of the Company's territories by treaties with foreign powers. Marching an army into Nagpore, he compelled Ameer Khan to retire. The pirates of Kolapore and Sawuntwarree were attacked and overawed. The growth of the power of Runjeet Singh now attracted his attention. Lord Minto was desirous (1808) at once to check the power of that chief in the east, and to form an alliance with him. He sent an embassy to Lahore, under Mr. Metcalfe, who, after some difficulty, succeeded in concluding with Runjeet the Treaty of Umritsir, of perpetual amity between the British government and the State of Lahore. About the same time Sir Harford Jones reached Persia in the character of a plenipotentiary of the British crown, and by him (1810) a treaty was concluded binding the sovereign of Persia to resist the passage of any European force through his country to India, and the government of England to furnish aid in case Persia should be invaded from Europe. Having thus established order and security at home, Lord Minto turned his attention to the hostile colonies of the enemy or his allies. Macao and the Chinese colonies of Portugal were occupied (1809), but were subsequently abandoned, owing to the firmness and threats of the Chinese government. The islands of Mauritius and Bourbon were captured (1809), thus cutting off a great resort for French privateers. The Dutch colonies in the Spice Islands and Java were captured after a gallant defence (1811). In 1812, on his return from Java, Lord Minto learned that he had been superseded in the government. He was raised to an earldom, and recalled, and in October, 1813, returned to England. His death took place within a few weeks of his return.

M'Leod Affair, THE (1841). During the Canadian Rebellion an American steamer called the Caroline, which had been engaged in carrying arms to the rebels, was boarded in the night by a party of loyalists, set on fire, and driven over the Falls of Niagara. She was lying at that time within the territorial jurisdiction of the State of New York, and an American citizen lost his life in the struggle. The matter caused some excitement in the United States; and in January, 1841, Alexander M'Leod, a British subject, was arrested in the State of New York on a charge of murder, for being concerned in the attack on the Caroline. The British government at once demanded his release, asserting that he was acting under and within his orders, and that in consequence the responsibility rested solely with them. The United States government replied to this communication that they could not interfere with the internal affairs of the State of New York. Lord Palmerston replied that the execution of M'Leod would be followed by war. M'Leod was tried at Utica in October, and was declared "Not Guilty." This was a simple solution of what seemed likely to prove a very disastrous affair.

Modus Tenendi Parliamentum is a document containing a sketch of the constitution and manner of holding Parliament. It pretends to give an account of Parliament as it existed in the time of William the Conqueror, but it would seem to have been written about the reign of Richard II., and in many particulars to describe rather the author's idea of what Parliament should be, than the actual condition of that assembly in the fourteenth century.

The document is to be found in Dr. Stubbs's Select Charters.

Mogul, THE GREAT, was the name commonly given to the Indian prince who was the descendant of Timour the Tartar, "the firebrand of the universe." Baber, one of his successors, established himself as Emperor of India at Delhi, and transmitted his dignity to his posterity. The invasion of Nadir Shah, and the sack of Delhi, 1739, struck a fatal blow at the grandeur of the Mogul Empire. Already the Deccan had split off under a powerful chief, the Nizam-ool-Moolk. The government of Oude was usurped by another; and the conquests of the Mahrattas tended to reduce the imperial authority to a shadow. In 1788 Delhi was sacked again; the wretched emperor was blinded by a ruffian, and his wives and daughters exposed and dishonoured. After the battle of Patun (1790), the emperor fell wholly into the power of Scindia. After the battle of Delhi he became a British pensioner, with a large and liberal pension and his residence in Delhi. On the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny in 1857, after a bloody massacre, the descendant of Timour was proclaimed King of Delhi. But after the siege and capture of Delhi by Archdale Wilson, he surrendered, and his two murderous sons were shot in the midst of their attendants by Captain Hodson. The Mogul himself was tried, found guilty of treason and murder, and transported to Tounghoo in Burmah, with his favourite wife and son.

Mohun, LORD (d. 1714), "the bully of the Whig faction," was a nobleman of bad character, conspicuous at intervals during the reigns of William III. and Anne. In 1692 he was tried for aiding his friend Captain Hill in the murder of the actor, William Mountford, before the court of the Lord High Steward. Although palpably guilty, he was acquitted. He behaved with great bravery while serving as a volunteer in the expedition against Brest (1694). In Anne's reign he was chiefly conspicuous for his uncompromising Whiggism. He spoke against Nottingham's Occasional Conformity Bill, and wished to have him sent to the Tower for an imputation on the memory of King William. He warmly defended the Godolphin ministry after its fall (1710). Marlborough chose him as his second in a duel arranged with Lord Powlett, which was stopped, however, by royal authority. Mohun was himself slain in a duel with the Duke of Hamilton, not, however before he had mortally wounded his adversary. The quarrel was of a private nature; but as Hamilton was about to be sent to France, it was believed with favourable messages to the Pretender, his death was regarded by the Tories as a political murder.

Moleyns, or Molineux, ADAM (d. 1450), Bishop of Chichester, was one of the negotiators of the marriage between Henry VI. and Margaret of Anjou, and also assisted in arranging a truce with France, both of which acts made him very unpopular. He was one of the victims of Jack Cade's rebellion, being murdered by the insurgents as he was on the point of escaping to France.

Monasticism. Monks were bodies of men, living together apart from the world, for the purposes of leading a religious life. Monasticism first sprang up in the East, where it assumed a solitary and contemplative character; as it spread in the West its organisation became more practical. The first monks who exercised any influence on Great Britain were the Celtic monks of Ireland, where Christianity early assumed a monastic and tribal character. The Irish Church was not so much organised round the bishops as round the monastery. The tribe was reproduced in the monastic brotherhood, of which the abbot was father and head. Celtic Christianity was poetical and imaginative. It sent forth missionaries amongst the Britons and the Picts. In the fourth century Ninian established a monastery at Candida Casa, or Whithorn, in Galloway. Soon afterwards two bishops of Gaul dotted along the Wye settlements, which rapidly spread. Columba's monastery at Iona was the source whence Christianity was carried into the Northumbrian kingdom (635), and Lindisfarne became the great missionary station whence the conversion of the north of England was carried on. When the Roman monk Augustine converted the Kentish kingdom he likewise established a monastery at Canterbury (598). The Roman and the Celtic Church advanced in their work of conversion till they came into collision. When in 664 it was agreed at the Synod of Whitby that the Roman use should prevail in the Northumbrian kingdom, the downfall of Celtic monasticism followed. Such monks as remained conformed to the Roman rule; those who refused returned to Iona. Before the end of the eleventh century Celtic monasticism died away, and the more vigorous system of Rome had taken its place. There was no great difference between the objects which the two systems proposed. Prayer, work, and reading were alike the aims of the communities. The monks settled on unoccupied lands, and by their labour brought them under cultivation. They taught the neighbouring folk, and by their active lives gave a standing protest against the prevalent sensuality of a rude people. The monasteries were the homes of peace and learning, and were the means of spreading civilisation. The Northumbrian thegn, Benedict Biscop, founded his monasteries of Wearmouth (674) and Jarrow (682), where rose a band of English scholars, of whom Bede is the chief. But even before his death, Bede saw the decline of the great days of monasticism. His letter to Egbert, Archbishop of York, complains of the excessive number of monasteries founded from a desire to obtain from the king grants of folkland. The monks were the mere creatures of the thegns who put them there; they lived idle and useless lives; they set a bad example, and impoverished the State. Bede's warnings were unheeded, and punishment was not long in coming. The Northmen attacked the monasteries, which were near the sea, and whose treasures offered them a rich booty. The ninth century saw the overthrow by the heathen of most of the renowned monasteries of England. The rule of life, such as it was, seems after this to have fallen into disuse, and they were mostly left in the possession of secular clerks. In the middle of the tenth century a monastic revival spread from the abbey of Glastonbury and Abingdon. Dunstan and Ethelwolf laboured to restore a system which alone could repair in English society the ravages wrought by the Danes. They pursued two objects, the substitution of monks for secular canons, and the introduction of the rule of St. Benedict for the vaguer and less organised rules which had been previously adopted. Their efforts met with great success. Kings and nobles again endowed monasteries, and monasticism became once more a great influence in the progress of English society.

The Norman Conquest brought still stronger and more definite organisation. The great monastic reform on the Continent, which had begun at Cluny, was steadily pursued in Normandy at Bec. From Bec came the two archbishops, Lanfranc and Anselm. Not only were the English monasteries more rigidly ruled by Norman abbots, but in cases where cathedrals had been originally of monastic foundation, Lanfranc replaced the secular canons by regulars. [CATHEDRALS.] By means of the monasteries especially the superior civilisation of the Normans was spread through England. But the institution of monasticism itself had well-nigh spent its strength. The eleventh and twelfth centuries witnessed the formation of a number of new orders, all following the Benedictine rule in its main features, but each striving to give it greater reality.

Each of the monastic movements which led to the formation of the Carthusians, Premonstratensians, Austin Canons, and, above all, Cistercians, found its echo in England. Amongst the founders of the Cistercian order was an Englishman, Stephen Harding, and the Cistercians were a favourite order in England, as the remains of their great abbeys in Yorkshire sufficiently show. The Crusades created a new kind of monasticism—the military orders of the Knights Templars and the Knights of St. John. One order only was specially English, the Gilbertines, founded by Gilbert of Sempringham, in Lincolnshire, about 1135, which is remarkable for double monasteries of men and women, side by side.

This feverish growth of new orders was a sign of weakness rather than of strength. Monasticism could not save itself from degeneracy, and in the beginning of the thirteenth century a new effort was made by St. Francis and St. Dominic, who established the mendicant orders. [FRIARS.] The friars rapidly increased in numbers and in popular estimation, and the glory of the old orders paled before them; but in spite of their greater activity, the friars also rapidly ran their course. The fourteenth century saw the gradual growth of a feeling against religious orders. The Templars, through their pride and wealth, and the mystery which surrounded their doings, were the first to fall. They were dissolved in 1310. In England the royal power showed great jealousy of "alien priories," or houses depending on foreign monasteries. Edward I. and Edward III. both confiscated their lands and possessions. Finally, in 1416, Parliament dissolved these "alien priories," and vested their lands in the crown.

The feeling against monastic institutions

was largely increased by the Lollard movement; but on many sides it was felt that their usefulness had really gone. In early times the monks had been settlers and reclaimers of barren land; later they had been good farmers, who had not dealt hardly with those who worked under them. The Cistercians in Yorkshire especially were the chief merchants in the wool trade with Flanders. But monasteries, like all corporations, though easy masters, were tenacious of their rights. They were often involved in quarrels with the rising spirit of municipal freedom. At St. Albans, for instance, the monks and the burghers were in constant strife about trifling matters. The enfranchisement of villeins, and the gradual extinction of villinage in the fourteenth century, brought economic changes, which were unfavourable to the tenure of lands by corporations. The land was more and more let to tenants, and not worked by the monks themselves. Luxury and idleness went hand in hand. It became clear that any reform in the Church must begin with the monasteries. In 1523 Wolsey obtained bulls from the Pope suppressing forty of the smaller monasteries, and authorising the application of their revenues to educational purposes. The Renaissance had made men feel that a learned clergy was necessary, instead of indolent monks.

The example set by Wolsey was rapidly followed when Henry VIII. threw off from the Church of England the papal headship. The monasteries were particularly obnoxious to the king as harbouring those who were discontented with his changes. Their weakness and their wealth made them a tempting object of attack. A visitation of the monasteries was followed by an Act of Parliament authorising the suppression of the smaller monasteries whose incomes were below £200 a year (1536). Their fall was quickly followed by that of the larger monasteries also (1539). The monastic system was swept out of England. The monasteries themselves were cast down. Their lands were granted to nobles, or were sold, and the result was a sudden change in social conditions which was not for the better. The easy-going monks were replaced by capitalists. The old-fashioned farming of the monks was superseded. Arable land was turned into pasture for the more profitable purpose of growing wool. Many peasants were thrown out of work, and the doors of the monasteries no longer stood open for the relief of destitution. There was great distress, and much discontent, which caused the popular risings under the Tudors, and the legislation of Henry VIII. against "sturdy beggars." Ultimately the Poor Law of Elizabeth adopted the principle of distributing alms to those in want, and replaced the charity of the monks by the legal contributions of the community. In constitutional matters the suppression of the monasteries largely diminished the members of the House of Lords. The greater abbots ceased to exist, and the character of the Upper House was changed by the loss of the preponderance of spiritual peers. [Abbott.]

The general character of English religious orders may be shown by the number of their houses at the time of the dissolution. There were 186 Benedictines, 173 Augustinians, 101 Cistercians, 33 of the four orders of friars, 32 Premonstratensians, 28 of the Knights Hospitallers, 25 Gilbertines, 20 Cluniacs, 9 Carthusians, and a few other orders. The total number of monasteries was 616, and their revenues were approximately valued at £142,914 yearly.

A full account of English monasteries is given in Dugdale's Monasticon; of monasticism in general a popular account is in Montalembert's Monks of the West. For the dissolution of the monasteries Dixon's History of the Church of England. [M. C.]

Monk, GEORGE. [ALBEMARLE.]

Monmouth, JAMES, DUKE OF (b. 1649, d. 1685), was the natural son of Charles II. by Lucy Walters, and was born at Rotterdam. During the king's exile he was generally known as James Crofts, but in 1662 he was brought over to England, and created Duke of Monmouth and Orkney, recognised by Charles as his son, and apartments in Whitehall given to him. In 1663 he was married to Lady Anne Scott, daughter and heiress of the Duke of Buccleugh. In 1665 he took part in a naval engagement with the Dutch, and in 1668 he was made captain of the first troop of Life Guards. In 1672 he was appointed to an important military command in the Dutch War, and distinguished himself by his bravery and discretion. In 1678 he fought in the army of the Prince of Orange, from whom he earned high praise. In 1679 he was sent to Scotland to repress the Covenanters, whom he defeated at Bothwell Bridge, but earned a name for humanity by preventing the indiscriminate slaughter of the insurgents. About this period dates his great popularity and his friendship with Shaftesbury and other leaders of the Protestant or Presbyterian party, and a design was formed whereby Monmouth should succeed to the throne. But Charles sternly refused to countenance such an idea, and expressly declared that Monmouth was not his legitimate son, while, to prevent these intrigues from being carried on any longer, he banished Monmouth to Holland in 1679. In 1680 he returned, was received by the people with the greatest enthusiasm, and made a progress through England, being hailed everywhere with demonstrations of popular joy. In the midst of his progress he was arrested at Stafford by the king's orders. He quickly made his peace with his father, and lived quietly in London till 1683, when he joined in the Revolution plot, though probably not in the Rye House conspiracy. Charles, however, treated Monmouth with the utmost kindness, but finding that he still consorted with men who were suspected of designs against the government, he was compelled to banish him once more to Holland. Here he remained till the accession of James II., when he was expelled from Holland by William of Orange, and returned to Brussels, where the invasion of England was planned. On June 11 (1685) he landed at Lyme Regis in Dorsetshire, where he issued a proclamation against "the Duke of York," as he termed James II., asserting his own legitimacy, but, at the same time promising that he would leave his claims to be decided by a free Parliament. From Lyme he marched to Taunton, Bridgewater, Wells, and Frome, at all of which places he was solemnly proclaimed. The royal troops under Feversham and Churchill encountered his levies at the battle of Sedgemoor, and Monmouth was utterly routed (July 5, 1685). After wandering about for some days, he was discovered near Holtbridge, in Dorsetshire, in a dry ditch, covered with fern. He now exhibited the greatest cowardice and terror, and entreated James to grant him an interview, which the king did, but, finding that he would not betray his accomplices, rejected all his appeals for mercy, and Monmouth was executed on Tower Hill on July 15th. He left three children—James, Earl of Dalkeith, Henry, Earl of Deloraine, and Anne, who died from grief shortly after her father.

Monopolies. The first attack upon the power of the crown to issue patents conferring exclusive rights of carrying on certain trades, was made in 1597. According to the common law every man was entitled freely to exercise his trade, but the principle was generally recognised that exceptions might be made to this rule in the case of any process newly invented or introduced from abroad. Anxious to gain a control over the increasing commerce of the country, the government was likely to stretch this principle farther than it would bear, and the grant of patents to courtiers was among the readiest means of satisfying their demands. In 1597 the Commons sent up an address to Elizabeth against the abuse of monopolies, but an evasive reply was given, and in 1601 a bitter debate of four days took place on the subject. The queen thought it wise to yield, promised that all injurious grants should be repealed, and caused most of the patents to be revoked. Their number increased again under James I.: "whereas, at the king's coming in," says a contemporary, "there were complaints of some eight or nine monopolies then in being, they are now said to be multiplied by so many scores." A detailed examination of the most important cases has been made by Mr. Gardiner, who declares that they were not open to the usual charges brought against them. "They were not made with the object of filling the Exchequer. They were not made, primarily at least, with the object of filling the pockets of the courtiers. They were, it is impossible to doubt, the result of a desire on the part of official persons to encourage commerce, and to promote the welfare of the State, though it cannot be denied that their zeal was often greater than their knowledge, and that their best efforts were not unfrequently tainted by . . . favouritism and corruption. Take, for example, the commission for gold and silver thread. Such thread had been made before in England, but on a small scale; in 1611 and 1616 patents were granted to certain persons, including several courtiers, on two grounds: first, that they would establish a manufacture large enough to compete with the Continent; and secondly, that they would import bullion, and not use English coin, the sinews and strength of our state." In 1618 the monopoly was taken into the king's hands, and a proclamation issued forbidding the manufacture of gold and silver thread by private persons, while a commission was issued for the punishment of offenders. The commissioners caused disobedient workmen to be arrested, tools seized, and goldsmiths and silkmens imprisoned upon refusal to enter into bonds not to sell to unlicensed persons. The harshness with which the monopolies were enforced, together with the fact that the chief monopolists were also profiting by patents for the control of alehouses and inns, and shamefully abusing their power, caused a storm of indignation which broke in the Parliament of 1621. On Feb. 19, Noy moved for an inquiry, and his proposal was seconded by Coke. A committee of the whole House investigated the patents for inns, and also those conferring monopolies. The king yielded to the storm, and Buckingham, on the advice of Dean Williams, declared he would not even protect his brother. Sir Giles Mompeyson and Sir Francis Mitchell were accused by the Commons before the Lords (a measure usually regarded as the revival of the power of impeachment, though not technically such), and heavy penalties were imposed. Finally, in the Parliament of 1624, an Act was passed abolishing most of the monopolies. Some few, however, were specially retained as for the public advantage. A few years later the Lord Treasurer Weston endeavoured to raise money by creating chartered companies, which escaped the Act of 1624 by being open to all merchants who cared to pay certain fees. Much discontent was caused among those traders who were unable to join, and the grants were all revoked in 1639.

Montague, JOHN NEVILLE, MARQUIS

OF (d. 1471), was the son of Richard, Earl of Salisbury, and the younger brother of the Earl of Warwick. He joined his father and brother in espousing the cause of York, and on the accession of Edward IV. was made Warden of the East Marches. In 1464 he defeated the Lancastrians at Hedgeley Moor and Hexham. In 1467 he was created Earl of Northumberland, and the estates of the Percies were granted to him. He resigned this position in two years in order that Percy might be restored, and received in lieu the title of Marquis of Montague. He joined Warwick in his intrigues against Edward, shared in Henry VI.'s restoration, and fell with his brother in the battle of Barnet.

Montague, ANTHONY BROWNE, VISCOUNT (d. 1593), "a man of great wisdom, prudence, and loyalty," was son of Sir Anthony Browne, Master of the Horse to Henry VIII., and as a staunch Roman Catholic was high in favour with Mary, by whom he was created a peer (September, 1553). He was lieutenant of the English forces at the siege of St. Quentin, and in 1560, in spite of his vigorous opposition to the Acts of Uniformity and Supremacy, was sent by Elizabeth on a mission to the court of Spain. His religion caused him to be suspected of sympathy with the northern rebels in 1569, but he nevertheless contrived to retain the favour of the queen. Lord Montague was one of the commissioners at the trial of the Queen of Scots in 1586.

Monte, ROBERT DE (d. 1186), was a monk of Mont St. Michel, in Normandy. He wrote a Chronicle, extending to the year of his death, and a History of Henry I., which is generally considered the eighth book of William of Jumièges' Chronicle. "His Chronicle," says Sir T. Hardy, "is the most important authority we possess for the history of the Continental actions of our later Norman kings and the earlier monarchs of the house of Plantagenet."

This work will be found in Pertz, and a translation in the Church Historians of England.

Montfort, SIMON DE (b. 1208). The marriage of Simon, lord of Montfort and Evreux, with the sister and co-heiress of the Earl of Leicester, in the reign of Henry II., was the origin of the connection of the Montforts with England. Their second son, Simon, the leader of the Albigensian crusade, to whom fell the title and half the estates of the earldom of Leicester, married Alice de Montmorency, and of this marriage, Simon, the great Earl of Leicester, was the fourth and youngest son. His father was deprived of his English estates in 1210, and died in 1218, leaving to his sons—of whom only two, Almeric or Amaury, and Simon, now remained—nothing more than his ancestral territories and his claims in England. Amaury resigned his rights to his younger brother, who came to England in 1230 to try his fortune. He at once became a royal favourite, was given a pension of 400 marks; and in the year 1238 was secretly married to the king's sister, Eleanor, widow of William Marshall. In 1239 he was invested with the earldom of Leicester, and soon after acted as godfather at Prince Edward's christening. Up to this date, then, there had been nothing to distinguish him from the crowd of foreign adventurers who haunted the court of Henry. Political causes precipitated the first quarrel. In 1239 Frederick II. was excommunicated by the Pope; after some hesitation the English king made up his mind to side with the pontiff, and determined to get rid of a man whom he knew greatly admired the Pope's enemy. When next he came to court, Henry greeted him with coarse and causeless abuse, and ordered him to depart. With his wife he hastened to France, cheered in his exile by a letter from Grosseteste of Lincoln, whom he had made his friend. In less than a year, however, the king was reconciled, but Simon was glad to take refuge from the annoyances of the English court in the excitement of a crusade (1240—41). In Palestine he could do little, though his ability so impressed the barons of the kingdom of Jerusalem that they begged the Emperor to appoint him governor of the land. In 1242—43 Henry's miserable campaign in Poitou engaged him; and then for five years he lived quietly on his Leicester estates, in the enjoyment of the friendship of Grosseteste and Adam de Marisco. In 1248 he was summoned from his retirement to become Lieutenant of Gascony. Into the details of his five years' administration it is not necessary to enter. Possibly he occasionally acted with ill-timed severity, and the pleasure which a strong man has in the sense of mastery may have led him into indiscretions. But it is clear that his administration was on the whole successful, and also that he was again and again shamefully abandoned by his weak master, who seemed to welcome the complaints made against him. On his return Simon again retired to his own estates, and watched the course of events, and it is not till the Mad Parliament of 1258 that he again becomes prominent. But from this time to his death he is the foremost figure in the opposition, and it was during this period that he made so powerful an impression upon the popular mind by his political measures and personal qualities. Avoiding details, his subsequent action may be thus summarised: He was one of the twenty-four who drew up the Provisions of Oxford, and a member of the permanent Council of fifteen; negotiated peace with Louis IX.; quarrelled with Gloucester in the Parliament of February, 1259, according to popular belief because the latter was content with getting power into the hands of the barons, and objected to further reform; he joined with the Bishop of Worcester in summoning the Parliament of 1261, in which knights of the shire were present; on the death of the elder Gloucester he practically governed England for some months at the end of 1262 and beginning of 1263; rejected the Mise of Amiens; took up arms and won the battle of Lewes (1264), which put the king into his hands; established a standing Council of nine instead of the elaborate constitution of 1208; and brought to the support of this a Parliament to which knights of the shire were summoned, and in 1265 representatives of the towns for the first time. He was killed at Evesham, Aug. 4, 1265.

Simon has long enjoyed the reputation of being the creator of the English House of Commons. It has, however, been pointed out that the writs of 1265 for borough representation were not sent through the sheriff, but to the mayors direct; and thus Simon's action stands outside the regular development of Parliament, which consisted in bringing the county courts into contact with the Great Council. It cannot, however, be doubted that the precedent of 1265 was of the utmost subsequent importance. It may fairly be argued that the constitution of 1258 does not represent Simon's own policy, but that of the barons with whom he was forced to associate; while that of 1264, arranged at a time when he had broken with the oligarchical party, represents his own ideas as to what was fitting in the existing state of things. Simon in 1264-65 showed his confidence in the knights and burghers by summoning them to a Parliament which was to have a permanent place in the constitution.

Montfort, HENRY DE (d. 1265), was the eldest son of Simon de Montfort. He took part with his father in his opposition to Henry III., and commanded the right wing of the baronial army at Lewes, and, after the victory, took charge of Prince Edward. The conduct of Henry and his brothers during the period between the battles of Lewes and Evesham was one of the chief causes of their father's fate. Henry seized all the wool in England, and sold it for his own profit, while he quarrelled with and estranged the powerful De Clares. He fought bravely at the battle of Evesham, and fell in a vain attempt to rally the baronial forces after his father's death.

Montfort, SIMON DE (d. 1273?), second son of Simon de Montfort, first distinguished himself in the year 1264 by defending Northampton against the royalists. He was, however, defeated, taken prisoner, and his life only saved by the personal intervention of Prince Edward. He was not released till after the battle of Lewes, when he was appointed by his father Warden of Surrey and Sussex. After the battle of Evesham, he held out in the castle of Kenilworth, and through his intercession the lives of the King of the Romans and his son were spared. After the capture of the castle, he retired to the sea-coast, where he put himself at the head of a body of pirates, and subsequently fled to Italy, where, in conjunction with his brother Guy, he barbarously murdered Henry of Almayne, at Viterbo, in 1269. For this crime he was excommunicated, and, "after a brief wandering on the earth with the curse of Cain upon him," he died in a castle near Sienna.

Montfort, ALMERIC DE, was the third son of Simon de Montfort. He was appointed Treasurer of York, but, after his father's death, was deprived of his office, and fled abroad. Being supposed to have been privy to the Viterbo murder, he was taken prisoner by Edward I. in 1276, but in 1281, at the Pope's intercession, he was released, and repaired to Rome, where he remained till his death.

Montfort, GUY DE, was the fourth son of Simon de Montfort, and took part with his father in the Barons' War, commanding the right wing at the battle of Lewes. He subsequently brought great odium on himself by his plunder of the merchant-ships in the Channel, and by his turbulence contributed to his father's downfall. Wounded at the battle of Evesham, he fled to Italy, where in 1270 he murdered Henry of Almayne at Viterbo. For this he was excommunicated, but was subsequently allowed to do penance, and fought bravely in the Papal army, but in 1288 was taken prisoner by the Sicilians, and ended his days in prison.

Montserrat, one of the Leeward Islands south-west of Antigua, was discovered by Columbus in 1493, and so called by him from its supposed resemblance to a mountain of this name near Barcelona. In 1632 it was colonised by a party of English settlers from St. Kitts, and remained in British hands until 1782, when it was taken by the French, and kept by them until the close of the war. Its affairs were formerly administered by a lieutenant-governor, an executive and legislative council of seven members, and a house of assembly of twelve. In 1871, however, it joined the federation of the Leeward Islands, its local legislature being now under a president.

Monumenta Franciscana is the title of a work published in the Rolls Series, under the editorship of Mr. Brewer, which contains valuable original materials for the history of the arrival and settlement of the Franciscans in England, the letters of Adam Marsh, and other documents connected with the foundation and diffusion of this great body. Mr. Brewer's preface throws a flood of light on the early history of the mendicant orders in England.

Moodkee, THE BATTLE OF (Dec. 18, 1845), was fought during the Sikh War. After a fatiguing march of twenty-one miles over an arid plain, Sir Hugh Gough found himself face to face with the army of Lal Sing. He was taken completely by surprise. The enemy's horse endeavoured to outflank our force, but were gallantly repulsed. In this first conflict between the English and the Khalsa soldiers, the superiority of the latter in discipline and musketry was very apparent. The commander-in-chief had himself to rally a flying native regiment, and in the confusion one of our regiments fired into another. Lal Sing was the first to fly, with his cavalry, and he was at length followed by the infantry, who withdrew under cover of night, leaving seventeen guns in the hands of the English. The British loss amounted to 872 killed and wounded.

Moolraj, INSURRECTION OF. Moolraj, the Governor of Mooltan, a strong fort in the Punjab, was the son of Sawan Mull, whom he succeeded in 1844. In March of 1848, after some differences with the Durbar, he offered to resign the fort and government. This was accepted, and Khan Singh was sent to assume the government, accompanied by Mr. Agnew, as political agent, and an escort of 350 Sikh troops. On the morning of the 19th, there was a stormy interview with Moolraj, who was ordered to produce the accounts of the last six years. On the 20th an attempt was made to assassinate Mr. Agnew. On the 21st a brisk fire was opened on the encampment from the citadel. The Sikh escort proved treacherous, and deserted to the enemy; a crew of howling savages rushed in and murdered Mr. Agnew and his companion, Lieutenant Anderson, with the greatest brutality. On the 22nd Moolraj issued a proclamation of a religious war against the English. Lieutenant Edwardes, who was employed in the revenue settlement at Bunnoo, across the Indus, without waiting for orders, crossed the Indus with 1,200 infantry, 350 horse, and two guns. The Nabob of Bhawalpore was requested by the Resident to advance. Lieutenant Edwardes joined him at Kineyree. Timely reinforcements enabled him to win the battles of Kineyree and Sudcosain, and to shut Moolraj up in Mooltan, when the outbreak of Shere Sing merged these operations in the second Sikh War.

Mooltan, SIEGE OF (1848). This was begun in July, 1848, by Lieutenant Edwardes with a British force, supported by one troop of the friendly Nabob of Bhawalpore. The investment continued till Sept. 12, when the town was ineffectually bombarded. The siege was raised Sept. 22. General Whish, with 17,000 men and sixty-four heavy guns, re-opened the siege (Dec. 27), and pushed it with great vigour. For five days, in spite of desperate sallies, the batteries played on the town. On the third day an enormous powder magazine exploded in the town, doing immense damage. On January 2, 1849, the town was carried by assault. The siege of the citadel was now pushed on. After a continuous fire from the English batteries for several days, Moolraj endeavoured to treat, but was informed that no terms would be granted short of unconditional surrender. He therefore continued to defend the fort, till his garrison insisted on surrender or an attempt to cut their way out. On Jan. 22, therefore, he surrendered, and the fort was placed in charge of Lieutenant Edwardes.

Moore, SIR JOHN (b. 1761, d. 1809), was the son of a Glasgow physician. His education was chiefly acquired on the Continent, till in 1776 he entered the army. Two years later he was ordered to Newfoundland, where he remained almost inactive during the American War. On the conclusion of peace in 1783, he was placed on half pay, and was returned to Parliament for a district of Scotch burghs. In 1790 he became lieutenant-colonel of the 51st Regiment. Five years later he saw almost his first active service at the siege of Calvi, in Corsica, where he led the storming party of grenadiers into the chief fort. He was appointed adjutant-general of the island, but he soon threw it up, and, returning to England, was ordered to the West Indies under Sir Ralph Abercromby. In the expedition against St. Lucia, he distinguished himself by his wonderful courage and energy, and was rewarded by being appointed governor of the island. In this position his continuous exertions, combined with the malarious character of the climate, twice laid him low, and in the summer of 1797 he went to England with Abercromby, whom he followed to Ireland. He was engaged against the rebels at New Ross and defeated them at Wexford. In 1799 he was sent to Holland, whence he returned severely wounded. In 1800 he was again employed under Abercromby in the expedition to Egypt. At the landing of the troops Moore signalled himself by his prompt decision in bringing up the reserves at the crisis of the battle, and so gaining the victory. At Aboukir he was again conspicuous, and again wounded. While the Peace of Amiens lasted, he remained at home on staff employment, but on the renewal of the war was placed as second in command of the troops in the Mediterranean. In 1807 he was sent to Sweden in command of 10,000 men to help the king. Some difference occurring between them, Moore was placed under arrest, and on freeing himself, returned at once with his troops to England. He had no sooner arrived than he was sent off to the Peninsula to act under Burrard and Dalrymple; but on their recall after the Convention of Cintra he was appointed to the command in chief (Oct. 6, 1808). At last he had an opportunity of displaying his great military talents, and he did not throw the chance away. He advanced up the country, but was compelled to retreat to Corunna under terrible difficulties, before Soult. On Jan. 16, 1809, he won a great victory at Corunna, and covered the embarkation of his army, but was himself killed in the action.

Memoir of Sir John Moore; Napier, Peninsular War; Alison, Hist. of Europe.

More, Sir Thomas (b. 1480, d. 1535), was the son of Sir John More, a judge of the King's Bench. At an early age he entered the household of Cardinal Morton. In 1497 he went to Oxford, and in 1499 entered Lincoln's Inn; already before this time he had become acquainted with Erasmus and other eminent scholars. In 1501 he entered the House of Commons, and speedily became a prominent member of what may be called the popular party, opposing Henry VII.'s demand for subsidies. In 1508 he was made a judge of the sheriff's court, and in 1510 became under-sheriff of London. In 1514 and 1515 he was employed as envoy to the Low Countries, and soon after he was made a member of the Privy Council, and in 1521 knighted. He became closely connected with Henry VIII., and assisted the king in his book against Luther. In 1523 he was appointed Speaker of the House of Commons at Wolsey's request, but he nevertheless opposed the grant which the cardinal tried to obtain from the House. He, however, was reconciled to Wolsey, and in 1527 accompanied him on a mission to France. In 1525 he had been made Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and in Oct., 1529, he became Lord Chancellor. Conspicuous as he had been all his life as one of the party of Church Reform, More was altogether opposed to the assumption of supremacy by Henry VIII. In May, 1532, he was deprived of the seals, and in 1534 (April 17), committed to the Tower. He declined to take the oath of supremacy, and was indicted for misprision of treason, Nov., 1534. More's noble and beautiful character was acknowledged by all his contemporaries. As the most distinguished of the English exponents of the "New Learning," he has an interest beyond that of his historical position. In addition to a Life of Edward VI. and other works, he wrote the Utopia (1526), one of the most remarkable political romances in this or any language, which is especially noteworthy for the way in which the author anticipates many of the results of modern progress.

Moreville, Hugh de, one of the murderers of Becket (q.v.), had been one of the itinerant justices. After the murder he fled to his castle of Knaresborough, and is said to have undertaken a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in expiation of his crime. From a charter we learn that he was living at the accession of King John, and he seems to have died shortly afterwards.

Morgan, Sir Henry, one of the chief buccaners of Jamaica, was frequently employed by Charles II. to harass the shipping of the Spaniards in the West Indies. In 1670 he plundered and burnt Panama, and as a reward was created a knight, and Governor of Jamaica.

Morgan, Thomas, a Welshman, and a devoted adherent of the Queen of Scots, was imprisoned on a charge of complicity in the Ridolfi Conspiracy. On his release he went abroad, and became Mary's chief agent in corresponding with her friends. He was declared by Dr. Parry to have instigated him to assassinate Elizabeth, and his arrest was accordingly demanded from Henry III. of France, but refused. In 1585 he formed a fresh plot against the life of the queen, and was more or less implicated in the Babington Conspiracy. His letters to Mary, written in July, 1585, communicating the details of the proposed invasion and rebellion, were produced in evidence at the Queen of Scots' trial.

Morice, James (d. 1596), attorney of the Court of Wards, moved in the Parliament of 1593 that the abuses of the bishops' courts should be reformed. On this the queen forbade the House to consider "any bill touching matters of state or reformation of causes ecclesiastical," and Morice himself was disabled from practising as a barrister, and was kept in confinement for some years at Tutbury (or, according to others, at Tilbury Castle), in spite of the efforts of Essex to obtain his release.

Morice, Sir William (b. 1602, d. 1676), a Devonshire gentleman of somewhat retired life, but of high repute in his own county, played an important part in the Restoration. He was the first person to whom Monk entrusted the secret of his design to restore Charles, and he was used as a go-between between Monk and Sir John Grenville, who was sent over to Charles. The king appointed him one of the Secretaries of State in 1660, which office he continued to hold till 1668, when he retired into private life.

Mortimer, The Family of, was one of the most important families of the Welsh Marches. Roger Mortimer, the paramour of Queen

Isabella, was created Earl of March, with considerable estates and influence on the Welsh border. He was attainted in 1330, but the attainder was reversed, and the title and estates restored to his grandson (1354). His great-grandson, Edmund Mortimer, married Philippa, daughter of Lionel of Clarence, son of Edward III. Their grandson, the Earl of March, was heir presumptive to the crown in Henry IV.'s reign, and the unsuccessful conspiracy of the Earl of Cambridge and Lord Scrope (1415) was intended to place him on the throne. His sister Anne married Richard, Earl of Cambridge, son of Edmund of Langley, Duke of York, son of Edward III. Their son was Richard, Duke of York (killed at Wakefield, 1460), who thus united the claims of the houses of York and Mortimer, and was descended directly from two sons of Edward III.

Mortimer, ROGER (b. 1287, d. 1330), was a ward of Piers Gaveston, and held many important offices in the reign of Edward II., being appointed Lieutenant of Ireland in 1317. He sided with Lancaster in his opposition to the king, was taken prisoner in 1322, and condemned to perpetual captivity. Escaping in 1324 he fled to France. In 1326 Queen Isabella being sent over to the French court, Mortimer formed an intrigue with her, and in the next year accompanied her to England. The king fled, and was subsequently deposed, and in 1327 Mortimer was master of the situation. For nearly four years the queen and Mortimer ruled the country. All attempts to upset or curtail their power were defeated; the Earl of Lancaster, who endeavoured to rival Mortimer, was compelled to submit in 1328, and a plot set on foot by the king's uncle, Edmund, Earl of Kent, which had for its object the restoration of Edward II., who was supposed to be still alive, failed utterly, and Kent was executed (1330). But this was Mortimer's last act, for the young king had determined to rid himself of the intolerable yoke he had borne so long. Mortimer was surprised in Nottingham Castle, arraigned as a traitor, accused of the death of Edward II. and the Earl of Kent, and hanged, to the universal joy of the nation. His arrogance and vindictiveness recalled the worst features of the Despensers, and his adultery with the queen rendered him still more odious in the eyes of the people.

Mortimer's Cross, THE BATTLE OF (1461), was fought between Edward, Duke of York (Edward IV.), and the Lancastrians, under the Earl of Pembroke. In 1460, while Richard, Duke of York, marched to the north against Queen Margaret, Edward was despatched to raise forces in the Welsh Marches. With these troops, he marched to Gloucester, where news reached him of his father's defeat and death at Wakefield (q.v.), and he prepared to march against Queen Margaret, when he learnt that the Earls of Wiltshire and Pembroke had assembled a large army of Welsh and Irish in order to attack him. Accordingly he turned round, and met them at Mortimer's Cross, in Herefordshire, between Leominster and Wigmore, and totally routed them. Pembroke and Wiltshire escaped, but Owen Tudor was captured and beheaded. Edward then proceeded with his army to join the Earl of Warwick, who had just been defeated by the Lancastrians at the second battle of St. Albans. They effected a junction at Chipping Norton, in Oxfordshire, and, with their united armies, marched towards London, where Edward was proclaimed king.

Mortmain. The abuse which the Statute of Mortmain (De Religiosis) (Nov. 15, 1279) was designed to remedy was by no means one of late origin at the time of the passing of this Act. Five hundred and fifty years earlier Bede had complained of the way in which pretended monks secured to themselves large grants of the public land, and on their produce, which ought to have supported the king's warriors, lived a life of ease and debauchery. But however great this evil may have been in the intervening centuries, it does not seem to have called for legal interference till the days of Magna Charta. By chapter 36 of the Magna Charta, confirmed 9 Henry III., "It was ordained that it should not for the future be lawful for any one to give his land to a religious house, and to take the same land to hold of that house." The object of this enactment was to prevent any more of the land from passing into the hands of the Church, and so ceasing to owe military service to the king, while at the same time the overlord lost all chance of ever recovering an estate so alienated by escheat; for by feudal law on the failure of the heirs of the grantee lands lapsed back to the grantor, and of course there could be no failure of heirs when lands were held by a corporation such as an abbey or church. Some thirty-four years later the Provisions of Westminster enacted in a somewhat similar spirit that no men of religion should enter into any man's fee without the licence of the chief lord of whom the fee is immediately holden. But this may well have been treated as a dead letter, for it was not re-enacted in the Statute of Marlborough (1267). Edward I., the whole bent of whose mind seems to have been towards definiteness and order, soon saw with disgust how much of the land was steadily freeing itself from the duty of military service, and securing itself against ever lapsing into the royal hands. To remedy this defect he issued the famous Statute of Mortmain, or Statutum de Religiosis (1279). This enactment forbids "any person whatsoever, religious or other, to buy or sell, or under colour of any gift, term, or other title, to receive from any one any lands or tenements in such a way that such lands and tenements should come into mort main." The penalty affixed to breaking this enactment was forfeiture to the next superior lord, and if he failed to insist on this forfeiture within a year, the right lapsed to his overlord, and so on to the king. But clerical cunning was not long in finding a means of evading even this law, and some six years later the king had to issue a fresh statute to check this new abuse. As might be expected, the great body of the clergy strongly disapproved of the king's measures, and in 1294, when Edward demanded half their revenue for the year, offered to grant it if he would only repeal the statute "De Religiosis." This, however, Edward was by no means prepared to do. We must not, however, suppose that all gifts of landed property to ecclesiastical foundations were cut short by this Statute of Mortmain. Passing by the system of "Trusts and uses," by which the monks attempted to evade its stringency, "the kings never withheld their licence from the endowment of any valuable new foundation." Another device, that of bringing land into the possession of the Church, under pretence of purchasing it as a burial-ground, was forbidden by another Statute of Mortmain under Richard II. (1391), a statute which at the same time specially declares the provisions and penalties of Edward's Act to extend to guilds and fraternities, and even to the "Mayors, Bailiffs, and Commons of Cities, Boroughs and other Towns, which have a perpetual Commonalty," and so could hold land in perpetuity without any chance of its lapsing.

Of later Acts dealing with the alienation of land in mortmain, we may notice 7 & 8 Will. III., c. 37, which empowered the king "to grant any person or persons, corporate or not, licence to alien in mortmain without rendering the lands liable to forfeiture." Again, the statute of George II. specified the conditions under lands which alone, &c., could be devised for charitable purposes. Oxford and Cambridge, Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, were excepted from the operation of this Act, and by the 5th of Geo. IV., the British Museum was likewise excepted from the Statutes of Mortmain, as other religious, educational, and charitable bodies have been in later times by Act of Parliament.

"Mortmain [Fr. mortis, dead; main, hand] is," says Dr. Lathom, "such a state of possession as makes property inalienable; whence it is said to be in a dead hand, in a hand that cannot shift away the property." In the later of the statutes the phrase runs lest lands "deveniant ad manum mortuam;" and in the French equivalent it is "devenir à mortmain."

Mountjoy, WILLIAM STEWART, VISCOUNT (d. 1692), was, says Macaulay, "a brave soldier, an accomplished scholar, a zealous Protestant, and yet a zealous Tory." He was one of the few members of the Established Church who held office in Tyrconnel's Jacobite administration (1689). Master of the Ordnance and colonel of an Irish regiment, he was also president of a royal society, formed in imitation of the Royal Society of London. When it was seen that Ulster was determined to hold out for William III., he was sent there to win them over. The inhabitants of Londonderry permitted him to leave a portion of his regiment there, but the Enniskilleners declined to listen to his proposal. Shortly afterwards, Tyrconnel, wishing him out of the way, sent him on a mission to St. Germain's, with Rice, who was to tell James that he (Mountjoy) was a traitor at heart. He was accordingly thrown into the Bastille. When James arrived in Ireland, he included him in his infamous Act of Attainder; unless he could contrive to escape from his cell, and present himself at Dublin within a few weeks, he would be put to death. After three years' imprisonment, he was exchanged for Richard Hamilton, and converted by his wrongs to Whiggism, volunteered in William's army. He fell at Steinkirk.

Mulgrave, EARL OF. [SHEFFIELD.]

Municipal Corporation. [TOWNS.]

Munro, SIR THOMAS (d. 1827), entered the military service of the East India Company. He was present at the first march on Seringapatam, and the battle of Arikera, and subsequently took part in the more successful march of 1792. In 1799 Captain Munro was included in the commission appointed to complete the organisation and settlement of Mysore after the fall of the Mohammedan dynasty. In 1813, having seen the disadvantages of the zemindary system of land settlement in Bengal and Mysore, he instituted the ryotwary system. In 1818 he visited England, was created a K.C.B. for his services, and returned to India as Governor of Madras. He modified the abuses of his revenue system, and thus obtained great popularity. He would have retired (1824), but remained especially to make provision for the Burmese War, until 1827, when he died near Gootz.

Munster, THE KINGDOM AND PROVINCE OF, is believed by modern authorities to have been peopled chiefly by the Milesians, a group of tribes of Gaulish or Spanish origin. The Irish legends represent Munster as having been divided between the Milesian chiefs Eber and his brother Lugaid, of whom the former prevailed, and drove the latter into the southwestern corner. President W. K. Sullivan thinks that the tribes of Eber are to be identified with the Scoti, or Brigantian Gauls, who invaded Ireland from Meath, and appears to throw some doubt on the theory of an invasion from Spain. The tribes of Eber were in turn subdued by the tribe of Degaid, probably of the rival Milesian race of Érimon, but the former, under the famous Mug of Munster, having recovered their strength, drove out the Degaidian tribe. Mug further defeated the ard ri, or over-king Conn "of the hundred battles," and compelled him to consent to a division of Ireland, by which the former received the southern part, Loth Moga or Mug's half (circa A.D. 130). Munster now comprised the modern counties of Tipperary, Waterford, Cork, Kerry, Limerick, part of Kilkenny, and Clare, which had originally belonged to Connaught. It was divided into the districts of Thomond, Desmond, and Ormonde. The kings of these districts formed a confederacy under the King of Cashel, who, according to the old Irish custom, was chosen alternately from the Eoghamists (afterwards the O'Donovans and the MacCarthys) of Desmond, and the Dalcasians (the O'Briens) of Thomond. It seems that Munster was partly converted to Christianity, probably through the Irish colonies in Wales, before the arrival of St. Patrick in 431, but even after the coming of that saint it would seem, from the fact that Queen Ethne the Terrible was still a heathen, that the new faith gained ground but slowly. The Munster kings were throughout this period the rivals of the ard ris of the Hui-Neill dynasty, and disputed the supremacy of Ireland with them, often not without success. They seized the opportunity of the Scandinavian invasions (795—1014), to revive their claim to the over- kingship, and unpatriotically ravaged the territories of the Hui-Neills. From 916, however, there was an interval of comparative peace throughout Ireland for forty years, during which time Cormac MacCullinan, the king-bishop of Cashel, is a prominent figure in Irish history, one of his feats being the defeat of the joint forces of the King of Connaught and of Flann, the ard ri, in battle. He is said to have re-established the system of alternate succession which had fallen into disuse in consequence of the weakness of the Thomond dynasty, and thus Mahoun, brother of the famous Brian Boru, was seated on the throne of Cashel. After his death (976) Brian slew the king of the rival clan, and speedily made Munster as powerful as it had been in the days of Mug. In 998, after a protracted struggle, he obtained from the over-king Malachi the acknowledgment of his authority over Mug's half of Ireland; in 1002 he wrested from him the title of ard ri, and in 1014, in alliance with Malachi, he defeated the King of Leinster and the Danes of Dublin at Clontarf. After his death, however, Munster again fell into anarchy until 1050, when Donnchad O'Brien succeeded in reducing the country to order by peaceful means. During the period of ruthless inter-provincial war which followed, the O'Briens frequently got the upper hand in Ireland, and assumed the title of ard ri. Moreover, they administered their kingdom well, and cared for the Church, amongst other good deeds elevating Cashel into an archbishopric. They also entertained relations more or less friendly with the Norman kings. After the Anglo-Danish invasion, the kings and chiefs of Munster, headed by MacCarthy of Desmond, "came in" readily to Henry and surrendered their strongholds. The English king retained Cork and Limerick for himself, but gave the greater part of Cork county to Fitz-Stephen and De Cogan, while Limerick went to De Braose, and the Decies to De la Poer. Their families were, however, speedily supplanted by the Munster Fitzgeralds, who had received grants of land in Limerick, Cork, and Kerry, and who founded the Desmond line together with the younger branches of the Knights of Kerry, and the Knights of Glyn. The Fitzgeralds, after a prolonged struggle with the MacCarthys and O'Briens, intermarried with them, and established a generally recognised authority. Ormonde, or East Munster, was occupied by the Butlers, who spread thence over Kilkenny and Tipperary. During the invasion of Ireland by Edward Bruce (1315) the Geraldines and Butlers suffered severely at the hands of the O'Briens, and Edward III., in order to strengthen their power, created the great earldoms of Desmond and Ormonde. These two houses were weakened further by the Wars of the Roses; the Butlers, moreover, becoming involved in a deadly feud with the Kildares, which lasted for generations. Through these dissensions the O'Briens and MacCarthys again obtained power, though the cautious policy of the Tudors kept them under. Thomond became county Clare, and was added to Connaught. In the reign of Elizabeth occurred the Desmond rebellions. Wishing to put a stop to the anarchy in Desmond, Elizabeth, and her governor, Sir Henry Sydney, in 1514, determined to colonise Munster with gentlemen from the west of England, headed by Sir Peter Carew, who claimed the old Fitz-Stephen estates. Moreover, the long-standing quarrel between the Desmonds and Ormondes was decided in the law courts in favour of the latter; and Desmond, who had been sent to London on a charge of high treason, thought it necessary to surrender large portions of his lands which it was proposed to plant with other colonists. However, the barbarities of Sir Peter Carew soon drove the whole country into a wild and bloody rebellion, the MacCarthys, and even Ormonde's brothers joining the Desmonds in the revolt, which was led by Sir Maurice Fitzgerald, a cousin of the earl. The Archbishop of Cashel was sent to Spain for help. Ormonde, however, pacified his brothers, and Sir Henry Sydney crushed the rebels, being succeeded after his recall by Sir John Perrott (1571), who, through the most brutal measures succeeded in reducing the district to order. Munster became an English presidency. The English government was, however, exhausted by the effort, and thought it necessary to have recourse to the most terrible severity, Sir William Drury hanging four hundred persons in one year. Thereupon the second Desmond rebellion broke out (1579), which, owing to the cowardice of the earl, who had escaped from prison, the early death of the brave Sir Maurice Fitzgerald, and the tardy arrival of assistance from Spain, was broken without much difficulty by the loyal Duke of Ormonde. The estates of the Fitzgeralds and their allies were confiscated and granted to English adventurers. In 1598 James Fitzthomas Fitzgerald assumed the title of Earl of Desmond, and in conjunction with O'Neil, Earl of Tyrone, raised the last of the Munster rebellions. After Essex had failed to cope with it, Sir George Carew suppressed it in 1600, and but little more is heard of the Geraldines. Munster, except Kerry, which was reserved for the government, was finally colonised by Cromwell with soldiers and adventurers; these were promptly absorbed by the Irish population, and though the Catholic gentry received back small portions of their estates at the Restoration, they lost most of them again under the "broken treaty of Limerick." From that last settlement the history of Munster has varied but little from that of the rest of Catholic Ireland.

Murdrum is defined in the Dialogus de Scaccario as "mors occulta alicujus, cujus interfectore ignoatur." The term was, however, often extended to the murder fine exacted from the hundred by the law of William I. when the murdered man could not be proved to be an Englishman. This process of proof was called "Presentment of Englishry." It was, however, obsolete so early as the reign of Henry II., owing to the way in which English and Normans were mixed up.

Murimuth, ADAM, a canon of St. Paul's in the time of Richard II., wrote a Chronicle from 1303 to 1336, which was continued subsequently to the year 1380. It has been published by the English Historical Society.

Mutiny Act, THE, was first enacted in 1689, and was facilitated by the mutiny at Ipswich of a Scotch regiment. Before this a person guilty of desertion or other military offences had ranked as an ordinary felon. "It was then enacted," says Macaulay, "that, on account of the extreme perils impending at that moment over the State, no man mustered on pay in the service of the crown should, on pain of death, or of such lighter punishment as a court-martial should deem sufficient, desert his colours or mutiny against his commanding officers. This statute was to be in force only six months. . . . Six months passed and still the public danger continued. By slow degrees familiarity reconciled the public mind to the names, once so odious, of a standing army and a court-martial. . . . To this day, however, the Estates of the Realm . . . solemnly assert every year the doctrine laid down by the Declaration of Right; and they then grant to the sovereign an extraordinary power to govern a certain number of soldiers according to certain rules during twelve months more." The bill was frequently attacked by the Tory party; since the reign of George I., however, it has been usual to pass it without discussion, and it is now annually brought in and read as a matter of form. From 1713 to 1715 the court-martial had no power to award capital punishment. Since 1748 it has been provided that no sentence touching life or limb could be imposed except for offences enumerated in the Act; and in the same year members of the court-martial were forbidden to divulge the sentence until approved, or the votes of any member unless required by Parliament. In 1764 the operation of the Act was extended to troops serving in India and North America. In 1766 the militia were brought under its provisions, and in 1785 half-pay officers were exempted from it. Mysore. The Mohammedan kingdom of the Deccan was founded by Hyder Ali on the wrecks of the southern principalities. It included, when at its greatest power, not only Mysore proper, but also the whole of Malabar, Cochin, and Calicut, and extended north into the Poonah and Hyderabad States; while to the east and south it included the Carnatic Balaghaut, the Baramahal, and the provinces of Coimbatore and Dendigul. These outlying possessions were gradually shorn off by English conquest, and in 1799 the Mohammedan State of Mysore came to an end at the second siege of Seringapatam and the death of Tippoo. The Hindoo State of Mysore was thereupon created, deprived of all the outlying provinces and Seringapatam, for the descendants of the old Hindoo rajahs. A strictly personal settlement was made with the rajah, leaving the Company the right of assuming the management if necessary. The insufferable rule of the rajah, culminating in rebellion, compelled Lord William Bentinck, in 1831, to assume the entire management. But in 1867 the native sovereignty was re-established, and orders were issued by the Secretary for India that the country should be surrendered to the rajah's adopted son on his coming of age. This was done in 1881.

Nagpore. THE TOWN OF, was captured by the English, Nov. 26, 1807, after a severe defeat inflicted on the rajah's troops. In 1853, on the death of the rajah, the town and territory of Nagpore were annexed by the English.

Nana Sahib. Dhoondoo Punt, a Maharratta Brahmin, was the adopted son of Bajee Rao, the last of the Peishwas. On the death of the latter the Nana petitioned the Lieutenant-Governor of Agra to continue the Peishwa's pension to him. The petition was rejected by Lord Dalhousie and the Directors, though the jaghire of Bithoor was granted him rent free for life (1863). In revenge he devoted himself to plots against the English government. His agents were employed in all the discontented portions of India, and his agent in England, Azim Dolla Khan, on his return encouraged him with exaggerated tales of English disasters in the Crimea. On the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny he became the chief instigator of the carnage. It was his object at once to revive the old empire of the Peishwas in his own person, and to sacrifice as many Europeans as possible to his revenge. It was by his orders that the sepoys fired on the garrison of Cawnpore after they had surrendered, and that the final massacre of Cawnpore was perpetrated. At the end of the Mutiny the Nana escaped to the Terai jungles of Nepal, where he is supposed to have died. In 1874, however, the Maharajah Scindia delivered up to the English government a prisoner, who represented that he was the Nana. He turned out to be an impostor; the reason for this imposture has never been discovered, nor is it certain whether the Maharajah was himself deceived.

Napier, Lieutenant-General Sir William (b. 1785, d. 1860), was the brother of Sir Charles and Sir George Napier, and the cousin of the admiral. His military services, unlike those of his brothers, were confined to the period of the great French War between 1807 and 1814. He served at the attack on Copenhagen, and in all the Peninsular campaigns down to Orthes. He was severely wounded at the bridge of Almeida (1810); received three other wounds during five years; obtained seven decorations; and at the close of the war was made a Commander of the Bath, though he had attained no higher rank than that of lieutenant-colonel. In 1819 he retired on half-pay; and from 1824 to 1840 he was unremittingly engaged on his History of the Peninsular War, which is one of the masterpieces of military history. In 1842 he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Guernsey, being now a major-general. In 1848 he became a K.C.B. In 1848 he published his Conquest of Scinde, a defence of his brother, Sir Charles.

Martineau, Biographical Sketches.

Napier of Magdala, Lord (b. 1810). Sir Robert Cornelius Napier was the son of Major C. F. Napier, and was educated at the Military College, Addiscombe. He entered the corps of Royal Engineers (1828), and served with distinction in the Sutlej campaign, at the conclusion of which he was appointed engineer to the Durbar of Lahore. He was present at the siege of Mooltan and the battle of Gujerat. He was named chief engineer under the new Punjab administration, and for some time was engaged in building roads and cutting canals to open up that province. In 1857 he served as chief engineer in the army of Sir Colin Campbell, and the part he played in the suppression of the rebellion greatly enhanced his reputation. He also distinguished himself in China as second to Sir Hope Grant, and was rewarded by being made a K.C.B., a major-general, and a member of the Council of India. In 1865 he became commander-in-chief at Bombay. In 1867 he received the appointment to command the Abyssinian expedition, and was made a K.G.C. of the Star of India. While he was in Abyssinia he achieved a brilliant success. King Theodore on his defeat committed suicide, the captives were restored, and Magdala besieged and burnt. On his return Sir Robert received the thanks of Parliament, the sum of £2,000 per annum was settled on him and his next heir, and he was elevated to the peerage by the title of Baron Napier of Magdala.

Napier, Sir Charles (b. 1782, d. 1853), eldest son of Colonel George Napier, was educated at home, and sent into the army (1794). He was employed in Ireland during the insurrection; he was at Corunna with Sir John Moore, and fought under the Duke of Wellington at Fuentes D'Onoro and Badajoz. Later he was employed in a fighting cruise off the Chesapeake, and returned in time to accompany the English army to Paris, though he was not present at Waterloo. A period of military inactivity followed; but in 1841 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Bombay. His first and greatest exploit was the conquest and annexation of Scinde, of which he was constituted governor by Lord Ellenborough. The general proceeded to subjugate the hill tribes and all the warlike population. He completely reorganised the whole physical and moral condition of the district, and gained the respect and reverence of the inhabitants—even of the Beloochees. His proceedings, however, highly offended the Directors, and a quarrel ensued, in which Sir Charles treated them with very slight ceremony. His plans for the termination of the Sikh War (q.v.) were not ripe when the battle of Sohraon ended it. Before leaving Scinde he succeeded in changing the feudal system of landholding into a landlord and tenant system, which he considered the best means of forming loyal subjects, by raising a race of independent farmers attached to the government. In 1847 he returned to England and lived in semi-retirement until the disasters of the second Sikh War (q.v.) made everyone look around for a general. Sir Charles started (March, 1849), but found on his arrival at Bombay that the Sikhs had been finally routed. He now devoted himself to military reform; but after two years returned to England, where he died.

Napier, VICE-ADMIRAL SIR CHARLES (b. 1786, d. 1860), was the cousin of the three Napier brothers, Charles, George, and William. He went to sea 1799; was employed all through the French War in the colonies and the Mediterranean. He served on shore in the Peninsula, and was present at Busaco. At the close of the war he had a long interval of rest, but on his return in 1829 he was employed off the coast of Portugal in the Galatea. He supported the Constitutionalists; defeated the fleet of Don Miguel, and settled Donna Maria on the throne. Don Pedro was unbowed in his gratitude; created him Viscount of Cape St. Vincent; gave him all the Portuguese orders, and named him admiral-in-chief. He proceeded to remodel the corrupt Portuguese navy; was thwarted by the officials, and threw up the appointment. In 1840 he was employed in the Mediterranean against Mehemet Ali as commodore, and concluded a convention with him. For his services he was made K.C.B., and received the thanks of both Houses. In 1841 he was elected for Marylebone. In 1847 he received the command of the Channel fleet, and compelled the Emperor of Morocco to make compensation for injuries done to the British commerce. During the Russian War he was nominated to the command of the Baltic fleet, but had little opportunity of earning distinction. On his return he quarrelled with the government on the subject, and mutual recriminations were interchanged. In 1855 he was returned for Southwark, and cleared himself in the eyes of Parliament and the nation. From this time he devoted himself to attacking the abuses in the navy, until his failing health required him to withdraw altogether from public life.

Napierville, THE BATTLE OF (1839), was fought near Montreal between the British troops under Sir James McDonnell and the Canadian rebels, who were completely defeated.

Naseby, THE BATTLE OF (July 14, 1645), was fought during the Great Rebellion. Both armies took the field in May, 1645. Charles I. marched northwards, and whilst Fairfax was besieging Oxford, the king stormed Leicester. Leaving Leicester, Charles established himself at Daventry, collecting provisions to revictual Oxford, and threatening to attack the eastern counties. Fairfax, who left Oxford on July 5, overtook the king on the 12th. The king resolved to give battle, and took up his position on an eminence called Dust Hill, about two miles north of the village of Naseby. The army of Fairfax was drawn up on Red Pitt Hill, about a mile from Naseby. The two armies were both about 11,000 strong, the Royalists being rather the stronger in cavalry. The Royalist right, commanded by Rupert, commenced the attack, and, after a hard fight, routed the Parliamentary left, under Ireton, and attacked the baggage of the Parliamentary army behind the line of battle. Meanwhile the Parliamentary right wing, led by Fairfax and Cromwell, charged and broke the division commanded by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, which formed the left of the king's army. Fairfax and his guards returned from this charge to take part in the struggle between the foot of the two armies in the centre. For this decisive struggle Fairfax brought up all his reserves, and was aided by part of Cromwell's horse and what remained of Ireton's division. Under their combined attack the Royalist centre was utterly routed. Rupert returned too late to the field to turn the fortune of the battle. The king, at the head of his reserve of horse, was resolved to charge in the hope of recovering the day, when a courtier seizing his bride caused a confusion, which effectually prevented an attack. The cavalry of the Parliament pursued the flying Royalists to within two miles of Leicester, and the slaughter during the flight was very great. The Parliamentarians lost about 200 men; the Royalists, 1,000 killed and about 5,000 prisoners, besides all their guns and baggage and the king's private correspondence.

The best account of the battle is in Sprigge's Anglia Rediviva. The letters of Fairfax, Cromwell, and the Parliamentary Commissioners addressed to the Speaker give the official report of the battle. Whitelocke's and Clarendon's accounts contain valuable details. Markham's Life of Fairfax contains a list of authorities, and a criticism of their value. [C. H. F.]

National Debt, THE. The kings of the Middle Ages, and notably the later Plantagenets, had frequently borrowed large sums of money on their own credit on the security of the crown property and estates: but the modern national debt was originated in the reign of William III. by Montague, in 1692, when Chancellor of the Exchequer. In order to defray part of the military expenses, Montague borrowed a million sterling, the interest of which—at first at ten, and, after the year 1700, at seven per cent.—was secured on new duties on liquors. These duties were to form a fund, and on the credit of this fund the loan was to be raised by life annuities, which were to be extinguished when the survivors were reduced to seven. In the following year another loan was obtained, in the shape of the capital of the newly-created Bank of England, which amounted to £1,200,000. By the date of the Treaty of Ryswick (1697) the national debt exceeded 20 millions; by that of the Treaty of Utrecht it was more than 50 millions. This rapid increase was the cause of great alarm to the Tory party, and it was the fear of the Whigs that the Pretender would come “with a sponge” and wipe out the national debt. Its gradual extinction was one of the objects of statesmen. In 1711 Harley founded a floating debt (a debt payable on demand) of ten millions, which became the capital of the South Sea Company, who in return were allowed the monopoly of the privileges of the Assiento (q.v.) contract with Spain. In 1717 Walpole established the first sinking fund, borrowing £600,000 at four per cent. only, to extinguish liabilities bearing a higher rate of interest. The high rate of interest, and the confusion caused by the fact that some of the annuities by which the various loans had been raised were redeemable and others irredeemable, induced the government in 1720 to accept the proposal of the South Sea Company that they should add the national debt to their capital, and should in return make the fund uniform and redeemable, paying at first five, and after 1727 four per cent.; but the failure of the company caused the plan to fall to the ground. Pelham was more successful in his measures, carrying out in 1750 a uniform arrangement, called the Consolidated Fund, and reducing the interest to three per cent., paying off those who were unwilling to accept the terms. Meanwhile the debt increased by leaps and bounds. At the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) it was over 78 millions; at the Peace of Paris (1763), over 138 millions; and at the conclusion of the American War (1784), 249 millions. In 1786 the younger Pitt proposed a new sinking fund, by which scheme the sum of one million was annually set apart from the income of the country for the reduction of the debt. The fallacy of the system became evident when times of difficulty arose; and the nation was forced to borrow, often at a higher interest than it gained, in order to meet current expenses. It was gradually abandoned, being finally laid aside by Lord Grenville in 1828. The struggle with Napoleon was a fearful strain on the national resources, and in 1817, when the English and Irish exchequers were consolidated, the capital was over 840 millions, and the annual charge exceeded 32 millions. Since that date it has been gradually reduced, partly by arrangements of economy, such as that by which, under the Bank Charter Act of 1833, the Bank of England was to receive £120,000 less than before for the management of the debt; partly, as in 1868 and onwards, by the conversion of stock into terminable annuities. In 1875 a new and permanent sinking fund was established, which was to be maintained by annual votes of the legislature. In 1883 a great scheme in connection with the national debt was formed by Mr. Childers, by which, through the creation of new annuities terminable in twenty years, £70,000,000 of debt could be immediately extinguished, and £173,300,000 in twenty years. The national debt in this year amounted to £756,376,519. In 1884 Mr. Childers carried an Act by which a portion of the debt was to be converted from three per cent. to two and a half per cent. stock. [BANKING; SOUTH SEA COMPANY.]

Macanlay gives a clear account of the origin of the debt, and Lord Stanhope of its connection with the South Sea Company. See also Massey, Hist. of Eng.; Martineau, Hist. of the Peace; McCulloch, Commercial Dictionary; Statesman's Year-Book. [L. C. S.]

Navarrete, or Najara, THE BATTLE OF (April 3, 1367), was fought during the alliance between the Black Prince and Pedro the Cruel, King of Castile. Pedro, a monster of vice, had been expelled from his kingdom by his natural brother, Henry of Trastamare, who was supported by a considerable French force, commanded by the Breton hero, Du Guesclin. Pedro applied for assistance to the Black Prince, who after some hesitation agreed to march into Spain to his aid, on condition that the expenses of the campaign should be defrayed by Pedro, and certain Spanish towns ceded to England. Accordingly he crossed the Pyrenees with an army of 24,000 men, and met the combined force of the French and Spanish, numbering 60,000 men, on the plain of Navarrete just beyond the Ebro near the town of Logrono. This victory was almost equal in the importance of its results to Crecy and Poitiers. The English archers won the day, the loss of the enemy being very considerable, and among the prisoners was Du Guesclin himself.

Navarino, BATTLE OF (Oct. 20, 1827). In 1827, on the refusal of Turkey to grant the armistice to the Greeks demanded by the powers, the French, English, and Russian fleets entered the Eastern Mediterranean, and appeared before Navarino Bay, where twenty-eight Turkish and Egyptian ships-of-war lay waiting fresh reinforcements from Europe. The allies explained the negotiations, and declared they should not sail. Ibrahim Pasha agreed, but sailed in spite of this. The allies returned, and drove the Turkish fleet into Navarino. Ibrahim now ordered a general massacre on shore. On the 20th, Sir Edward Codrington, the English admiral, sailed in to say that he would convoy the Turkish and Egyptian ships back to their respective countries. Codrington went on parleying till the Turks opened fire upon him and the French. The battle then began, and in four hours the Turkish fleet was entirely destroyed by the allies.

Navigation Laws, THE, regulated the privileges of British ships, and the conditions under which foreign ships were admitted to the trade of this country. Legislation of this kind was naturally of early development; we find instances of it under the later Angevin kings, and in the reigns of Henry VII. and Elizabeth laws were passed excluding foreign ships from our coasting trade. Cromwell was, however, the first to adopt the navigation system as a policy; in 1650 he excluded all foreign ships without a licence from trading with the plantations of America, and in 1651 the famous Navigation Act was passed, which forbade the importation of goods into England except in English ships, or in the ships of the nation which produced the goods. This measure was levelled at the Dutch carrying trade: it forced the Dutch into war, but in the end they accepted it. The mercantile system, as it was called, was continued after the Restoration. In 1660 an Act was passed providing that all colonial produce should be exported in English vessels; that no man might establish himself as a factor in the colonies, and that various sorts of colonial produce could only be exported to England and her dependencies. In 1663 it was enacted that the colonies should receive no goods whatever in foreign vessels. In 1672 came the Navigation Act of Charles II., based on that of Cromwell, under which the prohibition against introducing goods, except in English ships manned by a crew of which at least three-fourths were English, applied to all the principal articles of commerce known as the "enumerated articles." This Act ruined the Dutch merchant navy, and the cruel restrictions of the navigation laws were one of the main causes of the American rebellion. After the Declaration of Independence, the United States were placed on the footing of a foreign nation, and hence came under the operation of the Act of Charles II. They promptly retaliated by excluding our ships, and in 1814 the Treaty of Ghent was concluded, by which discriminating duties were mutually abolished. Long since the folly of these restrictions on commerce had been pointed out by political economists, and Mr. Wallace and Mr. Huskisson began from 1821 and onwards, introducing a series of measures of which the object was to place England and the foreign nations with which she was at peace on the same footing. The most important of these was the Reciprocity of Duties Act of 1823, which was directed against Prussia, the Netherlands, and Portugal, all of whom had raised their duties on English vessels; and the Act of 1826, by which the Navigation Act was repealed, and a new set of regulations established of a more liberal character, though the goods of Asia, Africa, and America were still restricted to English vessels, or those of the producing country. The free-trade legislation of 1842, 1846, and 1849 finally abolished a most vexatious system. Lastly, in 1854, the coasting trade of England was thrown open to foreign vessels.

The effects of the Navigation Act on America are mentioned in Doyle, The English in America, and Bancroft, History of the United States. See also Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations; and 12 Car. II., c. 18; 3 Geo. IV., c. 42, 43, 44, 45; 12 & 13 Vict., c. 29. For the increase of English commerce since the repeal of the Acts see Mr. Gladstone's speech at Leeds, Oct., 1861.

Navy, THE. According to the strict sense of the word, the navy did not come into existence until the reign of Henry VIII. Before that period the King of England had the power of calling upon a certain part of the people to serve against his enemies at sea, and to supply ships and arms; but there was no permanent naval force, although some of the sovereigns had ships which were their personal property. It seems, however, to have been the custom to pay the crews of these ships when on active service out of the national treasury. The Cinque Ports were endowed with privileges on consideration of rendering especial service at sea, but the obligation to serve was common to the whole coast. Until the end of the thirteenth century the general control of the navy was left to officers called leaders, governors, or justiciaries of the king's fleet. In the reign of John the office was held by an ecclesiastic, the Archdeacon of Taunton. In 1303 the title of admiral was already in use. Gervase Alard is stated to be "captain and admiral of the fleet of ships of the Cinque Ports, and of all other ports from the port of Dover, and of the whole county of Cornwall." Admirals for parts of the coast, or for different seas, were appointed on varying conditions until the office of Lord High Admiral grew out of the older "captain and admiral" of particular districts. [ADMIRAL.] From the beginning of the fifteenth century, the navy has always been governed, nominally at least, by a Lord High Admiral, either in person or by commissioners appointed to discharge the office. Its powers were very great, including the commandership-in-chief at sea, the authority of the present Lords of the Admiralty, with the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court in peace, and the prize courts in war. [ADMIRALTY.] The last

Lord High Admiral who really exercised the powers of the office was James II. when Duke of York. Henry VIII. began the modern navy by the appointment of a comptroller, and by setting aside a portion of his revenue every year to meet the expenses of building new vessels and of keeping his ships in fighting order. It was, however, long before an organised body of naval officers was formed. Until the reign of James II. it was the custom to appoint a captain who might or might not be a seaman, and who had a master to navigate for each voyage. The captain then collected his crew by voluntary enlistment or press. When the special service for which the ship had been commissioned was performed, the whole crew was paid off, and ceased to have any further necessary connection with the royal service. The pay of the captains was largely made up by fees for convoying, &c., until the abuses of the system induced James II. to abolish it, and compensate the captains by the large increase of sea-pay, known as service-and-table money. James II. also established the system of giving half-pay to officers not on active service. It seems to have been regarded as a species of retaining fee, and even until the beginning of the eighteenth century naval officers in the intervals of active service commanded merchant ships, and traded on their own account. There are well-known cases of merchant skippers appointed to command war ships as late as the end of the seventeenth century. Captain Cook is an example of a man who worked his way to command through the rank of sailing-master from before the mast. Step by step, however, our organisation has become more strict, and to-day naval officers are a highly trained professional body. The matériel of the navy has gone through a process of development very similar to that of the personnel. Under the Tudors, the first two Stuart princes, and the Commonwealth, the navy consisted of a nucleus of royal ships (or national, as the case might be), which was joined in war time, or whenever the king thought fit to make an imposing demonstration in the Channel, by a crowd of merchant vessels. Scarcely a fifth of the ships collected against the Armada belonged to the queen, and the proportion in Wimbledon's fleet which sailed against Cadiz in 1625, and in Buckingham's at the Isle of Rhé, 1626, was about the same. Even the great fleet which fought the three days' fight with Tromp in the Channel contained many armed merchant ships. By that time, however, the armed merchant ships had become a mere nuisance to the fighting vessels. What had done well enough in 1588, though even then the queen's officers did not think the ships from the ports good for much except to make a show, had become completely useless fifty years later. The causes of this change were two. In the first place the heroic enthusiasm of the Elizabethan days passed away with the Elizabethan heroes. In 1625 it was found impossible to get obedience from pressed crews and merchant skippers, and the English flag was disgraced by insubordination and cowardice before the enemy. In the second place Phineas Pett, James I.'s builder, had begun to make the war ship something far more different from the merchant vessel than it had been in the sixteenth century. The progress of the seventeenth century in ship-building was as rapid as anything seen in our time. When James I. ascended the throne a ship of five hundred tons was a match for anything; the liners of his grandsons were vessels of from 1,500 to 1,600 tons. Their superiority in build and rigging was enormous. As the war ship therefore became a special instrument, it was found impossible to improvise it out of a merchant ship any longer. Accordingly the number of royal ships had to be increased very rapidly. James I. left only thirty-three; Charles raised the number to sixty-seven; under the Commonwealth it rose to 150, and at the Revolution it was 234. At one period since then it has reached upwards of 900. The beginning of the eighteenth century may be considered as the period at which the navy became fully developed.

Since then the organisation of the navy has remained almost the same in form, though it has undergone innumerable modifications in points of detail. The administrative machinery, the rank and status of officers, the code of laws by which naval discipline was preserved, and the duties of the various branches of the service were fixed at the beginning of the last century; and though the changes in the construction and management of ships has been enormous, the attempt has constantly been made to adapt this organisation to it, without departing from it in essentials. Great progress was made in ship-building and naval tactics in the eighteenth century. In 1745 "first-rates" were ordinarily ships of 2,000 tons; in the American War they were 2,100; and in 1808 there was a ship of 2,616. The results of the great war with France from 1793 to 1815 was that the navies of the chief Continental States were almost annihilated, and that of England obtained an enormous preponderance. Great improvements in the construction of the vessels were made after the close of the war; and the English ships of the line reached their perfection between the years 1820 and 1845. But in 1838 steam was applied to war vessels, and by the time of the Crimean War many English liners were fitted with auxiliary screws. Shortly afterwards armour-plated ships were introduced, and since then change has succeeded change with bewildering rapidity. Wooden ships of the line have become quite obsolete, and during the last twenty years the English navy has been completely reconstructed, and ships of size far exceeding the largest vessel of the past, and carrying ordnance of enormous powers have been built. The old system of "rating" is still nominally kept up, and generally speaking the names, ranks, and duties are assigned to the fighting part of the service; but each ship now carries a large number of engineers, artificers, and scientific officers. Nazir Jung was the second son of Nizam-ool-Moolk, on whose death (1749), he seized the royal treasure and the throne, and called in the aid of the English to resist the confederation formed against him by Dupleix to support Mozuffer Jung, the grandson of Nizam-ool-Moolk. The alliance did not, however, last long, and Nazir Jung was of too reckless and pleasure-loving a nature to be able to cope successfully with the intrigues of Dupleix. In December, 1750, he was assassinated by a treacherous dependant.

Nechtan's Mere, THE BATTLE OF (May 20, 685), was fought between Brude, the Pictish king, and Ecgrith of Northumbria, his cousin, who had crossed the Forth to subdue the Picts. The result of this battle was most important. The Picts at once shook off the Northumbrian yoke, and the Northumbrian overlordship itself came to an end. Nechtsmere is the modern Dunnichen, about four miles south-east of Forfar.

Neck-verse, THE. [BENEFIT OF CLERGY.]

Nectan Morbet (d. 481), King of the Picts, was banished to Ireland by his brother and predecessor, Talorgan, on whose death, however, he returned. He is said to have founded the church of Abernethy, and to have given his name to Drum-nechtan or Dunnichen in Forfarshire, where the battle of Nectansmere was (685) subsequently fought.

Nectan (d. 732), son of Derili, succeeded his brother Brude as King of the Picts in 706. In 710 the king and nation were persuaded by St. Boniface to conform to the Roman Church, and to adopt Roman usages instead of the Columban. The Columban clergy were consequently in 717 expelled, and driven into Dalriada; this had the effect of stirring into antagonism the latent hostility between the Scots and Picts. In 724 Nectan abdicated and entered a monastery, which, however, he subsequently left, and after a victory over Alpin, the reigning king at Scone, recovered his kingdom. He was very shortly afterwards defeated by Angus MacFergus.

Nelson, HORATIO, VISCOUNT (b. 1758, d. 1805), was the son of the Rector of Burnham Thorpe in Norfolk. He went to school first at Norwich, and afterwards at North Walsham. In 1771 he went to sea with his uncle in the Raisonné, but soon returned, and was commissioned to the Triumph at Chatham. In 1773 his uncle's influence obtained a place for him in an expedition to the Arctic Seas. The expedition was at one time in great danger, but eventually returned in safety. He was then ordered to the East Indies, where, after serving eighteen months, he was invalided home. In 1777 he received his commission as second lieutenant of the Lowestoffe, ordered to Jamaica. In the West Indies he soon became noticeable for his bravery and application, and in December, 1778, he was appointed to command the Badger, from which he was transferred in the following June as post-captain to the Hinchinbrook. In the spring of 1780 he was appointed to command an expedition against San Juan in the isthmus of Panama. The expedition ended in failure, not through any fault of Nelson's, but on account of the deadly nature of the climate, against which only 380 out of 1,800 men were proof. Nelson himself was so shattered by the exertions he had gone through that he had to go to England to recruit his health. In 1783 he was appointed to the Boreas bound for the West Indies, where he found himself senior captain. In this position he became involved in some troublesome disputes, and finally in a law-suit, owing to his determination to enforce the Navigation Act. On the breaking out of the French War in 1793 he was appointed to the Agamemnon of sixty-four guns to proceed to the Mediterranean. In 1796 Sir John Jervis took the command in the Mediterranean, and Nelson became at the same time commodore. After various encounters with Spanish and French ships, he joined the main fleet off Cape St. Vincent, where, on Feb. 14, 1797, he took a conspicuous part in the great battle, and contributed much to the victory. Nelson was now advanced to the rank of rear-admiral, and commanded the inner squadron at the blockade of Cadiz. In July he conducted a night attack on Santa Cruz, which failed through the darkness; Nelson himself lost his right arm. Early in the following year he rejoined Lord St. Vincent in the Vanguard, and was immediately despatched in command of a small squadron to watch the movements of the French fleet in the Mediterranean. On Aug. 1 he came in sight of them anchored in Aboukir Bay, near Alexandria. He at once attacked with such fury and skill that, after the battle had raged all night, the whole French fleet, with the exception of four ships, was either taken or destroyed. The victory was hailed with delight in England, where honours were showered upon Nelson from all sides, and he was created Baron Nelson. There was work for him next to do at Naples in trying to strengthen that kingdom to resist France. At Naples Nelson's infatuation for Lady Hamilton led him to bolster up the decaying monarchy of the Bourbons, and to commit the only act of injustice recorded of him—the execution of Caraccioli. In the spring of the year 1800 Nelson returned to England, and in the following year he was sent as second in command under Sir Hyde Parker to the Baltic, and on April 2 bore the chief part in the bombardment of Copenhagen. Nelson was made a viscount, and on the recall of Sir Hyde Parker was left in sole command. On his return to England he was at once appointed to a command extending from Orfordness to Beachy Head. He organised an attack on the flotilla lying at Boulogne, but the expedition failed in its immediate object, though it had the effect of terrifying the French. On the war breaking out afresh in 1803 he was appointed to the command of the Mediterranean fleet, and took his station off Toulon. From May, 1803, to August, 1805, Nelson left his ship only three times, so constant was his watch for an opportunity of engaging the enemy. But when the alliance of Spain and France was concluded Napoleon determined to carry out his long-intended invasion of England. The combined fleets put out of port. Nelson went in search of them. From January to April, 1805, he beat about the Mediterranean; then pursued them to the West Indies. Here they were in advance of him; and he was baffled by conflicting accounts of their movements. At length he followed them northwards, and on July 19 anchored off Gibraltar, but could hear no tidings of them. Unrelentingly he resumed his search round the Bay of Biscay and the coast of Ireland, and returning, joined Admiral Cornwallis off Ushant on August 15, where he received orders to proceed to Portsmouth. There he learnt that Admiral Calder had fallen in with them off Cape Finisterre on July 22, and that they had put into Vigo to refit. He again offered his services, which were eagerly accepted; and on Sept. 29 he was off Cadiz. Villeneuve hesitated to obey peremptory orders to put to sea; but at length he ventured out, and on Oct. 21 gave Nelson his long-wished-for opportunity. The fleets met off Trafalgar, and in the battle which ensued the French and Spanish fleets were utterly destroyed. The victory was, however, only obtained at the cost of Nelson's life. He died at the early age of forty-seven. "Yet," as Southey says, "he cannot be said to have fallen prematurely, whose work was done."

Nennius is the supposed author of the collection of chronicles and genealogies of very different date and value which is styled Historia Britonum. Very different views have been held as to the authenticity, authorship, and historical usefulness of Nennius.

Many have agreed with Milton's description of him as a "very trivial writer," and one recent author speaks of "the stuff called Nennius." Mr. Skene, however, has formed a higher opinion of his value.

Nennius has been published by the Eng. Hist. Soc., and in the Mon. Hist. Brit. There is a translation in Bohn's Antiquarian Library. The best account of him will be found in Mr. Skene's Celtic Scotland, vol. i.

Nepaul. About the middle of the fourteenth century it was colonised by Rajpoots, and in the middle of the last century, a chief of the Goorkha tribe united all the small principalities and founded the military dynasty of Katmandoo. The attempts of the Nepaul princes to extend their dominions north ended in a collision with China, which resulted in their being compelled to pay tribute. Foiled in the north, they turned south. Their greatest general, Ulmur Singh, who acted almost independently, carried their arms west beyond the Kalee to the Upper Sutlej, coming in contact with the rising power of Runjeet Singh. Not content with this, they pushed their encroachments to the British frontier and beyond, until their aggressions ended in the Goorkha War (q.v.), which effectually repressed their attempts in the south and west. The treaty which ended the war has never been violated, and the Goorkhas, instead of taking advantage of our exigencies in the Mutiny of 1857, sent a large force to assist in quelling it. The barren region which was the scene of the war has proved an invaluable acquisition. It has furnished sites for sanatoria at Simla, Mussooree, Landour, and Nynee-thal, where the rulers of British India can recruit their strength during the heat of summer. The distance between Calcutta and Simla is abridged by a railway, and to this beautiful place the Governor-General, the commander-in-chief, and the chief officials, fly during the intense heat of summer.

Neutrality may be either perfect or conventional, independent of, or affected by, treaty. Examples of conventional neutrality are afforded by the perpetual neutrality and inviolability of the Swiss cantons declared in 1815, and by the neutrality of Belgium declared in 1833. In some cases also neutrality has been qualified by a pre-existing alliance with one of the belligerents. Thus, in the war between Russia and Sweden in 1788, Denmark, though supplying the Empress Catherine with certain aid, as arranged by previous treaty, was yet held to be neutral. Such a limited neutrality, however, would scarcely be recognised in these days. No hostilities are lawful on neutral territory, nor may troops pass through such territory for the purposes of war. Within the limits of the maritime jurisdiction of a neutral state all captures are invalid, and every belligerent act is unlawful. In 1863 the crew of the American merchantman the Chesapeake mutinied, seized the ship, and declared her a Confederate man-of-war. The United States government took the ship with three of the crew in British waters, but Mr. Seward considered the capture a violation of the law of nations, and delivered ship and men to the British authorities. Such violation of territorial right is a matter which lies between the neutral state and the captor. A neutral state is bound not to afford any kind of warlike help to either of two belligerents, and not to refuse to one what she grants to the other. Acting on these principles, Washington, on the outbreak of the European war of 1793, issued a proclamation of neutrality, with instructions to prevent the equipment of belligerent vessels in the ports of the United States. No legislative effort in this direction was made by Great Britain until the Foreign Enlistment Act of 1819, which followed the lines laid down in America. This Act was relaxed in 1835 in respect of troops levied to uphold the claim of Queen Isabella to the throne of Spain. During the civil war in America, 1861—65, much dispute arose concerning our duty as a neutral. Many cruisers, such as the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah, were built at Liverpool for the Confederate States, and were received in British ports. These ships did immense damage to the shipping and trade of the Federal States. The most famous of them, the Alabama, was built in Liverpool in 1862, received her crew from that port, and sailed thence to the Azores, where she put on board her armament, which had been sent out from Liverpool for that purpose. During the next two years she took sixty-five vessels, before she was herself destroyed. As she and her fellows left our ports without warlike equipment, the law was evaded rather than broken. Since, however, it was at least doubtful how far we had exercised due vigilance in the matter, we submitted the American claims to arbitration, and, in 1872, were condemned to pay £3,000,000 damages. As regards the rights of neutrals in trading and carrying, primitive law allows the capture of an enemy's goods in any place save the territory of a neutral state; public ships, being reckoned as such territory, are not subject to visitation or capture of goods. This does not apply to private vessels. In respect of these, however, primitive law has been modified by treaty in favour of the rule that free, or neutral ships, make the goods they carry free also. Treaties to this effect were made by Holland, a great trading and carrying country, with Spain in 1650, with France in 1662, and again at the Peace of Ryswick in 1697. Though the maxim "free ships, free goods," does not imply the other maxim, "enemy's ships, enemy's goods" (for the one is founded on the principle num cuiusque, while neutral goods, since they belong to a friend, should not be subject to capture), yet they have often been joined together, as in the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. The parties to the Armed Neutrality of the Baltic, in 1780, insisted on "free ships, free goods," which was contrary to British custom. This rule has been established by the Declaration of Paris, made in 1856, with the exception of contraband of war, a term including such goods as are of primary importance in war, together with such as are of doubtful use, as naval stores and coal, if they are rendered contraband by circumstances. A neutral ship is subject to capture when carrying military persons or despatches, or contraband goods, when they belong to the owner of the ship, or when fraud is practised. The right of neutrals to carry persons was involved in the Trent affair. In November, 1861, the Trent, a British mail steamer, was stopped by a United States ship, and two Confederate commissioners, Messrs. Slidell and Mason, with their secretaries, were taken from her. Earl Russell declared that these persons were not contraband, and finally they were delivered up to us, the question of their character being left unsettled. Neutral rights are further limited by blockade. The right to blockade by proclamation was asserted by Bonaparte, when, in 1806, without a ship to enforce his decree, he declared the blockade of the British Isles, and the same assertion was involved in our retaliatory Orders in Council. It has now been settled by the Declaration of Paris that a blockade to be binding on a neutral must be "effective." These restraints on neutrals imply the belligerent right of search and capture, and a neutral ship resisting this right is thereby rendered subject to confiscation.

Neville, THE FAMILY OF. The Nevilles were lords of Raby from the early part of the thirteenth century. In 1397 Ralph de Neville of Raby was created Earl of Westmoreland. The title was forfeited in 1570. Ralph's younger sons, Richard, William, and Edward, became respectively, through his marriage, Earl of Salisbury, Baron Fauconberg, and Abergavenny (with the titles of Despencer and Burghersh). Another son, George, was created Lord Latimer. Richard, Earl of Salisbury, was the father of Richard, the famous Earl of Warwick (by marriage with Ann, sister and heiress of Henry Beauchamp, Earl and ultimately Duke of Warwick), whose daughter, Isabel, married George, Duke of Clarence, created Earl of Warwick and of Salisbury (1472). John Neville, a younger brother of the "King-maker," was created Marquis of Montagu (1470), and his son, George, Duke of Bedford, in 1469. The latter was degraded from all his dignities in 1477, but a descendant in the female line, Anthony Browne, was created Viscount Montagu (1554). Returning to the generation next subsequent to Ralph, first Earl of Westmoreland, George Lord Latimer's title fell into abeyance in 1577, while that of Edward, Lord Abergavenny, still remains. It was raised to an earldom (with the viscounty of Neville of Birling in Kent) in 1784, and to a marquise (with the earldom of Lewes) in 1876. Between 1598, however, and 1604 there was a dispute between the heir general and the heir male of the title, which ended in the latter holding only the barony of Abergavenny, while the former received that of Despencer. The son of the holder of the Despencer title was in 1624 raised to the barony of Burgherah and earldom of Westmoreland, and the title still remains with his descendants.

Neville, ALEXANDER (d. 1392), was elected Archbishop of York in 1373, and on the accession of Richard II. became one of his chief advisers. The barons were determined to get rid of all the royal ministers, and in 1387 Neville was impeached of treason. The Merciless Parliament declared him guilty of treason, and the Pope was induced to translate him to the see of St. Andrews, which act, as Scotland acknowledged the rival Pope, was a mere mockery. Neville retired to Flanders, where he obtained a benefice, which he held till his death.

Neville, GEORGE, Bishop of Exeter (d. 1476), was the youngest son of the Earl of Salisbury, and brother to Warwick, the "King-maker." In 1456 he was made Bishop of Exeter, and on the triumph of the Yorkists in 1460, received the Great Seal. In 1465 he was appointed Archbishop of York; but on the breaking out of a quarrel between the Earl of Warwick and the king in 1467, he was deprived of the chancellorship. In 1470 he joined his brothers in their restoration of Henry VI., by whom he was appointed Chancellor; but after Edward's victories at Barnet and Tewkesbury, his goods were seized and he himself was imprisoned for three years. He took no further part in public affairs, and died not long after his release.

Neville's Cross, THE BATTLE OF (Oct. 17, 1346), was fought near Durham, between an invading army of the Scotch, under David II., the Steward and the Knight of Liddesdale, and the northern militia under Henry Percy and Ralph Neville. The Scotch were completely defeated, owing to their inability to cope with the English archers; David himself was captured, together with many of the chief men in the Scottish army, and it is said that 15,000 men were slain.

Nevis, one of the Leeward Islands, was discovered by Columbus (1493), and colonised by English settlers from St. Kitt's (1628). The progress of the island made rapid strides until 1706, when a French invasion carried off most of the slaves; and for some time after this attack, the colonists had considerable difficulty in supporting themselves. In 1871 Nevis joined the Federation of the Leeward Islands. Previous to this time the government was vested in a president, a council of seven members, and a representative assembly of nine.

New Brunswick at first formed part of Nova Scotia, and, like that country, was discovered first by Cabot in 1497. In 1639 and 1672 it was partially colonised by the French, and was by them held as a fishing and hunting station until 1760, when it was taken by the British. Shortly afterwards English colonists began to arrive in large numbers, and the fisheries were found to be extremely valuable. In 1783 the country was still further colonised by a number of disbanded troops, who were sent from New England, and in the following year New Brunswick was separated from Nova Scotia, and made an independent province, with a constitution similar to those of Nova Scotia and Canada. In 1837, in consequence of representations made to the home government, the entire control of taxation was vested in the legislative assembly. In 1867, under the British North American Act, New Brunswick was incorporated with other provinces under the title of the Dominion of Canada. Its government, which is now subject to the central authority at Ottawa, consists of a Lieutenant-governor, an executive and a legislative council, and a legislative assembly. The capital of New Brunswick is St. John's, and its wealth is derived from fisheries, coal, and iron, besides other minerals. [CANADA.]

New Model was the name given to the army of the Parliament as new modelled in April, 1645. The term referred at first to the plan on which the army was reorganised, but soon came to signify the army itself. The Lords rejected the first Self-denying Ordinance, because they did not know "what shape the army would suddenly take." The Commons produced a scheme for the reconstruction of the army on the following plan. The new force was to consist of 22,000 men, divided into 6,600 horse, 1,000 dragoons, and 14,400 foot, the horse to be formed into eleven regiments of 600 men each, the dragoons into ten companies of 100 men, and the foot into twelve regiments of 1,200 men each in ten companies. The army was to cost £44,955 a month, to be raised by assessment throughout the kingdom. On January 21 it was resolved that this force should be commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax, with Skippon as major-general. The officers were to be nominated by the commander-in-chief, subject to the approval of the two Houses. This scheme, and these appointments, were confirmed by the House of Lords on February 15, 1645. The new army contained a large number of Independents, for Fairfax was empowered to dispense with the signature of the Covenant in the case of religious men. Several of its officers had risen from the ranks, and had originally filled very humble stations. Lieutenant-Colonels Pride and Hewson had been, the one a drayman and the other a cobbler. But the assertions made at the time by opponents of the new scheme that most of the colonels were "tradesmen, brewers, tailors, goldsmiths, shoemakers, and the like," were entirely untrue. Out of thirty-seven generals and colonels it is computed that twenty-one were commoners of good families, nine members of noble families, and only seven not gentlemen by birth. It deserves notice that a large number of these officers were Cromwell's kinsmen and connections. Clarendon in 1660 described the army thus founded as "an army whose sobriety and manners, whose courage and success, have made it famous and terrible all over the world."

New Ross, THE BATTLE OF (June 5, 1799), was fought during the Irish Rebellion between General Johnstone, with some 1,400 men, and no less than 30,000 rebels, under Father Roche and Bagenal Harvey. The rebels were at first successful, and reached even the market-place; here, however, Johnstone rallied his men, and, charging with the bayonet, drove them out of the town with fearful carnage. The troops, enraged to frenzy, gave no quarter, and after eleven hours' fighting, no less than 2,600 rebel corpses were left on the field. This defeat prevented the rebels from marching on Dublin.

Newburgh, WILLIAM OF (b. 1135? d. 1200?), wrote a history covering the period 1154—1198. It is particularly interesting from its anecdotes of distinguished persons. The writer's style is clear and sedate, while his observations are acute and sensible. All that is known of the author is that he was an Augustinian canon.

An edition of his work is published by the English Historical Society.

Newburn, BATTLE OF (Aug. 28, 1640). At the opening of the second war between Charles I. and the Scots, Viscount Conway, with about 12,000 men, was charged to hold the line of the Tyne. Leaving two-thirds of his forces in Newcastle, Conway, with 3,000 foot and 1,500 horse, posted himself at the ford of Newburn, four miles above the town. There he threw up some hasty entrenchments, but they were commanded by the higher ground on the opposite bank, and, after a three hours' cannonade, the raw levies who defended them took to flight. The Scots now crossed the river, and after a couple of charges, routed the English cavalry. This defeat forced Conway to evacuate Newcastle, which the Scots occupied on the following day.

Newbury, THE FIRST BATTLE OF (Sept. 20, 1643), was fought during the Great Rebellion. The Earl of Essex raised the siege of Gloucester (Sept. 8), and managed to evade pursuit during the first portion of his march back to London. But Prince Rupert, with the royal cavalry, overtook him and delayed his progress, so that the king was enabled to occupy Newbury, and bar the road to London. The royal army was advantageously posted on a hill to the south of Newbury with its right resting on the river Kennet. Charles was resolved to maintain a defensive attitude, but the rash attack of some of his horse prevented this resolution being carried out. The battle was decided by the Parliamentary infantry, led by Essex in person, who stormed the hill by sheer hard fighting. "The trained bands of the city of London," writes an officer present, "endured the chiefest heat of the day, and had the honour to win it." "They behaved themselves to wonder," says Clarendon; "standing as a bulwark and rampart to defend the rest." The king lost many noblemen and officers, including the Earl of Carnarvon, the Earl of Sunderland, and Lord Falkland. Essex marched on to Reading, unopposed, the next morning.

Newbury, THE SECOND BATTLE OF (Oct. 27, 1644). After the surrender of the Earl of Essex in Cornwall (Sept., 1644), Charles marched back towards Oxfordshire. He found that the Parliament had united a new army of about 16,000 men from the armies of Waller and Manchester, and the remains of that of Essex. The king, with little more than 8,000 men, took up his position to the north of Newbury between Shaw and Speen, with his front protected by the river Lamborne, with Donnington Castle, and a house called Doleman's House, serving as outworks. Here the king was attacked on Oct. 27. On the king's left, round Speen, the Royalists lost that village and several guns, but they held their ground in the fields between Donnington and Newbury. On the right, at Shaw, the earthworks round Doleman's House were successfully defended, and the Parliamentary troops were repulsed with great loss. Nevertheless the loss of ground on the left obliged the king to abandon his position, and he withdrew the same night by Donnington Castle to Wallingford. Cromwell declared that this imperfect victory might have been turned into a decisive success had the Earl of Manchester been willing. "I showed him evidently," says Cromwell, "how this success might be obtained, and only desired leave with my own brigade of horse to charge the king's army in their retreat, leaving it to the earl's choice if he thought proper to remain neutral with the rest of his forces. But he positively refused his consent." So far did the inactivity of the Parliamentary general go, that the king was allowed twelve days later to return and remove his artillery and stores from Donnington.

Newcastle, THOMAS HOLLES, DUKE OF (b. 1693, d. 1768), succeeded to his uncle's property in 1711. He attached himself to the Whigs. On the accession of George I. he became Lord-Lieutenant of Middlesex, and was created Duke of Newcastle in 1716. In that year he displayed great zeal in suppressing the Jacobite rebellion. He was made Lord Chamberlain, and sworn of the Privy Council. He followed Sunderland and Stanhope when the schism took place in the Whig ministry, but on their deaths in 1720 he joined Townshend and Walpole. In 1724, on the dismissal of Carteret, he became Secretary of State. For many years he continued to be a follower of Walpole. At length, in 1738, seeing that Walpole was deprived of the friendship of Queen Caroline, and that the king was opposed to his peace policy, Newcastle began to intrigue against him. The king was encouraged in his wish for war; angry despatches were sent to the English ambassador in Spain. Walpole's appointment of Lord Hervey as Lord Privy Seal further alienated him. In 1742 his intrigues were successful; Walpole resigned. Wilmington was made premier, and on his death (1743) Newcastle's brother, Henry Pelham, became leader of the ministry. All opposition in Parliament had ceased, but the Pelhams were jealous of Carteret. They brought matters to a crisis by demanding the admission of Pitt and Chesterfield to the cabinet. The king refused, and they resigned. Carteret was commissioned to form a ministry, but he failed, and the Pelhams returned to power. In 1747 Newcastle succeeded in getting rid of Chesterfield. Contrary to the wish of Henry Pelham, he still promoted the war. Chesterfield, finding his peace policy disregarded, resigned. Shortly afterwards Newcastle (1748) concluded the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. In 1751 an estrangement took place between the two brothers. On the death of Pelham, Newcastle took his brother's place as head of the Treasury. He was at a loss for a leader in the Commons. Sir Thomas

Robinson, a weak man, was appointed to lead the House. Pitt and Fox contrived to torment him, but Fox making terms with Newcastle, he contrived to get through the year. It was evident that war was at hand. Newcastle was quite incapable. He gave contradictory orders to the English admirals, and on the failure of Admiral Byng the popular outcry against him was so great that he was compelled to resign (1756). He immediately began to intrigue for office. On the failure of Pitt's administration, a complicated series of negotiations ensued. During eleven weeks there was no Parliament. For a brief period Lord Waldegrave attempted to form a ministry. At length Pitt and Newcastle came to terms, and that strong government so gloriously known as Pitt's ministry was formed. "Mr. Pitt," said Horace Walpole, "does everything; the duke gives everything." On the death of George II., Newcastle sent abject messages to Bute, offering to serve not only with him but under him. But patronage and the management of elections were taken out of his hands. In 1761 he deserted Pitt, and spoke against the Spanish War. But his position was untenable, and in 1762 he resigned. In 1763 he was dismissed from his lord-lieutenancy for censuring the terms of the peace. In 1765 he received the Privy Seal in Rockingham's administration. In 1768 he died, intriguing to the last. "His peculiarities," says Lord Stanhope, "were so glaring and ridiculous that the most careless glance could not mistake, nor the most bitter enmity exaggerate them. Extremely timorous, and moved to tears on the slightest occasions, he abounded in childish caresses and empty protestations. Fretful and peevish with his dependants, always distrusting his friends, and always ready to betray them, he lived in a continual turmoil of harassing affairs, vexatious opposition, and burning jealousies. What chiefly maintained him in power was his court-craft, his indefatigable perseverance, his devoting every energy of his mind to discover and attach himself to the winning side."

Newcastle, WILLIAM CAVENDISH, DUKE OF (b. 1592, d. 1676), son of Charles Cavendish and Katherine, Lady Ogle, was created successively Baron Ogle (1620), Earl of Newcastle (1628), Marquis of Newcastle (1643), and Duke of Newcastle (1664). He took up arms for the king during the Civil War, and seized Newcastle, thus securing for Charles the communication he needed with the Continent. At the close of 1642 he marched into Yorkshire, recovered York, defeating after a six months' campaign the army of Lord Fairfax, and forcing him to take refuge in Hull. But the siege of Hull was unsuccessful (Sept. 2—Oct. 27), and in the next campaign the advance of the Scots, and their junction with Fairfax, forced him to shut himself up in York. The city was relieved by Prince Rupert, who, against the advice of the Marquis of Newcastle, gave battle at Marston Moor (July 2, 1644). After this defeat the marquis took ship at Scarborough, and retired to the Continent, where he lived until the Restoration. At Paris he married, in 1645, Margaret Lucas, celebrated for her learning and eccentricity, and author of a life of her husband. She estimates the losses sustained by the duke in consequence of his loyalty, and his services to the king, at £940,000. As compensation for these losses he was, in 1664, made Duke of Newcastle. Clarendon describes the duke as "a very fine gentleman," "active and full of courage," "amorous in poetry and music," but "the substantial part, and fatigue of a general, he did not in any degree understand, nor could submit to."

Newfoundland is an island at the entrance to the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It was discovered and colonised at a very early period by the Norwegians, and rediscovered by Cabot in 1497. Its valuable fisheries made it the resort of traders of all nations, and although always claimed by the English, since the attempt to colonise it by Sir Humphrey Gilbert in 1583, it was not until the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713 that it was finally created a crown colony. In 1583 Sir Humphrey Gilbert headed an expedition to Newfoundland, and two years later Sir Francis Drake claimed the island in the name of Queen Elizabeth. In 1623 a colony was established in the south of the island by Lord Baltimore and another by Lord Falkland, in 1635. Throughout the seventeenth century quarrels were continually taking place between the English and French fishing companies; and when the island was finally surrendered to England in 1713, certain fishing rights were reserved to the French, which enabled them to impair considerably the English trade. The value of the fisheries, however, continued to attract numerous settlers, and in 1724 Newfoundland was separated from Nova Scotia and made a distinct province, with a governor. In 1762 Newfoundland was again attacked by the French, but the towns taken by them were restored by the Treaty of Paris in the following year. Up to 1832 the country was governed by a system of local jurisprudence, but in that year a constitution was granted, and its representative house of assembly established. Responsible government was established in 1856. It has a governor appointed by the crown, an executive council of seven members, a legislative council of fifteen, and a house of assembly of thirty elected by household suffrage. It was made a bishopric in 1839. Newfoundland is now the only part of British North America which is not incorporated under the title of the Dominion of Canada. Its chief wealth is derived from its fisheries, which are still the cause of occasional disputes between the French and English fishing companies.

Newport, THE TREATY OF (1648). In spite of the vote that no more addresses should be made to the king (Jan. 15, 1648), the Presbyterian majority in Parliament seized the opportunity of the second Civil War to open fresh negotiations. On July 3 the resolutions of January were rescinded, and it was agreed (July 28) that efforts should be made to enter into a general and open treaty with Charles, and that the place of negotiation should be Newport in the Isle of Wight (Aug. 10). The Parliamentary commissioners, five lords and ten commons, arrived in the island on Sept. 16, and the negotiations began three days later. The negotiations continued till Nov. 27, as the king argued every point, and delayed to give decided answers in the hopes of escaping, or being freed by help from France or Ireland. He offered to consent to the establishment of Presbyterianism for three years, but would not agree to the abolition of bishops. His answers on the Church question, and the question of the "delinquents," were both voted unsatisfactory (Oct. 28—30). Nevertheless, on Dec. 5 the House of Commons, by 129 to 83 voices, voted "that the answers of the king to the propositions of both Houses are a ground for the House to proceed upon for the settlement of the peace of the kingdom."

Newtown Barry, in Wexford (June 1, 1798), was the scene of a skirmish in the Irish Rebellion. Colonel L'Estrange, with 400 militia and some guns, here defeated the rebels, 400 of whom were killed.

Newtown Butler, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 2, 1689), was a victory gained by the defenders of Enniskillen over the Irish adherents of James II. It had been determined to attack the city from several quarters at once. The Enniskilleners applied to Colonel Kirke for assistance, and received some arms, ammunition, and experienced officers, chief of whom were Colonel Wolseley and Lieutenant-Colonel Berry. The royal troops, already dispirited by a reverse at Linsaeke, were thrown into utter confusion by a word of command incorrectly given. Berry, who commanded the advanced troops, drove back Macarthy's dragoons, under Anthony Hamilton. Macarthy soon came up to support Hamilton, and Wolseley to support Berry. The armies were now face to face. Macarthy had above 5,000 men and several pieces of artillery, Wolseley under 3,000. The Catholics retreated in good order through the little town of Newtown Butler. About a mile from the town they made a stand. The battle was, however, soon over. Wolsley's infantry struggled through the bog and cut down the Irish cannoneers. The Enniskillen horse came along the causeway. The Irish dragoons were again seized with panic, and the infantry, finding themselves deserted, fled for their lives. Nearly 1,500 were put to the sword, while about 500 more were drowned in Lough Erne.

Mile, THE BATTLE OF THE (OR BATTLE OF ABOUKIR BAY), was fought August 1, 1798. Nelson, who had followed and passed the French fleet which convoyed Bonaparte's army to Egypt, had arrived at Alexandria two days before the French squadron. Not finding them there he set sail immediately for Candia, and spent the next four weeks searching the Mediterranean for them. On the morning of the 1st of August his fleet came in sight of that of the French, under Admiral Brueys, which was lying off Alexandria. The French ships lay just outside the harbour in a curve, extending from the shoal on the north-west on the left to near the batteries of Aboukir on the right. The English advanced to the attack sailing in two lines, one of which passed between the French and the shore, while the other, led by Nelson in the Vanguard, anchored outside the French line, the nine first vessels of which were thus taken between two fires. The action began about half-past six in the afternoon, and before nine five of the French ships had struck, or were rendered helpless. Shortly after this the gigantic Orient caught fire and blew up. The battle continued till midnight, by which time nearly all the French ships were too shattered to reply. At daybreak it was seen that the whole French line, with the exception of two ships which cut their cables and stood out to sea, had either sunk or struck their colours. The victory was in great part due to Nelson's admirable manœuvre of enveloping a portion of the French fleet between the two divisions of his own. The effects of the battle were very important. Bonaparte's army was entirely isolated, and the ultimate failure of the Egyptian expedition ensued. The French had in all nineteen ships, with 1,196 guns and 11,230 men. The English fleet consisted of fourteen ships, with 1,012 guns, and 8,068 men. The British loss was 895 killed and wounded. Among the latter was Nelson, who sustained a severe wound in the head. Two of the French ships of the line were destroyed and nine were captured. Their total loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners was 9,830. Admiral Brueys was among those who perished in the action.

Nisi Prius was a name given to a writ first issued in 1285, by which the juries empanelled in any ordinary civil cause were to be presented by the sheriff at Westminster on a certain day, unless before that day (nisi prius) the justices of assize came into the county, in which case the trial was to be before the justices, and not at Westminster.

Nivelle, THE PASSAGE OF THE (NOV. 10, 1813), was one of the great successes of the closing period of the Peninsular War. The river was strongly defended by Soult, but Wellington found a weak point in his defences, and introduced through it the light division into the heart of the French position. This mistake of Soult's resulted in his complete defeat, after a long and severe struggle. Soon after, Soult withdrew to Bayonne. The loss of the allies was heavy, but small compared with that of the French, who, in addition to 4,300 men, abandoned fifty-one guns and all the field magazines at St. Jean de Luz and Espelette.

Nizam, THE. On the break-up of the Mogul Empire the Nizam-ul-Moolk, Viceroy of the Deccan and feudal lord of the Carnatic, became almost independent of the court of Delhi. He was the ruler of a vast territory between the Kistna and the Nerbudda, with 35,000,000 inhabitants. On his death (1749) a struggle for the throne arose between Nazir Jung, his son, and Mozuffer Jung, his grandson, the former being supported by the English, the latter by the French. The deaths of Nazir and Mozuffer, the one by treachery, the other in battle (1750), made way for Salabut Jung and Nizam Ali, brothers of Nazir Jung. The former succeeded to Mozuffer, the latter, out of hatred towards Bussy, became the English candidate against his brother. Nizam Ali (d. 1803) eventually captured and murdered Salabut, and obtained the chief power in the Deccan. In 1765—66 the English obtained from him the Northern Circars, which had been granted to the Company by the Emperor. In 1786—87 he became engaged in war with Tippoo in alliance with the Mahrattas, in which he was not very successful. The feebleness of the Nizam, and his hatred and fear of Tippoo, made him very eager to join the Triple Alliance of 1790, but his fear of the Mahrattas, who had claims of chout on him, induced him to try and get a guarantee against the latter. This, however, was refused. His services during the war were not of much value, but in spite of this he gained a large accession of territory by the Treaty of Seringapatam. In 1794, seeing a Mahratta war was inevitable, he endeavoured to get English help, which was refused by Sir John Shore. Deserted by the English, he was beaten in the Kurdlah campaign. He now fell into the hands of a French officer, Raymond, who organised a disciplined corps, which was at first intended as a protection against the Mahrattas, but eventually absorbed the whole power of the country, so that the Nizam himself became alarmed, and accepted with alacrity Lord Wellesley's proposal to disband them, and renew the English alliance. The treaty of 1798 stipulated that the corps of British troops in the Nizam's pay should be augmented to 6,000 with a proper complement of artillery, on condition that a provision of twenty-four lacs of rupees a year should be made for their support. In 1800, fearing the rapacity of the Mahrattas, the Nizam proposed that the subsidiary force should be augmented, and that territory should be substituted for the subsidy in money; a treaty was therefore concluded by which the districts the Nizam had obtained from Mysore (1793—99) should be ceded as a commutation for subsidy, and that the English in return should guarantee the defence of his kingdom against all enemies. Thus Nizam Ali's long reign ended in making the Hyderabad State completely dependent on the English. In consequence, the Hyderabad State has survived the wreck of the other native principalities, and exists still as a dependent protected State.

No Addresses, VOTE OF. In December, 1647, after the king's flight to the Isle of Wight, the Parliament summed up their demands in four bills. The king on Dec. 28 declined to assent to these bills, having on the 26th come to an arrangement with the Scots. On the king's refusal the House of Commons resolved, by a majority of 141 to 92, that no further addresses should be made to the king by that House; that no addresses or applications to him by any person whatsoever should be made without leave of the Houses under the penalties of high treason; that no messages from the king should be received, and that no one should presume to bring or carry such messages (Jan. 3, 1648). The Lords agreed to these resolutions with only two dissentients (Warwick and Manchester) out of sixteen present (Jan. 15).

Nominees, THE ASSEMBLY OF, is the name given by some historians to the Parliament which met in 1653, and is generally known as "Barebones' Parliament."

Non-Compounders, THE, who gained their name about 1692, were a section of the Jacobite party who were willing to aid in the restoration of James II. without imposing any conditions on him whatever. They consisted chiefly of Roman Catholics, with some Protestant Non-jurors, such as Kettlewell and Hickes. They were all-powerful in the court of St. Germain's during the years that followed the Revolution, and their leader, Melfort, ruled the councils of James. We find them much disgusted by the Second Declaration which James issued in 1693 by the advice of Middleton, the leader of the Compounders. On the dismissal of his rival, Melfort and his party guided the Jacobite councils abroad. As the parties ceased after some years to come into collision, the title was gradually dropped.

Nonconformists is a name generally given to all Protestants who refuse to conform to the doctrine, discipline, or worship imposed by law on the Church of England, and who have organised religious associations of their own on a different basis. The mediæval Church system, more intolerant of schism than even of heresy, was incompatible with the existence of Nonconformity. The Reformation necessarily gave scope for freedom of discussion and difference of opinion. At the accession of Queen Elizabeth the constitution of the English Church was definitely settled. The followers of the Continental Reformers found much in the Reformed Church to which they took very strong exception. [PURITANS.] But the early Puritans were discontented Conformists, and not Nonconformists. The laxness of the ecclesiastical administration during the early part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth allowed many who objected decidedly to the Act of Uniformity to retain their cures without really carrying out the Act. Even Cartwright, who attempted to superimpose a presbyterial organisation on the existing ecclesiastical system, was in full communion with the Church. The attempt to enforce discipline which was marked by the publication of Parker's Advertisements in 1566 was followed by the first definite secession. Thirty-seven out of one hundred and forty beneficed clergy in London were driven from their cures for refusing to wear the surplice. Two deans and many country clergy were similarly deprived. Despite the exhortations of Knox, Beza, and Bullinger, a large number of these "assembled as they had opportunity, in private houses and elsewhere, to worship God in a manner which might not offend against the light of their consciences." Others took refuge in Holland. Those who remained in England formed separate congregations of the Independent type. From their leader, Robert Brown, they received the name of Brownists. From another leader they were called the Barrowists. [INDEPENDENTS.] They remained the only important Nonconforming body for nearly a century. Practically the only other Nonconformists were the Anabaptists. Stray foreign members of this revolutionary sect had atoned for their opinions at the stake between the reigns of Henry VIII. and James I. But neither they nor the Family of Love, a mystical branch of the same communion, were at all numerous. The constant emigration, especially of the Independents, to New England, kept down their numbers; yet it is remarkable that, despite the constant irritation to which they were subjected, but few of the Puritans seceded. Down to the Civil War, they continued, as a whole, members of the Church; and, though the high monarchist doctrines of the Caroline bishops and the need of the Scottish alliance forced the bulk of the Parliamentary leaders to accept Presbytery, the Book of Discipline, and the General Assembly, the flux of opinion during the whole of the period of the Civil War makes it hard to draw the line between Conformist and Nonconformist. Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists, along with the old clergy who accepted the "Engagements," could be Conformists under the Established Church of Cromwell; while Quakers, Fifth Monarchists, and rigid Anglicans were united in a Nonconformity that was hardly tolerated. The Restoration destroyed a system which the historian of Puritanism admits "to have never been to the satisfaction of any body of Christians. The Act of Uniformity (May 17, 1662) imposed on all the beneficed clergy the duty of reading publicly the amended Book of Common Prayer, and of declaring their unfeigned assent to everything contained in it; to receive episcopal ordination if they had it not already; and to abjure the Covenant. Nearly two thousand ministers gave up their cures rather than submit to such conditions. With their secession the history of Nonconformity in England really begins. Despite the series of stringent statutes by which Clarendon and the High Church Parliament made Nonconformity penal, the chief Dissenting Churches now received their organisation. The older bodies, the Independents and Baptists, simply returned with augmented membership to their former condition. A powerful Presbyterian Church was added to the Nonconforming bodies, which included not only the zealots of the Covenant, but liberal Low Churchmen like Baxter, whom a conciliatory policy would have easily retained. The swarm of minor sects which the religious anarchy of the Commonwealth had created still continued. The Quakers were the most important of these who did not ultimately become extinct. A few Socinian congregations had already been established, despite the ban of all parties alike.

In 1662 the Corporation Act deprived the Dissenters of some of their most valued rights as citizens. In 1664 the First Conventicle Act made the meeting of five Nonconformists for religious worship an offence punishable, for the first time by fine and imprisonment, and for the third by slavery in the American plantations. In 1665 the Five Mile Act strove to make it impossible for Nonconforming ministers to earn a living, and hard for them to escape being sent to gaol. In 1673 the Test Act imposed a sacramental qualification on all officials, which most Nonconformists could not conscientiously take. Still, even in this black period, when the gaols were full of men like Baxter and Bunyan, traces of more liberal feeling, such as Bishop Wilkins's abortive attempts at comprehension, were not wanting. The politic attempt of the crown to unite the Nonconformists with the Catholics against the Church—which marked the various Declarations of Indulgence—signally failed. Nearly successful with the Exclusion Bill, the Nonconformists—this time in alliance with the whole Church party—signally triumphed in the Revolution of 1688. Their period of direct persecution was now over. The Comprehension Bill indeed, which was to do justice to the descendants of the ejected of 1662, was a failure. But the Toleration Act gave "ease to scrupulous consciences" by allowing those who took new oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and a declaration against popery, to worship freely after their own manner, and exempted them from the penalties for absenting themselves from church, and holding illegal conventicles, and even permitted Quakers to affirm instead of swearing. But meetings were to be held with open doors, ministers were to approve the thirty-six out of the Thirty-nine Articles which concerned doctrine, and Papists and Socinians were excluded from the Act. This imperfect measure of toleration, in conjunction with the practice of occasional conformity, which opened up municipal and other offices, were at the time enough for practical purposes. The attempts of the High Churchmen under Anne to revoke its benefits were not successful. The Schism Act, and the Act against Occasional Conformity, were with difficulty passed. But on the accession of George I. began the long reign of Latitudinarian Low Churchmanship that saw in the Nonconformist a strong support of the Whig party. Though Walpole refused to stir up High Church hostility by repealing the Acts of Charles II., it became the custom from the accession of George II. to pass an annual Act of Indemnity to those who had broken the Test and Corporation Acts, which made them partially inoperative. In 1718 the repeal of the Occasional Conformity and Schism Acts, and failure to repeal parts of the Test and Corporation Acts, marks the spirit of the compromise. In 1727 the Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists were loosely organised into a body known as the Three Denominations, which enjoyed some legal recognition and exceptional privileges. But the general decay of religious fervour which marked the eighteenth century fully affected the Nonconformists. The Presbyterians gradually drifted into Unitarianism in doctrine, and almost into Congregationalism in organisation. Nearly all missionary fervour had abated when the Wesleyan movement arose during the reign of George III. The ecclesiastical connections and Arminian theology of Wesley retarded his influence upon the Nonconformist bodies for a long time; and it was not till after his death that the "people called Methodists" could be regarded as distinct from the Church from which they sprang. The influence of Whitefield was perhaps more direct. But before the end of the century the Evangelical movement had given new life to the Nonconformist churches. The increased interest in religious matters, and the spread of the habit of churchgoing largely increased the numbers of all the great religious bodies; a process which has been continued during the present century. Another remarkable feature of the religious history of the eighteenth century was the vast growth of Nonconformity in Wales, not only through the Methodist movement, which developed independently the similar movement in England, but also through the enormous increase of the older Nonconformist communions in that country. The growth of a strong body of Presbyterian Nonconformists from the Church of Scotland, as the result of a series of schisms on the question of church patronage, must also be mentioned. In Ireland alone, where the two Protestant denominations—the Irish Church and the Presbyterians—correspond roughly to the English and Scotch settlers, was there a comparatively slight development of Nonconformity.

Side by side with the numerical increase of Nonconformity, a series of remedial laws gradually removed the disabilities and inequalities which still attended Dissent, even after the days of the Toleration Act. In 1779 the subscription imposed by the Toleration Act on the Dissenting clergy was abolished. In 1792 the Scottish Episcopalians were relieved from the severe restraints in which their disloyalty had involved them. But Fox's attempt to relieve the Unitarians in the same year failed. At last, in 1828, the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed. The Dissenters' Marriage Act of 1836 allowed the solemnisation of Nonconformist marriages in their own chapels. In 1868, after a long agitation, compulsory Church rates were abolished. In 1869 the Irish Church was disestablished. In 1870 the University Tests Acts opened to the whole nation the old universities. In 1880 the Burials Act allowed Nonconformist burials in the parish churchyards. It was only after so long a series of struggles that the religious equality of the Nonconformists was finally established. [PURITANS; DISSENTERS; METHODISTS, &c.]

Non-Jurors. THE, comprised a considerable minority of the clergy of the Church of England who refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary at the Revolution. They were about four hundred in number, and included the Primate Sancroft, and four others of the "Seven Bishops," Ken, of Bath and Wells, White, of Peterborough, Lloyd, of St. Asaph, Turner, of Ely, and several eminent divines, of whom Jeremy Collier and Charles Lealie were perhaps the most celebrated. They based their objections on the doctrine of non-resistance, maintaining that by the "powers that be" St. Paul meant the powers that "ought to be;" but their writings were more numerous than solid, and Dr. Johnson entertained no unfounded contempt for their reasoning powers. Very few of the laity followed them, as the Protestant Jacobites were not required to take the oath of allegiance as a qualification for attending divine service, and, being in the position of shepherds without a sheep, the non-juring clergy sank into idle habits, or took to secular professions. In 1690 the issue of a form of prayer and humiliation by the Jacobite press, at a time when a French invasion was daily expected, aroused the utmost indignation against the non-juring bishops, but they issued a reply solemnly denying any knowledge of the publication. In the following year, after Bishop Burnet had made an ineffectual attempt to conciliate them on dangerously liberal terms, the sees of these bishops were filled up, Sancroft being superseded by Tillotson. The ex-Primate, who bore his deprivation with far less dignity than Bishop Ken, thereupon drew up a list of divines which he sent to James with a request that two might be nominated to keep up the succession. James chose Hicke and Wagstaffe. This hierarchy at first caused some alarm to the government, especially when the Non-jurors were found to be implicated in the various Jacobite conspiracies, and they suffered considerably both after 1716 and 1745. Soon, however, schisms broke out within the little body, some having leanings towards the Greek Church, some towards Rome, others being rigidly orthodox in their Anglicanism. By 1720 the communion had broken into two main sections, of which that headed by Spinkes dissented only on the question of the oaths and prayers for the reigning sovereign, while Collier introduced a new communion office of Roman Catholic tendencies. There were also minor divisions. Nevertheless the Non-jurors, who counted among their numbers William Law, the author of The Serious Call, and Carte the historian, were not finally extinguished until the beginning of the nineteenth century. Gordon, the last bishop of the regular body, dying in 1779, and Bortho, the last of the Separatists, in 1806. There were also Presbyterian Non-jurors in Scotland. These declined to acknowledge William and Mary, first because they were not of their covenant, secondly, because they had spared King James. Calling themselves the Reformed Presbytery, they continued to thunder against William and his successors; and, though they split up into factions, there was still in 1780 a considerable number who resolutely declined to own the government by paying taxes or accepting municipal offices. At length they became so few as to be unable to keep up meeting-houses, and were called Non-hearers. [JACOBITES; SANCROFT.]

Norfolk, PEEPAGE OF. [HOWARD, FAMILY OF.]

Norfolk, THOMAS MOWBRAY, DUKE OF (d. 1400), was the son of John Mowbray and Elizabeth, granddaughter and heiress of Thomas of Brotherton, Earl of Norfolk. He was created Earl of Nottingham in 1383, and Earl Marshal in 1386. He was one of the Lords Appellant of 1387, but afterwards joined the king and helped to execute his father-in-law, the Earl of Arundel. He was Governor of Calais, and to his charge Gloucester was entrusted in 1397, where he died, probably murdered by Mowbray, who in the same year was created Duke of Norfolk. In the next year he quarrelled with the Duke of Hereford, and each accused the other of treason. It was decided that the matter should be fought out at Coventry, but before the duel commenced, the king stopped the proceedings and banished both the combatants, Norfolk for life, and Hereford for six years. Norfolk set out on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and died at Venice.

Norfolk, JOHN HOWARD, 1ST DUKE OF (d. 1485), was the son of Sir Thomas Howard by Margaret, daughter and heiress of Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk. He took part in Talbot's expedition to Gascony, and fought in the battle of Castillon. He was much favoured by Edward IV., who made him treasurer of the household, and in 1478 captain-general at sea. He accompanied the Duke of Gloucester in his expedition to Scotland in 1482, and on Richard III.'s accession to the throne was made Duke of Norfolk and Earl Marshal. He steadily adhered to Richard, and was killed whilst fighting for him at Bosworth. Norfolk was warned of treachery the night before the battle by a paper which he found pinned to his tent with the following rhyme upon it:—

"Jockey of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dickon thy master is bought and sold."

Norfolk, THOMAS HOWARD, 2ND DUKE OF (d. 1524), was the son of John Howard, Duke of Norfolk, who was killed at Bosworth Field while fighting on the side of Richard III. Like his father, he fought under Richard's banner at Bosworth, and, being taken prisoner, was lodged for a period in the Tower, his newly-acquired title of Earl of Surrey being declared forfeited. He transferred his allegiance to Henry VII.; and he was entrusted as the king's lieutenant with the important duty of tranquillising the northern districts of England. In 1497 Surrey was directed to provide against the expected Scottish inroads. His rapid march to Norham, undertaken at the request of Fox, Bishop of Durham, compelled James IV. to make a hasty retreat into his own kingdom. Under Henry VIII., Surrey became a trusted member of the royal ministry; he also still further distinguished himself in the field by his decisive victory over James IV. at Flodden (q.v.) in 1513; and by the complete check he succeeded in giving in 1523 to the Scotch invasion under Albany, the consequence of which last success was a peace of eighteen years between the two countries. In 1522 he was placed in command of the English expedition despatched to France for the purpose of acting against that kingdom in conjunction with the Imperialist forces. Circumstances were, however, not favourable to any decisive engagement, and Surrey's hostile proceedings were limited to a general ravaging of the coast of Brittany. Surrey had his dukedom and the earl-marshalship restored to him in 1514, and was made Lord Treasurer and Knight of the Garter.

Norfolk, THOMAS HOWARD, 3RD DUKE OF (b. 1473, d. 1554), was a distinguished soldier and statesman under Henry VIII. and his two immediate successors. His first public appearance in the field was at Flodden, where he fought under his father. Subsequently, on becoming Duke of Norfolk in 1524, he took a prominent part in the proceedings of the king's Council as the political opponent of Wolsey, and the acknowledged leader of the English nobility. His tact and firmness enabled him to put down the Suffolk riots in 1525. On Wolsey's fall in 1530, Norfolk became Henry's chief minister. As the recognised head of the conservative party in Church matters, and the chief representative of the older nobility, he was deputed by Henry to negotiate with the rebel leaders in the Pilgrimage of Grace. He was instrumental in passing the statute known as the Six Articles. In October, 1542, he was in command of the English army in Scotland, on the occasion of the hostilities between the two countries which ended in the Scottish disaster of Solway Moss. In December, 1546, however, the influence of the king's brother-in-law, Lord Hertford, who had taken Cromwell's place as leader of the reforming party, was strong enough to bring about Norfolk's arrest on a charge of treason. A suspicion of pretensions to the throne was a fatal one for Henry to conceive of any of his nobles, and Norfolk would have shared the fate of his gifted son, the young Earl of Surrey, who was executed on the same groundless charge of treason (Jan. 21, 1547), had not the king's own death preceded the day appointed for his execution. All through the reign of Edward VI., however, he was kept a close prisoner, and was only restored to liberty on the accession of Mary to the throne. He presided at the trial of the Duke of Northumberland, and took an active part in the suppression of the rising under Sir Thomas Wyatt.

Norfolk, THOMAS, 4TH DUKE OF (b. 1536, d. 1572), the son of the third duke, was one of the most powerful nobles in England during the reign of Elizabeth, and a Catholic in politics, though in creed he professed himself an Anglican. Whilst in command of the Army of the North, during the Scotch campaign of 1560, he incurred the suspicion of the queen, who feared his popularity. In 1568, Norfolk was appointed president of the commission of inquiry at York to examine the charges brought against Mary of Scotland. It was at this time that the idea first arose amongst the Catholic nobles of a marriage between the duke and the Queen of Scots. This marriage, urged on by Murray and Maitland, was extremely distasteful to Elizabeth, to whom Norfolk declared that nothing would induce him to marry one who had been a competitor for the crown. He subsequently, however, gave his adhesion to the scheme, and, in conjunction with others of the queen's Council, such as Leicester, Sussex, and Throgmorton, he joined the plan of marrying Mary on condition that she outwardly conformed to the rites of the Church of England. Elizabeth, however, remained averse to the match. A plot formed against Cecil was discovered, and Norfolk, who had been intriguing with Spain for an attack on the commercial interests of England, renounced Protestantism, and threw himself into the arms of the Catholic lords in the north. In October, 1569, however, Norfolk was arrested and sent to the Tower, but regained his liberty the following year by giving a written promise not to pursue the scheme of the marriage. The duke, however, quickly found himself involved in a fresh Catholic conspiracy, known as the Ridolfi Plot (q.v.). In Sept., 1571, some letters which fell into Cecil's hands caused Norfolk to be lodged in the Tower, being brought to trial in the following January. The charge against him was that of compassing the queen's death—(1) by seeking to marry the Queen of Scots; (2) by soliciting foreign powers to invade the realm; (3) by sending money to the aid of the English who were rebels, and of the Scotch who were enemies to the queen. The duke denied all the charges, but was found guilty of high treason, and, after some delay caused by the unwillingness of Elizabeth to sign the warrant, was executed June 2, 1572.

Norham, THE CONFERENCE OF (June, 1291), took place at Norham, on the Tweed, between Edward I. and the English barons on the one side, and the competitors for the crown of Scotland, together with some of the representatives of the Scotch Estates, on the other. Edward offered to settle the dispute for the Scottish crown, only asking as a reward for his services the acknowledgment of his overlordship on the part of the Scotch. The conference was dissolved for three weeks in order that the Scotch representatives might consult the rest of the nation, and, at the end of that time, reassembled at the same place. Edward's title to the superiority over Scotland was not disputed; the competitors all acknowledged his authority, and, after some inquiry into their various claims, the conference was adjourned for a year, the question not being settled until Nov., 1292.

Norman Conquest, THE. It might, perhaps, be more accurate to describe the passage of history that goes by this name as the conquest of the English crown by a Norman duke, whom a curious train of accidents and circumstances had tempted into the position of a candidate for the regal dignity, but who had to assert the right to offer himself, not, strictly speaking, against the men of England, but against a rival candidate that had stolen a march upon him. It was certainly an event that involved several consequences galling to the national temper, as well as ruinous to some and injurious to many of the inhabitants; but it was not a conquest of the country in the ordinary sense—the land and people were not conquered by a single alien race, and made subject to another land and people, as was Ireland in earlier and India in later times. A splendid foreign adventurer brought the country to such a pass that its chief men had no choice but to elect him king. This event does not essentially differ in its one radical characteristic from that of the ascent of William of Orange to the throne—in degree, in circumstances, in nature and extent of consequences it is in marked contrast to the later conquest of the crown, but it is not without strong features of resemblance. The conditions of which this conquest was the outcome were the usual historical mixture of seeming accident and personal character; these began to combine towards the event that was to be their product about 1052. In that year the royal stock of Cerdic and of Egbert—from which the unforced choice of the nation had hitherto never swerved—appeared to be approaching extinction; it was as good as certain that the reigning king, the saintly Edward, would die childless, whilst the only other immediate scion of the stock that might be available, Edward, called the Outlaw—Edmund Ironside's sole surviving son—was an exile in Hungary. Moreover, the lately all-powerful family of Godwin, which might possibly have supplied material for a new royal house, had just, to its last male member, been disgraced and driven from the kingdom. The ordinary and extraordinary possibilities were apparently exhausted. Now, in the eleventh century such a conjuncture could hardly fail to breed ambitious thoughts in an able and enterprising kinsman—albeit by the female and alien side only—of the existing king's, a young man whose spirit was uplifted by great achievements at home, and who knew that King Edward had, from early associations, a preference for the stranger race to which he belonged. This kinsman was William the Bastard. At the end of the second of two wars that Ethelred the Unready had waged with a Norman duke, the English king had (1002) married Emma, daughter of Duke Richard I. King Edward was an offspring of this marriage. Thus, not only did the ruling houses of England and Normandy become connected, but also the fugitive Athelings of the former found an asylum with the latter, and the one of them that lived to be chosen king learned to love the ways and men of the land of his education better than those of the land of his birth. His eye, therefore, must have fallen with favour on the foremost man of the race he cherished, the great-grandson of his Norman grandfather. And under Edward's fostering care a purely Norman interest was already fast growing up in England: Norman adventurers in considerable numbers were settling in the kingdom and reaping an abundant harvest of lands and preferments, ecclesiastical and civil. Canute's success, too, had shown that the great prize was not beyond the reach of an utter stranger. Moved doubtless by such considerations, in 1052 William seized the occasion of the expulsion of the family of Godwin to cross the Channel on a visit to his cousin Edward, who probably then gave him the assurances of support which William afterwards represented as a promise of the succession to the crown. The crown was not Edward's to bestow, but his persuasions and influence might do much towards fixing the choice of the Wise Men after his death. Yet, if we are to take the word of the Chronicle, when Edward came near his dying hour, he recommended another candidate, Harold, the eldest living son of Godwin; for William was not long returned home when Godwin and his sons forced their restoration. The Norman interest in England was depressed, and in course of time Harold had made himself the first man of the English people. In him, too, ambitious thoughts must have arisen. What looks like an effort on Edward's part to avert the conflict, failed; in 1057 he recalled Edward the Outlaw, only to enable him to die in England. And the Outlaw's only son, Edgar, though not too young to be elected at a less critical time, appears for the moment to have been lost in the shadow of the two mighty antagonists. About 1064 a misadventure of Harold's gave William a decided advantage over his future rival. Cast ashore on the territory of Guy of Ponthieu, Harold was delivered from the captivity that necessarily followed by the interference of William, who was Guy's immediate lord, and was obliged to share his deliverer's hospitality till he had complied with the conditions that his host exacted. These are not certainly known; but probably were that Harold should marry William's daughter, and support his claim to the English crown. It is said—and the story may be true—that to add a greater awfulness to Harold's oath, a heap of relics had been secreted under the sacred things on which Harold was made to swear. But the oath had no power to bind the aspiring Englishman. Within two years Edward died (Jan. 5, 1066), and on the next day Harold, presumably after some form of election, was crowned king by Aldred, Archbishop of York, in the newly-consecrated abbey church of Westminster. A few days later tidings of this event came to William, who at once resolved to dispute the possession of the great prize with the man that had sworn to befriend him in his suit, but had now snatched it from him. He first challenged Harold to fulfil the alleged compact; and receiving either no answer at all or an answer that pleaded several excuses for non-fulfilment, he set about making extensive preparations for an expedition against the new king. At Lillebonne he won his somewhat reluctant barons to a participation in the enterprise; he gained the willing assistance of the trading class among his subjects; he denounced Harold as a perjurer over Europe; by pledging himself liberally he secured the sympathies and in a sense the apostolic benediction for his undertaking of Pope Alexander II., who even sent him a consecrated banner and a ring with a hair of St. Peter; he invited volunteers from other lands; and from Flanders, Anjou, Touraine, and Brittany men thronged to his standard. The north-western corner of Europe was awakened to an unwonted enthusiasm by his ardour and loud trumpeting of the merits of his cause. In forwarding his design, Lanfranc of Pavia, and William, the son of the self-sacrificing Osbern, were especially helpful. Forests were felled to build him innumerable ships. By these exertions a great host of mixed composition, given, at the highest, as 60,000, at the lowest as 14,000, was, while it was yet summer, collected, first at the mouth of the Dive, and then at St. Valéry upon the Somme, where a transport fleet, whose lowest estimate is 696, lay ready to receive them. After a long and harassing delay, due to thwarting winds, the expedition was at last allowed to lift anchor on Sept. 27, and next day it appeared off the coast of Sussex. The moment was eminently favourable. Harold's fleet, which had lain there all the summer to guard the approaches to the land, had been forced from its post by the exhaustion of its provisions; and the Norman host disembarked at Pevensey unobstructed. Indeed, the moment was doubly favourable. Harold and the choicest defenders of his kingdom had, on the very eve of the dread hour, been called northwards to repel a fatally-timed invasion of his brother Tosti and the Norwegian king, Harold Hardrada; and two days before William left St. Valery, had vanquished and slain them both at Stamford Bridge. Coast and southern shires alike were thus bare of defence, and William was free to act as he thought best fitted to serve his ends. He led his host to Hastings, raised defensive works there, and proceeded by a systematic destruction of the houses and ravage of the fields that were within his power, to provoke Harold to stake the issue on a single battle. Harold did not disappoint him. On being told of his rival's landing, he gathered round him his housecarls and marched with a well-nigh incredible swiftness from York to London, mustered to his standard all the available strength of Wessex and his brothers Gyrth and Leofwine's earldoms, then led his men rapidly to the hill of Senlac (now Battle); and, arriving on October 13th, threw up earth-works, built palisadings, and awaited the onset of the invaders. On the following morning (Saturday, Oct. 14), this onset was given, and after an entire day's fighting, as fierce and obstinate as any recorded in the annals of warfare, the sun set on the slaughter of Harold, his brothers, and the flower of his force, and the hopeless rout of the rest. The completeness of the result is ascribed by some to the impatience of Harold, whose eagerness to rescue the invaded seil, or close with his antagonist, made him give battle with but a fraction of his strength, and, by others, to his brothers-in-law, the Earls Edwin and Morcar, who held their levies aloof from the struggle till it was too late. But it looked as if the terrible day had merely cleared from William's path his most formidable competitor; the surviving leaders of the nation were not yet persuaded to elect him to the kingdom. They chose the boy Edgar instead, and made ready to continue the struggle. Thereupon William took his way by Romney, Dover, and Canterbury towards London, scattered a body of Londoners who tried to check his progress, and set fire to Southwark. But finding the capital still insubmissive, he went with his army to Wallingford, crossed the river there, and moved on London from the west. This advance brought the Wise Men that directed the resistance to their knees; they decided to offer William the crown; and meeting him at Berkhamstead with Aldred of York at their head, they announced to him the choice they had made. Yet William did not accept the proffered crown till he had consulted with his Norman nobles, and been advised by them to do so. He then despatched a part of his army to London to begin the construction of a fortress there, and following leisurely with the main body, was, on Christmas Day, crowned in the great Minster by the hands of Archbishop Aldred. An unpleasant incident marred the ceremony. The approving shouts of the English within the church, mistaken for cries of onslaught by the Normans without, made these set the neighbouring houses on fire, and a scene of wild riot and disorder ensued. The crown was now conquered; and shortly afterwards, at Barking in Essex, the full obedience of the country seemed to be conquered also. Thither came the great men of the north, Edwin, Morcar, Waltheof, Copsi, and others, and made formal acknowledgment of William as their king. The Conquest might now be thought complete. From the vast estates of Harold, his brothers, and other partisans, William rewarded his followers; but he either left undisturbed or confirmed in their possessions and offices those who had not fought against him or had submitted. To outward appearance the only material change was a Norman instead of an English king, and the addition to the higher and official ranks of the population of a contingent of foreign nobles, each with a foreign following. All was quiet; and the king, having deputed the government to his brother Odo, now Earl of Kent, and his friend Fitz-Osbern, now Earl of Hereford, returned home with his army in March, 1067. But the work of conquest proved to be only half done. Owing, it may be, to the harsh or inefficient rule of the regents, armed risings broke out all over the country; and William came back to find that the west and north had still to be subdued. In 1068 he marched upon Exeter, which had placed itself in the hands of Harold's mother and sons, took it after an honourable resistance, and thus brought under his sway the western counties. The northern lands, which were also in rebellion, were awed into transitory obedience by a movement upon Warwick; William entered York, and a Norman force under De Comines went on to Durham. The sons of Harold, after a vain attempt on Bristol, and a defeat in Somerset, sailed away. Again the prospect cleared. But again it turned out to be illusive. In 1069 the north was once more in arms; the Normans in Durham were slain to a man; and York was besieged by Gospatric and Edgar the Atheling. For a moment rebellion subsided before William's arrival at York, but only to renew its fury after his departure. The west, the Welsh border, and parts of the Midlands also sprang to arms; Gospatric, Edgar, Waltheof, and Edric the Wild took part in the outbreak; a large Danish expedition that had just landed joined the insurgents; York was stormed, and almost every man of its Norman garrison was put to the sword. Leaving the other centres of insurrection to the industry of his lieutenants, who did not fail him, William took in hand those of the north, and quelled them one by one. The Danes disappeared; Edgar fled; Gospatric and Waltheof submitted, and were replaced in their earldoms. The chastisement, probably cruel, of the country folk that William deemed necessary, grew in the narratives of later writers into a pitiless laying waste of all northern England, into a clearance from this region of every form of life. From this representation we may withhold our belief till evidence sufficient to establish so comprehensive a crime be produced. An arduous march to Chester in the first months of 1070, and the occupation of that city, finished the campaign, and with it the process of conquest. When William dismissed his troops at Salisbury in March, 1070, the work was practically done. Isolated attempts had still to be crushed, but the Conqueror's hold on the kingdom was now secure.

The earliest effect of the Conquest resulted from the struggle to complete it; for the fresh services therein rendered by his foreign followers to William were rewarded by the fresh forfeitures that the conflict generated. The ranks of the great landowners were thus stocked in large majority by foreigners; and the English titled and untitled nobility were for centuries largely of foreign origin. The rulers of the land, the men who administered affairs in Church and State, were for some generations taken almost exclusively from the same class; William was either afraid to trust Englishmen, or did not find among them the human qualities he sought. But few direct radical changes came of the Conquest; the laws and customs of the English were left unaltered; the groundwork of the political system continued the same—compurgation, ordeal, view of frankpledge, fyrd, witenagemot, all survived in their entirety; to every Englishman his full sum of rights and capacities remained. But two consequences of the event led to important changes: the tenure of land was feudalised, and a new system and new principles of law were planted side by side with the old. The former process created in time a thorough revolution in the tenure of land, in the relation of the king to the land, and the relation of the landowners to the king; while the latter, though applicable only to men of foreign origin, insensibly influenced and very largely transformed the native usages. "And this," says Dr. Stubbs, "ran up into the highest grades of organisation; the king's court of counsellors was composed of his feudal tenants; the ownership of land was now the qualification for the witenagemot instead of wisdom; the earldoms became fiefs instead of magistracies; and even the bishops had to accept the status of barons." Among the miscellaneous effects are prominently noticeable the union of the various divisions of the kingdom, which had not yet learnt to hold loyally together, into a single homogeneous state and people; the establishment of a strong central government and a vigorous execution of the laws; the separation of the ecclesiastical from the civil administration; the closer connection of the English Church with the Roman see, and its expansion into an imposing grandeur hitherto unknown; the breaking down of the national isolation, and the final entrance of England into the family of European peoples. Great importance is given by some writers to the moral discipline that the Conquest brought; we may perhaps regard the Norman and Angevin away as the rugged school that fitted the nation for constitutional rule and self-government.

The history of England and Normandy before and during the reign of William, and the circumstances of the Conquest, are told in detail in the great work of Professor Freeman, The Norman Conquest of England. [J. R.]

NORMANS, THE. The Normans were simply Northmen or Scandinavians advanced some stages further in civilisation by a few generations of residence in the land of a more humanised people and the neighbourhood of settled states. Their marvellous efficiency in their palmy days is probably explained by their having kept their native hardness and hardihood of character—their moral muscularity, as we may call it—and their bold spirit of enterprise unimpaired by the culture, the turn for art and taste for the finer pursuits, that they acquired by living in Gaul. Their new experience merely added intellectual keenness, deftness, and brilliancy of stroke to their resources for action; the old stimulating forces, their courage and their endurance, remained. Their ferocity had become valour, and their bodily strength the mastery of circumstances. That they owed the qualities which made their practical capacity to the good fortune that planted them on French soil, is suggested by the totally different history of their kinsfolk who had taken up their abode in other lands. The marauding bands of Norwegian pirates that had been roaming about and forming settlements along the Seine in the ninth and tenth centuries were at last admitted to an authorised participation in the soil by an agreement that Charles the Simple made, in 912, at St. Clair, on the Epte, with their most formidable leader, Rolf the Norseman. Thus taken within the pale of Continental civilisation, they rapidly profited by their advantages. They became Christians; they discarded their own, and adopted the French language; they cast aside their semi-barbarous legal usages, and took those of the Frank cultivators of the soil over whom they dominated; they learned or discovered improved modes and principles of fighting; they acquired new weapons—the shield, the hauberk, the lance, and the long-bow; they became masterly horsemen; they developed an impressive style of architecture, and built churches and monasteries; they founded bishoprics—in a word, they soon furnished themselves with the whole moral, spiritual, and practical garniture of human conduct then available, with additions and improvements of their own. Their territory had increased by taking in both kindred settlements and the lands of neighbouring peoples, till, from a vaguely described “land of the Northmen,” it became historic Normandy. Yet this wonderful growth was compatible with a political condition which was often not far removed from anarchy. The aristocratic class that the free-living, hot-natured pirate leaders had founded, and the unrestrained passions of the dukes replenished from generation to generation, were ever on the watch for an opportunity to break loose from all rule, and govern themselves and the native tillers of the soil that lay beneath them at their own sole discretion. Nor did the sense of moral obligation keep pace with the other elements of progress; a connection free from the marriage tie was held no shame; bastardy brought no taint. But, in spite of these defects, the Normans made themselves the foremost race in Europe; there are few other things in history so striking as the contrast between the smallness of their numbers and the frequency and greatness of their achievements. During the eleventh century, in the Eastern Empire and in Spain, in Italy and in England, men of the Norman race gained renown and the lordship of spacious lands, became kings and princes, and determined the course of history. “The twelve tall sons of Tancred of Hauteville” had grown into a kind of proverbial phrase suggestive of what it is in the power of man to do. Their craving for movement and adventure sought relief in pilgrimages; and as they always went armed, to enable them to resist lawless attacks, they were ready for any chance of showing their prowess they might fall in with, and they fell in with a good many. Their career in Italy and Sicily in the eleventh and twelfth centuries is even more astonishing, and in not a few of its features more honourable, than their better-known exploits in Britain.

North, FREDERICK, LORD, afterwards Earl of Guilford, was the eldest son of the first

Earl of Guilford (b. 1733, d. 1792). He entered Parliament first as member for Banbury in 1754, and in 1769 was named a Lord of the Treasury through the influence of his relative, the Duke of Newcastle. In 1766 Chatham made him Joint-Paymaster of the Forces along with George Cooke, and it was to this singular conjunction that Burke specially alluded when he said that “it did so happen that persons had a single office divided between them, who had never spoken to each other in their lives until they found themselves, they knew not how, pigging together, head and points, in the same truckle-bed.” On the death of Charles Townshend in 1767 he accepted the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and became leader in the House of Commons. On the fall of the Grafton ministry the king at once sent for Lord North, and found him so useful a servant that he retained his services for twelve years. Those years formed a most eventful period, for during them the Wilkes question was fought out, and the American colonies were for ever lost to the empire. To Lord North cannot fairly be imputed all the mistakes of that ministry. He was essentially weak and yielding, and was constantly overruled by the king, where his own better sense would have led him to adopt a different course. His daughter says of him, “although I do not believe my father ever entertained any doubt as to the justice of the American War, yet I am sure that he wished to have made peace three years before its termination.” These words exactly express Lord North’s position throughout the period of his administration. On the Wilkes question he fully believed in the right of Parliament to reject a member duly elected by a constituency; but he had the good sense to know when it was necessary to yield to public opinion, and he would have followed the dictates of his own observation had it not been for his easy temper, which made him give way to the more immediate pressure of the king. The same was the case with the American question; and as early as the spring of 1778 we find Lord North expressing his wish to resign: a wish which he repeated at intervals during the next four years, and which he was only prevented from carrying into execution by the king’s almost piteous entreaties to him to remain in office to carry out the court policy. At length the surrender at Yorktown gave the final blow to his ministry, and in the spring of 1782 he insisted on resigning. Then followed the short Rockingham ministry, which collapsed on the death of Lord Rockingham, and was succeeded by Shelburne’s ministry, which in turn gave way to the celebrated Coalition ministry, in which North and Fox were strangely united as Secretaries of State. But the universal unpopularity and distrust which such a formation roused, and the secret influence employed by the king to thwart its measures, brought it to a speedy conclusion in December, 1783. When Pitt began his long tenure of office Lord North retired into private life, retaining the Wardenship of the Cinque Ports, to which he had been appointed on his retirement in 1782. In 1790 he succeeded to the earldom on the death of his father, and died two years afterwards, having been afflicted with total blindness during the last five years of his life.

North, THE COUNCIL OF THE, was instituted in 1536 by Henry VIII., originally for the purpose of trying persons connected with the Pilgrimage of Grace. The court was held at York, and had jurisdiction over all the counties north of the Humber. Long after all traces of the insurrection had disappeared the court remained, and was one of the illegal jurisdictions revived and made instruments of oppression under the earlier Stuarts. It took the place in the north of the Star Chamber in the rest of England, and could inflict any punishment short of death. It was abolished by the Long Parliament in 1641.

North Foreland, THE BATTLE OF THE (July 25, 1666), was fought between the English and Dutch fleets, the former being commanded by Prince Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle, the latter by De Ruyter. The Dutch were totally routed, and lost about 4,000 men and 20 ships, and the English were complete masters of the narrow seas. English ships attacked various unfortified places on the coast of Holland, and destroyed a large number of merchant vessels.

North-west Provinces, THE, were the acquisitions of Lord Wellesley, and were so named because at the time they formed the north-west frontier of India. "They comprehended the country lying between the western part of Behar, the eastern boundary of Rajpootana and the Cis-Sutlej States, and the northern line of the provinces included in the Central India agency. They touched the Himalayas, included Rohilcund, and ran into the central provinces below Jhansi. Within their limits were the imperial cities of Delhi and Agra, the great Hindoo city, Benares, the important station and fortress of Allahabad, the flourishing commercial centres of Mirzapore and Cawnpore. The rivers Ganges and Jumna rolled in majestic rivalry through their length." They are ruled by a lieutenant-governor, and were created a lieutenant-governorship in 1835.

Northampton, THE BATTLE OF (July 10, 1460), was fought during the Wars of the Roses (q.v.). In 1459 the Yorkist lords had fled in confusion from Ludford, and Parliament had attainted them. In the summer of 1460 they returned to England, landed in Kent, and speedily raised a large army, with which they entered London. Henry VI. was at Coventry, and thither the confederate lords marched; the Lancastrians advanced to meet them, and took up a position on the banks of the Nene close to Northampton. Here they were attacked by the Yorkists, and, after an obstinate resistance, totally routed. The Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Shrewsbury, and many others were slain on the Lancastrian side; the king was taken prisoner, and the queen obliged to take refuge in Scotland. Henry was subsequently compelled to acknowledge York heir to the throne.

Northampton, HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF (d. 1614), the son of Henry, Earl of Surrey, and the brother of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, was created an earl by James I., 1603. He has incurred the infamy of having betrayed the secrets of his patron, the Earl of Essex, to the Privy Council, and will be remembered in history as a man of shameless principles, who for various selfish reasons changed his religion no less than five times. Under James I. he rose rapidly to honour, being made Warden of the Cinque Ports, and Lord Privy Seal; he was a commissioner at the trial of his enemy, Sir Walter Raleigh, and was subsequently concerned in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, and though he had inherited "the talents, the taste, and the accomplishments of his father," was in reality, as Mr. Tytler justly calls him, "a monster of wickedness and hypocrisy."

Northampton, WILLIAM PARR, MARQUIS OF (d. 1571), the brother of Queen Catherine Parr, was named one of the councillors appointed under the will of Henry VIII., 1547, to assist the executors in the government during the minority of Edward VI. During the rebellion in Norfolk, in 1549, he was for part of the time in command of the royal troops, but owing to his incapacity was superseded by Warwick. On the accession of Mary he was sent to the Tower for the support which he had accorded to Northumberland, but was subsequently pardoned. In 1554 Northampton was implicated in Wyatt's rebellion, and was again imprisoned, but was shortly afterwards released, and in the next reign became one of Elizabeth's councillors.

Northbrook, THOMAS GEORGE BARING, EARL OF (b. 1826), was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He was successively private secretary to Mr. Labouchere at the Board of Trade, to Sir George Grey at the Home Office, to Sir Charles Wood at the India Board and at the Admiralty till 1857, when he was returned for the House of Commons at Penrhyn and Falmouth, which constituency he continued to represent till he became a peer at the death of his father in 1866. He was a Lord of the Admiralty from May, 1857, to Feb., 1858; Under Secretary of State for India from June, 1859, to Jan., 1861; Under Secretary for War from the latter date till June, 1866. On the accession of Mr. Gladstone to power in 1868 Lord Northbrook was again appointed Under Secretary for War; and after the assassination of Lord Mayo (q.v.) he was appointed Governor-General of India in Feb., 1872. In 1876 Lord Northbrook returned to England. In Mr. Gladstone's second ministry (1880) he became First Lord of the Admiralty. In July, 1884, he was appointed High Commissioner in Egypt.

Northcote, SIR STAFFORD HENRY (b. 1818), was educated at Balliol College, Oxford; was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1847, and was returned for Dudley in the Conservative interest in 1855. He was unsuccessful in contesting North Devon in 1857; was returned for Stamford (1858); and was eventually elected for North Devon (1866). He was private secretary to Mr. Gladstone when the latter was President of the Board of Trade, and was Financial Secretary to the Treasury from January to June, 1859. He was appointed President of the Board of Trade in Lord Derby's third administration (1866); and was Secretary of State for India (1867-68). He was elected Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company (1869); presided over the Congress of the Social Science Association held at Bristol in the same year; and was appointed a commissioner to inquire into the law affecting the Friendly Societies (1870). Subsequently he was a member of the commission which arranged the Treaty of Washington. In 1874 he took office as Chancellor of the Exchequer under Mr. Disraeli, and when his chief retired to the House of Lords he became leader of the House of Commons. On the fall of the Beaconsfield ministry he became leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons.

Northmen. [DANES.]

Northumberland, HENRY PERCY, EARL OF (d. 1408), served in France in the wars of Edward III.'s reign. He was made Warden of the East Marches, and in 1378 captured Berwick. He was frequently employed by Richard II., but his espousal of the cause of Henry of Lancaster in 1393 caused the king to declare his estates forfeited. On Henry's landing in 1399 Northumberland was one of the first to join him, and when Henry became king he received large grants of land, among others the Isle of Man. In 1402 Northumberland and his son defeated the Scots at Homildon Hill, but about this time they grew discontented with the king; either offended at Henry's negligence in ransoming their kinsman, Edmund Mortimer, or at the king's claim to deal with the prisoners taken at Homildon, or from having suspicions of his intentions towards them. At all events Hotspur joined Glendower, and was defeated at Shrewsbury, while his father, who was marching to his aid, was compelled to submit, but was very soon forgiven by the king. In 1405 Northumberland joined other nobles in a fresh conspiracy against Henry, and on the plot being betrayed fled to Scotland. In 1408 he again took up arms, and met the royal troops at Bramham Moor, in Yorkshire, where his force was dispersed and himself slain.

Pauli, Geschichte von England.

Northumberland, JOHN DUDLEY, DUKE OF (b. 1502, d. 1553), was the son of Edward Dudley, the extortionate minister of Henry VII. Created Lord Lisle by Henry VIII., he distinguished himself in naval warfare with the French, as Lord High Admiral (1545), and was named by the king one of the executors to carry on the government during the minority of Edward VI., being shortly afterwards created Earl of Warwick. In 1547 he again distinguished himself at the battle of Pinkie, and two years later was instrumental in crushing the rebellion of Ket. About this time he attached himself to the Protestant party from motives of self-interest chiefly, and on the fall of Somerset (1549), assumed the office of Protector, two years later being made Duke of Northumberland. After the execution of Somerset (1552), Northumberland obtained complete ascendancy, not only over the Council, but also over the young king, whose favour he won by his pretended zeal for Protestantism; though at the same time he contrived to conciliate to a certain extent the Emperor and the Catholic party. The ill-health of Edward VI. in 1553, made it evident that he had not long to live; and Northumberland, partly from ambition, and partly from the knowledge that, if Mary succeeded her brother, his own ruin was inevitable, formed the design of getting the succession altered in favour of Lady Jane Grey, whom he shortly afterwards married to his son, Guilford Dudley. He had little difficulty in persuading the king to enter into his project; the privy councillors he had more trouble with, but eventually the will in Lady Jane Grey's favour was signed, and the duke, relying on the Protestant party and on French aid, thought the success of his plot secured, and it was even hinted that he hastened Edward's end by poisoning. On the king's death (July 6, 1553), Northumberland at once caused Lady Jane to be proclaimed, and announced to her that she was queen; but, contrary to his expectation, the feeling of the country was against the usurpation, and almost the whole of England declared in favour of Mary. The duke was arrested at Cambridge (where, seeing the failure of his scheme inevitable, he had proclaimed Mary) by the Earl of Arundel, who conveyed him to London. He was tried in Westminster Hall, by a court presided over by the Duke of Norfolk, and was condemned to death, being executed on Tower Hill (Aug. 22, 1553). Before his execution he confessed himself a Roman Catholic—"a needless and disreputable disclosure," remarks Mr. Turner, "of a masked and unprincipled mind."

Northumberland, THOMAS PERCY, 7TH EARL OF (d. 1572), was the nephew of the sixth earl, and son of Sir Thomas Percy, who was attainted in the reign of Henry VIII. As one of the leaders of the Catholic party in England, the earl was regarded with suspicion from the very commencement of Elizabeth's reign, and his implication in the Catholic intrigues of 1562 with Philip did not improve his position at court. A few years later Northumberland warmly espoused the cause of the Queen of Scots; and entered into a conspiracy with the Earl of Westmoreland, Leonard Dacre, and others, for her release from Tutbury Castle, where she was in confinement. In Oct., 1569, the queen summoned the rebel lords to appear in London, but they refused to obey her commands, and rose in arms. The energetic measures of the queen's ministers compelled the rebel earls to withdraw across the border without having gained more than some very temporary successes; and Northumberland—who, it is said, would have sought pardon from Elizabeth, had it not been for the brave spirit of his wife—was then given up to Murray by Hector Armstrong, of Harlaw, and imprisoned in Lochleven Castle, with William Douglas as his gaoler. After a captivity of two years and a half, an attempt was made to ransom him, and convey him to Flanders; but Elizabeth, fearing that his liberty might prove prejudicial to her interests, prevailed upon Douglas and the Earl of Morton to give him up to the English governor at Berwick (Lord Hunsdon) for £2,000. In spite of strenuous efforts made by Lord Hunsdon to obtain his pardon, he was beheaded at York (Aug. 22, 1572) without a trial, as an attainted traitor.

Northumberland, HENRY PERCY, 8TH EARL OF (d. 1585), brother of Thomas, seventh earl, whom he succeeded (1572), was in 1559 sent to Scotland on a mission to the Congregation; and in the following year took part in the siege of Leith. In 1569, on the rising in the north, and the disaffection of his brother, the earl, then Sir Henry Percy, took no part in the insurrection, though he is said to have been implicated in the subsequent plot of Ridolfi. In 1583 he was arrested and sent to the Tower on a charge of complicity in the conspiracy of Francis Throgmorton, who had implicated him in his confession. On June 20, 1585, he was found shot through the head in his bed. The earl was said at this time to have committed suicide, and this view is held by Mr. Froude. Lingard, however, and others, have considered that he was murdered.

Northumberland, HENRY PERCY, 9TH EARL OF (d. 1632), distinguished himself in the Low Countries under the Earl of Leicester. He warmly espoused the interests of James during the last days of Queen Elizabeth, and was by him sworn of the Privy Council. He was subsequently charged with complicity in the Gunpowder Plot, and although the accusation could not be proved, was deprived of his offices, fined £30,000, and imprisoned for fifteen years. "This unfortunate nobleman," says Miss Aikin, "was a man of considerable talents; the abundant leisure for intellectual pursuits afforded by his long captivity, was chiefly employed by him in the study of mathematics."

Aikin, Court of James I.

Northumbria, the most northern of the great old English states, included as its normal limits the whole of the territory between the Firth of Forth on the north, and the Humber on the south. The sea bounded it on the east, while on the west the Pennine Range, with its northern continuation, the Ettrick Forest, divided it from the British kingdoms of Cumbria and Strathclyde. But considerable districts to the south of the Humber were at one time included within its boundaries, while the western frontier was necessarily constantly shifting, and was gradually, although slowly, pushed farther back.

Like the other so-called "Heptarchic" kingdoms, Northumbria consisted originally of several separate settlements, though the absence of so definite a tradition as that in the south makes it harder to ascertain their limits and history. In the north a Frisian settlement seems to have been made on the shores of the Firth of Forth, which Nennius calls the Frisian Sea (see on this subject Mr. Skene's Celtic Scotland and Frisian Settlements on the Firth of Forth), but of this state we have practically no knowledge. The rest of Northumbria was colonised by Angles. Bernicia, the district north of the Tees, had for its first king Ida, who is said to have come from the north, and to have built as his capital Bamborough, named after his wife, Bebb. He gained many victories over the Britons, the confused tradition of which is, perhaps, preserved in the oldest Welsh poetry (see Skene's Four Ancient Books of Wales). He reigned twelve years (547—559), and was succeeded by several sons in succession, of whose history nothing is known. In 593 his grandson, Ethelfrith, son of Ethelric, became king. He was a man of energy and ambition. His marriage with the daughter of Ella, who in 560 had established another Anglian kingdom in Deira, the district between the Tees and the Humber, was the excuse for the expulsion of Edwin, the son of that monarch, and the union of Bernicia with Deira. Thus Ethelfrith became the first king of the Northumbrians. His defeat of the Scots at Degastan (603), and of the Welsh at Chester and Bangor-Iscoed (607), gave further strength to the new kingdom. But Edwin of Deira had found a powerful protector in Redwald of East Anglia, the "Bretwalda," and in 617 Ethelfrith was slain on the banks of the Idle in an attempt to subdue his chief rival for the sovereignty of Britain. Edwin now became King of the Northumbrians. His marriage with Ethelburga, daughter of Ethelbert of Kent, led to his conversion to Christianity in 627. In a solemn Witenagemot the Northumbrians accepted the new religion, and Paulinus, the queen's chaplain, became first English bishop of York, the old capital of Deira, and now of Northumbria. The victories of Ethelfrith had prepared the way for the overlordship over South Britain, which Edwin seems now to have assumed. He is fifth on the list of Bretwaldas, and Bede says "that he ruled both over English and Britons," and that his dominion included the two Monas—Anglesey and Man. With him the Northumbrian supremacy, which lasted for the greater part of the century, really begins. But he found in Penda of Mercia, and in Cadwallon, the great Welsh king, formidable competitors. In 633 their combined forces defeated and slew Edwin at Heathfield. All Northumbria was for a whole year subject to the conquerors, who seem to have aimed at lessening its power by splitting it up again into its original divisions of Bernicia and Deira. But in 634 Oswald, son of Ethelfrith, returned from his refuge in Iona, drove out the Britons and Mercians, reunited the two kingdoms, and laboured for the introduction of the Columban type of Christianity with a zeal that merited his canonisation. Yet in 642 he, too, was slain by Penda at the battle of Maserfield. His brother, Oswiu, who succeeded him, was compelled to yield Deira to Oswin, son of Osric, his cousin. In 651 Oswiu contrived to compass the death of his rival, but the jealousy of Penda provided Deira with another king in Oidilwald. But in 654 the victory of Win-widfeld over the Mercians, weakened by the defection of Oidilwald, Penda's dependant, led to the final triumph of Oswiu. Penda perished on the field. Bernicia and Deira were again united. Oswiu became undisputed lord of the English, as well as master of Strathclyde Welsh, Picts, and Scots. In alliance with Theodore of Tarsus he settled the ecclesiastical constitution of England, and his declaration in the Synod of Whitby (664) for the Roman in preference to the Scottish

Churches was critical in determining the course of the future history of Britain. He was the most powerful of all the Northumbrian monarchs, but with him departed the glory of his country. His son and successor, Egfrid (670—685) wasted, in efforts to convert a real supremacy over the Picts into a thorough conquest, the resources that Oswiu had used so well. The death of Egfrid on the fatal field of Nectansmere (685) was followed by the revolt of the Picts, Scots, and Strathclyde Welsh. His long quarrel with Wilfrid of York had convulsed the internal relations of the country. The rise of Mercia now gave the English states a new master. The next king was Aldfrid (685—705), an illegitimate brother of Egfrid, who had in exile been a pupil of the Scottish monks, and was called the "learned king." He was the patron of the great literary movement which had begun with Caedmon and Benedict Biscop, and which long outlasted the political importance of Northumbria. During the eighth century Northumbria is only remembered as the home of Bede, Alcuin, Archbishop Egbert, and other great scholars. Meanwhile a series of revolutions, seditions, and tumults had brought the Northumbrian monarchy to the verge of dissolution. No less than fourteen obscure kings ascended the throne between the death of Alcfrid and 796; of these "at least thirteen ended their reign by extraordinary means." Eadwulf (705) was dethroned after a reign of two months. Osred, son of Alcfrid, was slain by his kinsfolk (716). Cenred, after a two years' reign, came to a calamitous end (718). Osric, his successor, was slain in 731. Ceolwulf, the next king, abdicated, and became a monk (737), as did his uncle's son Eadbert in 758, after an almost unprecedented reign of twenty-one years. Oswulf (758) was slain by his own household after a year's reign. Of his successor, Moll Ethelwald (758—765), we are only told that he "lost his kingdom." The solemn deposition of Alcred (765—774) by the Witan was an important precedent for later times. Ethelred, son of Ethelwald (774—778) was driven into exile. Elfwald (778—789) was slain by conspirators. Osred (789—792) was deposed, and exiled, but returned, and was murdered, whereupon Ethelred was restored, only to be killed by his turbulent people in 794 during a great famine that was accompanied by portents, and succeeded by a destructive Danish inroad. Osbald, a noble, became king for twenty-seven days, but Eardulf was then called from exile to the throne. In 806 he was driven into exile, but was restored by papal influence. When he died is uncertain. The chroniclers now cease to give a regular succession of the Northumbrian kings. The Danes had reduced the kingdom to an extremity of disorder. The Mercian overlords had few difficulties with the decrepid state. In 827 the Northumbrians became the vassals of Egbert without so much as a battle. In 867 the Danes took advantage of the deposition of King Osbryht, and the election of a prince not of the royal blood, to take possession of York. In 875 inroads for plunder were exchanged for definite conquests, and next year Halfdane, the Danish leader, divided Deira amongst his willing followers. Thus ingloriously the kingdom of Edwin came to an end. A line of English ealdormen long continued to reign in Bamborough over Bernicia, but they were cut off from the great West Saxon monarchy by Danish Deira. The gradual subjection of Halfdane's successors to the Basileus of Winchester, the incorporation of the Bamborough earldom, the reassertion of Northumbrian local feeling in the great earldom of Canute, the grant of the Lothians to the King of Scots, the final conquest of Northumbria by William I., from which time alone we can date its extinction as a separate district, are the chief events of later Northumbrian history.

Bede, Historia Ecclesiastica; Simeon of Durham, De Gestis Regum Anglorum, and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, give most information among the original authorities. J. B. Green, The Making of England and the Conquest of England; Stubbs, Const. Hist.; Palgrave, English Commonwealth, and Skene, Celtic Scotland, are the most important modern works.

Norton, GRANTLEY FLETCHER, LORD (b. 1716, d. 1789), was born at Grantley, near Ripon. After being called to the bar, he was in turn appointed king's counsel, Attorney-General for the County Palatine of Lancaster, and Solicitor-General. In 1763 he became Attorney-General, but went out with the Grenville ministry in 1765. While in that office he had to encounter the difficult question of general warrants; and his impetuous recklessness did not smooth the way for his colleagues. Upon the resignation, in 1769, of the chair of the House of Commons by Sir John Cust, Sir Fletcher was elected to fill the vacancy. Through the excited years of Lord North's administration, Norton filled the office of Speaker with some ability, and a fearless indifference to consequences. In 1780 he paid the penalty of his independence by being dismissed from the chair. When, in 1782, the Marquis of Rockingham came into power, Sir Fletcher Norton was raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Grantley.

Norton, RICHARD, a zealous Catholic of the north, took part in the Pilgrimage of Grace, and in 1569, though a very old man, was an active supporter of the rebel Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, whom he joined with his sons. His son Christopher formed a plan to carry off Mary Stuart from Bolton Castle, but was foiled in its execution. He subsequently took an active part in the northern rebellion of 1569, and was in consequence executed at Tyburn.

Norwich has by some been identified with the Venta Icenorum of the Romans, but this is improbable. It is more likely an English city. It was burnt by the Danes, under Sweyn, in 1003. After the Conquest a strong castle was built there, and it was made an episcopal see. A serious riot occurred in Norwich in 1272, and the insurgents, in 1381, headed by John Litster, attacked the city and plundered it. Once again, in 1549, Norwich suffered from a popular revolt, when the city was captured by Robert Ket and his associates. Since this time it has occupied no important position in English history, though it has gradually and steadily grown in prosperity and commercial importance.

Norwich, THE BRIDAL OF (1075), was the occasion of the organisation of a powerful conspiracy against William the Conqueror. The refusal of the king to allow Ralph Guader, Earl of Norfolk, to marry the sister of Roger Fitz-Osbern, Earl of Hereford, was disregarded, and a plot formed at the wedding-feast ("That bride-ale that was many men's bale") to depose William, and bring back the country to the condition it was in at the time of the Confessor. The conspiracy was detected before any attempts could be made against the king, and the conspirators either fled or were punished heavily.

Froesman, Norman Conquest.

Nottingham was taken by the Danes in 868, and confirmed to them by the Peace of Wedmore. It was restored and re-fortified by Edward the Elder, 922. In 1067 William the Conqueror reconstructed and strengthened the castle. It was taken and burnt twice during the wars between Stephen and Maud. In 1461 it was the scene of the proclamation of Edward IV. In 1485 it was the headquarters of Richard III. before the battle of Bosworth. In the Great Rebellion it was the place where Charles I. set up his standard, Aug. 22, 1642. The castle was dismantled, by Cromwell's orders and re-built in 1680. In 1811—12 Nottingham was the scene of formidable "Luddite" riots, and of a Reform riot in October, 1831.

Nottingham, THOMAS MOWBRAY, EARL OF (d. 1405), was the son of Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, the adversary of Henry Bolingbroke. He joined Henry on his landing in 1399, and was made Earl Marshal. In 1406, a dispute with the Earl of Warwick being decided against him, he left the court in chagrin, and joined Scrope and others in a conspiracy against Henry IV. Through the treachery of Westmoreland, he was seized and beheaded.

Nottingham, HENRAGE FINCH, EARL OF (b. 1621, d. 1682), was called to the bar in 1645, but his Royalist sentiments prevented his coming prominently forward till the Restoration, when he was appointed Solicitor-General. He conducted the prosecution of the regicides with great fairness and judgment. In 1670 he became Attorney-General, and in 1673 Lord Keeper, which title he exchanged for that of Lord Chancellor in 1675. He held the Great Seal till his death in 1682, having in 1681 been created Earl of Nottingham. He figures in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel under the name of Amri. "From his persuasive powers," says Mr. Foss, "he acquired the titles of 'the silver-tongued lawyer' and 'the English Cicero,' and from his graceful action that of 'the English Roscius.'"

Foss, Lives of the Lord Chancellors.

Nottingham, DANIEL FINCH, EARL OF (b. 1647, d. 1730), entered early into public life. In 1679 he was placed on the Admiralty Commission. Under James II. he rigorously opposed the abrogation of the Test Act. In 1687 he entered into negotiations with Dykvelt, envoy of the Prince of Orange. He and Danby were representatives of the Tory party in those proceedings. He followed Sancroft's ideas on the settlement of the Revolution question, and advocated a regency to be exercised in James's name and during his life, but gradually abandoned the idea before the opposition of the Commons. He was appointed Secretary of State under William and Mary, thereby acquiescing in the king de facto, and bringing a large body of Tory supporters to the ministry. He was soon involved in quarrels with his Whig colleague, Shrewsbury. In 1689 he carried his Toleration Bill, by which Nonconformist divines were allowed to preach after signing thirty-four out of the Thirty-nine Articles. He also moved a Comprehension Bill, but was compelled to drop it on account of the opposition it encountered. On the departure of William for Ireland, he was placed on the Council of Nine. The resignation of Shrewsbury had made him sole Secretary of State. It was to his timely discovery of the intended invasion, and his vigorous measures to confirm the loyalty of the fleet, that the victory of La Hogue was in great part due. At the close of that year (1692) he bitterly inveighed against the subsequent mismanagement which had neutralised that victory. Nottingham and Russell became mortal enemies. A vague vote of censure was passed on the former in the Commons by a majority of one, but he was warmly supported by the Lords. William, wishing to reserve for himself the services of Nottingham, induced Russell to accept a place in the household. But on the appointment of Russell as First Lord of the Admiralty, he was forced to resign. In 1694 he vigorously opposed the establishment of the Bank of England. On the accession of Anne, he became Secretary of State. But his ideas were quite at variance with the schemes of Godolphin and Marlborough. In 1704 he declared that the ministry must be purged of the Whig element, and resigned. In opposition he raised the cry of the "Church in danger." In 1707 he proposed a motion to the effect that the English Church was threatened by the Union. He was struck off the Privy Council. As Harley neglected to give him office (1710), he joined the Whigs. They agreed to support his Occasional Conformity Bill if his Tory followers would oppose all ideas of peace. He therefore proposed and triumphantly carried a resolution "that no peace was honourable if Spain or the West Indies were allotted to any branch of the house of Bourbon." He was placed on the Privy Council by George I., but in 1716, disapproving of the condemnation of the leaders of the Jacobite rebellion, he was dismissed, and quitted public life.

Nova Scotia, now the most easterly province of the Dominion of Canada, was discovered by John Cabot in 1497. In 1598 it was partially colonised by a French expedition under the Marquis de la Roche, and in conjunction with New Brunswick, received the name of Acadia. In 1602 Acadia was granted by Henry IV. of France to a Huguenot nobleman, but in 1614 the English made a descent from Virginia, and destroyed the whole of the French settlements. In the year 1621 the country was granted by James I., under the title of Nova Scotia, to William Alexander, Earl of Stirling, whilst four years later, in order to encourage emigration, the order of Baronets of Nova Scotia was created. Sir William Alexander, however, sold the country to the French, but on the outbreak of the war between France and England in 1627, he, in conjunction with Sir William Kirk, expelled the French, but restored their settlements to them on the conclusion of peace in 1631. The claim of England to Nova Scotia was again successfully put forward by Cromwell, but in 1667 it was ceded to France by the terms of the Treaty of Breda. In 1689 it was again taken by the English under Sir William Phipps, but restored by the Treaty of Ryswick in 1697. In 1710 the capital, Port Royal, was captured by General Nicholson, and, in spite of various efforts made by the French to dislodge him, was held by him until the whole of Nova Scotia was formally ceded to England by the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. Though subject to frequent disturbances, Nova Scotia remained uninvaded until 1744, when De Quessel, the French Governor of Cape Breton, attempted to take Annapolis, as the capital, Port Royal, was then called. After the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) nearly 4,000 emigrants—chiefly disbanded soldiers—went out to Nova Scotia, under the command of General Cornwallis, and established the town of Halifax. The French did not, however, give up hopes of recovering Nova Scotia, and, in alliance with the Indians, continued to harass the new settlers to such a degree that in 1756 it was found necessary to expel 18,000 of the old French Acadians. Two years later the Nova Scotians received a constitution, consisting of a house of assembly, a legislative council, and a governor representing the British crown. From this time the condition of the country began rapidly to improve, and its prosperity was also materially increased by the influx of a large number of American loyalists during the War of Independence. Disputes and discontent in the legislature were of frequent occurrence, just as in Canada, and in 1840 Mr. Thomson (afterwards Lord Sydenham), Governor-General of Canada, was commissioned to inquire into the alleged grievances, and in consequence of his report the executive council was remodelled and the legislative council was increased by the addition of several members of the popular party. In 1858 Lord Durham included Nova Scotia in his contemplated scheme of a union of the British North American provinces, but he died before he could carry out his plan. In 1867 Nova Scotia was united with other provinces under the title of the Dominion of Canada, and is subject to the central government of the dominion at Ottawa, though it still retains its own provincial government, vested in a lieutenant-governor, an executive and a legislative council, and a house of assembly.

Nuncomar was a high-caste Brahmin, who intrigued for the deposition of Mohammed Reza Khan from the dewanry of Bengal, hoping to obtain his place. Disappointed of this, and encouraged by the enmity of the Council, he brought various charges of peculation against Hastings. Hastings, in return, had him accused and hanged for forgery.

Nunneries. The large majority of English nunneries before the Dissolution (1536—40) belonged to the Benedictine order. The following is a list of the most important: Shaftesbury (Dorset), according to tradition, founded by Alfred, which was so wealthy that Fuller tells us it was a proverb with the country folk "if the Abbot of Glastonbury might marry the Abbess of Shaftesbury, their heirs would have more land than the King of England;" Barking (Essex), said to have been founded by Erkenwald, Bishop of London, 677, which had for its first abbess, Ethelburga, afterwards canonised; Amesbury (Wilts), founded (980); St. Mary (Winchester); Malling (Kent); Mergate (Bedfordshire); Catesby (Northamptonshire); Clerkenwell, founded 1100; Godstow (Oxfordshire), founded 1138; Holywell (Middlesex); St. Helen's (London), founded at the beginning of the thirteenth century; Stratford-at-Bow (Middlesex); Chatteris (Cambridgeshire); Polesworth (Warwickshire); Sheppey (Kent); Wherwell (Hants).

The Cistercian houses were usually small: among the most important were Tarrant (Dorset) and Swire (Yorks). The great nunnery of Dartford, founded 1355, was disputed between the Augustinian and Dominican orders, but was held by the latter at the Dissolution. Syon (Middlesex), almost the wealthiest house in England, was held by Brigittine nuns (a branch of the Augustinians, reformed by St. Bridget of Sweden); Syon House was, in 1604, granted to the Earl of Northumberland.

The Minoreesses, or Poor Clares (the female Franciscans), held four houses in England. The greatest was that in London, where they were placed by Blanch of Navarre, wife of Edmund of Lancaster, about 1293. This nunnery outside Aldgate has given its name to the Minorites. The only other house of importance was at Denny (Cambridgeshire).

Oakboys, THz, was the name given to the Western Protestant tenants in Ireland, who, complaining chiefly of exorbitant county cess, collected in bodies in 1764, houghed cattle, and burnt farms. They never became formidable.

Oates, Trrus (b. circa 1620, d. 1705), was educated at Merchant Taylors' School and Trinity College, Cambridge. He took holy orders and was presented to a small living by the Duke of Norfolk. A charge of perjury being brought against him he was forced to give up this position, and was for a short time chaplain in the navy. He then identified himself with the Roman Catholics, being, however, dismissed in the year 1678. He set himself to work to gain a livelihood by his wits, and devised the story of the Popish Plot, that was readily accepted by the popular fears. Everywhere it was rumoured that Protestantism was in danger, and Oates communicated to the authorities that the Catholics were on the point of rising; that the principal features of their programme were a general massacre of Protestants, the assassination of the king, and the invasion of Ireland. Various incidents just then happened that confirmed Oates's story—none so much as the murder of Godfrey, the magistrate that had been most active in giving publicity to the conspiracy. Oates became a hero, his story being widely credited. He was rewarded with a pension of £900 a year, and a suite of apartments was devoted to his use at Whitehall. For two years multitudes of Catholics were, on the merest suspicion and on the slenderest evidence, condemned to death. In 1685 Oates was convicted of perjury, and sentenced to stand in the pillory, be whipped at the cart's tail, and then imprisoned for life. After the Revolution (1688), Parliament declared Oates's trial to be illegal, and ordered his release, granting him a pension of £300 a year. His attempts to regain notoriety after this were unsuccessful. [POPISH PLOT.]

Oath, THE CORONATION. [CORONATION.]

Oaths, PARLIAMENTARY, were first imposed in the year 1679, when it was enacted that no member could sit or vote in either House until he had taken in its presence the several oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, severe penalties being imposed on any one who should neglect the ceremony. This measure was re-enacted in 1700 and 1760, but in 1829 the Catholic Relief Act provided an especial form of oath for Roman Catholics. In 1866 the Parliamentary Oaths Act substituted one oath for the three previously in use, which in 1868 was altered with the idea of including all religious denominations, the form being, "I, A. B., do swear that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to law. So help me God." By the law of 1866 a penalty of £300 was imposed on members of both Houses for voting before they had taken the oath, and in the House of Commons the seat is vacated as if the member were dead. In the Upper House, however, a bill of indemnity is usually passed. Standing orders also provide at what hour the oath is to be taken. The most remarkable refusals to take the oaths were those of Sir H. Monson and Lord Fanshaw in 1688, and of Mr. O'Connell, in 1829, before the Relief Act was passed, but in neither instance was the objection entertained. The case of the Jews was brought up by claim of Baron Rothschild in 1850, to take the oaths, omitting the words "on the true faith of a Christian" in the oath of abjuration. A resolution was carried, however, that he was ineligible, nor was Alderman Salomons more successful in the following year. After the question had been discussed in several successive sessions, an Act was passed in 1858 by which a Jew was allowed to omit the obnoxious words, and a resolution to that effect became a standing order in 1860. The Parliamentary Oaths Act of 1866 finally placed Jews on an equality with other members, by omitting the words altogether from the form of oath. The right of Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists to make an affirmation instead of taking the oath, was first contested by John Archdale in 1693, but unsuccessfully. Several statutes were, however, passed to that effect in the reign of Anne, George I., and George II., and upon a general construction of these statutes, Mr. Pease, a Quaker, was allowed to affirm in 1833. In the same year Acts were passed allowing Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists, and those who had ceased to belong to those persuasions, to make an affirmation instead of taking the oaths; and this concession was confirmed by the Parliamentary Oaths Acts of the following reign. In 1880 Mr. Bradlaugh, who had been elected for Northampton, claimed to make an affirmation under the Evidence Amendment Act of 1869 and 1870. The report of a select committee being adverse, he presented himself to take the oath, but the House decided that he should be allowed neither to take the oath nor affirm. Subsequently, in 1883, the government attempted to deal with the case by introducing an Affirmation Bill, but it was thrown out in the Commons, nor were Mr. Bradlaugh's subsequent efforts to take his seat rewarded by success.

OATHS IN COURTS OF LAW are imposed both upon jurymen and witnesses. They may be traced back to a very remote date, and are intimately connected with the much-vexed question of the origin of trial by jury. The law of Ethelred II. directed that the twelve senior thegns in each wapentake should be sworn not to accuse any falsely. Though this is an isolated piece of legislation, we find that in England, as among the other Germanic races, an oath was habitually imposed in the courts upon the parties to a suit and their compurgators, and upon the witnesses who were called in if it was held that the oaths of the former were inconclusive. By the system of sworn recognition introduced by the Normans, which they derived probably from the Frank capitularies, oaths were also enforced, and though first applied to civil cases, this system was extended by the Assize of Clarendon to criminal cases as well. It is needless to discuss here the gradual divergence of the three elements of the jury system, the grand jury, the petty jury, and the witnesses, and it is enough to say that when their separate functions became defined (circa Edward III. to Henry IV.) oaths were still imposed upon all three. The later aspects of the question of oaths in courts of law chiefly concern the claims to exemptions from taking the oath that have been put forward from time to time. As in the case of the Parliamentary oath, the three classes of persons affected are those who believe in God, but are not Christians, Quakers and kindred sects, and Atheists, and the legislation concerning them falls chiefly within the present reign. In the first year of Victoria it was provided that anyone not professing the Christian religion might take the oath in any form they consider binding; hence Jews employ the words "so help me, Jehovah," and Mohammedans swear by the Koran. Quakers were permitted to make an affirmation instead of taking the oath, in 1833, and this privilege was confirmed by subsequent legislation. In 1854 it was provided chiefly for the benefit of those who belonged to no recognised religious sect, and consequently did not come under the former relief Acts, that if any person called as a witness should be unwilling to be sworn from conscientious motives, the court on being satisfied of the sincerity of the objection should permit him to make a solemn affirmation, and the same privilege was granted to jurors in 1867. These enactments were consolidated in the Evidence Amendment Acts of 1879 and 1880.

O'Brien, WILLIAM SMITH (b. Oct. 17, 1803, d. June 18, 1864), was the second son of Sir Edward O'Brien, of Cahimoyle. His eldest brother, Sir Lucas O'Brien, who was a Tory, became in 1855 Lord Inchiquin, as heir of the Marquis of Thomond. Smith O'Brien was educated at Harrow and at Cambridge, and in 1826 became the Tory representative of Ennis. He was an energetic opponent of O'Connell. From 1835 to 1849 he represented Limerick, and in 1846 he openly joined the Young Ireland party, led by Meagher and Mitchel. His descent from Brian Boru, and the claims he imagined himself to have to the Irish crown, seemed to a certain extent to have turned his brain. His idea was to establish an Irish Republic with himself as president. In 1848 he opposed in Parliament the Security Bill then proposed, and he was afterwards tried under that very bill in Ireland, but the jury disagreeing, it became necessary to allow him to go free. The treasonable character of his plans was, however, becoming clear, and an attempt was made to arrest him. He now left Dublin, and began haranguing the peasantry of the south. At last, on July 25, he assembled a large body in arms, and led them on the 26th against the police at Bonlagh Common. O'Brien escaped after the fight, and a reward of £800 failed to lead to his apprehension. On August 5, however, he was recognised at Thurles, as he was quietly taking a ticket for Limerick and lodged in Kilmainham gaol. On September 21 he was tried at Clonmel by a special commission, and sentenced to death. But his punishment was commuted to transportation. Unlike his fellow-conspirators, he refused a ticket-of-leave, and was sent to Norfolk Island. In 1856 he received a free pardon, and returned to Ireland. He died at Bangor in Wales, and the transportation of his remains from thence to Ireland led to a Nationalist demonstration. In private life he was one of the most truthful and kind-hearted of men.

O'Briens, THE SEPT OF, the most powerful clan in Munster, their chief stronghold being the city of Limerick, claimed descent from Brian Boru. In 1543 Murrrough O'Brien was made Earl of Thomond for life. He became a Protestant, and displayed more than the usual eagerness for Church lands; he sent a paper to England called the "Irishman's Request," asking for Oxford and Cambridge men to convert the people. Ultimately all his dignities fell to his nephew, Ronagh, whom, in accordance with the Irish custom of tanistry, he had supplanted. The fourth earl was a distinguished soldier, and fought against the Spaniards at Kinsale. The family became extinct in 1741.

Obscene Publications Act. In 1857, Lord Chief Justice Campbell succeeded in passing a bill to suppress the traffic in obscene publications, prints, pictures, and other articles.

Occasional Conformity, THE BILL AGAINST, was designed to prevent Dissenters from complying with the provisions of the Test Act (q.v.) only so far as to qualify themselves for office or membership of a corporation. It was introduced for the first time in 1702 by three Tory members, one of whom was Henry St. John, and provided that anyone who attended a dissenting meeting-house after having taken the sacrament and test for offices of trust or the magistracy of corporations should be immediately dismissed, and heavily fined. This unjust measure passed the Commons, but was rejected by the Lords, though Queen Anne put great pressure on that House to pass the bill. A similar fate attended it in the following year, and again in 1704, when the more violent Tories, led by Nottingham, proposed to carry it through their opponents by "tacking it" to the Land Tax Bill. In 1711, however, Nottingham and his "Dismals" formed an unprincipled coalition with the Whigs, the terms being that the latter should support the Occasional Conformity Bill, and it accordingly became law, the money fine being reduced from £100 to £40. This discreditable Act continued in force until 1719, when General Stanhope introduced a measure under the cunning title of a "Bill for strengthening the Protestant Interest," by which the Occasional Conformity Act and the Schism Act were abolished, but from which he was forced to exclude the Test Act.

Ochterlony, SIR DAVID (b. 1758, d. 1826), after having served in the Carnatic under Hastings and Coote, first appears prominently as Colonel Ochterlony in the capacity of Resident at Delhi (1803), after the conquest of Scindia's French troops. In this capacity he conducted the defence of Delhi in the most gallant manner, when Holkar besieged it on his return from Malwa in 1804. In 1814 he was given the command of the division destined to act against Umur Singh in the Goorkha War. Driving Umur Singh from point to point he at last shut him up in Malown. He was raised to the rank of a major-general, and had conferred upon him the Grand Cross of the Bath, being the first of the Company's officers to attain to that honour. In 1816, Sir David took command of the army for the second Goorkha campaign, and brought it to a successful conclusion. After the war he was appointed British Resident in Malwa and Rajpootana, and as such had in 1823 to deal with the disputed succession at Bhurtpore. The Governor-General, Lord Amherst, disapproved of Sir David's measures, and he was reprimanded. He thereupon resigned. The treatment he had received broke his heart, and he retired to Meerut, where he died within two months.

O'Connell, DANIEL (b. Aug. 6, 1775, d. 1847), was the son of an Irish gentleman of very ancient family. He studied at Louvain, St. Omer, and Douai; was driven from the Continent by the French Revolution, and went to London to read for the bar. In spite of the opposition of his family he came forward (Jan. 13, 1800) as a determined opponent of the Union, soon became the leader of the Catholic party, and in 1823 founded the Catholic Association. In 1825, he was prosecuted for saying, "that he hoped some Bolivar would arise to vindicate Catholic rights," but the grand jury ignored the bill. It was at his instigation that, in the year 1826, the Catholics began to show their power at elections. In 1828, he himself stood against Vesey Fitzgerald, and by means of the "forties" won the famous Clare election, his opponent retiring after five days' polling. His influence in the same year was strong enough to prevent a collision between the Catholics and the Orangemen, which seemed impending. The Emancipation Bill followed, but O'Connell having been elected before was still excluded from Parliament. He presented himself (May 15, 1829), and pleaded with great ability to be allowed to take his seat; his application was refused, and a new writ issued, but O'Connell was returned unopposed and allowed to take his seat. He was now called the "Liberator" in Ireland, and was the object of intense adoration on the part of the people. In 1831, he was forced to plead guilty to a charge of holding illegal meetings; although he was not punished, his influence was shaken at the time. He in vain opposed the Coercion Act of 1833, but did much service to the Whigs in promoting the cause of Reform. Afterwards, O'Connell and his "tail," as his followers in Parliament were derisively called, were for some time able to exercise great influence in that assembly, for he held the balance between Whigs and Tories. In 1838, however, he had to submit to a reprimand from the Speaker for accusing a member of perjury. In 1840, he revived the Repeal agitation, and in 1843, uttered language that was considered treasonable at the monster meetings he convened. But when government forbade the meeting at Clontarf on October 7, he failed to make good his words, and the Young Ireland party, among whom were the most talented of his followers, separated from him. O'Connell and his more immediate followers were arrested and prosecuted for conspiracy. A jury, entirely composed of Protestants, found him guilty, and he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment, and to a fine of £2,000. The English House of Lords by three to two reversed this decision. This result was hailed with enthusiasm, but the Repeal agitation was nevertheless crushed. O'Connell lived for some years longer, but his health was giving way. On Feb. 8, 1847, he delivered his last speech in the Commons, and died soon after at Genoa. In England he was scarcely looked upon as a serious personage, and derisive epithets such as the "big beggarman," were constantly applied to him. But in Catholic Ireland the influence obtained by his character, his energetic championship of the cause of his coreligionists, and his powers as a popular orator, was unprecedentedly great.

O'Connell Centenary, THE (August 5, 1875), was celebrated by processions and banquets in Dublin. It led to a furious quarrel between the Home Rulers and the Nationalists, which brought the banquet in the evening, presided over by the Lord Mayor of Dublin, to an untimely end; part of the guests wishing Mr. Gavan Duffy, and not Mr. Butt, to be associated with the toast of the "legislative independence of Ireland."

O'Connor, ARTHUR, heir expectant to Lord Longueville, an intimate friend of all the English Whigs, was one of the United Irishmen from 1796. In that year he was with Lord Edward Fitzgerald in France, and concerted with Hoche for an invasion. In 1797 he was imprisoned in Dublin Castle, but was soon released. Though the government was aware of his treason, it was unable to produce its information. O'Connor now established virulent papers like the Press and the Northern Star, advocating assassination. On Feb. 27, 1798, while on his way to the French Directory, as envoy of the Irish insurrectionary party, he was arrested at Margate, and brought before the Maidstone assizes. All the most distinguished members of the Opposition, however, came forward as witnesses to character, and he was acquitted. He returned to Ireland, but was arrested on another charge, and kept in prison. In 1798 Lord Cornwallis gave him and his confederates a pardon on condition of a full confession of his treason. This he did in a tone of bravado before a committee of the Lords. He was then sent to Fort George, and kept there till the Peace of Amiens. The American government refused to receive him, and he went to France.

O'Connor, FRABOIS. [CHARTISTS.]

O'Connor, RODERICK, King of Connaught, and last native King of Ireland (d. 1198), was the son of Turlough O'Connor. In 1161 he attempted to succeed to his father's power, but was unable to recover it till O'Loughlin, of Ulster, died (1166), and he was then recognised in the north at least as Lord of Ireland. [For his struggles with Dermot and the English, see article on IRELAND.] In cruelty he was fully equal to Dermot; thus he put to death a son and grandson of that king, who were his hostages. It was by his command, too, that the eyes of all his own brothers were put out. When Henry II. came over to Ireland in person, all he could obtain from O'Connor was that he consented to receive his envoys, De Lacy and Fitz-Aldhelm. In 1175, however, he concluded a treaty with Henry through ambassadors at Windsor. He thereby acknowledged himself as Henry's vassal, and promised to pay tribute. In return the English king recognised him as overlord of all Ireland which was not in the hands either of the king himself or of his Norman barons. Revolt of his sons embittered his later years, and in 1182, after a fierce civil war, he resigned the crown to his eldest son, and retired to a monastery, where he died, at the mature age of eighty-two.

Octennial Bill (1768). In 1761 an agitation for a Septennial Bill had begun in Ireland, where, till then, a Parliament was of necessity dissolved only by the king's death. In 1761 a bill to this effect was passed, but though returned from England, an error of the draftsman served as an excuse to the Irish Parliament for rejecting it. In Oct., 1767, the agitation, however, recommenced, chiefly because the bill had not been mentioned in the speech from the throne. In 1768 it was finally introduced as an Octennial Bill, and passed.

October Club, THE (1710), was composed," says Hallam, "of a strong phalanx of Tory members, who, though by no means entirely Jacobite, were chiefly influenced by those who were such." "It had long been customary," says Mr. Wyon, "for the members of a party, when some important measure was before Parliament, to meet at a tavern for the purpose of concerting a plan of action. The society was termed a club." Soon after the beginning of 1710, a few of the extreme Tories began to hold a series of meetings at the "Bell," in Westminster. "The password of this club—one of easy remembrance to a country gentleman who loved his ale—was October." The October Club soon set itself to work to undermine the power of Harley, whose moderation they scorned. It was from thence that the Jacobites looked for supporters in the last years of Queen Anne's reign. The Bolingbroke faction belonged to the October Club. They took great delight in vindictive attacks on the Whigs, especially Sunderland.

Odal, or UDAL, RIGHT, is a tenure of land that still prevails in the Orkney and Shetland Islands, and which before the growth of feudalism was the ordinary tenure of the Teutonic races. [ALODIAL LAND.] Its distinctive feature lies in the fact that land held by this right is held absolutely, and not dependent upon a superior. Odal right is thus antagonistic to feudalism, which recognised only service as a title to land.

Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury (942—958), was the son of one of the Danish chieftains who had taken part in the invasion of 870. Odo was attracted by the preaching of a Christian missionary, and embraced the Christian faith. He was adopted by Archbishop Athelm, and in 926 was made Bishop of Ramsbury. In 942 Dunstan's influence gained Odo the archbishopric. The archbishop-elect at once declared his intention of becoming a monk, thus placing himself at the head of the party of reform in the Church, whose object it was to encourage monasticism, introduce the Benedictine rule, and enforce celibacy amongst the clergy. During the reign of Edred this party had the ascendancy, but his successor, Edwy, seems to have joined the party of the secular clergy. Odo and Dunstan declared that Edwy's marriage with Elgiva was unlawful, and after a great deal of violent dispute, Edwy consented to divorce her. The story of Odo's cruel persecution of Elgiva is in all probability absolutely mythical. [DUNSTAN.]

William of Malmesbury; Hook, Archbishops of Canterbury.

Odo, Bishop of Bayeux (d. 1096), was the half-brother of William the Conqueror, whom he accompanied and greatly assisted in his invasion of England. In 1067, during William's absence in Normandy, he acted as regent of the kingdom in conjunction with William Fitz-Osbern. Their harsh and oppressive rule contributed to the risings of the English in various parts of the country, which disquieted the early part of William I.'s reign. However, in 1073 he was again appointed regent, and helped to crush the rebellion of the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk. He was munificently rewarded, raised to the second rank in the kingdom, and given the earldom of Kent and several rich manors. He now aimed at the papacy, but his ambitious projects were cut short by the king, who had him arrested as Earl of Kent, and committed to prison, where he remained till William's death. Though he was released and restored to his earldom and estates by Rufus, he joined Robert in his invasion of England. Being taken prisoner he was compelled to quit the country, and retired to Normandy, where he acted as minister to Robert, and accompanying him on the Crusade died, it is said, at the siege of Antioch.

O'Donnell, BALDEAR, the descendant of an ancient Celtic race, was in the service of the Spanish government when he heard that his countrymen had risen against the Revolution settlement of 1688. The Spanish king refused him permission to join them. He thereupon made his escape, and after a circuitous route through Turkey he landed at Kinsale. His appearance excited great enthusiasm; 8,000 Ulster men joined him, and he came to the assistance of the garrison at the first siege of Limerick. After the defeat of the Irish at Aghrim it was hoped that he would come to the defence of Galway. But he studiously held aloof. Soon afterwards he joined the English army with a few of his devoted followers, and on several occasions did valuable service to William.

O'Donnell, HUGH, called Red Hugh (d. 1602), was son and heir of Rory O'Donnell, Earl of Tyrconnel. In 1588 he was treacherously seized by order of Sir John Perrot, and kept a prisoner at Dublin as a hostage for his father's good behaviour. He, however, escaped after three years' captivity, and at once joined Hugh O'Neil. In 1601 he commanded the O'Donnells, who marched with O'Neil to raise the siege of Kinsale, and their defeat there is said to have been, in part at least, due to his impetuosity. In 1602 he sailed to Spain with a long train of followers, and was received by the court with great distinction, but died soon afterwards.

Moore, Hist. of Ireland.

O'Donnell, RORY, Earl of Tyrconnel (d. 1618), was brother of Red Hugh O'Donnell. In 1603 he gave up his Irish title, and received a grant of his lands and the earldom from James I. In 1607, however, he seems to have conspired with O'Neil, Earl of Tyrone, and with him at all events he went abroad, where he died after being attainted in 1612.

O'Donnells, THE SEPT OF THE, were powerful in Ulster, where the O'Neils were their hereditary foes and rivals. Calwagh O'Donnell was captured by Shane O'Neil, together with the Countess of Argyle, his wife, in 1560, and remained a prisoner till 1564, and even then he had to purchase his release by the loss of a large part of his lands. In James's reign, however, he regained his possessions, and became Earl of Tyrconnel. Soon afterwards, being involved in a plot, he fled, and, with his family, became prominent at the Spanish court.

Offa, King of Mercia (757—796), was of the royal house of Mercia, though not nearly related to Ethelbald, the last sovereign in the direct line of descent. He drove out the usurper Beornred, and quickly made himself master of the kingdom. Under him Mercia became the greatest power in Britain. He thoroughly subdued Kent by his victory at Otford in 774, inflicted in 777 a great defeat on Wessex at Bensington, and annexed Oxfordshire to Mercia. He frequently defeated the Welsh, and pushed the boundaries of Mercia westward. To protect his frontiers he constructed from the Wye to the Dee a dyke, the remaining traces of which still bear his name. To strengthen his power he got leave from the Pope in 786 to establish at Lichfield an archbishopric independent of the see of Canterbury. The murder of Ethelbert of East Anglia is one great blot on Offa's character. On the whole he appears to have been a wise and humane ruler, and to have encouraged learning. He drew up a code of laws which have unfortunately perished. He was very liberal to the Church both at home and abroad, and founded many monasteries, among which was the great abbey of St. Albans.

Offaley, LORD THOMAS (d. 1536), was the eldest son of the ninth Earl of Kildare. He renounced his allegiance to the sovereign power, and broke out into open rebellion. He was totally defeated near Naas, and sent to England as a prisoner, where he and five of his uncles were hanged at Tyburn.

Oglethorpe, GENERAL JAMES EDWARD († 1698, d. 1785), after serving in the army with distinction, was returned to Parliament as member for Haslemere (1722). He was celebrated for his philanthropy, and founded the colony of Georgia, and an asylum for debtors.

Olaf (Anlaf), HAROLDSON (or ST. OLAF) (d. 1030), was brought up in the kingdom of Novgorod, and at an early age put to sea on a buccaneering expedition. He next appears as the friend of the Norman dukes, and fought as Ethelred's ally in England. Finding that Canute had his hands full in England, he resolved to make an attempt for the crown of Norway, and, leaving England, was successful in establishing himself there. Canute, when he found himself secure in England, set out with a magnificent fleet, largely manned by English, to assert his supremacy, which Olaf had denied. The Norwegian king fled before him into Sweden, where he managed to secure the help of many outlaws and broken men. With them, and a faithful knot of personal friends, he returned to Norway to regain his throne. At the battle of Sticklestead, he was defeated and slain (1030). His body was hastily buried, but was later taken up, being found incorrupt, and buried in great state in a shrine at Trondhjem (Drontheim). Many English churches are consecrated to him. Tooley Street, in London, still preserves his name in the old Danish quarter.

Olaf (Anlaf), TRYGWASON (d. 1000), was the son of a Norwegian sea-king of royal blood, and was probably born in the British Isles. The accounts of his early days, which originate in a Latin chronicle, now lost, are not to be trusted. His first appearance in English annals is probably 988, when Watchot was harried, and Gova, the Devonish thane, slain, and many men with him; but in 993 we are told how he came with 450 ships to Stone, and thence to Sandwich, and thence to Ipswich, harrying all about, and so to Maldon. Here he was met by Brihtnoth, the famous ealdorman, whom he defeated and slew. Next year, with Sweyn, the Danish king, he laid siege to London, but failed to take it. They then harried, burnt, and slew all along the sea-coasts of Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire. On receipt of £16,000 they agreed to a peace, and Olaf promised never again to visit England save peacefully. Next spring he went to Norway and wrested the kingdom from Earl Hacon; here he ruled for five years, during which time he established Christianity in the various districts of Norway and her colonies. He disappeared mysteriously after a battle that he had lost; rumours of his living at Rome and the Holy Land as a hermit were long rife in the North.

Oldcastle, SIR JOHN, LORD COBHAM (d. 1417), was a member of the royal household and a personal friend of Henry V. He was the leader of the Lollards. In 1413 the clergy determined to strike a blow at them by indicting Oldcastle. He refused to appear before Convocation, and was excommunicated. At last, compelled to attend before a spiritual court at St. Paul's, he yet refused to recant his opinion, and re-asserted many of his former statements, declaring, among other things, that "the Pope, the bishops, and the friars constituted the head, the members, and the tail of antichrist." Thereupon he was pronounced a heretic, and imprisoned in the Tower. Making his escape, he was expected to put himself at the head of a large body of followers, who assembled in St. Giles's Fields; but Henry's promptitude prevented the rising, and Oldcastle escaped from London. In 1415 he attempted to excite a rebellion, and in 1417 he was captured in the Welsh Marches, and put to death as a heretic and a traitor. "Perhaps we shall most safely conclude," says Dr. Stubbs, "from the tenor of history, that his doctrinal creed was far sounder than the principles which guided either his moral or political conduct." Sir John Oldcastle married the heiress of the barony of Cobham, and in her right was summoned to Parliament as Lord Cobham, by which name he is often known. [LOLLARDS.]

Old Sarum is generally regarded as the Roman Sorbiodunum. The Saxons in 552 captured it from the Britons, and named it Searesbyrig. In 960 a Witenagemot was held at Old Sarum, and the barons were assembled here by William in 1086. From the reign of the Conqueror till the thirteenth century it was the seat of a bishop; but the town then followed the church, which was rebuilt in the plain; and hereafter it has continued to be almost deserted. Nevertheless, it sent two members to Parliament, and it was for Old Sarum that William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, first sat (1735). In 1832 it was disenfranchised by the Reform Bill.

Olive Branch Petition, THE (July, 1775), was the ultimatum on the part of the American colonies prior to the War of Independence. It was a petition drawn up by Congress, urging the king to direct some mode of reconciliation. Respectful and conciliatory, the petition proposed no terms or conditions, though it was generally understood that the colonies would insist on the repeal of the obnoxious statutes, and would require some solemn charter regulating the relations of the two countries in the future. The petition was entrusted to Richard Penn, joint proprietor of the influential colony of Pennsylvania. But on his arrival in London in August, "no minister waited on him or sent for him, or even asked him one single question about the state of the colonies." The king would have nothing to do with the petition or its bearer. The American envoys foresaw too clearly that the result of the refusal would be bloodshed; but Lord Dartmouth only expressed the popular misconception of the gravity of the situation, when he said that if he thought the refusal would be the cause of shedding one drop of blood he would never have concurred in it. Omdut-ul-Omrah, Nabob of the Carnatic, on the death of Mahomet Ali (1795) succeeded to the throne and debts of his father. During his administration the prosperity of the country was rapidly declining, and the resources of government were threatened with extinction. He was, however, surrounded by European money-lenders, and enabled to pay the English subsidy, and thus defer the crisis for a short time. Lord Hobart, Governor of Madras, proposed that the mortgaged districts should be ceded to the Company in lieu of the subsidy. This the Nabob refused, and also a similar proposition by Lord Mornington in 1799. On the outbreak of hostilities with Tippoo, Lord Wellesley demanded a war contribution of three lacs of pagodas; this was promised, but not paid. Various propositions of cession were made in lieu of subsidy, but all were refused. Meanwhile the Nabob had continued the intercourse and correspondence with Tippoo which his father had begun in violation of the Treaty of 1792, and at the capture of Seringapatam proofs of this were discovered. Before, however, any action was taken the Nabob died (1800).

Omichund was a wealthy banker of Moorsheadabad, who became acquainted with the plot which Meer Jaffier had arranged with Clive for the destruction of Surajah Dowlah. He demanded £300,000 as a bribe for silence. Clive therefore caused two treaties to be made out—the real one on white paper, in which Omichund was not mentioned, and the other, the false one, on red. Clive and the committees signed both, but Admiral Watson refused to sign the false one. Clive therefore forged his signature. When Omichund became aware of the deception that had been practised upon him, he lost his reason.

O'Neil, Conn, Earl of Tyrone (d. circa 1552), joined the Geraldines in their rebellion, and for a long time maintained himself against the English forces. In 1542 he consented to resign his title of "The O'Neil," and being refused the earldom of Ulster, went over to England, and was made Earl of Tyrone; his favourite, though illegitimate, son Matthew being elevated at the same time to the peerage as Lord Dungannon and the earldom entailed on him. On his death, a furious struggle broke out between Matthew's son and his uncle Shane, in which the latter triumphed.

O'Neil, Hugh, Earl of Tyrone, called "the arch rebel" (d. 1616), was the son of Matthew, Baron of Dungannon, who was himself the base son of Conn O'Neil, the first Earl of Tyrone. He first appears as commander of a troop of horse on the queen's side against Desmond. In 1587 the rank and title of Earl of Tyrone is acknowledged to be his, and, on his appeal to the queen, he is also invested with the lands attached to the earldom. He married the daughter of Sir H. Bagenal, but was suspected of having carried her off by force. Afterwards he was the ally of Red Hugh O'Donnell, but, nevertheless, he still temporised while he sought to obtain help from Spain. In 1597 he at last threw off the mask, and, assuming the royal title of "The O'Neil," allied himself with the neighbouring clans. After some fighting, he seemed ready to submit, and allowed the English to rebuild Blackwater Fort. He was soon in arms again, however, and, in 1589, he overthrew Sir H. Bagenal in person at the battle of Blackwater. Ulster, Connaught, and Leinster in consequence rose. The queen, now thoroughly alarmed, sent over the Earl of Essex as Lord-Lieutenant. He brought with him ample powers, and an army of 20,000 foot and 2,000 horse, the largest Ireland had ever seen. The two leaders met near Ballyduich, in the middle of the river Brenny; a truce was arranged, and Essex consented to submit O'Neil's demands to the queen. They included complete freedom of religion and the restoration of all forfeited land to the O'Neils, the O'Donnells, and to Desmond. Essex soon after left Ireland, and Lord Mountjoy succeeded him as commander of the English forces. The rest of the country gradually submitted, but O'Neil still held out in hopes of foreign succour. In 1601, 5,000 Spaniards at last landed at Kinsale, and some 2,000 more at Castlehaven. Kinsale was at once besieged by Lord Mountjoy and the Earl of Thomond. O'Neil, joined by O'Donnell, and by Captain Tyrrel with the 2,000 Spaniards from Castlehaven, marched to raise the siege. Against his own better judgment, he engaged the English forces on Dec. 23, 1601, and was defeated with a loss of 1,200 killed. In crossing the Blackwater on his retreat, he suffered another severe loss and was himself dangerously wounded. The Lord-Deputy then followed him into Tyrone, took his forts, ravaged the country, and even broke to pieces the old stone seat on which the O'Neils had been from time immemorial inaugurated as chiefs. When all hopes of Spanish succour came to an end by the surrender of Kinsale, and finally by the capture of Dunboy and the non-sailing of the Spanish armament, Mountjoy induced the queen to accept O'Neil's submission, which he made at Mellefont, being reinstated in his earldom of Tyrone. James I. at first treated him very kindly, but, when the English shire system began to be introduced and the penal laws began to be carried out, Tyrone conspired with Tyrconnel and the Spaniards. In 1607, thinking himself discovered, he fled the country and settled in Rome, where he died in 1616. His lands were confiscated after his flight. By the death of his sons soon after, this branch of the O'Neils became extinct.

O'Neil, OWEN ROS (d. 1680), had been an officer in the Spanish service, but returned to Ulster, and in July, 1642, assumed the command. He was soon hailed as "The O'Neil," though he was not in the direct line of descent. The Council entrusted him with the command in Ulster; but he was not at first very successful, and had to appeal to them for help. But, on June 5, 1646, he won the splendid victory over Monroe's Scots and English at Benburb. He was opposed to the reconciliation between Ormonde and the Catholics, and, in 1649, went so far as to come to an agreement with Monk; but, after Rathmines, the English Parliament refused to agree to this treaty, and he then proceeded to join Ormonde. Before he could effect his purpose, however, he was struck down by illness, or, as some say, poison, and died at Clonacter, in Cavan. Lecky says of him that "during the whole of his career he showed himself an able and honourable man."

O'Neil, SHANE (d. 1667), was the legitimate eldest son of Conn O'Neil. By Henry VIII.'s patent the earldom of Tyrone, as granted to Conn, was to descend to Matthew, his base son, and his heirs. Matthew had before Conn's death fallen by Shane's hand, but his son was supported by England. Shane O'Neil, however, got recognised as the O'Neil by a large part of the clan, and held out in rebellion against the Earl of Sussex, his personal foe. An attempt to set up O'Donnell against him led to that chief's capture, and his wife, the Countess of Argyle, became Shane's mistress (1560). Nevertheless, however, Shane professed himself anxious for peace, and even for an English wife; at last he was induced with this view to go over to England, where he was well received by Elizabeth, but not allowed to return. When, however, in 1561, the young Earl of Tyrone was murdered by one of his kinsmen, Shane was allowed to depart and at once succeeded to all his nephew's power. In 1564 the Lord-Deputy made an attempt at a meeting with Shane at Dundalk to induce him to liberate O'Donnell, who was still his prisoner. This he finally did, but on terms sufficiently humiliating for England and its ally. Soon after he concluded a treaty with Sir Thomas Cusacke, in accordance with which he submitted; he was, however, allowed to call himself the O'Neil till an English title should be found for him and the garrison of Armagh was withdrawn. This treaty he observed very faithfully, and in accordance with the wishes of the English he attacked and for the time destroyed the Island Scots in 1564. When Sir H. Sidney came over as Lord-Deputy, he refused to restore O'Donnell's lands, and ravaged the Pale; in consequence he was attacked by the united forces of the Lord-Deputy, of the Pale, and of the O'Donnells, and in 1567 all his forts were taken, and his own clan abandoned him. He fled to the Scots, but Oge Mac-Cormel, determined to revenge the defeat and fall of his brother, and had him murdered in his camp. Shane's head was stuck up in Dublin by order of the Lord-Deputy. Shane was a remarkable character, and seems to have governed Ulster uncommonly well. It is also evident that he had made a favourable impression on Elizabeth.

O'Neil, SIR PHILIM (d. 1652), a relation of the last Earl of Tyrone, was one of the leaders in the Ulster rising of 1641. He was a weak man, and the only one among the leaders who seems to have really allowed and encouraged outrages. At first he spared the prisoners, but after meeting with some reverses, he began to execute his prisoners, and on one occasion even burnt down

Armagh. Early in 1642 he announced that he was entrusted with a royal commission, and showed in support of his assertion a parchment with the Great Seal of Scotland. It was probably, but not certainly, torn from an old charter. He also began to style himself the O'Neil. In July, 1642, however, the command dropped from his feeble hands, and Owen Roe O'Neil, his successor, expressed in strong terms horror and disgust at his conduct. Sir Phelim's mother, on the other hand, had greatly distinguished herself in protecting the Protestants from her son's cruelty. Sir Phelim's chief success in actual warfare was obtained over the garrison of Drogheda. In 1652 he was tried before the High Court of Justice at Kilkenny, presided over by Fleetwood, and, together with some 200 others, convicted and executed.

O'Neils, THE SEPT OF THE, was the regal race of Ulster, descended from the ancient race which governed Ireland before the days of Brian Boru. In Edward Bruce's invasion their chief resigned his title to the crown. The regal title of the O'Neil was, however, always borne by their chief when he was in arms against England. In Elizabeth's time the O'Neil submitted (circa 1543), and became Earl of Tyrone, being refused the earldom of Ulster.

Orangemen, THE, was a term which began to be used as early as 1689, and was applied to the upholders of Revolution principles. On Sept. 21, 1796, the first Orange lodge was instituted by the Peep o' Day Boys, after the celebrated battle of Diamond. The lodges soon multiplied, their chief object at that time being to disarm the Catholics, who indeed had no right to keep arms. By 1797 they could muster 200,000 men. Many noblemen and gentlemen joined them, and it was their influence which counteracted that of the United Irishmen in the north. In 1798 the rebels were more afraid of them than of the regular troops, but Lord Camden, perhaps rightly, refused to employ them, and thereby give a sectarian character to the rebellion. In 1825 they were dissolved by the Association Bill. In 1836 they, however, again numbered 145,000 members in England and 125,000 in Ireland. The Duke of Cumberland was Grand Master, and the Orangemen were suspected of a wish to change the succession in his favour by force of arms. Consequently, after a parliamentary inquiry, their lodges were broken up. In 1846 they were again revived, and many faction fights followed in Ireland. In 1869 great excitement was created by the arrest of their Grand Master for violating the Party Processions Act.

Ordainers, THE LORDS, consisted of earls, barons, and bishops, appointed in March, 1310, to hold office till Michaelmas, 1311, and to draw up ordinances for the reform of the realm. A precedent for the appointment of such a commission was found in the proceedings of the Oxford Parliament of 1256, and in both cases it is noticeable that the Commons had no share in the matter. The Ordainers were twenty-one in number, viz., seven bishops, eight earls, and six barons.

Ordeal. This name, once written ordél and ordel, etymologically signifies a distribution into "deals" or parts, then a discriminating, and then a deciding (Ger. Urtheil), and was given to a peculiar method of reaching the facts in criminal cases that made a feature of the Anglo-Saxon judicial system. Though represented as an inheritance from Pagan times, it is described as "a reference to the direct judgment of God," and would seem to have been allowed as an alternative to those who failed in or shrunk from the process by compurgation or by oath. "If he dare not take the oath," says an old law, "let him go to the triple ordeal." But the recorded details will not warrant a positive statement. We only know that under certain circumstances, while the court, sheriff, bishop, thegns, &c., declared the law, the ordeal was expected to reveal the facts. The ceremony took place in church. After three days of severe discipline and austere diet, having communicated and made oath that he was innocent, the accused person, standing between twelve friends and twelve foes, when a special service had concluded, plunged his arm into boiling water, drew out a stone or lump of iron, and had his arm bandaged by the priest. This was the ordeal of water; or he was called on to seize a bar of iron that had lain on a fire till the last collect of the service had been read, carry it for three feet, and hasten to the altar, when the priest promptly applied the bandages. This was the ordeal of iron. If in three days' time the priest could say the arm was healed, the sufferer was pronounced guiltless, if not, he was judged as one convicted of God. Minor or less accredited ordeals were the corsead, or eating of the consecrated or accused morsel, and the casting of the subject, bound, into deep water. If the former did not choke, if the latter threatened to drown, it was taken as a proof of innocence. Walking on burning ploughshares also appears as an ordeal, but seldom, if ever, save in incredible stories, as in that told of Emma, Canute's widow.

Ordeal continued after the Conquest. The Conqueror allowed it to Englishmen when challenged by Normans in place of the newly-introduced trial by battle. "Domesday," Prof. Freeman tells us, "is full of cases in which men offer to prove their rights . . . by battle or by ordeal." In the Assize of Northampton (1176) it is ordered that men presented before the king's justices for the darker crimes should "go to the judgment of water." But it fell into disrepute; the Church withdrew her countenance from it; other processes, notably the crude forms of the jury system, grew into favour; the Lateran Council of 1215 abolished it. This sealed its doom in England as elsewhere; a letter of Henry III.'s to the itinerant justices in 1218 is usually accepted as marking its final extinction.

Ordericus Vitalis (b. 1075, d. 1145) was of mixed parentage, his father being a native of Orleans and his mother an English-woman. He was born in England, but spent most of his time at Lisieux, in Normandy. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History, chiefly concerned with the affairs of Normandy, and he is on the whole the most valuable authority for the reigns of William the Conqueror and his son. The first part of his work deals with the history of the Church from the beginning of the Christian era to the year 866; the second part gives the history of the monastery of St. Evroul; and the third part is a general history of events in Western Christendom from Carolingian times down to the year 1141.

Orders in Council are orders by the sovereign with the advice of the Privy Council. They have been issued in times of emergency. In 1766 an embargo was imposed on the exportation of corn, because of a deficient harvest and the prospect of a famine. Napoleon I.'s Berlin decree, declaring the whole of the British Islands to be in a state of blockade, called forth, on Jan. 7, 1807, an Order in Council prohibiting all vessels, under the penalty of seizure, from trading to ports under the influence of France. Further orders bearing upon the same question were issued on Nov. 11 and 21 of the same year. On April 26, 1808, by a new Order in Council, the blockade was limited to France, Holland, a part of Germany, and the north of Italy. The legality of Orders in Council has been frequently questioned. They have, however, been authorised by statute in various matters connected with trade and the revenue; and the International Copyright Act, 7 and 8 Vic., cap. 12, contains a clause empowering the crown by Order in Council to extend the benefits of that Act to works first published in any state that gives a like privilege to the productions of this country.

Ordinance is a form of legislation opposed to a statute. An ordinance has been defined as "a regulation made by the king, by himself, or in his council, or with the advice of his council, promulgated in letters patent or in charter, and liable to be recalled by the same authority." The essential difference between an ordinance and a statute lay in the fact that the former did not require to be enacted in Parliament, and might be repealed without Parliament. Moreover, the ordinance is the temporary Act of the executive; the statute, the permanent Act of the legislature. From the earliest days of Parliament a great deal of jealousy was felt on account of the ordaining power of the king and his council. It very frequently happened that an ordinance practically repealed or materially modified what had been enacted by statute; and in 1389 a petition was presented by the Commons praying that no ordinance be made contrary to the common law, the ancient customs of the land, or the statutes made by Parliament. The sovereign still possesses the power, which must be given to the executive, of legislating by ordinance in certain cases. But these ordinances, or Orders in Council, as they are termed, are only made with the consent of Parliament, are in most cases laid before the two Houses, and may be abrogated by Act of Parliament.

Ordovices, THE, were an ancient British tribe who occupied the north of Wales and Anglesey.

Oregon Question, THE. The treaty of 1783 between the United States and England had omitted to define the frontier between Canada and the United States eastwards from the great lakes, and also westwards from the Rocky Mountains, leaving open the disposal of the vast district lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific. In November, 1818, a convention was concluded between the two governments containing this stipulation, that "whatever territory may be claimed by one or other of the contracting parties on the north-west coast of America, to the west of the Rocky Mountains, as also all bays, harbours, creeks, or rivers thereon, shall be free and open to the ships, citizens, and subjects of both powers, for ten years from the date of the signature of the present convention." This convention was renewed Aug. 6, 1827, for an indefinite period, with the understanding that either party might rescind the stipulation by giving twelve months' notice. The boundary question was thus left still in abeyance. Numerous difficulties occurred, and in 1846 the American legislature gave notice that the existing convention would terminate in twelve months. A great deal of indignation had previously been excited in England by President Polk's inaugural address in 1845, in which he distinctly claimed Oregon as part of the United States, and asserted that the Americans would maintain their right to it by force of arms if necessary. This speech was replied to by Sir Robert Peel in a spirited address to the House of Commons. England at once transmitted a proposition for a settlement, and this was eventually accepted by the United States. The territory was then equitably divided between the two countries by the Oregon Treaty of 1846. The north-west frontier was defined along the main land to the coast, but there were some minor points which were not defined with sufficient precision to prevent mistake. In consequence a dispute arose later as to the ownership of the little island of San Juan, which was decided by arbitration.

Orford, EARL OF. [RUSSELL; WALPOLE.]

Orkney and Shetland, the northernmost county of modern Scotland, consists of two groups of islands, of which the Orkneys are the southernmost. There are faint traces of their having been originally inhabited by Picts. If Nennius could be believed (Mon. Hist. Brit., p. 56A) it was the original settlement of that nation. In A.D. 86 Agricola took possession of the Orkneys, but it is improbable that the Romans ever effected a definite occupation. When in 682 the Pictish king, Brude MacBile, devastated the Orkney Islands, he must have waged war against some civil foes. But the real history of the northern islands begins with the Scandinavian settlements. Their position exposed them to Viking outrages, and invited the settlement of the hardy Norsemen, who fled beyond sea from the tyranny of Harold Harfagr. In 874 Thorstein the Red, son of a Norse King of Dublin, had already conquered both Orkney and Shetland, and Caithness and Sutherland. But within ten years Harfagr himself sailed to Orkney, added it to his empire, and constituted it an earldom in favour of Rognwald, who handed it over to his brother Sigurd. Jarl Sigurd soon added to his government Caithness and Sutherland, if not districts still further south. It is unnecessary to enter into the detailed history of the Jarls of Orkney, of their wars with the Scots, in the Hebrides, and in Ireland. Their district was frequently split up into two portions, held by different members of the reigning family. The Scottish kings claimed some indefinite suzerain rights over Caithness, but Orkney paid scat or tribute to Norway alone. Some of the more valiant of the earls conquered the whole of the districts north of the Spey, but the evidence of language no less than of history shows that "Suther land" was the southernmost point of the district permanently occupied by the Norsemen. Unlike the Hebrides, the jarldom of Orkney was not only conquered, but colonised. The original inhabitants were nearly extirpated. To this day the language of the district is English, the nomenclature Norse, the laws and constitution purely Scandinavian. The udal tenure, and the Norse poor law are but things of yesterday in Orkney. After the introduction of Christianity by Olaf Trygvason in 997, Orkney became the seat of a bishopric, and Shetland later of an archdeaconry, which were included in the province of Trondhjem. But the obedience of the Bishop of Caithness was more doubtful. Earl Thorfinn (1014—1064), the founder of the cathedral of Kirkwall, was almost the last of the great conquering Jarls of Orkney. His conquests lapsed on his death. His sons, Paul and Erling, who joined Harold Hardrada's expedition to England in 1066, ruled jointly, and were the founders of two lines of earls. The son of Erling was the famous St. Magnus. Malcolm Canmore by his marriage with Thorfinn's widow brought the whole district into some relation with the Scottish crown. But in 1093 both Orkneys and Western Isles were conquered for a time by Magnus Barefoot of Norway, but on his death in 1104 the native jarls regained their practically supreme authority. In 1196 William the Lion definitely subjected Caithness to his throne. In the next century the earldom of Caithness was divided between the Angus and Moray families. At a later period the Sinclairs got possession of it. The islands remained under the nominal suzerainty of the Kings of Norway, and, after the Danish conquest, of the Kings of Denmark. In 1470 they were handed over to James III. as security for the portion of his wife, Margaret of Denmark. At the same time the bishopric was transferred from the province of Trondhjem to that of St. Andrews. The pledge was never redeemed, and at last, on the marriage of James VI. with Anne of Denmark, the pretensions of the Danish kings were more formally ceded. The islands were constituted into a Scottish county, though it was not until the Reform Act of 1832 that Shetland had any voice in returning Parliamentary representatives. The land gradually got into the hands of Scottish proprietors, but the bulk of the population remained Norse, though that language died out with the cessation of the political connection.

Orleans, THE SIEGE OF (1428—29), was commenced by the Duke of Bedford in October, 1428. The English were at this time masters of the whole country north of the Loire, and were anxious to extend their conquests across that river. For this purpose it was necessary that Orleans should be taken, as it commanded the valley of the Loire. The size of the city rendered a strict blockade almost impossible, while a considerable French force harassed the besiegers. The battle of Patay, which was fought in February, 1429, seemed to deprive the besieged of all hope of succour, and the fall of Orleans was certain, when the sudden rise of Joan of Arc, and the enthusiasm she created, aided by the skill of Dunois and other generals selected by her, entirely changed the aspect of affairs. Led by the heroine of Domremy, the French succeeded in entering Orleans in April, and on May 8 the English raised the siege and retired, being defeated with considerable loss ten days later at Patay. Sir E. Creasy places the siege of Orleans among the decisive battles of the world, and certainly its results were very considerable. The raising of the siege was the turn of the tide; after this the English lost town after town, fortress after fortress, till at last, of all their great French possessions, Calais alone was left to them.

Orleton, ADAM, Bishop of Winchester (d. 1345), was made Bishop of Hereford in the year 1317, and translated to Winchester in 1333. In 1323 he was accused of high treason before Parliament. He refused to recognise the jurisdiction of a lay court, and was supported by all the other prelates and many of the barons. Edward II. summoned a council of laymen and had Orleton tried before them. A verdict of guilty was returned, and his property sequestrated. Before long, however, he was reconciled with the king; but he never forgot the insult, and in 1326 he took the lead among the bishops in support of Isabella and Mortimer. He played a very important part in the events which led to Edward's deposition and murder, and is largely responsible for both these acts.

Ormonde, JAMES BUTLER, 4TH EARL OF (d. 1452), was Lord-Deputy in Henry IV.'s reign. In Henry V.'s reign he was Lord-Lieutenant, and succeeded in keeping the natives out of the Pale (q.v.). In 1423 he was superseded. In 1440, however, he again became Lord-Lieutenant, and remained so till 1446.

Lodge, Portraits.

Ormonde, JAMES BUTLER, 5TH EARL OF (d. May 1, 1461), was created Earl of Wiltshire in 1449, and was knighted by Henry VI. In 1453 he became Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and got tonnage and poundage granted to him on condition of guarding the seas. He was an ardent Lancastrian, and fought against the Earl of Warwick at sea. At Wakefield, he was one of those who captured the Duke of York. In 1461, however, he was taken prisoner at Towton, and beheaded at Newcastle (May 1, 1461). Together with his brothers he was attainted in Edward IV.'s first Parliament; his brother, the sixth earl, was, however, soon afterwards restored in blood.

Ormonde, THOMAS BUTLER, 7TH EARL OF (d. 1515), succeeded his brother, the sixth earl. The act of attainder was finally reversed by the first Parliament of Henry VII., and he was summoned to the English Parliament as Baron Ormonde of Rochford, in 1495. In 1515 he died, without male issue. Through his daughter, his English barony passed to the Boleyns, and they were created Earls of Ormonde as well. But on the death of Thomas Boleyn without male issue, in 1539, the earldom was restored by Henry VIII. to the Butlers.

Lodge, Portraits.

Ormonde, THOMAS BUTLER, 10TH EARL OF (d. 1614), was in 1559 Lord High Treasurer of Ireland, which office he held till his death. He was a staunch Protestant, having been educated at the English court; this embittered his feud with the Earl of Desmond (q.v.). In 1580 he was appointed Governor of Munster, and the duty was imposed on him of destroying his old foe, the Earl of Desmond. In January, 1580, he advanced into the country of the Fitzgeralds, destroying all before him. It is said that in one year his forces killed 836 malefactors, and 4,000 other people. So relentless was his policy that Munster was a desert when he left it. During the remainder of his life Ormonde continued a firm supporter of the English supremacy.

Ormonde, JAMES BUTLER, 1ST DUKE OF (d. 1688), was the most powerful nobleman in Ireland. In 1641, when the rebellion broke out, he was made lieutenant-general of the king's forces. In consequence of his victory over Lord Mountgarret at Kiltrush in April, 1642, he became a marquis. He soon after defeated General Preston, but the position of the king in England being critical, he obeyed the royal orders, and concluded with the rebels the peace called the Cessation. Soon after he was made Lord-Lieutenant, but being unable to hold his own, he honourably chose rather to give up Dublin to the Puritans than to the natives, and surrendered it to Colonel Jones, and in 1647 he concluded a regular treaty with the Parliamentary commissioners. On hearing, however, of Charles I.'s execution, he took out a new commission as Lord-Lieutenant from Charles II., and soon found himself at the head of all the Irish forces, excepting only O'Neill's troops; however, his attempt to besiege Dublin was frustrated by the battle of Rathmines (Aug. 2, 1649), and soon after he left the kingdom. After the battle of Worcester, he remained with Charles II. in his exile. On the Restoration he became Lord Butler and Earl of Brecknock in the English peerage, and in 1661 Duke of Ormonde in Ireland. He was again Lord-Lieutenant from 1661 to 1668, and again from 1677 to 1682. His losses in the king's service were estimated at £900,000. His reputation for loyalty, ability, and integrity stood very high, and he held aloof from the immorality of Charles's court. His latter years were clouded by his fears for James II., and they probably hastened his end. His eldest son, Lord Ossory, had fallen by the hand of an assassin in 1680. This son was nearly as popular as his father, and had greatly distinguished himself in the Netherlands.

Ormonde, JAMES BUTLER, 2ND DUKE OF (b. 1665, d. 1745), was grandson of the first Duke of Ormonde. On the death of his grandfather, he was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford. On the arrival of William in England, he deserted James II. in company with Prince George of Denmark, and was present at the coronation of William and Mary. He was present at the battle of the Boyne, at Steinkirk, and at Landen, where he was taken prisoner. In 1696 he voted for the attainder of Fenwick. In 1700 large grants of land were made him by the Commons. On the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession, he was sent with an expedition to Cadix, together with Sir George Rooke. In 1703 the duke became Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, on the resignation of Rochester, and was reappointed in 1710. His policy of favouring the Catholics and opposing the Irish Parliament made him very popular in Ireland. On the dismissal of Marlborough he was appointed to command the troops in Flanders. He was ordered to undertake no offensive operations against the French, in view of the proposed treaty; but he could not refuse to join Eugene in the siege of Quesnoy. On the declaration of an armistice (June, 1712), the English troops were ordered to separate from Eugene. After the accession of George, it was resolved to impeach him for acting in concert with Marshal Villars. He fled to France. Bolingbroke ascribes the ruin of the Pretender's cause in 1715 to the flight of Ormonde and the death of Louis XIV. The duke soon started for the coast of Devonshire, hoping to find that county in a state of rebellion. But his agent had betrayed his plans; and there was every appearance of the most profound peace. On his return he quarrelled with Bolingbroke, and induced James Edward to dismiss him. In 1719, Alberoni, the Spanish minister, fitted out a fleet, with 5,000 soldiers under the command of Ormonde. He was to join it at Corunna as "Captain-General of the King of Spain." But the ships were scattered by storm. He spent the remainder of his life chiefly in retirement at Avignon. In 1740, on the outbreak of war, Ormonde went once more to Madrid, but could gain no promises of help. In 1744 Charles Edward neglected to summon him to join his intended invasion of England, until all chance of success was over for the year. "Ormonde," says Stanhope, "unlike Bolingbroke, having taken his part steadily and adhered to it in evil fortune, and never returned to his native country. He was certainly a man of very amiable temper, and no mean accomplishments; and with no blot on his character, unless incapacity and utter want of vigour are to be looked on as such."

Orsini Question. On Jan. 14, 1858, Felix Orsini and his gang attempted the assassination of the Emperor of the French by means of explosive bombs. As these men came from London, where they had made their preparations, great indignation was excited in France that shelter was afforded to such a crew of ruffians. Count Walewski, Minister of Foreign Affairs, wrote to Count Persigny, French ambassador at London, on the subject with some acrimony, inveighing against the defective laws of England, which allowed the right of asylum to protect such assassins. The French ambassador made representations to the English government, and Lord Palmerston, recognising the justice of the representations, introduced a bill for the punishment of conspiracy to murder. Unfortunately, however, certain French officers had thought fit to give vent to their indignation against England in their congratulations to the Emperor, and entreated him to allow them to "demand an account of the land of iniquity which contains the haunts of the monsters, who are sheltered by its laws." The result was that in spite of Count Walewski's endeavours to remove the bad impression, the spirit of England was roused and Lord Palmerston's measure was regarded as an unworthy concession to the menaces of the French army. It was thrown out on a division, and Lord Palmerston resigned. His successor, Lord Derby, took up a stronger position, and returned a firm answer to Count Walewski's note. A satisfactory reply was received, and the matter terminated in a friendly and honourable manner.

Orthes, THE BATTLE OF (Feb. 27, 1814), was fought at the close of the Peninsular War, and gained one of the strong positions which Soult had taken up in the south of France. Two days before the battle, Beresford forced the passage of the Gave de Pau, below Orthes. On the next day, Soult learnt this, and took up a strong position on a ridge, which was in part covered with woods, and presented a concave front to the allies. The ridge was crossed by the main road from Orthes to Dax, and was protected in front of its centre by some swampy ground, at the further side of which was an old Roman camp, which was occupied on the day of the battle by the light division. Wellington's plan was to turn the French right, while Hill, skirting the French left, should seize the road to St. Lever; thus Soult would have no line of retreat, and would be shut up in Orthes. The attacks of Roe and Picton on the French right on the morning of the 27th completely failed; but Wellington ordered a concentrated assault to be made on the French left and centre. Wading through the marsh, the troops were not noticed until they drove in the skirmishers, and carried all before them. The confusion soon became general, and the French fell back. Hill meanwhile had forced the ford at Sonars, and was now in possession of the Pau road. There was thus only open to Soult a narrow road to Sault de Navailles. Of this he determined to avail himself, and conducted the retreat with such skill and order that the French were able to seize a small ridge, before Hill could occupy it. Wellington, being wounded, was unable to superintend the pursuit himself, which was not carried on so vigorously as it might have been. As it was, however, Soult lost an enormous number of stragglers, many of whom fell into the hands of the allies.

Ostmen, or Eastmen (Norse, Aust-mathr), was the name generally applied to the Scandinavian settlers in Ireland. Towards the end of the eighth century the exceptionally disturbed condition of Ireland, where the power of the ard ri (over-king) had been reduced to nothing, and sept constantly waged war against sept, invited the Viking rovers to plunder and settle on its coasts. In 795 the first recorded invasion took place. For the next half century the invaders sought plunder only. But about 850 they formed permanent settlements along the whole east coast. Dublin, whose suburb Oxmanstown still preserves the name of the Ostman, Wexford, Waterford—both purely Norse names—Limerick, even in the remotest part of the island, became the centres of Norse jarldoms. With characteristic facility, the new-comers soon mixed with the natives. Besides the pure races—the Dub-gaill, or black foreigners, and Findgaill or fair foreigners, as various branches of the Norsemen were called—the mixed race of Gall-goidel soon became equally famous as pirates, warriors, and mariners. They constantly spread devastation along the shores of Britain. The Welsh coast, from its proximity, was especially often attacked by them. But they also had close relations with the Norsemen more to the north. A son of a King of Dublin first conquered Orkney; and names like Njal give weight to the theory that Iceland was largely settled by Irish Danes, or at least had constant dealings with them. The Danish kings of Dublin were especially powerful. At last the vigour of the Viking states began to abate. The Ostmen were compelled to acknowledge the overlordship of great English kings, like Edgar. They became too much mixed up with the clan system of the Irish to retain their old characteristics. A great Celtic reaction set in, which culminated in the decisive victory of the famous Brian Boromhe at the battle of Clontarf in 1014. (See Skene, Celtic Scotland, i. 386.) The power of the Norseman was broken, though the weakness of the conquerors left Dublin a Danish city until the arrival of Strongbow. Their conversion to Christianity still farther weakened the old Viking prowess. Their bishoprics, connected with Trondhjem in early times, were in striking contrast to the clan system of the Irish Church. The anxiety of these Norse bishops to avoid amalgamation by the latter by acknowledging the supremacy of Canterbury, is strikingly brought out by the relations of Lanfranc with the Archbishop of Dublin. (Freeman, Norman Conquest, iv. 529.) At last the remnants of the Ostmen readily assimilated themselves to their kinsfolk the Norman lords and soldiers who conquered the greater part of Ireland in the reign of Henry II. Except for their influence in the place-names of the island, and on the growth of the towns, they left few permanent traces in the later history of Ireland.

Ostorius Scapula, Roman Governor in Britain (47—51), conducted the successful campaign against Caractacus. The subsequent rising of the Silures taxed his energies, and is said to have occasioned his death.

Oswald, King of Northumbria (634—642), was the son of Ethelfred. After his father's death, he retired to Scotland, where he remained till the death of his elder brothers gave him the claim to the throne. He defeated Cadwallon at Heavenfield, near Hexham, and obtained the sovereignty both of Bernicia and Deira. He ranks as the sixth Bretwalda, and is said to have reigned over Angles, Britons, Picts, and Scots. He re-established, with the help of St. Aidan, Christianity in Northumbria, and his virtues receive high praise from Bede. He perished at Maserfield in battle against Penda of Mercia. By his subjects he was regarded as a martyr, and miracles were said to be wrought by his relics.

Oswestry is a town in Shropshire of considerable antiquity. It derives its name from Oswald, King of Northumbria, 642. The remains of a castle said to date from the Norman Conquest are there, situated on a hill to the west of the town.

Oswy, or Oswiu, King of Bernicia (b. 642, d. 670), was the son of Ethelfred. On the death of his brother Oswald, he succeeded to Bernicia and the Bretwaldaship, while Deira went to his nephew, Oswine. In 651 Oswiu murdered his nephew, but failed to conquer the whole of Deira. During the early part of this reign, Northumbria was exposed to frequent attacks from Penda of Mercia, who was, however, defeated and slain by Oswiu in 654. For a short time after this, Oswiu ruled over the whole of Mercia, but was eventually compelled by Wulphere to retire within the boundaries of his own kingdom. Oswiu's reign is also important for the union of the Churches in England, which took place now, the Scottish missionaries being obliged to submit to the authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury. His reign was most prosperous, and his kingdom was greatly enlarged by victories over the Picts.

Otho, one of the chaplains of Pope Honorius III., was sent over to England as nuncio in 1225, partly to plead for Falkes de Breauté, in which he was unsuccessful, and partly to raise money for the Pope by obtaining a grant of two prebends in each cathedral. This monstrous demand was refused, and in 1226 Otho left England, to return in 1237 with full legatine powers. He now acted with great moderation, arranged some difficulties with Scotland, reformed the Church, and attempted to abolish pluralities. But his rapacity was unbounded, and when he left England in 1241, it was said that he had then drained the country of more money than he had left in it.

Ottawa is the capital of Canada. It was named Bytown, after Colonel By, until 1854, when it was incorporated as a city under its present name. In 1865 it was made the Canadian capital and seat of the legislature. The Parliament Houses are reckoned amongst the finest buildings in America.

Otterburn, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 19, 1388), was fought between an invading force of Scotch troops, headed by the Earls of Douglas and Murray, and an English force, led by the Percies. The Scotch army was divided into two portions, which marched into England by different routes. The smaller division, after being repeatedly threatened by the English, besieged the town of Otterburn, in Northumberland, where they were attacked in an entrenched position by Hotspur with a force of 9,000 men. Although the Scots were numerically far inferior, their victory was decisive; both the Percys (Hotspur and Ralph) were taken prisoners, and about 2,000 of the English were slain. The battle of Otterburn has been commemorated in ballad poetry under the name of Chevy Chase. "The battle of Otterburn," says Mr. Burton, "has this much significance in history, that it marks the fading from the defenders of Scotland of the dread of immediate absolute conquest by England."

Otterburne, THOMAS OF (d. circa 1421), a Franciscan, wrote a Chronicle of English History from the earliest times to the year 1420. This work is of some value for the reigns of Henry IV. and V., and has been published by Hearne.

Oude, at one time a province of the Mogul Empire, became connected with England during the governor-generalship of Warren Hastings, through the Treaty of Benares and the transactions with regard to the Rohillas. The treaty began that defensive alliance which gradually tended to subject the Vizier to the English, and which, in 1801, after various cessions of territory, placed him in an isolated position, surrounded by the English territories, without the necessities of defence. The sovereigns, in consequence, gave themselves up to extravagance, debauchery, and misgovernment, in spite of the repeated protests and threats of the English. Gazeed-ud-deen, on his accession in 1814, assumed, by the advice of Lord Hastings, the title of King of Oude, and no longer recognised the authority of the Mogul. In 1856 Lord Dalhousie annexed the country by the order of the Directors, the king becoming a state prisoner.

Oudenarde, THE BATTLE OF (July 11,

1708). This was one of the great battles in the War of the Spanish Succession. Finding that the war was becoming unpopular both with the English and Dutch, Marlborough resolved on a decisive blow. The French, numbering 100,000, under the Duke of Burgundy, a prince of the blood, who was jealous of Vendôme, the second in command, were attempting to take Oudenarde, a fortress on the Scheldt. Marlborough, having been joined by Eugene, in command of the allies amounting to little more than 80,000, advanced towards them, and they promptly raised the siege. Although the French outnumbered the allies, they were under the disastrous disadvantage of being led by commanders with different views; and when, accordingly, the armies met, they were utterly routed. They lost 3,000 men and had 7,000 taken prisoners, besides ten pieces of cannon and 4,000 horses. The allies lost nearly 2,000 men.

Oulart, SKIRMISH AT. On May 27, 1798, during the Irish Rebellion, 8,000 insurgents were defeated here. Of some 200 of the North Cork Militia, all but five were killed. Father Murphy led the rebels.

Outlawry, i.e., exclusion from the protection and benefit of the law, has been from very early times the punishment which has attended flight from justice, or refusal to appear before a legal tribunal. In the laws of Edgar it is even enacted that a person refusing obedience to a decision of the hundred, shall, after being fined three times, become an outlaw, unless the king allows him to remain in the land. An outlaw was said to "bear a wolf's head," and therefore to be lawfully slain by any who met him. But as early as the thirteenth century some doubt seems to have been felt as to the expediency of so summary a procedure. Thus Bracton laid it down that though an outlaw might be killed if he defended himself or ran away, so that it was difficult to take him, when once taken his life was in the king's hands, and any one then killing him must answer for it as for any other homicide. Yet Fleta, under Edward II., declares that an outlaw may be killed anywhere with impunity, and the case which Coke refers to, in order to prove that under Edward III. such an act was declared by the judges unlawful, shows really that the old principle was still recognised. But as manners softened, the question ceased to be of practical importance, though the legal doctrine was still doubtful as late as Philip and Mary. The most important consequence of outlawry was the forfeiture of chattels for all cases, with the addition, in cases of treason or murder, of the forfeiture of real property; for other offences, of the profits of land during the outlaw's lifetime. Outlawry in civil cases for refusal to appear in court was abolished by 42 and 43 Victoria. In criminal cases it is practically obsolete, and no longer necessary, since extradition treaties have become general. It may be added that outlawry does not lie against a peer except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

Outram, SIR JAMES (b. 1803, d. 1863), saw active service in Afghanistan (1838), and subsequently acted as Resident at Hyderabad, Satara, and Lucknow. In 1842 he was appointed commissioner to negotiate with the Ameers of Scinde, in which capacity he differed from Sir C. Napier as to the latter's conduct. In 1856 he became chief commissioner of Oude. His name is inseparably connected with the defence of Lucknow, and he ranks as one of the saviours of India during the Indian Mutiny. In 1856 he commanded during the Persian War, and became in 1858 a baronet, and lieutenant-general.

Overbury, SIR THOMAS (b. 1581, d. 1613), born in 1581, educated at Queen's College, Oxford, became a student at the Middle Temple, and was knighted in 1608. Overbury earned distinction as a poet, traveller, and writer, and became the friend and confidential adviser of Robert Carr. The king became jealous of his influence, and wished to remove him from the court, whilst at the same time his opposition to Rochester's proposed marriage with Lady Essex made Rochester wish to get him out of the way for a time. James offered Overbury a diplomatic post abroad, which Rochester encouraged him to refuse, and the king for this refusal committed Overbury to the Tower (April 21, 1613). Rochester merely wished to keep Overbury quiet. Lady Essex seized the opportunity to get rid of him altogether, and at length succeeded in getting him poisoned (Sept. 15, 1613). On Dec. 20, the same year, took place the marriage of Lord Rochester, now created Earl of Somerset, to the divorced Countess of Essex. Early in 1615 the fact that Overbury had been poisoned came to the knowledge of Sir Ralph Winwood, the king's ambassador in the Low Countries, and was by him revealed to the king. Four of those concerned in the plot were executed, and the earl and countess were tried before the Lord High Steward's court (May, 1616). Both were declared guilty, but pardoned by the king, and, after 1623, released from their confinement in the Tower.

Overkirk, GENERAL (d. 1708), was one of the Dutch favourites of William III.,

whose life at the battle of St. Denis he saved, receiving as reward from the States General a costly sword. On the accession of William he became Master of the Horse. He took an active share in William's battles in Ireland, and received grants of Irish land, which were among those assailed by the Resumption Bill. He was present at the death-bed of William III. On the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession he shared with Opilan the command of the Dutch troops, and was entrusted to command the line of the Meuse. At the battle of Ramillies he headed a charge on the French cavalry, but was driven back by a counter charge from the "Maison du Roi." Soon afterwards he invested and reduced Ostend. At the battle of Oudenarde he turned the French right, and cut it off from the main body. Shortly afterwards he died worn out by the labours of the campaign.

Oxford, THE TOWN OF, is mentioned as the seat of a school or college as early as 802. It was taken by Edward the Elder in 912, and became one of the most important of the West Saxon towns. It was captured by the Danes under Sweyn in 1013, and was several times the seat of the Witenagemot under Canute. It was stormed by William the Conqueror in 1067, and the castle built about 1070. The castle was occupied by the Empress Maud in 1142, and captured by Stephen on her escape. The treaty between Henry II. and Stephen was made at Oxford (Nov. 7, 1153). In 1258 the Mad Parliament met there, and the Provisions of Oxford were drawn up. In 1542 Oxford became one of Henry VIII.'s new bishoprics. Ridley, Latimer, and Cranmer were executed here in 1555 and 1556. In the Civil War it was the head-quarters of Charles I. after Oct., 1642. The king established his mint there in 1643, and held a Parliament in 1644. It was unsuccessfully besieged by Fairfax in May, 1645, and again besieged the following May, and taken June 24, 1646.

Oxford, JOHN DE VERE, EARL OF (b. 1409, d. 1461), fought in the French wars, and was one of the ambassadors who negotiated peace with France. He was a staunch Lancastrian, and on the accession of Edward IV. he was attainted and beheaded on Tower Hill.

Oxford, JOHN DE VERE, EARL OF (d. 1513), son of the above, was restored to his earldom in 1464, but on the restoration of Henry VI. joined the Lancastrians. After the battle of Barnet he fled to France, and getting together some ships, maintained himself by piracy. He afterwards seized on St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, where he was besieged for some months. He at last surrendered and was imprisoned at Hamnes, in Picardy. Here he remained till 1484, when he induced the governor of the castle to espouse the cause of Henry of Richmond, whom he accompanied to England, and assisted at Bosworth. He was rewarded by Henry VII., and made Constable of the Tower and Lord Chamberlain. He commanded the armies employed against Simnel and the Cornish rioters, became High Steward and High Admiral, and was high in Henry VII.'s favour. Yet he was fined 15,000 marks for his violation of the Statute of Livery on the occasion of a royal visit to his seat.

Oxford, EDWARD VERE, 17TH EARL OF (b. 1540, d. 1604), one of the haughtiest and most overbearing of the nobles of Elizabeth's reign, was one of the commissioners at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots in 1586. He subsequently did good service for England in fitting out, at his own expense, ships for the defence of the country against the proposed Spanish invasion (1588).

Oxford, PROVISIONS OF (1258), were the schemes of reorganisation and reform forced on Henry III. by the Mad Parliament of Oxford in 1258. A commission of twenty-four persons was appointed, twelve nominated by the king, and twelve by the barons. By the advice of these commissioners, the king was to draw up means for the reform of the civil administration, the Church, and the royal household. When the Parliament met, the barons brought forward a schedule of grievances which they desired the commissioners to remedy. The Provisions of Oxford themselves supply the machinery by which these grievances might be redressed. The twenty-four commissioners met, and each twelve selected two out of the other twelve, and these four nominated fifteen who were to form a council for advising the king and to hold three annual Parliaments. With them the barons were to negotiate through another committee. There was also another committee of twenty-four, whose business it was to inquire into financial matters; while the original twenty-four were to undertake the reform of the Church. The commissioners drew up the Provisions of Westminster (q.v.), and drove the foreigners out of the country. This government lasted till 1261, when Henry repudiated his oath, and the Pope issued a bull absolving him. [MONTFORT, SIMON DE.]

Oyer and Terminer is the name given to a commission granted by the crown to judges and others, "to hear and to determine" cases of treason felony and trespass. By virtue of this commission, judges deal with criminal cases in the various circuits. The words oyer and terminer are derived from the French ouïr, to hear, and terminer, to determine.

Pacifico, DON, was a Jew, a native of Gibraltar, and consequently a British subject, resident at Athens. In April, 1847, his house was attacked and burnt by the mob. The Hellenic authorities took no steps to prevent the outrage, and refused to indemnify Don Pacifico, who claimed heavy damages. Lord Palmerston demanded instant compensation; and on the refusal of the Greeks to satisfy this claim, or that raised in the case of the Fantome, and of Mr. Finlay [FINLAY QUESTION], a British fleet was ordered to enter the Piræus, and seize the shipping there belonging to Greek owners. The Hellenic government appealed to France and Russia. Negotiations took place between the governments of England and France, in the course of which a serious quarrel between the two powers was with difficulty avoided. Finally the claims were settled by arbitration, and Don Pacifico received about one-thirtieth of the sum he demanded. Lord Palmerston's coercive measures towards the Hellenic government formed the subject of animated debates in both Houses of Parliament. In the House of Lords a vote of censure was carried against the government by a majority of thirty-seven. In the Commons, however, a vote of confidence was carried by forty-six, after a remarkably brilliant speech from Lord Palmerston.

Paget, WILLIAM, LORD (b. 1506, d. 1563). Born of humble parents, he attracted the notice of Bishop Gardiner, and rising rapidly, was knighted, and became one of the secretaries of state in 1543, and in that capacity negotiated peace with France in 1546. He was appointed one of the council of regency by the will of Henry VIII., with the office of chief secretary, and supported Somerset in setting aside that arrangement, and assuming the office of Protector. In 1549 Sir William Paget was sent on a diplomatic mission to the Emperor Charles V., with instructions to try and persuade him to join England in a war with France; and, though unsuccessful, he was on his return raised to the peerage. In a very statesmanlike letter, written from Germany, he attempted to inspire the wavering councils of the Protector with prudence and vigour in dealing with the rising in the west of England, but to little purpose. The see of Lichfield also lost the greater part of its lands in order to furnish him with an estate. On the fall of Somerset, to whom he had been consistently faithful, Paget was thrown into the Tower, and deprived of his appointments (1551), but was pardoned in the following year. On the accession of Mary he became one of her most trusted advisers, and was made Keeper of the Seals. He was throughout in favour of moderation, and had no sympathy with those who wished for the establishment of the Inquisition, and the execution of the Princess Elizabeth. Lord Paget was one of the promoters of the marriage between Mary and Philip of Spain, and was disposed to regard the friendship of Charles V. as highly necessary for England. On the accession of Elizabeth, he resigned the seals; but though he did not enjoy the confidence of the queen, he continued from time to time to give her advice. During the last years of his life, he advocated an alliance with Henry IV. of France in preference to the friendship of Spain.

Paget, THOMAS, 2ND LORD (d. 1589), the second son of Lord Paget, of Beaudesert, was a zealous Catholic, and a supporter of Mary Queen of Scots and the Jesuits. He was attainted, and compelled to take refuge abroad on suspicion of being concerned in Throgmorton's plot.

Paine, THOMAS (b. 1737, d. 1809), was the son of a Norfolk staymaker. He lived first at Sandwich and then in London, practising various trades with indifferent success. In 1774 he emigrated to America, where he became editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine, and in 1776 published his famous pamphlet, Common Sense, which was followed by a periodical called the Crisis, written for the purpose of keeping up the flagging spirits of the colonists. Paine was rewarded by Congress by the appointment of Secretary to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, and in 1781 was sent to France in company with Colonel Laurens to negotiate a loan for the United States. He visited France a second time in 1787, and went from thence to England, where, in 1791, he published the Rights of Man in reply to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution. The government thereupon resolved to prosecute him for his attack upon the Constitution, and in spite of Erskine's brilliant defence, he was found guilty. Paine had already anticipated his sentence by retiring to France, where he was returned to the National Convention by the electors of Pas-de-Calais. "The foreign benefactor of the species," as Carlyle calls him, voted with the Girondists, and advocated the banishment rather than the execution of the king. His moderation procured for him expulsion as a foreigner from the Convention by the Jacobins, and imprisonment. In 1794, however, he was released on the intercession of the American government, and resumed his seat. The Age of Reason, composed during his imprisonment, was a defence of Deism, written in extremely gross taste. Paine returned to America in 1802, and spent the rest of his life in obscurity.

Pakenham, SIR EDWARD (d. 1815), was a brother-in-law of the Duke of Wellington, and one of his most trusted subordinates. He distinguished himself greatly in the Peninsular War, playing an important part in the victory of Salamanca (1812). During the war with America, which began in 1812 he commanded the expedition sent against New Orleans. The place was vigorously defended by General Jackson, and in the disastrously unsuccessful assault (Jan. 8, 1815) Pakenham lost his life.

Pakington, SIR JOHN (d. 1727), was a high Tory, and member for the county of Worcester during the reigns of William III. and Anne. He preferred a complaint against William Lloyd, Bishop of Worcester, and his son, for using their influence in the elections against him, and proved his case, the House censuring their conduct as "unchristian." Sir John Pakington was throughout his life a violent partisan; his speech against the union with Scotland was hooted down because of its ungenerous insinuations, and he was equally headstrong in his opposition to the Occasional Conformity Bill. There does not appear to be the slightest ground for the idea that he was the original of Sir Roger de Coverley. He was the ancestor of Sir John Pakington, created Baron Hampton (d. 1880), who held various posts in Lord Derby's ministry, and who, in 1866, disclosed to his constituents the secret of the famous "Ten Minutes' Bill."

Palatine, COUNTIES, are so called from the fact that their lords had royal rights, equally with the king in his palace (palatium). The earl of a county palatine could pardon treasons, murders, and felonies; while all writs were in his name, and offences were said to be committed against his peace, and not against that of the king. Palatine counties originated in the time of William I., who practically created three—Chester, Durham, and Kent—whilst Shropshire had, until the time of Henry I., palatine rights. These counties were selected as being especially liable to attack—Chester and Shropshire from the Welsh Marches, Kent from France, and Durham from Scotland. The disturbed state of the borders rendered it an easy task for an earl, who was as powerful as a sovereign in his own territory, to extend his frontiers at the expense of his enemies. Kent ceased to be a palatine earldom after the death of Odo of Bayeux, whilst Pembroke and Hexhamshire, in Northumberland, were made counties palatine. Henry I. granted royal rights over the Isle of Ely to the Bishop of Ely, and in the year 1361 Lancaster was created a palatine earldom. "The palatine earldom of Chester," says Bishop Stubbs, "had its own courts, judges, and staff of officers, constable, steward, and the rest; it had its parliament, consisting of the barons of the county, and was not until 1541 represented in the Parliament of the kingdom." The other counties palatine, with the exception of Lancaster and Chester, which were held by the crown, and of Durham, were assimilated to the rest of the country during the sixteenth century. The palatine jurisdiction of Durham remained with the bishop until 1836, whilst the jurisdiction of the Palatine Courts at Lancaster, with the exception of the Chancery Court, were transferred to the High Court of Justice by the Judicature Act of 1873.

Pale, THE. That part of Ireland which was de facto subject to English law began to be called the "Pale" in the fifteenth century. It was in earlier times distinguished from Celtic Ireland as "the English land." The Pale was surrounded by a belt of waste marches, beyond which lay the lands of the Irish enemy. From the invasion of Edward Bruce, in 1315, until the Geraldine rebellion in the sixteenth century, the extent of "the English land" steadily diminished. Bruce harried the Pale mercilessly in 1316 and 1317. The small English freeholders were forced to follow the Lord-Deputy in his "hostings." Their abandoned farmsteads were robbed and burnt by English and Irish alike. They fled in great numbers across the seas, in spite of the most strenuous legal prohibitions. The Statute of Kilkenny (1367) openly acknowledges the division of Ireland into a Celtic and an English territory, and attempts to isolate them from each other by decreeing savage penalties against Celtic intruders into the Pale, and English colonists adopting Irish customs. But the law was soon a dead letter. The statute of Edward IV., c. 3, provides, just a century later, for the swearing-in of the Irish inhabitants of the Pale as lieges, and declares that deputies shall be named to accept their oaths "for the multitude that is to be sworn." The Parliament of Drogheda in 1494 ordered the construction of a mound and ditch around the English borders, "in the county of Dublin, from the waters of Auliffy to the mountain in Kildare, from the waters of Auliffy to Trim, and so forth, to Meath and Uriel." These practically continued to be the limits of the Pale until Henry VIII. undertook the conquest of the whole island. Dalkey, Tallaght, Kildcullen, Naas, Kilcock, Sydan, Ardee, Denver, and Dundalk formed the border in 1515. In 1534 there was "no folk subject to the king's laws, but half the county Uriel, half the county of Meath, half the county of Dublin, half the county of Kildare." In 1537 Justice Luttrell describes the Pale as a "little precinct, not much more than 20 miles in length ne in breadth." Bullied by the crown, "cessed" by the Parliament, subjected by their lords at once to feudal dues and to tribal impositions, plundered by corrupt judges and extortionate deputies, blackmailed by the Irish in time of peace, and harried by both sides in time of war, the dweller in the Pale was probably the most wretched of all the wretched inhabitants of Ireland.

Palgrave, Sir Francis (b. 1788, d. 1861), was called to the bar (1827), and having served on the Record and Municipal Corporation Commissions, was appointed in 1838 Deputy-Keeper of her Majesty's Records. Palgrave wrote largely on historical subjects; his chief work, the Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth: Anglo-Saxon Period (1832), was the fruit of unwearied research and examination into original authorities, and though many of the conclusions have not been accepted by later scholars, and some mistakes in details have been pointed out, it is valuable for its learning and acuteness. He wrote besides a History of England: Anglo-Saxon Period (1831); a History of Normandy and England (1851-57); and edited for the government the Calendars and Inventories of the Treasury of the Exchequer, Parliamentary Writs, Rotuli Curia Regis, and Documents Illustrative of the History of Scotland, besides writing an Essay on the Original Authority of the King's Council. Sir Francis was of Jewish parentage, and his name was Cohen, which he changed to Palgrave on his marriage.

Palladius, Sr., was one of the numerous Christian missionaries who preceded St. Patrick in Ireland. He was consecrated Bishop of Ireland by Pope Celestine I., and despatched by him in 431 to that country. Little is known about his previous history; he is supposed to have been a Briton, and appears to have been sent in the first instance by the British bishops to the Gaulish bishops, and by the latter to the Pope. He landed in Munster, but failed to gain many converts, and departed, having erected there three wooden churches. On his way back to Rome he died, one account representing him as having been martyred by the Scots.

Palliser, Sir Hugh (b. 1720, d. 1796), was second in command to Admiral Keppel in a ludicrously abortive action with the French off Cape Ushant in 1778, in which, after several hours' fighting, the rival fleets withdrew without any advantage having been gained on either side. Keppel declared that Palliser was to blame for this failure, mutual recriminations ensued, and the former being a member of the Opposition, the latter a Lord of the Admiralty, their case was made a party question. At length the matter was referred to a court-martial, which, reflecting the unjust tone of popular opinion, triumphantly acquitted Keppel, and when Palliser, feeling that this was a reflection on himself resigned his appointments, and demanded an inquiry, he could only obtain a very qualified sentence of approval.

Palmer, Sir Thomas (d. 1553), was joint commander of the English force which invaded Scotland in 1548, and took Haddington. On the blockade of the town by the French and Scotch he was taken prisoner while escorting a relieving force which re-victualled the exhausted garrison. Palmer's chief notoriety is derived from his betrayal (in 1561) of the Protector Somerset to the Earl of Warwick, to whom he revealed a plot to murder Warwick himself, and others of the Protector's enemies, which, when supplemented by some false additions, led to his death. Palmer was subsequently condemned by a special commission, and executed for his share in the treason of Northumberland and Lady Jane Grey.

Palmerston, Henry John Temple, Viscount (b. 1784, d. 1866), was the eldest son of the second viscount. He succeeded to the title, which was in the Irish peerage, in 1805, and was promptly chosen by the Tory party in the University of Edinburgh to contest the seat, but without success. In 1807, however, he began his parliamentary career as the representative of Newport, and two years later became Secretary at War in the Duke of Portland's administration. This office he held under successive governments until 1828, and aided the Duke of Wellington in his great exploits as far as a rotten military system permitted. Lord Palmerston early attached himself to the more liberal section of the Tories, which was led by Canning and Huskisson, and he followed the latter out of office. He now joined the Whigs, and in 1830 accepted the Secretaryship for Foreign Affairs under Earl Grey, playing an honourable part in the negotiations which led to the independence of Belgium, to the settlement of the Spanish and Portuguese questions, to the European resistance to the designs of Mehemet Ali, which brought him into so much odium in France. Having retired from office with the rest of his colleagues in 1841, he returned with them, and again became Foreign Secretary in 1846. Palmerston's unsympathetic attitude towards the European revola-

tions of 1848, and the quarrel with Greece about the Don Pacifico affair, caused his foreign policy to be called in question; a vote of censure was passed upon it in the House of Lords, but in the House of Commons an amendment, moved by Mr. Roebuck in favour of the government, was carried by a majority of forty-six, Palmerston making a magnificent speech on the status of British subjects abroad. In 1852 he was dismissed from office by the Queen, acting on the advice of Lord John Russell, for expressing, entirely on his own responsibility, the government's approval of Louis Napoleon's coup d'état. In spite of Mr. Disraeli's saying, "There was a Palmerston," he promptly defeated his late leader on the Militia Bill, and having declined office in Lord Derby's stillborn ministry, became Home Secretary in Lord Aberdeen's Coalition cabinet (Dec., 1852). In that capacity he inaugurated the ticket-of-leave system, but he was chiefly employed the while in watching the Eastern question, and urging his colleagues forward to the war with Russia. On the fall of the Aberdeen administration before Mr. Roebuck's vigorous attack, it was felt that he was, as he said, l'inevitable, and in Feb., 1855, he became Prime Minister. After the peace a period of languor followed until in 1857, the government was defeated on Mr. Cobden's motion condemning the measures taken in "the lorcha Arrow" affair, when Lord Palmerston appealed to the country, and came back again to power with a larger majority than before. The Indian Mutiny was followed by his bill for the transference of the authority of the East Indian Company to the crown. In February, 1858, he was most unexpectedly defeated over the Conspiracy Bill, caused by Orsini's attempt on the life of Napoleon III., but the Conservative administration that supplanted him proved short-lived, and in 1859 he came into power again as First Lord of the Treasury, and continued to hold that office until his death. During his administration the treaty of commerce with France was concluded (1860) through Mr. Cobden's exertions. He was on the side of the North during the American Civil War; in the Trent and Alabama affairs he displayed some want of wisdom. Then came the Maori War; the Polish insurrection of 1863, during which his distrust of the Emperor of the French compelled him to discontinue the idea of intervention; and the Schleswig-Holstein question, during which he uttered words that were universally interpreted to imply that England would intervene on behalf of Denmark. Lord Palmerston's last great speech was in reply to Mr. Disraeli's attack on the conduct of the government, and it saved him by a majority of eighteen. His death was rather sudden. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, Oct. 27, 1865. Lord Palmerston was essentially a European rather than an English statesman; he has been charged with understanding little, and caring still less, about the great movements of the time at home. On the Continent he made it his first business to uphold the interests of his country, and that fact, combined with his genial good-humour, was perhaps the cause of the great popularity which he enjoyed to the end of his career.

The best life of Lord Palmerston is that of Lord Dalling, the last volume of which is edited by the Hon. Evelyn Ashley, M.P.

Pandulf, CARDINAL (d. 1226), one of Innocent III.'s ministers, was sent to England in 1213 to make terms with King John. For a little while the king held out, but finding himself deserted by everyone, he consented to Pandulf's terms, and resigned his kingdom to the Pope, receiving it back as a fief of the holy see. Shortly after this Pandulf left England and did not return till 1218, when he was appointed legate in the place of Gualo. He held this office for three years, during which time he brought a considerable odium on himself by his alliance with Peter des Roches against the English members of the Council. Still we find him lending valuable assistance to the cause of order by repressing the turbulence of the barons. In 1218 he was appointed Bishop of Norwich. Stephen Langton strongly opposed Pandulf's pretensions, and in 1221 procured the recall of his commission as legate, together with a promise from the Pope that during his (Langton's) lifetime no legate should be appointed. Pandulf retired to his diocese of Norwich, where he died.

Papacy, RELATIONS WITH. The conversion of the south of England by the Roman monk Augustine, who was sent by Pope Gregory I., established a close connection between the Church in England and the Papacy. Gregory I. drew up a scheme for the ecclesiastical organisation of England according to the lines of the provincial organisation of the Roman Empire. There were to be two ecclesiastical provinces—one in the south, and one in the north—and each of the metropolitans was to have twelve suffragan bishops under him. This scheme was never entirely realised. The north of England was converted by Celtic missionaries; but the superior organisation of the Roman Church made it more attractive to many minds. The Northumbrian Wilfrid visited Rome, and returned a staunch adherent to the Roman system. The struggle between the Roman and Celtic Churches disturbed Northumbria, till the Synod of Whitby (664), chiefly owing to Wilfrid's influence, decided in favour of Rome. This decision brought England within the circle of Western civilisation, and made possible her political union. Soon afterwards the death of an Archbishop of Canterbury at the papal court gave Pope Vitalian an opportunity of nominating Theodore of Tarsus as his successor. It is a striking instance of the cosmopolitan influence of the Roman system that an Eastern monk should rule the English Church. Archbishop Theodore had a rare gift for organisation. He established the framework of the ecclesiastical system pretty much as it remains at present. He made the Church in England strong in religion and learning. England became a centre of missionary activity. In the eighth century English missionaries spread Christianity along the Rhine, and paid back England's debt of gratitude to the papacy by bringing the Frankish Church into closer connection with the holy see. In 787 a sign of England's relationship to Rome was given by Offa, King of Mercia, who, to obtain the Pope's consent to the establishment of a Mercian archbishopric at Lichfield, granted a tribute to the Pope. This payment of a penny from every hearth passed on under the name of Peter's pence, and in later days the traditional sum of £201 9s. was paid for the whole kingdom. Though the papacy was regarded with great respect, its interference was rarely invited in the affairs of the English Church. In the tenth century Dunstan made the intercourse with Rome closer, and the archbishops from that time went to Rome for their pall.

On the whole, it may be said that in Anglo-Saxon times the Church in England was decidedly national, and worked harmoniously with the State. Few matters were referred to the Pope's decision. Even Dunstan rejected a papal sentence, and legates were rarely seen in England. But the events preceding the Norman Conquest tended to bring the papacy into closer relations with English politics. Under Edward the Confessor, a Norman favourite, Robert of Jumièges, was made Archbishop of Canterbury. On Godwin's return from exile, Archbishop Robert fled amongst the other Normans. His place was filled up by the election of Stigand, which Pope Leo IX. refused to recognise, as being uncanonical. Pope Alexander II. favoured the expedition of Duke William of Normandy, and sent him a consecrated banner. The papal approbation lent the Norman Conquest somewhat the appearance of a crusade, and three papal legates were sent afterwards to reform the English Church. Many bishops were deposed, and Norman successors were given to their sees. But neither William I. nor Archbishop Lanfranc were men who were willing to surrender any of the rights of their position. The great Pope Gregory VII. sent to demand arrears of Peter's pence, which he considered as a feudal due, and claimed also the performance of homage. William I. answered that he would pay the arrears; as to the homage, he had never promised it, his predecessors had never performed it, and he knew not on what grounds it was claimed. Moreover, William I. reduced to shape the claims of the crown in ecclesiastical matters. He set forth three points: (1) That no Pope should be acknowledged in his realm save after his consent. The reason for this was the frequency of disputed elections to the papacy, and conflicting claims between rivals. (2) No decision of national or provincial synods were to be binding without his consent. (3) No vassal of the crown was to be excommunicated till he had been informed of the offence.

The strong position assumed by William I. was used by William II. as a means of tyranny and extortion. Ecclesiastical fiefs were treated like lay fiefs; bishoprics were kept vacant, and their revenues were seized by the crown. The reign of William II. shows the need which there was for a power like that claimed by Gregory VII. to protect the Church from feudal exactions. A schism, however, weakened the papacy. Archbishop Anselm was attacked by William II. because he wished to receive the pall from Urban II., whom the king had not yet acknowledged as Pope. Finally the pall was sent to England, and was taken by Anselm from the high altar at Canterbury. But Anselm could not stand against the persecution of William II., and fled to the Continent, where the papacy was still powerless to help him. On Henry I.'s accession he returned; but he had learned in his exile the most advanced principles of the Hildebrandine policy, and on his return he raised an objection to the investiture of spiritual persons by a layman. This was practically to assert the entire freedom of the Church from the State. Henry I. would not yield, and Anselm again went into exile. But the king needed the archbishop's help, and in 1107 Pope Paschal II. agreed to a compromise, which ten years afterwards was extended universally. The crown was to receive homage for the temporalities attached to an ecclesiastical office, while the spiritual emblems, the ring and crosier, were to be conferred by spiritual persons. Soon after this, Henry I. used the mediation of Pope Calixtus II. to compose his differences with the French king. Another subject of dispute arose about the presence of papal legates in England. The Pope, as universal visitor of the Church, sent legati a latere for special purposes. The English clergy maintained that the Archbishop of Canterbury was permanent representative of the Pope (legatus natus) in England, and could not be superseded. Henry I. did not fight this question. In 1125 a papal legate, John of Crema, presided at an important council in London; but the protest against legates was not in vain.

Henry II. procured from the one English Pope, Hadrian IV., a bull conferring on him the sovereignty of Ireland, which was granted on the ground that by the donation of Constantine all islands were vested in the Roman see. But he made no use of this grant till the murder of Archbishop Thomas Becket made it desirable for him to show some zeal in the Pope's service. During the quarrel between Henry II. and Becket, the papacy was not strong enough to interfere with effect. Even after Becket's murder Alexander III. received Henry II.'s excuses, and did not join his enemies. Henry II.'s invasion of Ireland was followed by the Synod of Cashel, in which the Irish Church was reformed in accordance with the Pope's wishes.

X The reign of John marks the farthest advance of the papal power in English affairs. Under Innocent III. the papacy reached its highest point, and John's brutal character was no match for the Pope. A disputed election to the see of Canterbury led to an appeal to Rome. There was enough informality to justify Innocent III. in setting aside both the claimants; but he went further, caused a new election to be held in Rome, and nominated Stephen Langton to the suffrages of the monks. John refused to admit Langton, and Innocent III. laid his kingdom under an interdict. John confiscated the goods of the clergy: Pope Innocent III. proceeded to excommunicate, and finally to depose, the king. John's tyranny had alienated his subjects, and the French king was ready to execute the papal sentence. In despair John made abject submission, granted his kingdom to the Pope, and received it back as a fief, by the annual rent of 1,000 marks. As John debased himself the spirit of the English barons rose. Aided by Archbishop Langton they demanded a charter of liberties. Innocent III., to his disgrace, took the side of his vassal, and the Great Charter was a victory won by a united people against the king and the Pope alike. Innocent III. annulled the charter, but died as the struggle was about to commence. John's death quickly followed, and the minority of Henry III. gave time for reflection. The young king was crowned by the legate Gualo, and for a time there was an attempt on the part of the papacy to set up a legatine government in England. Archbishop Langton, by earnest remonstrances, procured the withdrawal of legates, and the confirmation by the Pope of the legatine power of the Archbishop of Canterbury. For two centuries there was no further attempt to interfere by legates in English affairs.

The papacy was soon involved in a desperate struggle against the imperial house of Hohenstaufen, for which it needed large supplies. England was exposed to increasing exactions, and the feeble character of Henry III. made him a willing tool in the hands of the resolute Popes Gregory IX. and Innocent IV. The Pope taxed the English clergy to the extent of a twentieth or a tenth of their annual incomes. They protested at the Council of Lyons (1245), but their remonstrances were not supported by the king. Moreover, the Pope used recklessly his prerogative of provisions, or nominations to vacant benefices, suspending the rights of the patrons. It was said that the incomes thus drawn from England by foreign and non-resident ecclesiastics amounted to 50,000 marks. An association was formed, headed by a knight, Sir Robert Twinge, which took the law into its own hands, harried the papal collectors, and drove them from the kingdom. Innocent IV. offered Henry III. the kingdom of the Two Sicilies for his second son Edmund, and Henry III. did his best to induce England to pay the expenses of the war necessary to gain possession of this disputed heritage. The laity refused to pay; but the clergy suffered from every device which the papal ingenuity could frame. Hence clerical discontent was a strong element in the Barons' War, and the nation generally looked upon the Pope as a foreign intruder.

The great King Edward I. had to face a resolute Pope in Boniface VIII., who aimed at making the papacy the centre of the international relations of Europe. By the bull Clericis laicos, Boniface VIII. forbade the taxing of the clergy except by his consent. The Convocation in 1297 pleaded the Pope's prohibition against a heavy demand for money made by the king. Edward I. replied by outlawing those who refused to pay, and the clergy were driven to make composition with the royal officers. Soon afterwards, however, Edward I. was glad to employ Boniface VIII. as arbitrator in an untimely difference between himself and the French king. Boniface VIII., wishing to extend his influence, encouraged the Scots to appeal to him as judge between them and Edward I. Edward, to avoid a personal quarrel with the Pope, laid his letter before Parliament at Lincoln in 1301. The barons replied that the Kings of England had never pleaded, nor been bound to plead, concerning their temporal rights before any judge, ecclesiastical or secular; their subjects would not permit them to do so. Boniface VIII. was engaged in a contest with the French king, which ended in his defeat, and led to the establishment of the papacy at Avignon. The feeble Edward II. was ready to use Pope John XXII. as the means of procuring a truce with Scotland; but the fortunes of war had changed after Bannockburn, and it was now the turn of the Scots to refuse the papal mediation.

The French war under Edward III. increased the English resistance to papal exactions, which under the Avignonnese Popes grew heavier and heavier. The Popes at Avignon were on the French side, and England would not see her money carried to her foes. In 1343 the agents of two cardinals who held preferment in England were driven from the land. In 1351 was passed the Statute of Provisors, which enacted that if the Pope appointed to a benefice, the presentation for that time was to fall to the king, and the papal nominees were liable to imprisonment till they had renounced their claims. To avoid the conflict of jurisdiction between the royal courts and the papal courts, the Statute of Præmunire in 1353 forbade the withdrawal of suits from the king's court to any foreign court. In 1366 Pope Urban V. demanded arrears for the last thirty-three years of the tribute of 1,000 marks which John had agreed to pay to the papacy. The prelates were foremost in giving their opinion that John had no power to bind the nation to another power without its consent. Lords and Commons together resolved that they would resist to the utmost the Pope's claim. Urban V. withdrew in silence, and the papal suzerainty over England was never again revived.

✕ The spirit of resistance to the papacy was expressed in the teaching of Wyclif, who began his career as an ardent supporter of the English Church against the Pope. When he passed into the region of doctrine, Pope Gregory XI. issued bulls ordering his trial; but Wyclif was not personally condemned. The great schism in the papacy led to an increase in papal expenditure and papal exactions, especially under Boniface IX. But the spirit of England and the Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire were strong enough to offer determined resistance. In 1391 Boniface IX. annulled the statutes by a bull, and proceeded to issue provisions which the English courts refused to recognise. Parliament at the same time asserted that they would not recognise the Pope's power of excommunication if it were directed against any who were simply upholding the rights of the crown. At the same time a more stringent statute against provisors was passed. The schism in the papacy greatly diminished the papal power, and led to many efforts to heal it. Ultimately, in the Council of Constance the rival popes were deposed or resigned, and in the vacancy of the papal office there was an opportunity for reforming abuses in the ecclesiastical system. The Emperor Sigismund was desirous of reform, and at first Henry V. of England promised his aid. But the difficulties of harmonious working in the council were so great that Henry V. deserted Sigismund, and joined those who thought that a new election to the papacy was a necessary prelude to reform. Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, the king's uncle, was called to Constance, to mediate between contending parties. By his good offices arrangements were made for the election which ended in the choice of Martin V. (1418). Martin V. showed his gratitude by raising Henry Beaufort to the dignity of cardinal. It shows the weakness of the government under Henry VI., that Beaufort was allowed to hold this dignity together with his bishopric. Up to this time English bishops had been compelled to resign their sees on accepting the cardinalate. Moreover, Beaufort was nominated papal legate against the Hussites. He raised troops in England, and led an expedition. Archbishop Chicheley was weak and timid. Martin V. ordered him to procure the repeal of the Statute of Præmunire, and when he pleaded his inability, suspended him from his office as legate. In 1428 Chicheley was driven to beg the Commons to repeal the Statute of Præmunire; but weak as was the government, the Commons refused. Martin V. humiliated the English episcopate, but gained nothing for himself.

The next relations of the papacy with England are purely political, arising from the Pope's position in the politics of Italy. In 1489 Henry VII. of England joined the League which was formed by Pope Alexander VI., against the French, in consequence of Charles VIII.'s invasion of Italy. Similarly in 1512, Henry VIII. joined the Holy League which Julius II. formed against France. Julius II. promised to transfer to him the title of "most Christian King," which had hitherto belonged to the French monarch. The transfer was not made, but a few years later Henry VIII. was satisfied with the title of "Defender of the Faith," granted to him by Leo X. in return for a treatise against Martin Luther. Henry VIII.'s great minister, Wolsey, became a cardinal, aspired to the papacy, and entertained projects for a reform of the Church. But Henry VIII.'s desire for a divorce from his wife, Catherine of Aragon, led to a collision with the papacy. Henry demanded that the Pope should annul, or declare to be invalid from the first, the dispensation by virtue of which he had married his brother's widow. Clement VII. temporised, and even endeavoured to procure Catherine's consent. He committed the cause to Wolsey and Campeggio as legates, and then revoked it to his own court. Henry VIII. had gone too far to recede. Wolsey was declared liable to the penalties of Præmunire for having exercised the authority of legate. The clergy were by a legal quibble involved in the same penalty, and only escaped by admitting the royal supremacy. Henry VIII. hoped to intimidate the Pope; but Clement VII. dared not give way. In 1533 the royal supremacy was established by Act of Parliament, and all direct relations with the Court of Rome were suspended. In 1537 Pole was made legate north of the Alps, with a view to influence English affairs; but Henry VIII. proclaimed him a traitor, and Pole was obliged to return from Flanders. Under Mary, in 1554, Pole was received as papal legate in England, and all Acts of Parliament against the Pope's jurisdiction were repealed. Pope Paul IV. was injudicious enough to urge upon Mary and Pole the impossible work of restoring the possessions of the Church. On Mary's death he showed such an implacable spirit towards Elizabeth that she felt that Anne Boleyn's daughter could not be reconciled to the Roman Church. In 1559 the royal supremacy was restored, and there was never again a question of its abolition. England drifted further and further from the papacy, and in 1571 Pius V. excommunicated Elizabeth.

The marriage of Charles I. to Henrietta Maria renewed to some degree diplomatic intercourse with the Pope. Papal messengers were sent to England, and the queen had a representative at Rome. Charles I. wished to confirm his claims to the allegiance of his Catholic subjects; and his proceedings were viewed by the Puritans with growing displeasure. The talk of union between the Church of England and the Church of Rome was one cause of popular discontent. Under Charles II. and James II. these relations were again renewed, with the result of accentuating more clearly the Protestantism of England by the Act of 1701, which secured the Protestant Succession. From this period relations with the papacy became regulated by the ordinary exigencies of diplomacy. During the Napoleonic war, England took the part of Pius VII., and restored to him the Papal States, of which he had been violently dispossessed. The last act of hostility towards the papacy was the Ecclesiastical Titles Act of 1851, which regarded as papal aggression the appointment of Roman Catholic bishops with territorial designations.

Papineau, M., was a leader of the French Canadian party of Lower Canada, and one of the chief movers of the petitions to the home government, setting forth the grievances of the National party. He was a man of great ability, and having been elected a member for the city of Montreal in 1820, became in a very short time Speaker of the assembly. On the outbreak of the riots in 1836, the government attempted to arrest Papineau for his democratic utterances, but failed, though they succeeded in compelling him to leave the country.

Paris, MATTHEW (d. circa 1259), was a Benedictine monk of the abbey of St. Albans. He was sent to Norway as visitor of the Benedictine order by the Pope in 1248, and probably employed in other important diplomatic and ecclesiastical missions. He was a man of great accomplishments, and was a mathematician, poet, and theologian. He is specially notable as an historian. He wrote a work called Chronica Majora, which is a continuation of the History of Roger of Wendover from the year 1235. He also wrote Historia Minor, which extends from 1067 to 1253, and the Lives of the Abbots of St. Albans. He is supposed also to have written the abridgment of the Historia Major called Flores Historiarum, and attributed to Matthew of Westminster. Matthew Paris is the greatest of our mediæval chroniclers, and almost the only one deserving the name of historian. He seems to have been on intimate terms with Henry III. and the chief men of his day, and to have made good use of his opportunities. His works, from their fulness, their evident signs of accurate information, and their plain-spoken candour, are by far the most important authorities for the first half of the thirteenth century; while in point of style, and in the acuteness of their observations and reflections, they are very greatly superior to most of the mediæval annals.

An edition of the Hist. Minor is published in the Rolls Series. The Chronica Majora were first printed in 1571. There is a translation in Bohn's Antiquarian Library.

Paris, THE DECLARATION OF, 1856. At the Congress of Paris, 1856, four important points of international law were agreed to by the representatives of the powers:—(1) Privateering is and remains abolished. (2) The neutral flag covers even enemies' goods, with the exception of contraband of war. (3) Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under an enemy's flag. (4) Blockades in order to be binding must be effective: that is to say, maintained by a force really sufficient to prevent access to the enemy's coast. The concurrence of the government of the United States of America was sought for these resolutions. It was refused to the first, but given to the rest. This refusal was due to the objections raised by the European powers to the American proposition that for the future all private property should be exempted from capture by ships of war. Spain and Mexico also declined to accede to the four articles.

—, THE TREATY OF (Feb., 1763), brought to an end the Seven Years' War between France and England. Separate negotiations had been opened in March, 1761, but had been broken off by Pitt on learning of the Family Compact between France and Spain. Upon this discovery, Pitt resolved on war with Spain, and laid energetic plans for carrying on that war before the Council. Temple alone supported him; and finding that he could not lead, he resigned in October. In November the treaty was concluded by the Duke of Bedford, English ambassador at Paris. As to Spain, each nation was to observe the same limits as before the war began, Spain conceding all the points on which she had based her declaration of war. Between France and England both nations agreed to take no further part in the war in Germany; and the French were to restore all territories held by them in Hesse and Hanover. Minorca was to be given by them in exchange for Belleisle. America passed wholly to England; but the French were to retain their rights of fishing off Newfoundland. In the West Indies, England retained Tobago, Dominica, St. Vincent, and Grenada; but restored Guadaloupe, Martinique and St. Lucia. In Africa France gave up Senegal, but recovered Goree. In India, she agreed to have no military establishment; and on this condition the French were allowed to resume the factories which they had held before the war. Before the peace was finally concluded, news came of the capture of Havannah; and the English cabinet insisted on some equivalent being given, if England was to cede this, her most recent conquest. Florida was accordingly given up by France.

—, THE TREATY OF (May, 1814), was concluded by the allies soon after the abdication of Napoleon, and his despatch to Elba. Its terms were very moderate, when considered by the side of the terrible havoc inflicted on the Continent during nearly twenty years by the French armies. The frontier of 1790 was to be generally restored; but on the north, and towards the Rhine, it was to be advanced, so as to include several strong fortresses, while towards the Alps a considerable part of Savoy was included within the French border. England and Austria refused to make France pay any contribution towards the expenses incurred by the war. The only real advantage gained by England was the surrender of the Isle of France, in order to secure the route to India, while it retained Malta for the same object.

—, THE TREATY OF (Nov. 20, 1815), was concluded on the close of Napoleon's final campaign in Flanders. It rigorously insisted on confining France to its old boundary of 1790, and deprived it of the additions, which the treaty of the previous year had allowed to it. A large contribution towards the war expenses was levied upon it, to the amount of 700,000,000 francs, which was all to be paid in five years. As a security for the payment of this large indemnity, and for the future tranquillity of the country, it was stipulated that the northern fortresses should be held for five years by the troops of the allies.

—, THE TREATY OF (Feb., 1856), came at the close of the Crimean War. In the beginning of the year 1856 the plenipotentiaries of the great powers assembled at Paris. Four articles were brought forward as the basis of a peace. They were eventually accepted in a slightly amended form by the Czar. The first redressed the Moldavian frontier, so as to render it more easily defensible against Russian invasion. The second took from Russia all control over the mouths of the Danube, appointing first a commission of the great powers to arrange preliminaries, and secondly a permanent commission from Austria, Turkey, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, and the three Danubian provinces to draw up rules, establish a police, and superintend navigation. The third proposed that no fleet, and no naval station of any country, should be permitted in the Black Sea, but that Russia and Turkey should be empowered to make a convention to keep up a small light-armed force for police and coast service; on the other hand merchant ships of all classes were to be allowed freely to enter it.

Hertlet, Map of Europe by Treaty.

—, THE TREATY OF (March 3, 1857), was concluded between England on the one hand and Persia on the other. By it Persia renounced all claim or dominion over Herat and Afghanistan, and engaged to refer any future differences she might have with the Afghan States to the friendly offices of the British government. The slave trade in the Persian Gulf was also by this treaty abolished.

Parish is derived from the Greek παροικία, and means primarily the district assigned to a particular church. In early times the bishoprics were small and the spiritual care of each town or district was in the hands of the bishop, but with the spread of Christianity and the development of the importance of the episcopate, it became usual to assign special districts within the diocese to the care of a single presbyter under the bishop's supervision. By the ninth or tenth century at latest this parochial system became universal, but it had been gradually growing up long before that time. In England the original missionaries were monks, who were organised together by their dependence on the bishop, but it soon became an evidence of piety for the lord of a district to build and endow a church on it, in return for which he seems to have acquired the right of nominating the minister, who gradually obtained the disposal of the tithes, which originally had been administered by the bishop. Archbishop Theodore of Tarsus gave the first impulse towards the development of the parochial system in England, and Bede urged strongly on Archbishop Egbert the importance of the work. Ultimately the whole of England, with insignificant exceptions, was divided into parishes, which were usually, though not necessarily, coterminous with the township or manor, though in many cases the township was too small to require a priest and church of its own, so that some parishes contain several townships, and sometimes the boundaries of parishes and townships even overlap. Still, as a whole, the parish became little more than the township in its ecclesiastical aspect, and as the old English local system became obsolete, the parish encroached, so to say, upon the township. In modern times the parish suggests civil quite as much as ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The parish has become for many purposes the unit of local government, of highway management, of rating, of poor relief, as much as the district under the jurisdiction of the rector or vicar. The parish vestry, originally an ecclesiastical assembly of all the inhabitants, has become a civil court that has acquired some of the slender functions of the townshipmoot. The churchwardens and overseers, its officers, have become in a sense civil as well as ecclesiastical officers. One of the churchwardens is elected by the ratepayers in the Easter vestry meeting.

Besides civil parishes, as old parishes are called, the Church Building Act of 1818 permitted the establishment of new ecclesiastical parishes or districts, which, independent in ecclesiastical matters, remained for civil purposes part of the mother parish.

Parisi, THE, were an ancient Celtic tribe occupying the south-eastern portion of the present county of York.

Parker, MATTHEW (b. 1504, d. 1575), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Norwich and educated at Cambridge, where he attained great celebrity as a scholar and a theologian. He became famous as a preacher, and was appointed Chaplain to Henry VIII., and in 1552 Dean of Lincoln, but having distinguished himself by his zealous advocacy of the Reformation, narrowly escaped martyrdom during the Marian persecution. His sound judgment caused him to be singled out by Elizabeth on her accession for the primacy, which he accepted much against his will, being consecrated at Lambeth by Barlow, Bishop of Chichester; Hodgkins, suffragan Bishop of Bedford; Miles Coverdale, late Bishop of Exeter; and John Scory, Bishop of Hereford (Dec. 17, 1559). From this time the history of Archbishop Parker is that of the Church of England. On several occasions the archbishop found himself brought into collision with Elizabeth, especially on the subject of the marriage of the clergy, which he favoured. He took an important part in the translation of the Bishop's Bible (1563—68), and in his revision of the Thirty-nine Articles showed much good sense. Parker was the author of the famous Advertisements of Queen Elizabeth, which formed a book of discipline for the clergy, and the enforcement of which has earned for their author the obloquy of the Puritanical party and the reproach of having been a persecutor. In 1575 the archbishop died, having during the whole tenure of his office followed the consistent policy of maintaining ecclesiastical affairs as they had been left by Edward VI. In theology he was Calvinistic, but in matters of ecclesiastical government he was altogether opposed both to the Catholics and the Puritans, and anxious, with due prudence and circumspection, to obtain uniformity in the English Church. Parker was a student of English antiquities and early history. He wrote a work, De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ (1572), and edited Matthew Paris in 1571.

Parker, SAMUEL (b. 1640, d. 1688), Bishop of Oxford, was the son of one of the Barons of the Exchequer. At the Restoration he forsook the Puritan party, to which he had belonged, and made himself conspicuous by his bitter attacks on them. He was consecrated Bishop of Oxford in 1685, and next year was forcibly intruded into the office of President of Magdalen College. He died shortly after this, leaving the reputation of a voluminous and acute writer, and a dishonest man. He left an historical work, De Rebus sui Temporis, published in 1726.

Parker, SIR HYDE (b. 1739, d. 1807), entered the navy at an early age, and was made a post-captain in 1763. He distinguished himself during the American War, and captured Savannah in 1778. He took part in the relief of Gibraltar in 1782, and the operations before Toulon in 1799. In 1801 he was appointed to the chief command of the expedition to Copenhagen, with Nelson as his second. The actual command of the fleet which was in action at the battle of Copenhagen was taken by the latter.

Parkhurst, JOHN (b. 1511, d. 1574), Bishop of Norwich, the tutor of Bishop Jewel, was one of the most earnest of the Reformers of Edward VI.'s reign, and was in consequence obliged to take refuge at Zurich during the Marian persecution. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England and became Bishop of Norwich. Bishop Parkhurst was a supporter of the Nonconformists, and a vehement opposer of persecution.

Parkyns, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1696), was a lawyer and a Jacobite conspirator, chiefly notorious from his share in the Assassination Plot. He had been one of the most violent opponents of the Exclusion Bill, and had supported James II. to the last. After the Revolution, however, he swore allegiance to

William. He did not take a very active share in the Assassination Plot (1696), owing to the infirmities of age. His chief duty was to provide arms for the conspirators. Large quantities were seized at his house on the detection of the plot. He was tried and condemned to death (March 24). A committee of the Commons went to interrogate him at Newgate, but he refused to betray his accomplices. He died, "not only without a word indicating remorse, but with something which resembled exultation."

Parliament. The fundamental notion that has always upheld the office and action of Parliament in the constitution, and has been professedly the guiding principle of all dealings with it on the part of the crown, is that it is the realm of England in little, embracing in its conception all the separate parts, which united make the conception of the great English nation. Every capacity, every political virtue inherent in the whole nation, is inherent in it. The history of the institution, taken apart from its origin, begins with Nov. 27, 1295. On that day the first assembly, whose parliamentary character is uncontested, met at Westminster; but the word Parliament—which translates colloquium, means a talking, and came to us from Italy—had been already in frequent use; it was given, for instance, to the peculiarly constituted meetings that the Provisions of Oxford determined should be held three times a year. Its earliest recorded application to a national assembly is found under the year 1246, and even after 1295 mere councils were now and then called by the name. Parliament, in the words of Bishop Stubbs, is "the concentration of all the constituents of the shiremoots in a central assembly. They contained in their ultimate form the great folk, clerical and lay, the freeholders, and representatives of the townships and municipalities of the several shires. Parliament contains practically the same component parts of the nation, and the kinship of the humbler with the grander institution is seen in the employment for centuries of the sheriffs and county courts in Parliamentary elections. Through the sheriffs the whole electoral machinery was set in motion: at the county courts the elections of knights of the shire was made, and to them those of citizens and burgesses were reported. The county court, too, had long been the chief depository of the principle of representation: when the need arose its merit as a model for the great representative body could hardly be missed. But the historic Parliament is something more than the express essence of all the county courts in the kingdom; it is an assembly that is an image of the people, not as an undivided whole, but as split up into separate interests. It is "not only a concentration of machinery, but an assembly of estates." The clergy, the baronage, and the commons had all to be in it, united yet distinct, to make it a full Parliament. Now the higher clergy and the baronage had always been in the national council; the lower clergy and the commons had only to be added, and the work would be done. The process of adding those took some time, and but for the strong motive that kept driving on the king to its accomplishment, might have taken much longer. Personal property or "movables" had become subject to taxation; the methods of getting the necessary consents, expressed or constructive, which the pre-Parliamentary regime obliged the king to resort to, were complicated and tedious, and the need of a simple and swifter method was strongly felt. Accordingly we find several assemblies before 1295 which contained one or more of the Parliamentary elements that were still wanting, but which still lacked something to make them perfect. In 1213 two such were summoned, one with chosen men of the towns in it, to St. Albans; the other, with chosen men of the shires in it, to Oxford. In 1254 the sheriffs were directed to see that their several shires returned two knights each to settle what aid they were willing to give the king. During the years that follow similar instances are found; but in none were citizens and burgesses combined with knights of the shire till the meeting in Jan., 1265, of the renowned Parliament called at the instance of Simon de Montfort. This contained 117 dignified churchmen, 23 lay nobles, two men summoned from each shire through the sheriff, and two men summoned from each city and borough, but not through the sheriff. This, however, "was not primarily and essentially a constitutional assembly. It was not a general convention of the tenants-in-chief, or of the three estates, but a Parliamentary assembly of the supporters of the existing government." Consequently Bishop Stubbs refuses to see in it the first Parliament of the modern type. During the next thirty years there was no lack of assemblies that got the name of Parliaments, in which the commonality is recorded to have been present. Under 1282 we read even of provincial Parliaments, one at York and one at Northampton, both representative of the lower clergy and lay commons—which, however, sat apart from each other—but without the lay nobility. A general tax was their object, in which fact we have a proof of the close connection between taxation and the birth of representative government. A Parliamentary gathering at Acton Burnell in 1283 is a good example of those unfinished Parliaments. It contained no clergy, and representatives of only twenty-one cities and boroughs; and its business was to see David of Wales tried for his life. Others, equally imperfect, succeed. At last the troubles that crowded in upon Edward I. in 1295 persuaded him to throw himself upon his whole people. In October he issued writs for an assembly, which should be a complete image of the nation. On Nov. 27 this assembly met, and in it historians discern all the component parts and type of a finished Parliament. It was composed of 97 bishops, abbots and priors, 65 earls and barons, 39 judges and others, representatives of the lower clergy, summoned through their dioceses, and representatives of the counties, cities, and boroughs summoned through the sheriff. Every section of the population that had political rights was in it, in person or by proxy.

This fully developed Parliament did not at once fall into the exercise of all the powers belonging to the body of which it was the expansion. One of them, indeed, the judicial, it has taken care never to assume. Taxation was at first the sole business that all its parts had in common, but time and circumstance soon brought rights and privileges. By slow degrees legislation and general political deliberations came to be classed among its powers. All its parts, however, did not advance towards these with equal speed; those which have since far outstripped the others moved but timidly at first. For a time, also, the several parts held aloof from one another, and even when the pairing process began, the tendency was towards the combination of the barons and knights of the shire into one body, the citizens and burgesses into another, while the clergy made a third. But this did not go far; within little more than a generation the clerical and lay baronages had coalesced into the joint estate of the lords spiritual and temporal, and all the lay representatives into the estate of the commons; and within little more than fifty years the lower clergy, preferring to tax themselves in Convocation, had fallen away altogether. From this time Parliament grew steadily in importance, and in a few generations was firmly rooted in the constitution. It had become indispensable to the legal transaction of the greater affairs of state. During mediæval times it was, except at rare and brief intervals, convoked often and regularly, and not seldom to provincial towns; its influence was felt in every department of government; it occasionally curbed the king of his will; its members had become privileged, and a system of rules—a whole code of laws, in fact—had grown up to guide its conduct and prescribe its procedure. From the time of Edward III. it is undoubted that no tax could be levied, and (in secular matters at least) no law be made that had not originated in and been sanctioned by Parliament. Throughout the Tudor period it kept all its powers unimpaired, though in exercising them it was moved by special causes to submit for a time to the dictation of the crown. In Elizabeth's days it began to recover its independence, and under the early Stuarts it entered upon a course of action which developed into a struggle for supremacy in the state. This it pursued so doggedly that it measured its strength with the crown and overthrew it, but only to be itself overthrown by one of its own soldiers. Restored with the monarchy, it again drifted into a less violent conflict with its former antagonist, in which it was less disastrously successful, for at the Revolution it secured its supremacy, and it has since become the one all-important political power, whose will must be obeyed in everything, and throughout the empire.

Round such an assembly there is sure to grow a formidable fence of privilege. The powers and exemptions, known as Privilege of Parliament, which both Houses enjoy in common, are of two kinds—those that belong to the Houses in their corporate capacity, and those that belong to individual members. Of the former the most vital are freedom of speech, liberty of access to the presence of the sovereign, that the sovereign should not notice anything said or done in Parliament, save on the report of the House, the power of committing for contempt, and an exclusive jurisdiction in disputed claims to seats. The first and second of these are of very early date, and are still formally granted by the crown at the beginning of every Parliament. The third was of slower growth, having been often violated by Charles I. The fourth, called "the keystone of parliamentary privilege," was won with difficulty, but has now long been exercised in all cases of breach of privilege, such as disobedience, slander of members, interference with the officers of Parliament, and such-like. The fifth was not secured, by the Lower House at least, till 1604. Of the latter class the most valuable is exemption of members from arrest when going to, attending, or returning from, Parliament, except on a charge of treason or felony, or a refusal to give surety of the peace. Once their privileges were far more extensive; they could not be impleaded in civil suits; their goods could not be distrained, and their servants enjoyed the same immunity from arrest as themselves. But legislation has taken these away, and generally removed the area of their personal privilege to the one immunity given above.

Parliamentary Trains Bill (1864).

This bill was introduced by Lord Derby. It proposed that in every railway leading to the metropolis, provision should be made for the accommodation of the working classes by cheap trains. This measure was accepted by the government, and was the first of a long series of similar measures.

Parry, Dr. William (d. 1685), was a Welshman "of considerable learning, but vicious and needy," who was employed by Burleigh to reside abroad, and to act as a spy on the English exiles. On his return home, he had frequent interviews with the queen, disclosing various designs on her life, which he appears to have contemplated taking himself on several occasions. In 1584, having violently opposed in Parliament the act against the Jesuits, he was expelled from the House, and imprisoned for a short time, but released by the queen's orders. He was shortly afterwards denounced by a fellow plotter and spy, named Edmund Neville, as having formed a scheme to assassinate the queen. Under torture he confessed that he had been urged to murder Elizabeth by Morgan and Cardinal Como, and that the intention was to place the Queen of Scots on the throne. He was executed for treason at Tyburn (March, 1585).

Aikin, Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth.

Parsons, ROBERT (b. 1546, d. 1610), "a subtle and lying Jesuit," was born in Somerset, and educated at Oxford, where he became a fellow of Balliol. Being compelled to quit England on a charge of embezzling the college money, Parsons went to Rome, and joined the Jesuits. In June, 1580, he visited England in company with Edmund Campian, and caused great alarm to the government; and a very severe statute against those who harboured or concealed Jesuits was passed by Parliament (Jan., 1581). So active was the search after the two missionaries, that Parsons was compelled to return to the Continent, barely escaping his pursuers. He then went to Scotland for the purpose of undermining the English influence there; and in 1582 met the Duke of Guise at Paris, where he arranged the plan of associating Mary and James in the government of Scotland, and went to Spain to procure assistance from Philip. His schemes were, however, frustrated by the prompt measures of Elizabeth's ministers, and by the Raid of Ruthven. After the destruction of the Spanish Armada, in 1588, Parsons constantly urged Philip to renew his attempts to invade England, and was continually forming schemes for the assassination of the queen, and for the succession of a Catholic sovereign. In 1594 he published, under the name of Doleman, his famous Conference about the Succession to the Crown of England, dedicated to Essex, in which he set forth the claims of the Infanta.

Partition Treaties were an attempt to settle from outside the complex question of the Spanish Succession on the death of the king, Charles II. (1) (Oct. 11, 1698). It was proposed to confer the greater part of the Spanish dominions on the least powerful of the candidates, the Electoral Prince of Bavaria. The first overtures were made by Louis XIV., and in consequence, Marshal Tallard was sent to London in April, and the first rough form of the division was broached. In August Louis, still hoping to secure the whole of the Spanish dominions for one of his grandsons, was inclined to break off the negotiations, but was dissuaded by Tallard. The departure of William for Holland, where it was feared that he might form a union with the emperor, the Elector of Bavaria, and the chief Protestant princes against France, caused Louis to wish for a definite settlement. By the Treaty of Loo, as it is sometimes called, signed by the representatives of England, France, and Holland, France consented to resign all claims on Spain, the Indies, and the Netherlands in favour of the electoral prince. The dauphin was to have the province of Guipuscoa, with Naples, Sicily, and some small Italian islands, which were part of the Spanish monarchy. The Milanese was allotted to the Archduke Charles. As the electoral prince was still a child, it was agreed that his father, who was then Viceroy of the Spanish Netherlands, should be Regent of Spain during the minority. Unfortunately, the electoral prince was carried off by small-pox (Feb., 1699), and no arrangement had been made for the case of his dying before succeeding to the throne. "Thus perished," says Ranke, "an arrangement which was in harmony with existing circumstances, and probably could have been carried out." (2) (Oct. 11, 1700), was another attempt to settle the Spanish Succession, again unsettled by the death of the Electoral Prince of Bavaria. This time, the Archduke Charles of Austria was to be king of the greater part of the Spanish dominions. France was to receive Guipuscoa, in the north of Spain, and the two Sicilies, together with Milan, which was to be exchanged for the Duchy of Lorraine. Spain, the Indies, and the Netherlands were to pass to the Archduke Charles. It was evident that Louis was insincere. Soon the Spanish minister, Portocarrero, and the French diplomatist, Harcourt, induced the dying King of Spain to make a new will declaring the Duke of Anjou, a son of the dauphin, heir to the whole of his dominions. The treaty was unpopular in England. In November the King of Spain died, and Louis, with complete disregard of treaties, accepted the Spanish inheritance for his grandson. The Tory House of Commons proceeded to impeach Portland, Oxford, Somers, and Montague for their share in the treaties; but this resentment proved abortive, although in March, 1701, both treaties were severely censured. "It was felt," says Ranke, "that the whole advantage arising from the late war was being lost by it. By getting South Italy and the Tuscan shores, France would be mistress of the Mediterranean and of the Levant trade; out of the Mediterranean ports no ship would be able to sail without her leave."

Passaro, THE BATTLE OF CAPE (Aug. 11, 1718), resulted in the destruction of the Spanish fleet. Alberoni, as a preliminary step towards the fulfilment of his designs against the power of Austria in Italy, made himself master of Sicily, a country which neither England nor France was pledged to support. At this crisis, Admiral Byng arrived in the Mediterranean. The Spaniards laid siege to the citadel of Messina on July 31. Byng embarked 2,000 German infantry at Naples, and proceeded to its relief. He proposed, however, to the Spanish commander a suspension of arms for two months. Perplexed by the non-arrival of instructions from his government, the Spanish admiral, Castañeta, neither accepted nor rejected the proposal, but put out to sea. Byng encountered him off Cape Passaro. The first shot was fired by some detached Spanish ships, and a general engagement ensued. "The Spaniards," says Lord Stanhope, "were without order and concert; and vessel after vessel, attacked in succession by a superior force, found even the highest courage, the most stubborn resistance, unavailing." Castañeta continued to cheer on his men, though wounded in both legs. The report to the English government was: "We have taken and destroyed all the Spanish ships which were upon the coast; the number as per margin."

Paston Letters, THE, are a series of letters written by and to the members of the family of Paston, of Norfolk, from 1424 to 1506. Besides the letters, which are from and to many of the most illustrious persons of the time, a considerable number of public documents of great importance are preserved in the Paston archives. The importance of this series of family documents cannot be overrated. Besides throwing much light on family affairs, they present a complete picture of English family life in the fifteenth century. A portion of them were published by Sir John Fenn in 1787, but by far the best edition is that of Mr. J. Gairdner, with critical and historical introductions of much value.

Patay, THE BATTLE OF (May 18, 1429), was fought after the raising of the siege of Orleans. The English army retired towards Beaugency, but this important town was captured by the French, and a pitched battle was fought at Patay, between Orleans and Brittany, in which the English were defeated with a loss of 2,000 men, and their general, Talbot, taken prisoner.

Patent Rolls, THE, contain accounts of all grants of offices, honours, and pensions, and particulars of individual and corporate privileges. The term patent was given to these rolls because they were delivered open, with the great seal affixed, and were supposed to be of a public nature and addressed to all the king's subjects. A Calendar to some of the Patent Rolls has been printed by the Record Commission.

Paulet, SIR AMYAS, after being for some time the English ambassador at Paris, was created Governor of Jersey, and in 1585, owing to his stern Puritanism, was chosen to guard the Queen of Scots at Tutbury. He was insensible alike to Mary's charms and to her endeavours to win him over to her side, declaring "that he would not be diverted from his duty by hope of gain, fear, or loss, or any private respect whatsoever." In spite of his sternness, Paulet seems to have treated the Scottish queen with respect and courtesy; and though the letter signed by Davison and Walsingham after the trial, requesting him to "find out some way to shorten her life," was undoubtedly sent, and that too on the authority of Elizabeth, he flatly refused to do what "God and the law forbade." He was subsequently a commissioner at Mary's trial, and was present at her execution. In 1588 he was sent as a commissioner to the Netherlands, in conjunction with Henry, Earl of Derby, and Sir James Crofts.

Paulinus was one of the missionaries who came to reinforce Augustine in 601, and on the marriage of Ethelburga, daughter of Edbald of Kent, to Edwin of Northumbria, he was selected to accompany the princess. Through his instrumentality, Edwin was brought to Christianity in 626, and with the assent of the Witenagemot the Christian religion was established in Northumbria, and Paulinus was made Bishop of York. In this new position he was energetic, and in the course of six years had traversed nearly the whole of Northumbria, preaching and baptizing. The death of Edwin in 633, and the ravages of Penda, compelled Paulinus to quit the kingdom and seek refuge in Canterbury. The see of Rochester being vacant, he was appointed to it, and held it until his death in 644.

Bede, Hist. Eccles.; Bright, Early Eng. Ch. Hist.

Peda, King of Mercia (655—656), was the son and successor of Penda. He was only allowed by Oswiu of Northumbria, his father-in-law, to hold the southern portion of Mercia. His reign is important as seeing the introduction of Christianity into Mercia, Peda himself having been converted during his father's lifetime. He is said to have been murdered by the treachery of his wife.

Peckham, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury (1279—1292), was Provincial of the Franciscans, and on the resignation of Kilwardby, was appointed to the archbishopric. As a friar, at a time when the friars had not lost their missionary spirit, Peckham looked upon himself as the agent of the Pope to England, and had little sympathy with the national feelings. The greater part of his pontificate was occupied in disputes with the king, with the Archbishop of York, or with the monks of Canterbury. Of his policy Dean Hook says: "It is clear that he was not on the patriotic or national side in politics, although the peaceful and prosperous state of the country did not render it necessary for him to declare himself.

Trivet; Hook, Lives of the Archbishops.

Pecock, REGINALD, said to have been born in Wales, was elected in 1417 fellow of Oriel College, ordained priest four years later, appointed in 1431 Master of Whittington College in London, and became in 1444 Bishop of St. Asaph, and Doctor of Divinity. In 1450, on the murder of Bishop Moleyns, he was translated to the see of Chichester. Pecock distinguished himself by the originality of the views he expressed in his preachings and writings. His great work, the Repressor of Overmuch Blaming of the Clergy, was directed against the errors of the Lollards, and vindicated the reasonableness of the usages of the Church. For this and other books Pecock was attacked in the council held at Westminster in 1457, cited before the Archbishop of Canterbury, his works examined by twenty-four doctors, and he himself finally condemned as a heretic. Under this pressure he abjured the heretical positions charged against him, and made a public recantation at Paul's Cross (Dec. 4, 1457). He was deprived of his bishopric, and though he appealed to Rome and procured bulls ordering that it should be restored to him, he was unable to recover it. He spent the rest of his life in compulsory seclusion in the Abbey of Thorney, in Cambridgeshire.

Pecquigny, THE TREATY OF (1475), was made between Edward IV. and Louis XI. of France. The English invaded France in 1475, Edward IV. having made an alliance with Charles of Burgundy, but directly the English set foot in France, Louis offered to treat for peace, and eventually the treaty of Pecquigny was made on these terms:—1. Edward to return to England on the payment of 75,000 crowns. 2. A truce to be kept for seven years. 3. The Kings of England and France to assist each other against foreign enemies or rebellious subjects. 4. Prince Charles, son of Louis XI., to marry the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. 5. The King of France to pay annually to the King of England the sum of 50,000 crowns.

Peel, SIR ROBERT (b. Feb. 5, 1788, d. July 2, 1850), was the son of Sir Robert Peel, an enormously wealthy Lancashire cotton manufacturer. Educated at Harrow and Christ Church, Oxford, Peel, after a very brilliant university career, entered Parliament for Cashel in 1809, as a supporter of Mr. Perceval. In 1810 he was made Under-Secretary for the Home Department. In 1812 he was Chief Secretary for Ireland under Lord Liverpool. In 1817 he was returned as member for Oxford University, and in 1819

he was chosen chairman of the committee on the currency, in which capacity he was mainly instrumental in bringing about the return to cash payments. From 1822 to 1827 Peel was Home Secretary; but on the accession of Canning (April, 1827), he retired, being unable to agree with that minister on the subject of Catholic Emancipation. In 1828 he returned under the Duke of Wellington; and in March, 1829, having become convinced of the necessity of granting the demands of the Catholics, he moved the Catholic Relief Bill in the House of Commons. In May, 1830, Peel succeeded his father in the baronetcy, and, having been rejected the previous year by the University of Oxford, re-entered Parliament as member for Tamworth. During the discussion on the Reform Bill, Peel, who resigned with his colleagues (Nov., 1830), strenuously opposed the measure. In 1834 he was recalled to office during the brief Conservative ministry of William IV. On May 6, 1839, on the resignation of the Melbourne ministry, Sir Robert Peel was sent for by the queen; but his request for the removal of certain of her majesty's ladies of the bed-chamber who were connected with Whig leaders being refused, he declined to form a ministry, and the Whigs returned to office. In Aug., 1841, they resigned, and Sir Robert Peel became Prime Minister, holding office till June, 1846. His régime was marked by some important financial changes, including the Bank Charter Act of 1844. But it was specially marked by the repeal of the Corn Laws (q.v.), and the removal of protectionist restrictions on trade. Sir Robert, with the bulk of his followers, was altogether opposed to the removal of the corn duties, and vigorously resisted the Anti-Corn Law agitators. But he at length became convinced of the justice of their cause, and, to the intense disgust of many of his followers, himself brought in the bill for the repeal of the duties on corn. But a large portion of the Conservatives abandoned him, and the Liberals gave him little support, and in June, 1846, he resigned. During the remaining years of his life he gave a general support to the home and commercial policy of the Whig ministers, though he opposed their foreign policy. He died from the effects of a fall from his horse while riding in St. James's Park. Peel's public action, especially in the matter of the Catholic Claims and the Corn Laws, exposed him to much misconstruction in his lifetime. But his honesty, his zeal for the welfare of the country, his moral courage and independence of character, have been amply acknowledged by the succeeding generations. And whatever exception might be taken to his general statesmanship, no one has doubted that his talents as an administrator and a financier were of the highest possible order.

Peelites was the name given to those Conservatives who, after the Repeal of the Corn Laws (1846), formed a third intermediate party in Parliament. Liberal-Conservatives, they refused a junction with either political extreme; kept aloof alike from the Whigs under Russell and Palmerston, and the Conservatives under Derby and Disraeli. Even after the death of Peel, in 1850, the presence of Sir James Graham, Mr. Gladstone, the Duke of Newcastle, Sidney Herbert, Mr. Cardwell, among the Peelites made them especially formidable. On the accession of the Earl of Aberdeen in 1852 the isolation of the Peelites ceased, as that ministry was formed by a coalition of Peelites and Whigs. Mr. Gladstone became Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Graham became First Lord of the Admiralty, the Duke of Newcastle became Secretary of State for the Colonies, and Mr. Sidney Herbert returned to his old position of Secretary at War.

Peep-o'-Day Boys, THE, was the name assumed by many of the Ulster Presbyterians between 1780 and 1795, who banded themselves together to resist the Catholic "Defenders." Many fights took place between these two parties. On the institution of the Orange lodges in 1790 many of the Peep-o'-Day Boys passed into them. The Peep-o'-Day Boys bore a large share in the "Battle of the Diamond" (Sept. 21, 1795).

Peerage. It was doubtless from France that England first learned to narrow the political application of the word peers—which in literary and general usage still collectively designates all persons that are equals in rank or belong to the same class—to members of the specially privileged order, the hereditary nobility. The German companions in arms, who had conquered Gaul and divided the land among them, were at an early period called peers, that is, fellow-warriors pledged to mutual support. Its limitation in England to the hereditary counsellors of the sovereign, whose capacity to fill such an office originated at one time in the tenure of certain fiefs, at another in the direct receipt of a personal writ of summons to Parliament, at a third in a formal patent of peerage, and, in its feminine form, to the wives of such hereditary counsellors, and in certain contingencies their female descendants, as well as created peeresses, may perhaps have been encouraged by the perfect equality of privilege, that held the varying ranks of the order on the same level in the political system. In that system kings, princes, dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts and barons, have all been equals, whatever social precedences may have distinguished them. The latest created baron had a voice and vote in Parliament as potent as a King of Scotland's or a Prince of Wales's. But though all peers were once lords of Parliament, there never has been a time when all lords of Parliament were peers. The lords spiritual have never been considered peers; they are not regarded as having the right, when accused of treason or felony, to be tried by the peers; and they do not sit in judgment on a peer arraigned on a capital charge. The word came into regular use in the fourteenth century; it is found in the sentence passed on the Despençers in 1321. The status and composition of the peerage had then been definitely established, and its place in the constitution been settled. The English peerage had then declared itself to be no caste, such as was the French nobility, but merely a small knot of citizens whose distinguishing feature was that they had inherited the capacity, or been invited, or been commissioned by the king, to fill a responsible office in the State, that of perpetual adviser of the crown, had a few cherished privileges conceded to them in consequence, and on dying passed on their duties and privileges to their heirs. For in time tenure lost its ennobling virtue, in time the writ of summons was discontinued as a mode of creating peers, and the more deliberate proceeding of bestowing the dignities that admitted to the peerage by a formal patent, was exclusively used, and enabled the crown, when it seemed advisable, to limit the right of inheritance, which hitherto had descended to heirs general, to heirs male. In mediæval days, when the dignity devolved upon an heiress, though she could not herself take the official seat in Parliament and in Council, she yet could give her husband, if not a right to the dignity, at least a presumptive claim to a writ of summons. Thus the Kingmaker was for a time Earl of Warwick, merely because he had married the sister and heiress of Henry de Beauchamp. And the state of suspended animation for a peerage that is known as abeyance, arose when a peer left his honours at his death to co-heiresses, whose posterity had no power of assuming them till the stock of all but one of the daughters had been exhausted.

The special privileges of the peerage descend from an early period; but it was the quarrel of Edward III. with Archbishop Stratford in 1341 that first made the most valuable of them matters of record. In the course of that dispute the lords reported that "on no account should peers . . . be brought to trial, lose their possessions, be arrested, imprisoned, outlawed or forfeited, or be bound to answer or to judge, except in full Parliament and before their peers." And in 1442 it was settled by statute that peeresses had the same rights, when placed in the same position. But the value of the right was for centuries greatly impaired by its practical restriction to the times when Parliament was sitting: during the recess the Lord Steward, who was appointed by the crown, formed the court at his discretion, by choosing whomsoever he pleased from the body of peers, generally to the number of twenty-three only. This hardship was removed by the Treason Bill of 1696, which made it obligatory to summon to the court of the Lord Steward "all the peers who have a right to sit and vote in Parliament." It is only on charge of treason, misprision, and felony that peers are entitled to the privilege; for minor offences they are tried by the ordinary courts. The other rights of a peer—freedom from arrest, admission on demand to the presence of the sovereign, liberty to kill venison in a royal forest, a claim to higher damages for slander, &c.—are now of little or no account. Since the completion of the Imperial Parliament, there are many Scottish and Irish peers who are not lords of Parliament: but they enjoy all the other distinctions of the order; and an Irish peer can sit among the Commons for any constituency in Great Britain. The two most striking features in the later history of the peerage are the amazing increase in its numbers, and the unreserved admission to its ranks of men of distinction in every honourable employment, soldiers, lawyers, diplomatists, bankers, tradesmen, manufacturers. In this way the order has grown from 69 landed proprietors in 1603 to more than 500 representatives of almost every form of social and personal distinction, literature not excepted.

Pelagius was born in Britain, towards the end of the fourth century, and his original name appears to have been Morgan, of which Pelagius is a Græcised form. He left his native land very early, and lived most of his life in Gaul, where he became notorious for his heretical teaching on the subject of original sin and free-will. Pelagianism took root in Britain, and it was to combat this heresy that Germanus and Lupus came over from Gaul. It would seem to have died out in Britain in consequence of the English Conquest.

Pelham, HENRY (b. 1696, d. 1754), was a younger son of the Duke of Newcastle. He took an active part in the suppression of the rebellion in 1715; and first sat for Seaford in 1718. He became Lord of the Treasury (1721), Secretary of State for War (1724), and Paymaster of the Forces (1730). He was a zealous supporter of Walpole, and faithfully upheld the measures of that minister against the attacks of the Opposition. Walpole's resignation in 1742 was followed by Wilmington's short ministry. On his death the candidates for the premiership were Pelham and Pulteney. With extreme reluctance the former was induced to assume the management of the Commons as First Lord of the Treasury. He was supported by the brilliant Carteret, who had been Pulteney's friend. The Pelhams succeeded to the difficulties of the Austrian Succession question, and were obliged to obey the dictates of their party, who were determined on hostilities with France. Carteret finding his policy thwarted, retired in 1744. Pelham, who, unlike Walpole, dreaded opposition, now persuaded Chesterfield and Pitt to support the ministry, and placed several Tories in subordinate positions. Finding themselves superseded by Carteret in the king's councils, the Pelhams determined to bring the matter to a crisis by demanding the admission of Chesterfield and Pitt to office. On the king's refusal, they resigned; but as Carteret failed to form a ministry, they were placed again in power. Meanwhile the Jacobite rebellion of 1745 had the effect of bringing the Pelhams back to Walpole's peace policy, and the war was concluded by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (Oct., 1748). There had now ceased to be any opposition in Parliament. In 1750 Pelham introduced his successful financial bill, whereby the interest of the national debt was decreased from five and four to three per cent. The reform of the calendar and Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act (1753) are the remaining points of interest in his administration. In 1754 he died, and George declared, "Now I shall have no more peace." "Like Walpole," says Mr. Lecky, "he was thoroughly successful in questions of finance, and almost uniformly successful in dealing with them. A timid, desponding, and somewhat fretful man, with little energy of character or intellect, he possessed, at least, to a high degree, good sense, industry, knowledge of business, and Parliamentary experience."

Pembroke, JASPER TUDOR, EARL OF (d. 1493), was the son of Owen Tudor and Catherine of France. In 1461 he fought against the Yorkists at the battle of Mortimer's Cross, where he was defeated, and with difficulty escaped. He was attainted, and deprived of his honours, but in 1470 he landed in England with the Duke of Clarence, and the Lancastrians driving Edward out, he was restored to his titles and estates. In 1471 he once more had to flee, and this time in company with his nephew, Richmond. For many years he lived in Brittany, till 1485, when he accompanied Richmond to England, and shared the victory of Bosworth with him. He received great rewards from Henry VII., and was one of the commanders at the battle of Stoke, in 1487.

Pembroke, THOMAS HERBERT, 8TH EARL OF, and 5th Earl of Montgomery (b. 1656,

d. 1733), was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and succeeded to his brother's title in 1683. He raised the trained-bands of Wilts in order to suppress Monmouth's rebellion. In 1687 he was deprived of his lord lieutenantancy. He took part in the coronation ceremony of William and Mary, although he had voted for a regency, and was shortly afterwards sent as ambassador extraordinary to the States-General. Pembroke was sworn of the Privy Council, and placed at the head of the Admiralty Commission. On the departure of William for Ireland he was placed on the Council of Nine. Pembroke was made Lord Privy Seal in 1691. When the king went to the Netherlands to take command of the army he was appointed one of the Lords Justices. He voted against Fenwick's attainer, although desirous that that conspirator should be brought to the scaffold. Pembroke was first plenipotentiary at the Treaty of Ryswick. He was created President of the Council in place of Leeds in 1700; and by an able speech expressed the dislike of the Tory Peers to the Resumption Bill. On the accession of Anne he was dismissed from the Admiralty in order to make room for Prince George. He was one of the commissioners to treat of the Union with Scotland, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in 1707. Pembroke was subsequently created President of the Council, from which the Whigs attempted to thrust him in order to make room for Somers. On the death of Prince George, he again became Lord High Admiral, but resigned in 1709 on receiving a pension. Before the arrival of George I. in England Pembroke was one of the Lords Justices who carried on the administration. During the remainder of his long life he took but little part in politics. Although Pembroke played a prominent part during two reigns we know but little of his personal character. He was a moderate Tory in opinions, and seems to have carried out his official duties with seal and integrity.

Pembroke, WILLIAM HERBERT, EARL OF (d. 1570), one of the most powerful men of his day, was employed in crushing the western rebellion in 1549, and as a reward was made Master of the Horse and President of the Council of Wales. In 1551 he was created Earl of Pembroke, and in conjunction with Warwick and Northampton virtually ruled England. At first deeply implicated in Northumberland's plot to set Lady Jane Grey on the throne, the Earl soon found that his interests lay really on the other side, and on perceiving that the country was in favour of Mary, proclaimed her at St. Paul's Cross. In 1554 he threw the whole weight of his influence into the scale in favour of the queen, whom however he personally regarded with dislike; and it was owing in a great measure to his course of action that Sir Thomas Wyatt's rebellion was so easily suppressed in the following year; he was one of the commissioners sent to France to arrange for a general peace, and in 1556 led a reinforcement of troops to Calais to ward off the threatened French attack. On the accession of Elizabeth he accorded her his warmest support. In 1569 he was, however, arrested on suspicion of being implicated in the plot to marry the Duke of Norfolk to Mary, Queen of Scots, but he cleared himself at once, and was placed in command of part of the queen's army.

Penal Code, THE, IN IRELAND, was first felt under James I. In 1603 a royal proclamation was issued ordering all Roman Catholic priests to leave the country under pain of death, and announcing that the penal clauses of the Act of Uniformity would be put in force. Parliament, however, remonstrated, and in 1613 a promise was given that the laws would not be enforced. A period of some toleration followed, which was cut short by the Cromwellian conquest. Under the Protectorate the Catholic gentry and priests were shipped off wholesale to Barbadoes as slaves; no Catholic was allowed to carry arms, to live in garrison towns, or to go a mile from his residence without a passport. In spite of the second Act of Uniformity, the Irish enjoyed a considerable amount of toleration under Charles II. and James II., and their sufferings began again after the broken treaty of Limerick. After the English Parliament had in 1693 excluded Catholics from the Irish Parliament by imposing the oath of allegiance and abjuration, and a declaration against transubstantiation, upon members, the latter body set to work upon the legislation known to infamy as the Irish penal code. (1) The first of the penal statutes, passed in 1695, provided that no Catholic should keep a school under penalty of £20 or three months' imprisonment; that parents should not send their children abroad for education under penalty of outlawry and confiscation, the case to be tried without a jury. (2) The Disarming Act commanded all papists to deliver up their arms under penalty of a heavy fine for the first offence, and imprisonment for life and forfeiture for the second. (3) In 1697 all Roman Catholic ecclesiastics who were in correspondence with Rome were expelled the kingdom, and forbidden to return under pain of death; new priests were forbidden to enter Ireland, and in the following reign the existing clergy were placed under a strict system of registration (1704). (4) The Intermarriage Act provided that a Protestant woman marrying a Catholic should be dead in the eye of the law, and a Protestant man who married a Catholic should be regarded as a papist. (5) Catholics were disqualified in 1698 from practising as solicitors, and further measures were passed in the reigns of Anne and George II. to prevent evasions of the Act. The legislation of Anne's reign was terribly severe, and was deliberately framed with the object of depriving the native Irish of what little property they still possessed:—(1) The Act for the Suppression of Papacy (1704) provided that any person who perverted a Protestant should be guilty of præmunire; that Catholic parents should be compelled to maintain and educate their Protestant children; that no Catholic could be guardian or trustee; that the eldest son of a Catholic, by turning Protestant, converted his father's interest in his estates into a mere life-tenancy; and that lands of Catholics were to descend in gavelkind unless the eldest son declared himself a Protestant. Again, no Catholic could buy land or take leases for more than thirty-one years; he could not inherit land without taking the oaths, the estate passing at once, until his apostacy or death, to the next Protestant heir; no Catholics were to be allowed to settle in Limerick or Galway; no person was to hold office, civil or military, without taking the oaths and subscribing the declaration of transubstantiation. (2) By the Act of 1709 an informer who could prove that a lease or sale had been secretly made in favour of Papists was to have the property; and the previous legislation compelling Catholic fathers to support their Protestant children, suppressing papist schoolmasters and regulars, and commanding parish priests to be registered, were enforced with additional rigour. Lastly, in 1727 an Act was passed by which every Roman Catholic was deprived of his vote, both at Parliamentary and municipal elections. The only effect of this terrible code was the destruction of the Catholic gentry in Ireland; many of the best families emigrated, and a few apostatised. The other measures were either evaded or not put into execution. The cruel persecution of the "Irish enemy" began to abate towards the end of Walpole's administration; and to Lord North belongs the credit of the first substantial Roman Catholic Relief Bill, by which, on taking the oath of allegiance, they were allowed to hold leases of 999 years (1778). In 1782 the penal code was further relaxed, the provisions against the purchase, inheritance, and disposition of land, residence in Limerick and Galway, instruction by popish schoolmasters, and the guardianship of children, being repealed. Additional measures for the freedom of the Roman Catholics were passed in 1792, when the restrictions on the legal profession were removed, the odious Intermarriage Act was repealed; and in 1793, when £40 freeholders were allowed to vote in Parliamentary and municipal elections, to enter Dublin University, and to fill, with a few exceptions, civil and military offices. These were stepping-stones to the great

Roman Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829, by which the last relics of the abominable Penal Code were swept away.

Penda, King of Mercia (626—654), was the son of Pybba or Wybba, and claimed to be descended from Woden. Under him Mercia first assumed a position of equality with the other kingdoms. The petty states which hitherto had occupied Middle England were conquered by him, and consolidated into the later Mercian state, which was continuous with Central England. He was the opponent of Christianity and of Northumbria, against which he even formed an alliance with the Welsh. In 633 he defeated and slew Edwin of Northumbria at Heathfield, and ravaged the whole country of the Northumbrians; in 642 he again defeated the Northumbrians at Maserfield. He frequently defeated the East Angles, and slew three of their kings. He drove Cenwealh of Wessex out of his kingdom, and at one time seemed likely to make himself master of almost the whole of England. But in 654 he was himself defeated and slain at Winwidfield by Oswiu of Northumbria. "This prince," says Lappenberg, "presents a striking and almost inexplicable phenomenon. Ruler of a territory surrounded more than any others by a numerous hostile British population, a state which was of all the youngest; a state formed in the middle of the country, of immigrants and aftercomers, who found the maritime parts already occupied; protected by marshes, rivers, mountains, succeeding to power at the age of sixty, yet displaying the energy of youth; the last unshaken and powerful adherent of paganism among the Anglo-Saxons, this prince had during his reign of thirty years first assailed the Bretwaldas of Northumbria, and afterwards repeatedly the other states of his countrymen, with great success and still greater cruelty, yet, notwithstanding the destruction of five kings, without securing to himself any lasting result." Peninsular War, THE (1808—1814), was, so far as England was concerned, the most important episode in the wars with France, which lasted, with little intermission, from 1793 to 1815. In July, 1808, an alliance was signed between England and Spain, and two British divisions were at once despatched to Portugal, under Wellesley and Moore. From Aug. 1—6, Wellesley was engaged in disembarking the troops in Figueras Bay, and on the 8th he moved towards Lisbon. On the 17th Laborde opposed him at Rorica, and was defeated; and Junot met with the same fate at Vimiero four days later. Wellesley was, however, prevented from following up the advantage he had gained by a rapid pursuit; and on the 30th, the Convention of Cintra was signed, by which the French were allowed to quit Portugal unmolested with all their stores, guns, and ammunition. Much as this convention was condemned at home, it secured, by the occupation of Portugal, a firm basis of operations. In November, Napoleon himself took command in Spain; and after severe struggles with the Spaniards, the French, on Dec. 4, entered Madrid, and installed Joseph for the second time on the throne of Spain. Meanwhile, Sir John Moore, who, on the other generals being recalled after the Convention of Cintra, had succeeded to the command in Lisbon, had arranged to form a junction at Salamanca with Sir David Baird, who was bringing up reinforcements from Corunna, but owing to want of transport, and the stupidity of the native authorities, neither general could move at an adequate pace; and it was not till Nov. 13 that Moore arrived with his vanguard at the place appointed. In spite of the fact that all his precautions in the rear had been overthrown by the treachery of the Spaniards, he determined to press on to the assistance of the Spanish armies. On Dec. 9 he first learnt that Madrid was in the possession of the French, and that one French army had been despatched to Lisbon by way of Talavera, thus cutting off his retreat to Portugal, while Soult was on his march against Moore's army. He at once marched against Soult, and checked him in a brilliant skirmish at Sahagun; but Napoleon was drawing his armies round to enclose him; and there was nothing left but to retreat. This movement was begun on the 24th, and the several divisions concentrated at Astorga on the 31st. The next day Napoleon had to leave the army, and Soult was left to pursue a force, which under extreme difficulties had forgotten all discipline. Nevertheless Moore managed to bring them safely to Corunna, where he halted to collect the stragglers. On Jan. 15, 1809, he gave Soult battle, defeated him, though killed himself in the moment of victory; and the army was embarked without further molestation and sailed for England. In May Wellesley took command in Portugal, where the French were almost supreme. He at once advanced against Soult, and drove him back from Lisbon in a series of skirmishes. He followed up his partial successes by an advance up the Valley of the Tagus, and on July 28 defeated Victor and Joseph in a hard-fought battle at Talavera. He, however, retreated soon afterwards into winter quarters on the Mondego. In the spring of 1810, Masséna opened a brilliant campaign, the object of which was the conquest of Portugal. After many successes he was met by Lord Wellington (for a peerage had been bestowed upon Wellesley after Talavera), at Busaco on Sept. 27, defeated, and driven back. Wellington took advantage of the victory to retreat to the lines of Torres Vedras, which he had constructed as a defence for Lisbon. In March (1811), having received reinforcements, Wellington issued from his lines, and by a series of masterly movements forced Masséna to retreat to Salamanca. On April 9 he began to blockade Almeida, and in the beginning of May, at Fuentes d'Onoro, again defeated Masséna, who had advanced to its relief. During the battle, the Governor of Almeida had taken advantage of the carelessness of the investing force to destroy the fortress and escape. In the meanwhile Graham had broken out from Cadiz, where he had been invested all the winter, and on March 6 defeated Victor at Barossa. Beresford had on March 16 been detached by Wellington to recapture Badajos, which had been lost to the French by the treachery of its commander. Early in May he had made all the dispositions necessary for the siege; but the operations had soon to be abandoned on account of Soult's approach with a strong relieving force. Beresford gave him battle on the ridge of Albuera on May 16, and after a terrible struggle, in which victory was long doubtful, entirely defeated the French army. Wellington, coming up soon after the battle, at once ordered Badajos to be reinvested. An assault, however, on Badajos on June 9 was repulsed with great loss; and the siege was finally abandoned on the approach of Soult and Marmont, who had united their forces. Wellington retired behind the Guadiana, but took up so bold a position that he imposed on the two marshals, who, thinking him much stronger than he really was, in their turn withdrew, Soult to Seville, Marmont to the Tagus valley, where he quartered his army around Almaraz. Wellington at once advanced, but was foiled in an attempt to surprise Ciudad Rodrigo, which, however, was now completely blockaded. Late in September, Marmont marched with an overwhelming force to its relief; and after checking him in a vigorous combat at El Bodon Wellington ordered a general retreat. On the 27th he again repulsed an attack of the French, and withdrew to a position so strong that Marmont did not venture to attack it, and from want of supplies withdrew again to the Tagus valley. In October Hill successfully drove the French from Cáceres, and opened up the whole district for a foraging ground for the allies. For two months Estremadura was completely in Hill's power, till in Jan. (1812), he was recalled to Portugal by a threatened advance of Marmont. Meanwhile in the east of Spain, the French had been very successful, and Valencia and Catalonia had been reduced. On Jan. 1 (1812), Wellington with all things ready crossed the Agueda, and on the 8th broke ground in front of Ciudad Rodrigo. The siege was hurried on in order to forestall Marmont's arrival. On the 19th the place was assaulted and carried after a terrible struggle. When Marmont in his advance learned the fall of Ciudad Rodrigo, he hastily retired to Salamanca, which he fortified. Wellington lost no time in marching to the south, and preparing for the siege of Badajos. The works were begun on March 17, and here again had to be conducted with all speed from the fear of Soult's relieving force. On April 7 the place was captured by one of the most determined and sanguinary assaults on record. On May 19 Hill surprised and destroyed the bridge of Almaraz, which formed the only communication across the Tagus between Marmont and Soult, and Wellington followed up this success by laying siege to the forts of Salamanca. In ten days they were reduced, and on July 22 Wellington utterly defeated the French in the great battle of Salamanca. For eight days he followed up the pursuit to Valladolid. Thence, leaving Clinton to watch the movements of the French in the direction of Burgos, he continued his march to Madrid, which he entered in triumph on Aug. 12. Here he was again prevented by the illiberality and bad management of the home government from carrying the war any further into Spain, although either Soult or Suchet might have been crushed. He accordingly turned towards the north, where Clausel had rallied the fragments of the Salamanca army. Clausel retreated before Wellington with much skill; and Wellington halted before Burgos, resolved to take it before proceeding further north. He was, however, very badly supplied with siege tools, and even ammunition ran short; and the siege, which was begun on Sept. 19, was finally abandoned, after a month had been spent in unsuccessful attempts to storm the place. The retreat was conducted under great difficulties, aggravated by the utter disregard for discipline to which the men gave way. After several skirmishes, Wellington's army found itself secure at Ciudad Rodrigo. Wellington then disposed it in winter quarters, and made strenuous preparations for renewing the campaign in the following year. The earliest movements of 1813 were, however, made by Murray against Suchet in the east, and resulted in the defeat of the latter near Castella. It was not till May that Wellington began his forward movement, but then all his plans were so matured that the position of the French behind the Douro was turned, and they were in full retreat, without a battle having been fought. A union had been also effected by the same operations with the Spaniards in Galicia. Burgos was destroyed by the French in their retreat; and without taking any advantage of the natural difficulties of the country, Joseph abandoned every position, until he had crossed the Ebro and taken up a strong position at Vittoria. It was, however, of no avail, for on June 21 Wellington carried the position, and inflicted on Joseph the most crushing defeat suffered by any army throughout the war. Graham was at once despatched to lay siege to San Sebastian; but in a few weeks the works had to be suspended on account of the arrival of Soult, who had been sent to supersede Joseph and was reorganising the northern army. In a series of fierce combats fought among the passes of the Pyrenees, Soult's efforts to break the line of the allies were utterly baffled; he retired, and Wellington ordered the siege of San Sebastian to be resumed. On Aug. 31 it was stormed. Soult made one more effort to succour it, but he was worsted in the combats of Vera and San Marcial, and had to retire again. Wellington, by the fall of San Sebastian, was free to devote his whole attention to Soult. By a series of skilful movements he forced the passage of Bidassoa early in October. A month later he attacked Soult in a strong position, which he had been fortifying for three months, on the Nivelle. Each redoubt was successively carried, and the English troops crossed the river. A month later he crossed the Nive, in the face of Soult's opposing force. The next day Soult issued from Bayonne, thinking that he could cut off the left wing of the allies. The attack was met by a stubborn resistance, till Wellington sent up reinforcements and compelled the French to withdraw in haste. But Soult directed a new attack against the right, which had been thus weakened. Wellington had, however, anticipated the attack, and after "one of the most desperate battles of the whole war," succeeded on Dec. 13 in completely baffling the French on all points. The country was, however, so flooded, that no further movement was possible; and the allies went into winter quarters along the left bank of the Adour, the French being disposed along the opposite bank. In February, 1814, Wellington determined to advance into France; but to do this it was necessary to drive Soult from Bayonne. It was only possible to cross the Adour below Bayonne, as it was weakly guarded there on account of its natural difficulties. His plan, therefore, was to draw Soult away by an advance of his centre and right, while Sir John Hope with the left effected the passage of the river. Accordingly Hill, with 20,000 men, moved off on Feb. 12 towards the east. The French outposts were everywhere driven in, and Soult was hopelessly mystified as to Wellington's real design. He accordingly made his dispositions so as to be able to concentrate on Orthes. Wellington continued to drive in the enemy from all their outposts, and on the 26th Beresford crossed the Gave de Pau, and false attacks were directed against Orthes. On the following day the English attacked Soult's position at Orthès. For a long time the battle was doubtful; indeed, at one time the French seemed to be on the point of repulsing the attack and winning the day; but Wellington, quickly changing his mode of attack to suit the altered circumstances, won a complete victory, which would have resulted in the entire destruction of Soult's army had the pursuit been energetically executed. Meanwhile Hope had grappled with stupendous difficulties; had crossed the Adour, and in the face of the enemy had, by the indefatigable energy of soldiers and sailors combined, contrived a bridge which should resist alike the force of the tide and the attacks of the enemy. The investment of Bayonne was now complete; and Wellington, crossing the Adour, despatched Beresford with 12,000 men to Bordeaux, while he himself prepared to follow Soult, who was retreating towards Toulouse. In three skirmishes the allies encountered the French outposts, and drove them in; but Wellington was moving cautiously, and it was not till March 26 that the two armies were in sight of one another. Soult was resolved to hold Toulouse, in order to keep his communications open with the other armies, and Wellington was equally resolved to isolate him. Accordingly he attacked him on April 10; and at length, after a most terrible struggle, in which the allies lost more men than in almost any other battle in the whole war, the chief positions were carried. But even then Soult did not at once give up the place, and was ready to receive an attack the next day. Wellington, however, designed a new plan of operations, and Soult, afraid of being surrounded, carried off most of his troops to Villefranche. The movement was a most masterly conception, and its execution did not fall short of the skill with which it was planned. But its results were never known, because news had already arrived of the Convention of Paris and the abdication of Napoleon. Thus ended the War of the Peninsula, and the English forces made all haste to evacuate France. On June 14 Wellington issued a general order, in which he thanked the troops for their glorious services throughout the long struggle, which had had an incalculable influence on the affairs of Europe, and had in no small degree contributed to the fall of Napoleon.

Penn, Sir William (b. 1621, d. 1670), a native of Bristol, entered the merchant service, and afterwards the royal navy. In the war between the Commonwealth and the Dutch he greatly distinguished himself, and in 1653 became an admiral. In 1655 he bore a large share in the capture of Jamaica, and in the same year became M.P. for Weymouth. In 1660 he was knighted, and made one of the commissioners of the navy. He took part in the subsequent Dutch wars, and was engaged in the great victory of 1665.

Penn, William, son of Admiral Sir William Penn, educated at Christ Church, Oxford and at Saumur. He became a Quaker in 1667, and was in 1668—9 eight months imprisoned in the Tower, and in 1671 six months in Newgate, for propagating their doctrines. On March 4, 1681, he received from the king, in satisfaction for debts due to his father, the land lying between Maryland and New York, and founded the colony called after him Pennsylvania. From the summer of 1682 to the summer of 1684 he was engaged in laying the foundations of the colony in America and establishing good relations with the Indians. On his return to England, he obtained great influence with James II., approved and supported the Declaration of Indulgence, and endeavoured to secure for the policy of the king the support of William of Orange. In 1690 and in 1691 he was accused of treasonable correspondence with the exiled king, but in neither case was the charge proved. Nevertheless he was in 1692 deprived of his government of Pennsylvania, which was restored to him two years later. In 1699 he made a second visit to America, whence he returned in 1701. His relations to the colony, and the colonial assembly involved him in many debts, and frequent disputes arose. He could not "but think it hard measure" he wrote to the colonists in 1710, "that, while that has proved a land of freedom and flourishing, it should become to me, by whose means it was principally made a country, the cause of grief, trouble, and poverty." In 1712 Penn was struck by apoplexy, just as he was preparing to sell to the crown his rights as proprietor, and, though he lived till 1718, was incapable for the rest of his life of doing any business.

Penry (or AP HENRY), JOHN (b. 1559, d. 1593), a Welsh clergyman, became one of the most zealous followers of Robert Browne and a determined opponent of Episcopacy. He is supposed to have originated the attacks on the bishops published under the name of Martin Marprelate, but it was found impossible to trace the work to him. He was subsequently brought to trial on a charge of having libelled the queen, and though the evidence was incomplete, was found guilty and hung at St. Thomas Waterings (May 29, 1593).

Pension Bill, THE (1730), was introduced by Sandys as a weapon of attack against Sir Robert Walpole. By an Act of 1708, all persons holding pensions from the crown during pleasure were made incapable of sitting in the House of Commons, and this was extended by an Act of 1714 to those who held them for any term of years. "But the difficulty," says Hallam, "was to ascertain the fact, the government refusing information." Accordingly Sandys proposed a Bill by which every member of the Commons was to swear an oath that he did not hold any such pension, and that if he accepted one, he would disclose it to the House within fourteen days. Walpole allowed this measure to pass the Commons by a small majority, and threw the responsibility of its rejection in the Lords on Townshend as leader in that House. This was one of the reasons that led to the latter's resignation. The measure suffered a similar fate in 1734 and 1740.

Pensions, THE QUESTION OF, is intimately connected with that of the alienation of royal demesne, which was so frequently made a subject of complaint by the reformers of the Middle Ages. It was not until the accession of Queen Anne that steps were taken to prevent the sovereign from charging the hereditary revenues with pensions and annuities, which were considered to be binding on his successors, when it was provided that no portion of the hereditary revenues should be alienated by the crown beyond the life of the king. Pensions, however, were still granted on the hereditary revenues of Scotland and Ireland, and on the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duties, for the lives of the grantees. When George III. surrendered the hereditary revenues in exchange for a fixed civil list amounting first to £800,000, and afterwards to £900,000, it became the fund from which pensions were paid. There were no limits to pensions, except the civil list itself, and debts frequently accumulated in consequence; moreover, they dangerously increased the influence of the crown. Burke proposed in consequence (1780) that the pension list should be reduced to £60,000, but his Bill for "the better security of the independence of Parliament, and the economical reform of the civil and other establishments" did not become law. However, the Civil List Act of the Rockingham administration, which was passed in 1782, was built on the same lines. The pension list was to be gradually reduced to £95,000, and no pension to any one person was to exceed £1,200. In order to prevent the practice of granting secret pensions during pleasure, it was directed that all future pensions were to be paid at the exchequer, and they were to be granted only in cases of distress or desert. The pension lists on the Irish and Scotch revenues, and on the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duties, still remained, however, and were sources of much political corruption. (1) In 1793 the Irish pensions had reached the sum of £124,000, the gross annual revenue being £275,102. After several attempts had been made to remedy the abuse, a Bill was introduced into the Irish House of Commons, at the instigation of the Lord Lieutenant, by which the hereditary revenues were surrendered in exchange for a civil list of £145,000, and a pension list of £124,000, which was eventually to be reduced to £80,000. No grants in any one year were to exceed £1,200, but pensions held during the pleasure of the crown were exempted from the provisions of the Act. The contemplated reduction was effected by 1814; and on the accession of George IV. the Irish pension list was further reduced to £50,000, no grants exceeding £1,200 to be made until the list was so reduced. (2) The Scotch hereditary revenues remained exempt from Parliamentary control until 1810, when the pensions charged on them amounted to £39,379. It was then provided that the amount of the pensions should be reduced to £25,000, and no more than £800 should be granted in one year until the reduction had been effected. (3) In 1830 the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duties were surrendered by William IV. for his life, the pension charged upon them continuing payable. At the same time the three pension lists of England, Scotland, and Ireland were consolidated, and arrangements made for their reduction from £145,750 to a future maximum sum of £75,000 on the expiration existing interests. Lastly, on the accession of Victoria, the right of the crown to grant pensions was restricted to £1,200 a year; these pensions to be granted in strict conformity with the resolutions of the House of Commons of 1834, which limited them to "such persons only as have just claims on the royal beneficence, or who, by their personal services to the crown, by the performance of their duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science and attainments in literature and the arts, have merited the gracious consideration of the sovereign, and the gratitude of their country." There has of late (1884) been some outcry against perpetual pensions, such as those granted to the Churchill and Penn families, and arrangements have been made for their commutation. Pensions are now granted for two lives.

The most important Acts bearing on the question of civil list pensions are 1 Anne, s. 1, c. 7; 23 George III. c. 82; 33 George III., c. 34 (Ireland); 1 George IV., c. 1., s. 10; 50 George III., c. 11.; and 1 Vict., c. 2. Pepys, SAMUEL (b. 1632, d. 1703), was educated at St. Paul's School, and Magdalen College, Cambridge. He became Clerk of the Acts to the Navy in 1660, and Secretary to the Navy in 1673. During the reigns of Charles II. and James II. the administration of naval affairs was largely in his hands, and he introduced some important reforms. He was imprisoned in the Tower on suspicion of being concerned in the popish plot in May, 1679, but liberated the following February. He became President of the Royal Society in 1684. He wrote Memoirs of the Royal Navy (1690), and left in his manuscripts a Diary, written in shorthand, which was deciphered and first published by Lord Braybrooke in 1825. The work is almost unequalled for its naive candour, and its gossiping pages give a singularly piquant sketch of the court and society of Charles II.'s reign.

Perceval, SPENCER (b. 1762, d. 1812), was the second son of John, Earl of Egmont, and was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1786 he was called to the bar, and ten years later took silk. At the same time he entered Parliament as M.P. for Northampton, and was soon noticed by Pitt as a promising member. In supporting the Treason and Sedition Bills he rendered good service to the government. Addington appointed Perceval his Solicitor-General, and in 1802 Attorney-General, in which capacity he had to conduct the prosecution of Peltier for a libel on Bonaparte, and in spite of the brilliant defence of Sir James Mackintosh, he secured a verdict of guilty. He held that office until Pitt's death in 1806. In March, 1807, he became Chancellor of the Exchequer, and on the death of the Duke of Portland in 1809 he was named First Lord of the Treasury. At that time the war in the Peninsula was being carried on: Napoleon had as yet received no check on the Continent; England was spending millions in encouraging the nations of Europe to offer an effectual resistance to him. Foreign politics were thus all engrossing, and scarcely any attention was paid to the reforms at home, which were so badly needed. For three years his ministry lasted, and then on May 11, 1812, he was shot by one Bellingham, in the lobby of the House of Commons. Nothing could have happened so opportunely for Perceval's reputation as his murder, which raised him to the position of a martyr. From having been really a minister of moderate abilities, by his death he suddenly became, in public estimation a political genius, a first-rate financier, and a powerful orator. We can now look back more calmly and see in him a man of shrewd sense, imperturbable temper, narrow views, and restless ambition, which, to his credit, never led him astray from the path of integrity.

Percy, HENRY (b. 1366, d. 1403), who from his impetuosity and daring was surnamed "Hotspur," was the son of Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland. When quite young he was associated with his father in the charge of the Scotch prisoners, and in 1385 he was sent to release Calais, and made many daring excursions into Picardy. He killed the Earl of Douglas in the battle of Otterburn, where he was himself taken prisoner. On his release he fought in France and Brittany. He joined Henry of Lancaster on his landing in England in 1399, and received substantial rewards from him subsequently. Becoming discontented, however, with the king, Percy joined in 1403 with Douglas, but was defeated and slain in the battle of Shrewsbury. He married Elizabeth Mortimer, eldest daughter of Edward, Earl of March.

Perrers, ALICE, was one of the ladies of the bedchamber of Philippa, queen of Edward III. After his wife's death she acquired immense influence over the king, and interfered in the affairs of State, supporting the policy of John of Gaunt. In the Good Parliament (1376) most serious charges were brought against her. She had interfered with the administration of justice, and her rapacity and extravagance were equally unbounded. She was compelled to take an oath never to return to the king's presence; and it was ordained that if in the future she behaved as she had in the past, she should forfeit her goods and be banished. On the death of the Black Prince, however, the proceedings of the Good Parliament were reversed, and Alice Perrers resumed her influence over the king. She was present at his death-bed, but fled from it after robbing him of his finger rings. Of her subsequent history nothing is known.

Perrot, SIR JOHN (b. 1527, d. 1592), was reputed to be the son of Henry VIII. He was imprisoned by Mary for his religious opinions, but under Elizabeth rose for a time to high favour. In 1572 he was appointed President of Munster, where he suppressed a widespread rebellion, and in 1585 was made Lord Deputy of Ireland. His policy, though calculated to benefit the country, gave such offence to the clergy that they contrived, by means of forged documents, to obtain his recall, which was followed by his trial for high treason in 1592. He was found guilty, though probably on very insufficient evidence, of using language derogatory to the queen, and of giving secret encouragement to Spain; and died in prison of a broken heart, September, 1592.

Persian War, THE (1856). At the end of 1855 a series of studied insults towards Mr. Murray, the British minister at the Persian court, obliged him to withdraw his mission from Teheran, and break off communication with the Persian government.

Attempts were made to patch the matter up, but the news of the siege and capture of Herat, in spite of treaty obligations, was followed by a declaration of war by England (Nov. 1, 1856). An army of 6,000 men, under the command of Sir James Outram, was at once despatched to the Persian Gulf. The English attacked Rushan, a fort near Bushire, and the place was carried after an obstinate defence. The next day Bushire was attacked and similarly captured. On Jan. 27, Sir James Outram arrived and took the command. Being joined by part of Havelock's division, he advanced on Burrasgoon, where the Persians were encamped, found it deserted, and returned after destroying all the stores found there. On his return he was much annoyed by the Persian cavalry, but eventually succeeded in attacking and driving off the pursuing force. A short lull in hostilities occurred now. But on March 26 the strong fortress of Mohamrah on the Karoon river was attacked by sea and land. The garrison was commanded by Prince Khan Mirza. No real attempt was made at a defence; the guns of the fort and town were quickly silenced, by the fleet, and then the prince abandoned the place and retreated to Akwaz, 100 miles up the Karoon, where he had large magazines and supplies. Sir James Outram immediately organised an expedition under Commander Rennie to ascend the river and destroy this place. The steamer advanced on the 29th, and on April 1 found the enemy, about 7,000 strong, posted at Akwaz. The troops landed and advanced against the town. There was, however, no struggle. The Persians, cowed by their disasters, fled at once, and again allowed their camp to be taken possession of with all the stores it contained. On the 4th the expedition returned to Mohamrah, and thus the operations closed. Meanwhile, the preliminaries of a peace had been adjusted at Paris. The Shah agreed to renounce all pretensions to Herat, to withdraw his troops from Afghanistan, to guarantee protection to the English commerce, and to suppress slavery in the Persian Gulf.

Perth was taken by Bruce from the English (1311), and in 1332 was fortified by Edward Baliol, who was for a time besieged there by the Earl of March. In 1339 it was retaken by Robert the Stewart from Sir Thomas Ughtred, Edward III.'s lieutenant. In 1559 it was occupied by the Queen Regent and a French bodyguard; in Sept., 1644, it was taken by Montrose after the battle of Tippermuir, and in May, 1689, by Claverhouse. In 1715 it was occupied by Lord Mar, and in 1745 was also in the hands of the rebels for some time. James I. was murdered (1436) in the monastery of Black Friars in Perth.

Peterborough, BENEDICT OF (d. 1193), was of unknown origin. In 1173 he was appointed chancellor to the Archbishop of Canterbury; in 1177, Abbot of Peterborough; and in 1191, Vice-Chancellor of England. The Chronicle, which is erroneously attributed to him, extends from 1169 to 1192, and is highly important for the period it embraces, giving much information not to be found in any other writer.

Benedict of Peterborough's Chronicle has been published in the Rolls Series, with invaluable introductions by Bishop Stubbs, who suggests, with much probability, that Richard Fitz-Neal, Bishop of London, is the author.

Peterborough, CHARLES MORDAUNT, EARL OF (b. 1668, d. 1735), in 1675 succeeded to his father's estates. In his youth he served under Admirals Torrington and Marlborough in the Mediterranean. For his bold opposition to the designs of James II. he was compelled to betake himself to the Hague, where he strongly recommended the Prince of Orange to invade England. When William had landed at Torbay, Mordaunt went on before him, and occupied Exeter. He became First Commissioner of the Treasury, a post to which he was unsuited; and where he quarrelled with Godolphin, who was an excellent financier. He was created Earl of Monmouth. In 1690 Caermarthen procured his retirement from office. In 1696 he attempted to ruin his opponents by the help of Sir John Fenwick's confessions. But the attempt failed, and Monmouth, now hated by both parties, was stripped of his employments. In 1697 he succeeded to his uncle's fortunes and title. On the accession of Anne he was offered and refused the command of the forces in the West Indies. In 1705 he was sent to command in Spain. He captured the fortresses of Montjuich, and Barcelona fell. Though he had but a handful of men, he at once pushed on to relieve San Mattheo. He accomplished the feat with 1,200 men, and drove the Spanish army of 7,000 men before him into Valencia. From Valencia he set out in the night and defeated a reinforcement of 4,000 men. A French army under Marshal Tessé, and a fleet under the Count of Toulouse, were sent to blockade Barcelona, Peterborough attempted to raise the siege, but failed. He then produced a commission appointing him commander of the fleet as well as the army, and set out in an open boat in quest of it. He was picked up by one of the ships; and though he failed to bring on an engagement with the French fleet, he relieved Barcelona. But he quarrelled with the Archduke Charles, who disapproved of his design of marching at once on Madrid. Unable to endure a command divided between himself and Galway, he left the army for Genoa. In 1707 he returned as a volunteer; but Sunderland, a warm supporter of Galway, roughly recalled him. He visited Vienna, the camp of Charles XII. at Alt-Rastadt, and that of Marlborough in Flanders. In 1711 he was sent to Vienna in order to reconcile the Emperor and the Duke of Savoy. In 1713 he was made Governor of Minorca. On the accession of George I., he was made general of the marine forces of Great Britain, an office continued under George II. In 1717 he was suddenly arrested at Bologna on the groundless charge of plotting against the Pretender's life. In 1719 he conducted, on his own responsibility, an intrigue with the French court through the Duke of Parma, uncle of the Queen of Spain, which resulted in the dismissal of the minister Alberoni. In 1735 he died at sea, on his way to Lisbon. "This man," says Macaulay, "was, if not the greatest, yet assuredly the most extraordinary character of that age. . . But his splendid talents and virtues were rendered almost useless to his country by his restlessness, his irritability, his morbid craving for novelty and for excitement. His weakness had not only brought him, on more than one occasion, into serious trouble, but had impelled him to some actions altogether unworthy of his humane and noble nature."

Peterloo Meeting. THE (August 16, 1819), was the most celebrated of the meetings in which the national desire for Parliamentary Reform found expression. Manchester decided to follow the example of Birmingham, and made extensive preparations for a grand meeting on Aug. 16, 1819, under the lead of a noted reformer, "Orator" Hunt. The county executive made extensive military arrangements to prevent any rioting or disturbance. On the day fixed, between 50,000 and 60,000 people marched into St. Peter's Field, then on the outskirts of Manchester, while the magistrates were watching the proceedings from a neighbouring house. As soon as Hunt rose to address the assembled crowd, they sent the chief constable to arrest him—a hopeless impossibility in the face of an enthusiastic mob. The Yeomanry were then sent to charge the crowd; but they became scattered, lost their order, and were beginning to experience some rough treatment at the hands of the crowd, when the magistrates gave the Hussars orders to charge. Nothing could have been more effectual; "the charge swept the mingled mass of human beings before it; people, yeomen, and constables, in their confused attempts to escape, ran over one another." The meeting was broken up; Hunt was arrested, and the field was left strewn with the victims of the impetuous charge, which has given to the Peterloo Meeting the name of the Manchester Massacre.

Peters, or Peter, HUGH (b. 1599, d. 1660), was a native of Fowey in Cornwall, and was educated at Cambridge. He became lecturer at St. Sepulchre's Church in the city, and in 1633 minister of an Independent congregation at Rotterdam. In 1634 he emigrated to Massachusetts, and succeeded Roger Williams as pastor at Salem. He returned to England in 1641. "I was sent over to his majesty," he said on his trial, "that we might have a little help in point of excise and customs, and encouragements in learning." He remained in England, and became an active preacher and army chaplain. In 1649 he accompanied Cromwell to Ireland, and became one of the commissioners for the amendment of the laws (1651). He was also appointed one of the Triers (1654). At the Restoration he was excepted from the Act of Indemnity, tried as a regicide and condemned to death. He was charged with plotting the king's death with Cromwell, and with exciting the soldiers against him by his preaching before and during the trial. He was also accused by rumour of being himself the executioner of Charles I., but this was not brought forward on his trial. He was executed on Oct. 16, 1660.

Petition and Advice (1657). On Feb. 23, 1657, Sir Christopher Pack brought forward in the House of Commons an address proposing the recasting of the constitution. This was discussed and amended for a month, and finally presented to Cromwell on Mar. 31 under the title of the "Petition and Advice." April was spent in discussions between Cromwell and a committee of the House touching the question of the kingship (definitely refused by Cromwell on May 8), and dealing with defects which he perceived, and amendments which he suggested in other portions of the proposed constitution. The Commons finally added a supplement to the original "Petition and Advice," called "The Humble Additional and Explanatory Petition and Advice." The two documents together, known shortly by the title of the first, made up the new scheme of government. Cromwell was empowered to choose his successor, and confirmed in the Protectorate. Parliaments were to be called every two years at the furthest, and enjoy all their customary rights. Several classes of persons, viz., all Roman Catholics, and generally all persons who had borne arms against the Parliament, and not since given signal testimony of their good affections, were excluded from political rights. The Protector was empowered to nominate a second House of seventy members, his Church establishment sanctioned, and a limited toleration secured. To the Protector's Council, consisting of twenty-one persons, approved by Parliament, an important share in the government was given. Protector and Council together disposed of the fixed yearly revenue (£1,300,000), now granted, and were responsible for its expenditure to Parliament. On the whole the Petition and Advice established a far more workable distribution of political power than the instrument of government.

Petitioners (1679) was the name given to those members of the Opposition, or "Country" party, who in this year presented petitions to Charles II. asking him to summon a Parliament in Jan., 1680. Their opponents presented counter-petitions, expressing abhorrence of the attempt to encroach on the royal prerogative, and were hence called Abhorers (q.v.).

Petition of Right (1628). When the third Parliament of Charles I. met, the Parliamentary leaders resolved to begin by vindicating the violated rights of the subjects rather than renewing the attack on Buckingham. After a general discussion the Commons proceeded to pass resolutions against arbitrary imprisonment, unparliamentary taxation, and other grievances. Wentworth suggested that they should proceed by a bill which should define what the law should be in the future, but though his idea was adopted by the Commons, the king's openly expressed opposition obliged them to drop it (April 28). Coke now proposed that they should ask the Lords to join with them in a Petition of Right (May 6), and after about three weeks' debate the Upper House passed the petition (May 28). The petition demanded four things:—(1) That no freeman should be obliged to give any gift, loan, benevolence or tax, without common consent by Act of Parliament. (2) That no freeman should be imprisoned contrary to the laws of the land. (3) That soldiers and sailors should not be billeted in private houses. (4) That commissions to punish soldiers and sailors by martial law should be revoked, and no more issued. Charles, with the consent of the Council, answered evasively, "The king willeth that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that the statutes be put in due execution." Dissatisfied with this reply, the Commons prepared a remonstrance against the advisers by whose counsel the king had acted. The king interrupted them by a message forbidding them to meddle with affairs of State. The House boldly took up again the charges against Buckingham. Before this determination, and before the ambiguous attitude of the House of Lords, the king yielded and assented to the petition according to the usual form. But the king's final surrender did not secure the agreement of king and Commons. A new quarrel unfortunately arose before the end of the month, on the question whether the petition rendered illegal the levy of tonnage and poundage without a Parliamentary grant. Nevertheless, the king's acceptance marked the beginning of a great era in English history. "The Petition of Right," says Mr. Gardiner, "has justly been deemed by constitutional historians as second in importance only to Magna Charta itself. It circumscribed the monarchy of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, as Magna Charta circumscribed the monarchy of Henry II. . . . Like Magna Charta, too, the Petition of Right was the beginning, not the end, of a Revolution."

Philiphburgh, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 13, 1645), was fought at a place two miles west of Selkirk, when Montrose's Highland army was surprised by David Leslie with 4,000 horse from the Scottish camp before Hereford. Montrose himself escaped with a small portion of his force, the rest were cut in pieces.

Philippa, QUEEN (b. circa 1312, d. 1369), wife of Edward III., was the daughter of William, Count of Holland and Hainault. She was contracted to Edward in 1326, and the marriage was celebrated in 1328. She accompanied her husband on some of his foreign expeditions, and at other times defended the kingdom in his absence; though the story of her presence at the battle of Neville's Cross rests on insufficient authority. Better authenticated is the well-known anecdote of her intercession for the burgesses of Calais, which well suits the gracious and merciful disposition of one of the most popular of our queens.

Phipps, SIR CONSTANTINE, was Lord Chancellor of Ireland (1711 to 1714), Lord Justice in 1712 and in 1714. He was an active Jacobite, and in 1712, by his efforts, won the Dublin elections for his party. The Commons impeached him in 1713, and Parliament was prorogued to protect him against them.

Pictou, GENERAL SIR THOMAS (b. 1757, d. 1815), entered the army in 1771. In 1784 he was ordered to the West Indies; and on the capture of St. Lucia, two years later, Sir Ralph Abercromby recommended him for the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 68th, and soon afterwards appointed him Governor of the island of Trinidad. In this capacity he allowed torture to be applied according to the Spanish law. Legal proceedings were instituted, and in 1805 he was found guilty by a jury in the Court of King's Bench. A new trial was, however, granted, and the verdict was reversed in 1808. In 1809 he commanded a brigade in the Walcheren expedition, and was appointed Governor of Flushing. Before he had recovered from a malarious fever, which he had contracted on this expedition, he was ordered to Portugal to command the 3rd Division, nicknamed the Fighting Division. At Badajoz he rendered most signal service. He was soon afterwards invalided, but resumed his command in time to share in the battle of Vittoria, where his division bore the brunt of the fighting. He was engaged in nearly all the battles of the Pyrenees and in the south of France. On the news of the escape of Napoleon from Elba, at Wellington's express desire, Picton accepted a command under him. At Quatre Bras he was with a very inferior force opposed to Ney, and for three hours sustained, unaided, a most obstinate contest. In this battle he received a wound, of which he told no one, lest he should be prevented from taking part in the greater battle, which he knew must soon take place. Accordingly he was present in command of the 5th Division, against which Napoleon launched one of his earliest, and, as the Duke of Wellington testified, "one of his most serious attacks." As he was in the act of giving the word for that charge, which repulsed the attempt to break the English line, he was struck by a musket-ball on the temple, and killed instantaneously. The story that the Duke of Wellington was on bad terms with Picton has been totally denied by the duke himself, who appreciated his qualities and solicited his services both in the Peninsula and in Flanders.

Picts. THE (i.e., Picti, or painted people), were the nation who in early times inhabited the north-eastern and northern parts of the modern Scotland. Their ethnology has been one of the most controverted points even in Celtic antiquities. But no one now believes that they were of Teutonic origin, and the general consensus seems to be that they were Celts of the Goidelic rather than of the Brythonic type. It has, however, been shown that not only some of their place-names, but also some of their customs, can hardly be of Aryan origin, and that consequently they were largely of "Ivernian" or pre-Aryan descent. But the term Picta, which is obviously of Roman origin, does not seem to be indicative of race, but to have been simply used to denote a group of people of various origin dwelling together, who ultimately became members of the same political organisation. To the classical writers the term Pict simply meant the whole aggregate of the tribes dwelling to the north of the Roman walls, who at an earlier age were known as the Caledonii and Meatae. They never were subjugated by the Romans, and even when the Scots had occupied the western coast of Scotland, they still held the region north of the Forth, and east of Drumalban, though at a later date Scandinavian conquests deprived them of the extreme north of the island. The range of mountains called the Mounth divided the northern from the southern Picta. There was also a third Pictish territory in Galloway, whose inhabitants, shut off by Brythonic tribes from their northern brethren, were called the Niduari Picts, and, curiously enough, retained the name long after it had become extinct north of the Forth. [GALLOWAY; CUMBRIA.] When they first became prominent in history as the devastators of the abandoned province, the Picts were mostly heathens. The Picts of Galloway had become at least partially converted to Christianity by the preaching of Ninian at the end of the fourth century. At the end of the sixth century the teaching of Columba established among the Picts the authority of the monastic and tribal church of Iona, and created intimate relations between the immigrant Scots and the race they had driven over Drumalban. About the same time a united Pictish monarchy seems to have grown up, with a peculiar rule of succession in the female line that was certainly pre-Aryan. Before long, however, the Picts were compelled to fully acknowledge the supremacy of the great Northumbrian monarchs of the seventh century. The rash enterprise of Egfrid led, however, to the Pictish victory of Dunnichen (Nechtansmere), which again secured their freedom (685). In the next century the teaching of the missionary, St. Bonifacius, induced Nectan, King of the Picts, to expel the Columban clergy, and introduce the Roman usages (717). The result was constant war with the Scots, which, along with the Danish invasions, which now became constant, reduced the Pictish kingdom to much misery. The history of the period after Bede's invaluable work ends is very obscure. The Pictish law of succession especially exposed the state to the danger of foreign kings. At last, in 844, Kenneth MacAlpin, "the first of the Scots," established a new dynasty in the land of the Picts, which produced the political union of Picts and Scots. After the end of the ninth century there are no more kings of the Picts—or of Scone, as, after its capital, the state was sometimes called—but of Alban. The whole of Scotland north of the Forth and Clyde was thus, except for the Norse jarldoms on coasts and islands, united, at least nominally, into a single state.

[T. F. T.]

Pilgrimage of Grace was the name given to the insurrection in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire in 1537, caused chiefly by the ecclesiastical and other reforms of Henry VIII. and Cromwell. It was headed by a young Lincolnshire gentleman, named Robert Aske, and joined by most of the gentlemen and nobility of Yorkshire. The rebels mustered in great force and advanced towards York, which they occupied. Joined by the Archbishop of York, Lord Darcy, and the Percies, the rebels, 30,000 strong, moved southwards. At Doncaster they were met by the royal commissioners, the Earl of Shrewsbury and the Duke of Norfolk. A conference was held, and the rebels were induced by the terms offered to disband. But, finding that their demands were not really to be complied with, an insurrection broke out anew under Sir Francis Bigod. This was suppressed with great severity. Martial law was established in the north. Aske, Darcy, and twenty other leaders were seized (March, 1537) and executed, and the movement was stamped out.

Pindarrie War. The Pindarries were a body of freebooters, established in the Vindhya Hills, recruited from all nations and religions, and finding employment sometimes with the armies of native princes, sometimes in predatory excursions of their own. Their expeditions were of the most destructive character; all mounted and lightly armed they crossed the country in marches of from forty to fifty miles a day, fell upon the devoted district, carried off everything movable in it, and burnt the houses and crops. In 1815 the Pindarries crossed the Nerbudda, and ravaged the English possessions in the Deccan. Lord Hastings determined to end this, and prepared large armies in all the presidencies. The matter was complicated by the extensive conspiracy organised by Bajee Rao and Appa Sahib, and the treachery of Dowlut Rao Scindia. The vigorous measures of Lord Hastings, however, broke up the conspiracy, and the Pindarries were beaten again and again (1817). Chetoo Singh, their chief, however, with the remnant of his followers, to the number of 20,000, assembled in arms. The English forces were concentrated for a great attack; the Pindarries seeing the hopelessness of resistance, fled; Chetoo, deprived of his followers, sought refuge in the forests of Malwa, where he was devoured by a tiger, and the Pindarries submitted (1818).

Pinhoe, THE BATTLE OF (1001), was fought between the English and the Danes, in which the latter were victorious. Pinhoe is a village three miles east of Exeter.

Pinkie Cleuch, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 10, 1547), was fought during the Protector Somerset's campaign. The two forces were drawn up on each side of the Esk, the English under Somerset and Warwick, the Scotch under the Earl of Huntly. The Scotch crossed the river and at first gained the advantage, but were scattered by a great charge of the English.

Pipe Rolls, THE, or Great Rolls of the Exchequer, are preserved in the Record Office and are almost perfect from 2 Henry II. to the present date. They relate to all matters connected with the revenue of the crown, crown lands, &c., and are of great value for historical and genealogical purposes. A Pipe Roll Society, for the publication of these documents, was formed in 1883.

Pipewell, THE COUNCIL OF (1199), was held by Richard I., immediately after his coronation, to raise money and make other preparations for his Crusade. Pipewell Abbey is in Northamptonshire, in the neighbourhood of Rockingham.

Pitcairn Island. In April, 1798, the crew of H.M.S. Bounty mutinied, owing to the harsh conduct of their commander, Lieutenant Bligh. After many adventures, a remnant of the mutineers reached Pitcairn Island in the Pacific Ocean, where, together with some women, natives of islands in the South Seas, they formed a settlement, remarkable for the orderly and exemplary conduct of its inhabitants. Their descendants inhabit the island to this day. The settlement was visited by Captain Elliot in 1839, who gave such a favourable report of the state of the islanders, that assistance was sent out to them by the government.

Pitt, WILLIAM (b. 1759, d. 1806), the son of the first Earl of Chatham and Lady Hester Grenville, was born May 28, 1759, and very early gave signs of his future greatness in his marvellous precocity. In 1773 he went up to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where his industry led him to devour mathematics and classics alike. He left Cambridge soon after his father's death, and, being called to the bar in 1780, went the Western Circuit. But in the autumn of that year a general election took place, and Pitt was returned to Parliament for Appleby. In the following February Pitt made his first speech in favour of Burke's plan for Economical Reform. His power was recognised at once; Fox proclaimed him one of the first men in Parliament. He continued to gain influence and admiration by every speech he made. Early in December news came of Cornwallis's surrender in America, and Pitt seized the opportunity to attack the government. The ministry resigned, and was succeeded by Rockingham's cabinet. Pitt was offered the Vice-Treasurership of Ireland; but he knew his own value, and declined the offer, which would not have given him a seat in the cabinet. He nevertheless supported the government till Rockingham's death. Then followed Lord Shelburne's brief tenure of office, succeeded by the Coalition. When that came to an end in Dec., 1783, the king invited Pitt to form a government. Never had a Prime Minister a more difficult task before him. In December the majority against him was almost two to one; but such was Pitt's resolution and tact, that by March 5, 1784, it had dwindled, after sixteen divisions, down to a bare majority of one. The country at large was vehement in its support of the government, and the city of London presented Pitt with its freedom. Pitt now dissolved the Parliament, and government candidates were everywhere returned. Pitt at twenty-four "domineered absolutely over the cabinet, and was the favourite at once of the sovereign, the Parliament, and the nation." Already in 1782 he had demanded an inquiry into the system of Parliamentary representation. When, however, he was in power with a large majority at his back, he was prevented by the king's strenuous opposition from again introducing the subject, and the French Revolution soon had the effect of driving the mere notion of reform of any kind out of men's minds. He nevertheless did make an effort in that direction when, in 1785, he introduced a bill "to amend the representation of the people of England in Parliament." During his first eight years of power, Pitt enjoyed a time of tranquillity and peace, when there were no wars being carried on by England, at any rate at a nearer distance than India, and the country and Parliament alike were anxious to see carried out some of the numerous reforms which had been so often talked about. The first of these measures which Pitt approached was the vexed question of Indian government, which had proved the death of the Coalition ministry. Pitt's Indian Bill was quite successful, and was followed by his scheme for the reduction of the National Debt. In the same year (1786) began the measures for the impeachment of Warren Hastings. Pitt took no active part in it, though he gave his support to the prosecution. In 1788 the king fell ill, and Pitt, supporting the constitutional view of the Regency question against Fox, who warmly took up the cause of the Prince of Wales, attached himself more firmly than ever to George III. In the same year he advocated with all his eloquence a Bill for the Abolition of the Slave Trade. When the French Revolution broke out, Pitt appeared in a new light. For the remaining years of his life he was chiefly engaged in leading the European opposition to France. His war administration, however, was far from fortunate, and his military enterprises were ill-planned and unsuccessful. But at home he still held his own in the confidence of his countrymen. He saw the immediate necessity for the union of Ireland with England; but the king's narrow-minded obstinacy prevented him combining Union with Catholic Emancipation, which alone, he said, would make the Union effectual. But Pitt was not the man to be balked in his endeavours to fulfil a promise; and, as he could not have his own way in the matter, he resigned, in 1801, the post which he had held so triumphantly for seventeen years, and with him went all the abler members of his administration. "All that was left to the king was to call up the rear ranks of the old ministry to form the front rank of a new ministry." Addington became Prime Minister, and for a time seemed to succeed, chiefly by the help of Pitt, who supported him, and by the conclusion of a peace with France on the terms of the Treaty of Amiens. But the real incapacity of Addington, combined with the restless ambition of Bonaparte, at length compelled Pitt to assume a different attitude towards the ministry. Parliament and the nation at large looked to Pitt as the only man who could save the country in the event of the war which it was seen must soon be continued with France. Addington felt the pressure on all sides, but tried to come to terms with Pitt, which would still leave him in the possession of a large share of power. In May, 1803, Pitt emerged from the retirement in which he had been living, and made a great speech, advocating the declaration of war. In April, 1804, Addington resigned. Pitt was commanded to form a ministry. He desired a broad government, which should include all the highest talent in the kingdom — Fox, Grenville, Windham, and others. But the king's obstinacy once more defeated an excellent scheme. Pitt yielded, and formed a Tory administration. Most strenuous efforts were made both at home, and by the development of foreign combinations, to avert the threatening danger; and the glorious victory of Trafalgar in Oct., 1805, crushed the French navy. But the close of Pitt's career is melancholy. The Opposition, which had refrained from any factious resistance to the war policy of the government, in April, 1805, proposed a vote of censure on Lord Melville for mismanagement of the navy while Treasurer under Pitt's former administration. Pitt stood by his old friend; but the Speaker's casting vote decided a division against the accused. Pitt regarded the adverse vote as almost a vote of censure on himself, and was quite crushed. In the following July, Parliament was prorogued; but the war was carried on with Napoleon's usual activity. In September Pitt had the satisfaction of negotiating with Russia and Austria a general coalition against Napoleon, who in reply made every preparation for invading England. Circumstances, however, prevented him from carrying out that scheme, and he turned his attention to the Continent. The capitulation of the Austrian army at Ulm on Oct. 19 was the first result of this change of plan. The news proved a death-blow to Pitt, which even the news of Trafalgar four days later could not avert. The next day, at the Lord Mayor's dinner, he spoke the last words he was ever to utter in public. In December he retired to Bath to rest; but the news of Austerlitz completed the breakdown of his health. He was just able to travel to London in January for the opening of Parliament on the 21st; but when he arrived at Putney, he was too ill to attend, and two days later, on Jan. 23, 1806, he died. Pitt has been justly called the man of Parliamentary government. No man ever, from his earliest appearance in the House of Commons to his latest days, exercised so absolute a sway over that assembly. By his incorruptible integrity, conspicuously displayed during nineteen years, he did more than any one man to crush out the corruption in high places which had prevailed during the first eighty years of the eighteenth century.

Place Bills. THE FIRST (1672) was a measure congenial to the Tory reformers of William III.'s reign. Its object was summarily to exclude all placemen from the House of Commons. "Nobody thought of drawing a line between the few functionaries who ought to be allowed to sit in the House of Commons, and the crowd of functionaries who ought to be shut out. A member who was to be chosen after 1693 was not to accept any place whatever." The bill was violently opposed in the Upper House, Marlborough making a great speech in its support. When the question was put, forty-two were in its favour and forty-four against it. Proxies were called, however, and the bill was lost by three votes. Next year the bill was introduced again, and again easily passed the Commons. It provided that no member of the House of Commons, elected after Jan. 1, 1694, should accept any place of profit under the crown, on pain of forfeiting his seat, and of being incapable of sitting again in the same Parliament. The Lords added the wise amendment, "unless he be afterwards chosen to serve in the same Parliament." The Commons agreed to this amendment. William, who appears to have misunderstood the nature of the bill, refused his assent. The angry Commons first passed an address, affirming that those who had advised the king on this occasion were public enemies; and then, on the motion of Harley, appointed a committee to draw up a representation to the king. William, however, in his reply, yielded nothing. "Thus ended, more happily than William had a right to expect, one of the most dangerous contests in which he ever engaged with his Parliament." In 1694 the bill was introduced again into the Commons. It was thrice read, but on the third reading was rejected by thirty-three votes. The result of the bill would have, as Ranke remarks, caused "Parliament and the administration to stand against one another as two distinct bodies." THE SECOND (1743) was originally proposed by Sandys, but subsequently opposed by him on the ground that George II. was antagonistic to the measure. "Derided," says Hallam, "though it was at the time, it had considerable effect; excluding a great number of inferior officers from the House of Commons, which has never since contained so revolting a list of court-deputies as it did in the age of Walpole."

Plantagenet, the name by which the house of Anjou is generally known, is derived from planta genista, the broom-plant, a sprig of which was usually worn by Geoffrey of Anjou, father of Henry II., on his cap. It is doubtful whether this custom of his is to be taken to indicate his love of field-sports, or as a sign that he was not ashamed of the humble origin of the house of Anjou, which had for its founder a woodman of Rennes. Plassey, THE BATTLE OF (June 23, 1757), was fought by Clive against the troops of Surajah Dowlah in the campaign undertaken to avenge the massacre of the Black Hole of Calcutta. Clive having concluded his arrangements with Meer Jaffier, addressed a letter to Surajah Dowlah, recapitulating the grievances which the English had to complain of, and stating that he was coming to Moorshedabad to arrange them. He set out from Chander-nagore on June 13 with an army of 1,000 Europeans, 2,000 natives, and eight pieces of cannon. Meer Jaffier, however, proved faithless, and on the 19th the rains set in with great violence. Clive saw that he had advanced too far to recede, and that there would be more danger in retiring than proceeding. Accordingly he called a council of war on the question, and it was almost unanimously decided not to risk an action. In spite of this, however, on June 22, the British force crossed the Hooghly, and at midnight encamped in a grove of mango-trees at Plassey. In the morning the Nabob's troops, headed by a body of fifty Frenchmen, were in motion, and the assault began with a furious cannonade. The English escaped the shots by sitting down under cover of a high bank. About noon a slight shower damaged the enemy's powder. They were compelled to withdraw their artillery, and Clive advanced vigorously to the attack of their lines. In spite of the gallantry of the French, Clive was able to storm the camp, rout the whole army, and pursue them for about six miles. The enemy, it is supposed, lost about 500 men; the English only seventy-two. The Nabob, influenced by the conspirators, had been the first to fly, and, mounted on a camel, and followed by about 2,000 horse, bore to his capital the news of his disgrace.

Platen, MADAME DE, was a sister of the Countess of Darlington, the mistress of George I. We find the sisters supporting Carteret against Walpole and Townshend, who relied on the influence of the Duchess of Kendal. She received a bribe of £10,000 to facilitate the passing of the South Sea Bill. In 1723 a marriage was arranged between her daughter and the Count of St. Florentin, but the countess required as a condition that a dukedom should be granted to the bridegroom. This Carteret, as Secretary for the Southern Department, exerted himself to obtain from the Duke of Orleans. Horace Walpole was thereupon sent by his brother to Paris to counteract the intrigue. Madame de Platen was ultimately consoled by a portion of £10,000 from George, but the interference of Walpole caused Carteret to retire to the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland.

Playhouse Bill, THE (1737), was brought forward by Sir Robert Walpole in order to check the indecency of the stage. His Playhouse Act was an amendment to the Vagrant Act of Queen Anne's reign. "It declared," says Lord Stanhope, "that any actor without a legal settlement, or a licence from the Lord Chamberlain, should be deemed a rogue and a vagabond. To the Lord Chamberlain it gave legal power instead of customary privilege; authorising him to prohibit the representation of any drama at his discretion, and compelling all authors to send copies of their plays fourteen days before they were acted, under forfeiture of £50, and of the licence of the house. Moreover, it restrained the number of playhouses, by enjoining that no person should have authority to act except within the liberties of Westminster, and where the king should reside." The bill was carried in spite of the vigorous opposition of Lord Chesterfield; and its effect in subjecting all plays acted to the previous examination of the Lord Chamberlain and the officials appointed by him, has never been undone.

Pleas, THE COURT OF COMMON, or COMMON BENCH, gained existence as a separate court from the curia regis by the 17th article of Magna Charta, which provided that "common pleas should not follow the court, but be held in some fixed place." In the early part of the reign of Henry III. it was distinguished from the Exchequer and the King's Bench as having cognisance of the private suits of subjects. The Court of Common Pleas was held at Westminster. In the reign of Edward I. the Barons of the Exchequer were forbidden to interfere in its jurisdiction, and from the beginning of that reign commences a regular series of Chief Justices of Common Pleas. A full bench consisted of the Chief Justice and of four (after 31 & 32 Vic., of five) puisné judges. This court had a concurrent jurisdiction with the Queen's Bench and Exchequer in personal actions and ejectment. It had an exclusive jurisdiction in real actions. Under the Parliamentary Elections Act of 1868, and under the Railway and Canal Act of 1853, it also received appeals from the Revising Barristers' courts. Appeals from this court formerly lay to the King's Bench, but were transferred by 21 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. to the judges of the King's Bench and the Barons of the Exchequer sitting in the Exchequer Chamber. The exclusive jurisdiction of the court was maintained by the Judicature Act of 1873, for the Common Pleas Division, but in virtue of s. 31, has since been merged by Order of Council in the general jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice.

Plegmund, Archbishop of Canterbury (890—914), was a man of very extensive literary acquirements, and one of the chief ornaments of Alfred's court. It is generally supposed that it is to him that we owe the compilation of a portion of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, and it is known that he assisted the king in many of his literary undertakings, notably in the translation of Gregory's pastorals. "He carried out consistently the plans of Alfred, and laboured diligently to secure for the Church a learned ministry."

Plunket, WILLIAM CONYNHAM, LORD (b. July, 1764, d. Jan. 4, 1854), the son of a clergyman; he was educated at Trinity College, and in 1787 was called to the Irish bar. In 1807 he became member for Midhurst; in 1812 for Dublin University. He was one of the most brilliant speakers in an age of orators. He was not a Whig, but a follower of Lord Grenville. In 1821, after Grattan's death, he became the chief pro-motor of Catholic Emancipation (q.v.) in Parliament. He had before been Solicitor-General, and in 1821 became Attorney-General. As such he proceeded ex officio against the promoters of the "Bottle Plot" (q.v.), and his conduct was criticised in Parliament, but he was able to vindicate it successfully. In 1827 Canning tried to get him made Lord Chancellor, but the king refused. He was, however, made Lord Chief Justice of the Irish Court of Common Pleas, and a peer. In 1830 he became Lord Chancellor.

Poitiers, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 19, 1356), was the second of Edward the Black Prince's great victories over the French. In 1355 the truce which had been concluded for eight years came to an end. The Black Prince at the head of a great army, largely composed of mercenaries, landed in Guienne, and marched up the Garonne, plundering the country. The following year he marched towards the Loire; but near Poitiers he found his way barred by 80,000 men under King John of France. The prince's army is said not to have exceeded 8,000; but it was very strongly posted behind lanes, hedges, and vineyards, which were lined with archers. His offers to treat were rejected, and the French horse pressed on up the lane. But they fell back in confusion before the arrows of the English. At the same time they were charged in flank by the English cavalry, while the main body of the English foot advanced on their front. The French fought desperately, but were completely routed. 8,000 of them were killed, and among the crowd of prisoners was King John himself.

Poitiers, WILLIAM OF (b. c. 1020), was a Norman soldier who subsequently took orders, and became one of William the Conqueror's chaplains. He wrote Gesta Guillelmi, an account of the Norman Conquest, embracing the period from 1036 to 1067. Being a contemporary account, his history is of considerable value.

Pole, ARTHUR, son of Geoffrey Pole, and nephew of Cardinal Pole, attempted in 1562 to form a conspiracy in conjunction with his brother, Edward Pole, and with the aid of the Duke of Guise, against Elizabeth, offering in case of his success to sink his own claims to the throne in favour of Mary Queen of Scots. The plot was discovered before it came to anything, and Pole was sent to the Tower, and condemned though not executed. His claims to the throne, by which he hoped to win over a large number of adherents, were derived from George, Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV.

Pole, REGINALD, CARDINAL (b. 1500, d. 1558), was the younger son of Sir Richard Pole, by Margaret, daughter of George, Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. Though educated for the Church and destined for the highest ecclesiastical preferments, he gave up all his prospects rather than acquiesce in the divorce of Queen Catherine and the separation of England from the Papacy. He retired to Italy, and was made a cardinal by Paul III. He was the intimate associate of Contarini and the early reformers of Catholicism; took an important share in the business of the Curia, and, it is said, narrowly missed the papal chair. He took a leading part in the Council of Trent, though that assembly condemned his doctrine of justification. He never lost sight of England; wrote a book against Henry; constantly stirred up the Catholic powers against him, and was the leading representative of English Catholicism in Europe. At last the reaction under Mary restored him to England as papal legate and Archbishop of Canterbury. He was her leading adviser in ecclesiastical affairs, though he is said to have been averse to some of the more brutal aspects of her persecutions. Towards the end of his life he was involved in a quarrel with Paul IV., who deprived him of his legatine position.

Polish Note, THE (1863). The news of the Polish insurrection, and its sanguinary suppression, excited great enthusiasm and sympathy in England and France for the Polish cause. France was ready for intervention if England would join. Earl Russell went to the extent of drawing up, in concert with France and Austria, a note on the subject, urging on the Russian government six points as the outline of a pacification of Poland. These were—a complete amnesty, a national representation, a distinct national administration of Poles for the kingdom of Poland, full liberty of conscience, with the repeal of all the restrictions imposed on Catholic worship, the recognition of the Polish language as official, the establishment of a regular system of recruiting. Lord Palmerston, however, refused to hear of anything like armed intervention. When Russia learnt that the note was a mere unsupported suggestion, she treated it coolly and contemptuously. The question, however, was brought up in the House of Commons by Mr. P. Hennessy. The result was a hot debate, in which Mr. Disraeli, Lord Palmerston, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Stanfeld, Lord Robert Cecil, and others, vied with each other in expressing detestation of these barbarities. A great meeting was held on the subject at the Guildhall, at which similar indignant speeches were delivered. Nothing, however, was done by the government beyond the despatch of the Note.

Polish Question (1831—32). At the outbreak of the Polish rebellion England warmly sympathised with the rebels. At the same time Palmerston, occupied with the Belgian question, steadily refused to assist the Poles except by suggestions to Russia. But that power knew he would not interfere by arms, and his remonstrances were treated with derision. He made another attempt to obtain mercy for the Poles after the fall of Warsaw, but Nesselrode briefly informed him that the only obligation incumbent on Russia by the Treaty of Vienna, was the duty of maintaining the union, and that the constitution was a grace of the emperor, which had been forfeited by rebellion. In 1831, however, the woes of Poland attracted the attention of the House of Commons. But these attacks produced no result. The feeling in favour of the Poles grew as the news of the Russian cruelties were brought home, and in July, 1833, Mr. Cullar Ferguson moved an address to the crown in favour of the Poles. Palmerston, however, opposed this, urging that the British government could not do more than it had done, unless it declared war, and that the latter course would be hardly advisable. However, the most violent language was applied to Russia and its emperor in Parliament, and the feeling against them became so strong, that later in the session, the ministry was compelled to give way, and grant a sum of £10,000 for the relief of the Polish exiles.

Pontage was a duty imposed upon all freemen for the making and repairing of bridges, and is the same as the "Brig-bot" of Anglo-Saxon times. In a charter of Edward I. to certain foreign merchants, we find them exempted from "pontage."

Poor, ROGER LE (OR, ROGER PAUPER), was the son of Roger, Bishop of Salisbury. By his father's influence he was made Chancellor by King Stephen in 1135, but in 1139 he was, together with many other ministers, arrested by the king. He was carried to Devizes, where his cousin Nigel, Bishop of Ely, was holding out against the royal troops, and the threat that, unless he surrendered, his cousin should be put to death before his eyes, had the intended effect. After remaining in captivity for some time, he was released on condition of quitting the kingdom, to which he never returned.

Poor Law, THE (IRELAND). There was no legal provision for the Irish poor previous to the year 1828, though some two and a half millions were annually spent in charity. In 1838 the English system was introduced, and though the Irish were, and are, especially unwilling to enter a poor-house, it on the whole succeeded. During the famine, indeed, the poorer unions were very soon bankrupt, and Parliament was more than once called on to relieve them. At last, in 1849, the Rate in Aid Bill was passed, by which to relieve the poor districts of Connaught—a general rate all over Ireland was resorted to, government lending £100,000 for the relief of immediate distress, on this security.

Poor Laws is the name which has been given to the legislation providing for the relief and maintenance of the destitute. In mediæval England the care of the helpless poor was undertaken generally by the lords of manors, the parochial clergy, the monasteries, and religious guilds, and in the case of poor craftsmen by the trade guilds. After the Black Death in 1349 the surviving labourers refused to work, except at higher wages. By an Act of the same year (the first of the many "Statutes of Labourers") an attempt was made to force all able-bodied men to work, and almsgiving to "sturdy" or "valiant" beggars was forbidden. In the Act of 1388, confirming the Statute of Labourers, appears the first germ of a law of settlement. The labourer was thereby forbidden to leave his place of service, or to wander about the country without a passport; impotent beggars were to remain where they were at the passing of the Act, or if not there provided for, to seek a maintenance within their hundreds, or in the places where they were born. In the Acts of 1495 and 1504 it was further provided that beggars should be "sent to the place where they were born, or have dwelt, or are best known, to support themselves by begging within the hundred."

In the sixteenth century the break-up of the system of the manor and craft-guild, the dissolution of the monasteries and religious guilds, and the increase of prices owing to debasement of the coinage, made the question of pauperism much more pressing than it had ever been before, and some systematic attempt to provide relief was necessary to prevent social anarchy. In 1536 it was enacted that while the "lusty" poor might be "daily kept on continual labour," the poor who were not able to work should be provided for. For this purpose the congregation of each parish were to be exhorted to charitable offerings, and a book was to be kept by the clergy showing how the money was spent. In 1551 collectors of alms at church on Sunday were to be appointed, and persons refusing to subscribe were to be expostulated with by the bishop. By a later Act the bishop was empowered to send them before the justices, who, if persuasion failed, could impose upon them the payment of a definite amount. It was not, however, till 1601 that a general compulsory rating was substituted for semi-voluntary contribution. This Act, the foundation of English Poor Law, ordered the nomination by the justices of two or three overseers in each parish, who were empowered to raise the amount necessary for the relief of the poor by taxing every inhabitant. The Act drew a clear distinction between able-bodied poor unwilling to labour, or unable to find employment, who were to be set to work, and impotent poor unable to work, who were to be relieved. Persons able but refusing to labour were to be committed to prison.

The Law of Settlement, which took the place of the various Tudor statutes to suppress vagrancy by imprisonment, whipping, branding, and the like, began with an Act of 1662. This authorised the justices, upon complaint of the overseers, made within forty days of a person's coming to a strange parish, to order him to be removed to his own place of settlement, unless he could give securities to the parish against becoming chargeable to it. The natural result of this Act was to keep the poor to their own parishes, and to prevent labourgoing where it was needed. Intolerable tyranny was its outcome. In 1685 it was enacted that inasmuch as "poor people at their first coming do commonly conceal themselves," the forty days should count from their giving notice of their residence to the overseers. In 1691 various other ways of obtaining settlement were established, such as payment of taxes for a year, or a year's hiring, or the serving of an annual office. Still more important was another provision of the same Act. In order to prevent misuse of the powers of overseers, it was ordered that a register should be kept of paupers and of the amounts received by them, that a new list should be made out yearly, and that no one else should receive relief, except by authority of one justice, or by order of the bench of justices at quarter sessions. This latter clause was speedily interpreted as empowering justices to order relief to applicants at their own discretion. An attempt was in vain made to meet the misuse of this power by an Act of 1723, which enacted that the applicant must prove that he had already applied to the parish officers, who must show cause why he was not relieved. But the evil result of allowing justices to act independently in the matter of relief were not very apparent till the end of the eighteenth century, and, on the whole, the Poor Law worked well down to 1760.

In 1697 a workhouse had been built in Bristol under a special Act, and there "the workhouse test" was first adopted, i.e., willingness to enter the house was alone taken as a test of destitution. The plan proved so successful that it was imitated in some other towns, and by the Act of 1723 parishes were empowered, singly or in unions, to provide workhouses, with the proviso that persons refusing to enter such houses should be refused relief. This Act resulted in a great diminution of expenditure where adopted, yet it seems to have been carried out in comparatively few parishes.

The industrial revolution which began in the second half of the eighteenth century, and the increase of enclosures, led to a rapid extension of pauperism, which was still further encouraged by a slipshod philanthropy. By Gilbert's Act of 1782 parishes were empowered to form unions or incorporations with adjacent parishes; these incorporations were permitted to build workhouses. The justices were to appoint guardians (paid officials, like modern relieving-officers) to administer relief. The Act of 1723 was practically repealed in the case of incorporations by the provision that none but the impotent were to be sent to the workhouse, while suitable employment was to be provided for the able-bodied near their own homes. Sixty-seven such incorporations were formed, and the result of the statute was that in five years the cost of relief rose from one and a half to two million pounds.

The pressure of the Continental war led to still more disastrous measures. In 1796 the Berkshire magistrates drew up a declaration (the so-called "Speenhamland Act of Parliament") fixing a scale of relief according to the price of wheat, and the number of children in a family, and they were imitated in several other counties. The practical effect of this was that relief was granted in aid of wages, and the farmers, themselves benefiting through their long leases by the high price of corn, were able to throw part of the cost of their labour upon non-farming residents in their parishes. Next year an Act legalised generally out-door relief, and formally repealed the Act of 1723. In 1801, moreover, the justices became the rating as well as the relieving authority. Some attempt was made in 1819 to improve the state of things by empowering such parishes as chose to elect a "select vestry" to superintend the overseers. In most parishes, however, especially in the rural districts, relief was still administered by the overseers, with the right of appeal to the justices on the part of the labourer when the overseers were not sufficiently pliant. The worst consequences followed—the agricultural labourers were pauperised, the bastardy laws made vice very profitable, and a premium was set on idleness and improvidence. Between 1784 and 1818 the amount of poor rate increased about three times as fast as population (population from eight millions to nearly twelve millions, poor rate from two million pounds to almost eight millions). These evils led to a commission of inquiry in 1833, and the great Act of 1834, the most important in the history of Poor Law after 1601. It attempted to restore the workhouse test for able-bodied paupers; parishes were grouped into unions, and placed under elected boards of guardians, and the guardians were put under a central board at London — the Poor Law Commissioners, superseded in 1847 by the Poor Law Board, and that in 1871 by the Local Government Board, headed by a responsible minister as President. The measure was for a time very successful, and by 1841 the poor rate had fallen to £4,760,000. In 1844 the "Out-door Prohibitory Relief Order" finally forbade all relief except in the workhouse. But the commissioners still allowed out-door relief in case of sickness or "bodily infirmity," and this was speedily construed to cover relief to persons over sixty years of age incapable of earning wages. But this led once more to a rapid increase of out-door relief, encouraging improvidence, and causing wages to be lower than they would otherwise have been. During the ten years 1861 — 71 the expenditure rose from five and three-quarter to more than seven and three-quarter million pounds, and the number of paupers from 883,921 to 1,037,360. This increase of pauperism, together with the growth of a spirit of scientific philanthropy, led to strong efforts to enforce the workhouse test, and these have met with considerable success. They have been seconded in London by Goschen's Act of 1870, which placed workhouse expenditure on a metropolitan fund, while leaving out-door relief to be borne by each district. It has been generally found, however, impossible to get rid of out-door relief, unless some charitable organisation, working in concert with the Poor Law authorities, deals with cases of temporary distress, and with the misfortunes of the provident poor.

Poorunder, THE TREATY OF (March 1, 1776), was concluded between the East India Company and the Poonah State. It annulled all the engagements of the Treaty of Surat to Ragoba, who was to disband his army and retire to the banks of the Godavery on a pension. The British army was to quit the field, Salsette was to be retained if the Governor-General desired it, but all other acquisitions were to be relinquished; the claim of the English on the revenues of Baroach was conceded with twelve lacs for the expenses of the war.

Popham, SIR JOHN (b. 1531, d. 1607), appointed Solicitor-General in 1579, was two years later elected Speaker of the House of Commons. He became Attorney-General the same year, an office which he held for eleven years, during which he took part in most of the important State trials of the period. In 1592, Popham succeeded Sir Christopher Wray as Lord Chief Justice, in which capacity he presided at the trials of Sir Walter Raleigh and the conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot. He is said to have been the originator of the idea of the transportation of felons to New England and other colonies. Sir Edward Coke calls him "a man of ready apprehension, profound judgment, most excellent understanding, and admirable experience and knowledge of all business which concerned the Commonwealth."

Popish Plot, THE, was the name given to an imaginary conspiracy of the Catholics in the reign of Charles II. Though, no doubt, there were some projects for an attempt against the government agitated by the English Catholics, there is little doubt that the "plot" owed its existence chiefly to the imagination of Titus Oates and other informers. Oates was an English clergyman of bad character, who had become a Roman Catholic, and joined the Jesuits at St. Omer. In 1678 he deposed before a magistrate that he knew the particulars of a papist scheme, by which the king was to be killed, a Roman Catholic ministry appointed, and a massacre of the Protestants prepared with the assistance of a French army. A few days afterwards Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Oates had sworn, was found murdered on Primrose Hill, and a universal panic spread over the nation, which seemed for the time to have lost its senses. The wildest stories of Oates and the informers who arose were believed without question. Parliament met on Oct. 21, and the Commons resolved, "that there hath been, and still is, a damnable and hellish plot, carried on by papist recusants for assassinating the king, the subverting the government, and for rooting out the Protestant religion." The plot was taken up by Shaftesbury as a weapon against his political opponents and the Duke of York. On the evidence of Oates, Dangerfield, Carstairs, and Bedloe, many leading Roman Catholics were tried, convicted, and imprisoned, or executed, and Oates went so far as to swear that he had heard the queen give her consent to the king's murder. On Nov. 30 an Act was passed "for disabling papists from sitting in either Houses of Parliament." In March of the following year (1679) the bill to exclude the Duke of York from the throne was brought in, and though Charles deferred it for that year by a dissolution, it was carried through the Commons in Nov., 1680, and rejected in the House of Lords. In Dec., 1680, Lord Stafford, the most distinguished of the victims of the Popish Plot, was executed. But by this time a reaction had set in. The judges would no longer convict on the evidence of the informers, and the people were alienated by what seemed like a Whig persecution of the Duke of York. In March, 1681, Charles dissolved his fifth Parliament, and governed without one during the remainder of his reign; and later in the year one of the false witnesses, Colledge, was put on his trial, and condemned at Oxford, and Shaftesbury himself was prosecuted by the crown for treason, though the bill was thrown out by the grand jury in London. Population. There is no subject on which wilder guesses have been made than those which, without enumeration, or something equivalent to enumeration, have been hazarded about the population of cities and counties, about the numbers of contending or invading armies, and about the ravages of famine and pestilence. Accounts of those numbers have been given, occasionally with some statement which appears to be confirmatory, but which later research has accepted with distrust. Thus, Herodotus states a number for the invading host of Xerxes, and asserts in confirmation of his figures that a rough census was taken of the army and its followers. But in the more critical age of Juvenal the whole narrative was scouted as the invention of a vainglorious and mendacious Greek. In the same manner, but with a better critical apparatus, Hume, in his essay on the populousness of ancient cities, challenged the assertions of those who claimed millions where thousands would have been nearer the truth. In our own country the same exaggerations have been made, doubtless in good faith. Gascoigne, the critic, and in some degree the chronicler of the fifteenth century, a Chancellor of Oxford University, and a highly estimable and honourable person, alleges that he read the names of thirty thousand students in Oxford during the period immediately antecedent to the great Plague of 1349. They could not possibly have been housed in the town, or if housed, could hardly have been fed. We are told that sixty thousand persons perished by disease in Norwich between January and July in the above-named year, but it is certain that till the last thirty years, or thereabouts, Norwich has never had 60,000 inhabitants. Numbers are habitually exaggerated, and when panic is abroad the exaggeration rapidly becomes a geometrical ratio.

During the fourteenth century, and nearly to the end of the sixteenth, the population of England and Wales could not have been more than from two to two and a half millions. The proof of this statement is partly indirect, and partly direct. It may be confidently affirmed that, provided the inhabitants of a country subsist on one kind of grain, as the English from the remotest period have on wheat—more generally, indeed, from the Middle Ages to the eighteenth century than they even do at present—the number of persons in the country will be almost exactly equal to the number of quarters of wheat which is annually produced in the country. Now it could be shown, and it has been shown elsewhere, that the maximum produce of wheat in England and Wales from the beginning of the fourteenth to the close of the sixteenth century could not have been more than two and a half millions of quarters, and was probably much less, the average rate of production per acre being below eight bushels. The writer of this article has examined many thousands of farm accounts, giving the exact amount of produce from the acreage sown in all parts of England, and he is confident that eight bushels to the acre is a liberal estimate in average years.

We are not, however, without direct estimates. There are several taxing rolls in the Record Office, especially records of poll taxes, from which it is possible to arrive at an approximate estimate of population. One of those more than a century ago was published, and commented on in the Archæologia. In 1377, the last year of Edward III.'s reign, Parliament granted the king a poll tax of four pence a head on all lay persons over fourteen years of age, none but known beggars being exempted from contributing. Beneficed clergymen paid a shilling: other ecclesiastical persons, except mendicant friars, paid, like the laity, four pence. The number of persons who paid the tax in the whole country, and in the principal towns is given, and Mr. Topham added one-third to the amount, in order to include the untaxed part of the population, a quantity which the vital statistics of the time entirely justified, though now, owing to sanitary improvements, the life of childhood is prolonged beyond what was to be expected then, and, therefore, the proportion of youth to a more adult age is higher. The forty-two towns, which are separately enumerated, had an aggregate population of 168,720 persons. The rest of the population in the county and small towns is 1,207,722. But from this enumeration Durham and Chester, and Wales, including Monmouth, are excluded, not being taxed in the grant. Mr. Topham put this population at 182,123, making a total of 1,558,565. By adding a third of this number for the children, and giving a very liberal allowance for beggars and begging friars, a total of two and a quarter millions is reached.

Again, there exists in the archives of the Record Office an enumeration of the population and the quantity of corn produced in nine of the Kentish hundreds. This was certainly made in the first half of the sixteenth century. Kent was one of the wealthiest counties in mediæval England, if we take into account the large amount of down and woodland which it contains. The district referred to contained no large town then, and contains none now. The population was 14,813 in the period referred to, and was 88,080 in 1871, or almost exactly six times more. Now six times two and a half millions is about the number of persons who can in average years be supported by the produce of English agriculture, the residue being dependent on foreign supplies. But it is in the highest degree improbable that those calculations, derived from different elements, not two being from matters of fact, should so closely agree in the conclusion, and that conclusion be an error.

The readers of Macaulay will remember that this author, in his excellent but unequal chapter on the state of England at the death of Charles II., argues with conclusive force that three separate calculations have been made as to the population of England and Wales about that time. Gregory King calculated the quantity from the hearth tax, and set it at five and a half millions. The second estimate is taken from a return made to William III. as to the number of the several religious sects, and concludes with a population of under five and a half millions. The third is that of a writer of our own time, who has gathered his inferences from the registers of baptisms, marriages, and burials, and reaches nearly the same figure. We could add a fourth estimate, which would arrive at almost exactly the same conclusion, viz., from the rate of production from the soil, which was at this time more than double that at which it stood in the period from the accession of Edward III. in 1327 to the death of Elizabeth in 1603, so great had been the progress of agriculture during the seventeenth century, and we may add, also, of opulence.

The fact is, a country will always contain as many people as can subsist on the produce of its own soil, or being engaged in manufacture and trade, can procure from foreign sources the whole or part of what it needs for its subsistence. Occasionally it produces nothing, but gets all its wants from external sources, as Venice did in the time of its greatest opulence and power. More frequently, if it be eminent as a trading or manufacturing country, it obtains a portion of its supplies in exchange for its service as a trader, or for its goods as a producer. The population will be nearly or quite stationary if it cannot expand in the direction of trade, or of generally merchantable commodities. The population may be stationary by reason of climate, or, perhaps, of race, but the soil of a diminishing fertility, or the soil of an unequal progression, will be filled by foreign immigrants. It is sometimes said that the native population of the American Union, especially in the Eastern States, is unprogressive, though this has been denied or disputed.

But the accession of the foreign population in America is an enormous annual total, and would be, even if the growth of the native-born stocks was obvious and indisputable. The fact is, the production of food within the limits of the American Union is vastly in excess of the possible wants of the existing population.

Fears have been expressed that the growth and increase of the human race would at no remote period induce some enormous calamity, that the area of cultivable land is limited, that the power of occupation is limited, and that the facilities of transport are limited also. But at present, and as far as one can interpret the facts, for an indefinite future these contingencies are increasingly distant. The distribution of products is rendered year by year more easy, and the distribution of labour, though certainly not so obvious and immediate, is sufficiently easy for some relief to a local plethora of labour, or to a temporary lack of employment, or for the attractiveness of a new field of labour. It is not, indeed, true, as some modern socialists have alleged, that a rapid growth of population can never meet with a glutted market, or deficient sustenance, but there are checks which the theorists of the pessimist view do not enumerate, and there are risks which the optimist interpreters of the situation do not recognise. If Matthews and Ricardo and the elder and younger Mill had been told that now (1884) the three kingdoms would contain nearly forty millions of people, and that food would be cheaper, employment more constant, and wages higher than when they sought to interpret the facts, they would have possibly retained their theories, but would have been far less confident in their accuracy.

Over-population, like over-production, is partial, and confined to particular employments or classes. When a calling is prosperous or reputable it attracts persons, and those who are attracted are not easily able to abandon their choice. In the United States, and the English colonies, where there is a boundless field for certain callings, there is a very restricted market for others. In these countries there has long been an over-population of clerks and shopmen, and such persons have been warned for many years past that there is no field for their service in a country which has infinite opportunities, for in truth there never is an over-population of industrial agents, whose services are permanently and increasingly in demand, and there always is an over-population of those who cannot find employment for the labour which they think they can give, but which the market does not estimate. So, again, there are employments of capitalists which are over-crowded, perhaps at present more so than among artisans. [For the numbers of the population since 1801, see CENSUS.]

century down to the economists of our own time. The principal work, on which the largest and most permanent controversy has been waged, is that of Malthus (q.v.). See Godwin, Political Justice; Doubleday, Theory of Population; the writings of the two Mills, father and son; and, for the ancient condition of England, Rogers, Agriculture and Prices, and Six Centuries of Work and Wages. Portland, RICHARD WESTON, EARL OF (b. 1577, d. 1634), became collector of the customs in the port of London, and one of the commissioners charged with the reform of the navy (1618). He was subsequently entrusted with important negotiations in Germany (1620), and at Brussels (1623). In Sept., 1621, he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1624 he strongly opposed war with Spain, but contrived to preserve Buckingham's favour, and was created Baron Weston, April 13, 1628. In the House of Lords he strove to amend the Petition of Right by inserting a clause saving the king's "sovereign right," and two months later was made Lord Treasurer (July, 1628). After Buckingham's death he succeeded to his influence, and became the king's chief adviser. As such he advised the dissolution of the third Parliament, and was threatened with impeachment by Eliot. In the administration of the Treasury he was careful and economical, but succeeded in securing for himself a large fortune. In foreign affairs he aimed at an understanding with Spain, and was partly responsible for the two treaties with that power for the partition of Holland (1631-34). He opposed intervention in the German War. His influence in the Council was assailed by Laud, by the queen, by the Earl of Holland, and many others, yet he retained the king's confidence till his death. He was created Earl of Portland on Feb. 17, 1633. Clarendon terms him "a man of big looks and a mean and abject spirit." He declared himself a Catholic on his death-bed.

Portland, WILLIAM BENTINCK, EARL OF, afterwards DUKE OF (b. 1649, d. 1709), was a member of a noble Dutch family, and a close friend of William III. His friendship with William of Orange is said to have originated from his nursing the prince through a severe attack of small-pox. On the discovery of the Rye House Plot he was sent by William of Orange to England to congratulate Charles II. and the Duke of York on their escape. He was sent to England in 1687 in order to confer with the leaders of the Opposition there. He accompanied William to England. In 1689 he was in favour of William's sole claim to the throne, and had a violent dispute with Burnet on the subject. In 1690 he was sent by William to Holland in order to calm Amsterdam, where the citizens refused to allow William to nominate the magistrates. He had been created Earl of Portland, and Groom of the Stole. He accompanied the king to Ireland, and commanded a troop of Dutch horse. In Jan., 1691, he sailed with William for Holland. William had given him large grants of land in Wales, but the hostility of the Commons compelled him to revoke the grant (1695). In July, 1697, a series of informal interviews took place between him and Marshal Boufflers at Hull, while the conference was sitting at Ryswick, with a view to terms of peace. It was through these interviews that the Treaty of Ryswick was eventually concluded (Sept., 1697). Meanwhile the friendship between Portland and William was growing cold, for the former showed an unworthy jealousy of the king's new favourite, Arnold Van Keppel. Next year, therefore, the king sent him to Paris at the head of a magnificent embassy. Portland executed his duties with fidelity. Together with Marshal Tallard, he laid down the lines of the Partition Treaty. Portland returned to England, and in the beginning of 1699 surprised everyone by resigning his office as Chamberlain. His jealousy of Keppel seems still to have been the motive that influenced him. The quarrel between Portland and Albemarle grew in intensity, and at length he retired altogether from court. In 1701, he came forward to defend the Second Partition Treaty. Together with Somers he was impeached for his share in the matter, and the Commons requested that he might be removed from the king's councils. There were additional charges against him for grants and dilapidations of the royal revenue. But the Commons, who refused to appear at the trial of Somers, allowed the impeachments to drop. He was present at the deathbed of William, and in his last moments the king took the hand of his old friend and pressed it tenderly to his heart. Portland lived in retirement for the remainder of his life. "Bentinck," says Macaulay, "was early pronounced by Temple to be the best and truest servant that ever prince had the good fortune to possess, and continued through life to merit that honourable character."

Portugal, RELATIONS WITH. The friendly relations which Henry II. had established with the princes of the Iberian peninsula made the few dealings between the early Portuguese monarchs and the English court of a generally amicable nature. More intimate relations began when the Black Prince became the partisan of Peter the Cruel of Castile, and John of Gaunt claimed his throne as his daughter's husband. The reigning King of Portugal, Don Ferdinand, joined the English against Henry of Trastamare, who had succeeded in winning the throne of Peter. In 1381 an English army, under the Earl of Cambridge, who had also married a daughter of Peter's, came into Portugal; but very little was done, the English troops behaved badly, and Ferdinand concluded a truce with the Castilians. The marriage of Cambridge's son John to Beatrice, the king's daughter, was annulled on the retirement of the English, and on Ferdinand's death in 1383, Don John of Avis had to fight for his throne against Beatrice's husband, King John of Castile. In 1386 John of Gaunt came with an English army to help the new king, whom he married to his daughter Philippa. But the campaigns proved unfortunate, and John of Gaunt abandoned both Portugal and his hopes of the Castilian crown. The career of maritime glory into which Portugal embarked in the fifteenth century brought it into no direct relations with England, though it prepared the way for later English enterprise; and when the English first appeared in India they were welcomed by the Great Mogul as likely to counterbalance the Portuguese. Intimate commercial relations between England and Portugal also sprang up during the later Middle Ages. The conquest of Portugal in 1580 by Philip II. of Spain led to the fitting out of the Armada in Lisbon harbour, but also to the English affording a refuge to Don Antonio Prior of Crato, the popular candidate for the Portuguese throne, in whose behalf Drake, in 1589, avenged the Armada by an expedition to the coast of Portugal. But though Antonio accompanied the fleet, it did more harm to Spain than good to Portugal, and the plundering of Portuguese vessels, and the devastation of Portuguese colonies by the English, involved their old ally in their war against her new master. In 1640 Portugal began her successful revolt under John of Braganza against Spain. One of the first acts of the new State was to conclude, in 1642, a commercial treaty with Charles I.; but this rather complicated its relations with the government of the Commonwealth. In 1650 John refused to surrender the fleet of Princes Rupert and Maurice, which had taken refuge in the Tagus, to Blake; an act which, despite the voluntary retirement of the princes, caused some disagreement. But in 1652 the English war against the Dutch, the enemies of Portugal, and Cromwell's adoption of an anti-Spanish policy soon after, made it an easy matter to renew in 1654 the treaty of 1642. This began the political and commercial dependence of Portugal on England, which was continued by the marriage of Catherine of Braganza to Charles II.; a measure necessitated by the abandonment of the Portuguese by the French in the Treaty of the Pyrenees, and justified by the security it gave to Portuguese independence, both against the Spaniards and Dutch. But the cession of Bombay and Tangier almost acknowledged the commercial supremacy of the English. At last the designs of Louis XIV. on Spain involved the Portuguese in hostility to him, and justified the conclusion of the Methuen Treaty (q.v.) in 1706, which completed the dependence of Portugal. Through it Portuguese armies fought with Stanhope and Galway against the French and Spaniards during the Succession War. All through the eighteenth century Portugal, like Holland, was a satellite of England. The whole trade of Portugal fell into English hands. The commerce of Lisbon and Oporto was entirely carried on by English factors. The vineyards of the Douro, and the mines of Brazil, were ultimately quite dependent on English capital. The bread which the Portuguese ate, and the clothes which they wore, were brought from England; and, what was worse to disciples of the mercantile system, the "balance of trade" was constantly in favour of the English. The famous Marquis of Pombal, who, during the reign of King Joseph (1750-1777) upheld almost alone the power of Portugal, sought to change this dependence into alliance on equal terms. The English factors and Jesuits combined to plot his ruin; but his triumph resulted in a transient revival of Portuguese trade through his commercial companies, and Pitt was willing to accept the assistance of the Portuguese army, which the Count von der Lippe had reorganised in the war against Spain at the close of the Seven Years' War. The death of King Joseph, and the fall of Pombal, renewed the degradation of Portugal. The war against revolutionary France again necessitated its dependence on England. Even in 1801, when France and Spain were united against it, Portugal struggled some time before accepting the Treaty of Madrid, which gave France equal commercial rights with England. But the refusal of Portugal in 1807 to accept the Continental system involved it in fresh hostilities with France. English help alone forced Junot to conclude the Convention of Cintra. Henceforth Portugal was the basis of operations against the French during the whole Peninsular War. Government and army became alike dependent on England, and the Portuguese troops disciplined by Beresford, proved no unworthy allies of the English under Wellington. The conclusion of the war left Portugal, where the liberal spirit was rising, in the hands of the tyrannical government of a king who had sought in Brazil a secure refuge from the French. In 1822 a constitution was obtained; but in 1824 an absolutist reaction under Don Miguel took place; which was renewed in 1828. Canning exerted all his energies in favour of the constitutional party. But after his death the Wellington ministry took a neutral attitude, which practically meant supporting Don Miguel. The heroic struggle of Dona Maria provoked, however, much sympathy, and in 1833 an English expedition under Napier powerfully assisted in the triumph of the constitutional party, and the quadruple alliance of England, France, and Spain with Portugal guaranteed their success. In 1835 the Methuen Treaty was annulled. But up to the present time the long commercial dependence which the treaty had occasioned has not entirely ceased to show its results.

Portugal, THE JOURNEY OF, was the name given to the expedition undertaken in the year 1589 for the purpose of wresting the Portuguese crown from Philip of Spain, and bestowing it on Don Antonio, the pretended rightful sovereign, who was an illegitimate son of Henry of Portugal. The expedition, which was under the command of Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Norris, and consisted of fifty vessels carrying 15,000 men, sailed in March, 1589. Corunna was the first place attacked; much damage was done to the shipping, and part of the town was burnt, whilst Sir John Norris defeated a large force of Spaniards, who had come to relieve the city. Drake then sailed up the Tagus to Lisbon, whilst Sir John Norris landed at a place called Peniche and marched overland to join him, proclaiming Don Antonio on the way. Lisbon, however, was too strong to be taken, the country refused to rise for the pretender, and in May the expedition returned home, having failed in its primary object, though it had the effect of inspiring the English.

Post-Nati, CASE OF THE. On the accession of James I. to the throne of England, it became a question whether his Scottish subjects, born after his accession to the English throne (post-nati), were aliens in England or not. The Scots contended that they were not, and the same view was taken by the judges in the House of Lords. In the House of Commons it was contended that a statute would be required to naturalise them. The point was decided in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, when the friends of an infant born in Scotland after 1603 sought to establish his right to hold land in England. Ten of the twelve judges decided that the post-natus was not an alien in England.

Poynings, SIR EDWARD (d. 1512), after a distinguished military career was sent to Ireland as Lord-Deputy by Henry VII. soon after his accession. He was very successful both in subduing the partisans of the house of York, and in quelling the native Irish rebels in Ulster, and along the borders of the Pale. He reduced the eastern portion of the island to order. His period of government is specially noted for the passing in December (1549) of the famous statute known as "Poynings' Act," by which it was enacted that all existing English laws should be in force in Ireland, and that no Parliament should be held in Ireland without the sanction of the king and council, who should also be able to disallow statutes passed by the Irish Houses. Thus the legislative independence of the English colony in Ireland was at an end. "Poynings' Act" remained in force for three centuries, till repealed in 1782. [IRELAND.]

Præcipe, THE WRIT OF, was a peremptory command addressed to the sheriff, ordering him to send a particular cause to be tried in the king's court, instead of the local court. This was felt to be a great grievance, and by section 34 of Magna Charta its use was limited.

Præmunire, STATUTES OF. In the fourteenth century there seem to have been two forms of papal exaction more distasteful to the English Parliament than any others: the one—of no modern standing even then—the right claimed, and often exercised, by the Pope of giving away Church benefices in England to men of his own choice, and often to aliens; the other, his persistent action in assuming to himself and his curia the right of deciding cases of law which ought properly to have been dealt with by the king's courts at home. Against each of these abuses the Parliaments of the middle of Edward III.'s reign aimed statutes: attempting to check the first abuse by the Statute of Provisors (1350—51), and the second by the first Statute of Præmunire (1353). By the latter of these two statutes the king "at the grievous and clamorous complaints of the great men and the commons of his realm of England," enacts that all his liege people of every condition who refer any matter properly belonging to the king's court to any jurisdiction outside the realm shall be allowed two months within which to appear before the king's Council, his Chancery, or his justices of either bench, &c., to answer for their contempt of the king's rights in transferring their cases abroad. "If," the statute continues, "they fail to put in an appearance at the due time, their lands and chattels are all forfeited to the king; their persons are liable to be seized, and if not found, the offenders are to be outlawed." Two things are worth noticing with reference to the statute; first, that the clergy are not mentioned as petitioning for its enactment or assenting to it; and, second, that although the measure is plainly levelled against the pretensions of the Roman Curia, yet its aim is nowhere stated in the body of the Act. There were several subsequent Statutes of Præmunire. The later and fuller are naturally more often called the statute, as in a way they superseded the earlier. The name is more especially reserved to an Act passed in the sixteenth year of Richard II. (1393). In this statute it is plainly stated that the right of recovering the presentation to a church benefice "belongeth only to the king's court by the old right of his crown as used and approved in the time of all his progenitors, kings of England." The statute then proceeds to condemn the practice of papal translation, and after rehearsing the promise of the three estates of the realm to support the king in his rights, enacts without any circumlocution, "that if any purchase, or pursue, in the Court of Rome, or elsewhere, such translations, processes, excommunications, bulls, &c." he and his notaries, counsellors, and abettors shall forfeit all their lands and tenements, goods, and chattels to the king, while the offenders themselves are to be attached and brought before the king and his council, or be proceeded against by writ of Præmunire facias, as is ordained in other Statutes of Provisors. It is from the phrase Præmunire facias that the whole enactment has derived its name. These are the opening words of the writ directed to the officer, bidding him forewarn the offender when and where he is to appear to answer to the charges brought against him. The word Præmunire is said to be a corruption of Præmonere, to forewarn. The scope of these Præmunire Acts was still further enlarged under 2 Henry IV., 3 Henry V., &c. The Statutes of Præmunire were, however, constantly disregarded. Papal provision became in the 15th century the most usual way of appointing to bishoprics. The custom of granting dispensations from the statute had much influence on the growth of the King's dispensing power. It was by a dexterous manipulation of the clause, which included the abettors of a breach of the Statute of Præmunire in the penalty due to the prime offender, that Henry VIII. laid the whole body of the clergy at his mercy in 1531 for having acknowledged the legatine authority of Wolsey; and the king's pardon was only bought by a large sum of money, and their acknowledgment of him as supreme head of the church. Under Elizabeth, to refuse the oath of supremacy was made a breach of the Statute of Præmunire; and also to defend the pope's jurisdiction in England, or to support a Jesuit college, or any popish seminary beyond the sea. By later enactments the penalties following a breach of this statute have been extended to offences very different from those which were commonly connected with the word Præmunire.

Prayer Book, or, properly, the Book of Common Prayer, is the Liturgy of the Church of England, ordained by law for national use. Before the Reformation, Latin service-books were in use throughout Christendom, founded upon a common model, but containing considerable variations. The prayers for various hours of the day were contained in the Breviary; the order for celebrating the Holy Communion in the Missal. There was also a manual of devotions in English called the Prymer, current in the fifteenth century. The desire of the reforming party, headed by Cranmer, was for greater simplicity and intelligibility in the service-books, and Cranmer steadily moved in that direction. In 1541 a new edition of part of the Sarum Breviary was issued; and in 1542 Cranmer notified to Convocation the King's pleasure that the service-books should be examined, corrected, and reformed of all superstitious prayers. A committee of bishops and divines sat for that purpose and prepared materials for the future. Portions of the Scriptures were ordered to be read in English in churches; and in 1544 the Litany, which was already in English for use in processions, was revised by Cranmer. In 1545 was issued the "King's Prymer," which contained the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and several canticles and collects, as well as the Litany in English.

In the reign of Edward VI. the work of liturgical revision first bore definite fruit. In the first year of the reign, Convocation and Parliament ordered the Communion to be administered under both kinds; and a committee of divines was appointed to draw up "The Order of Communion," which was published in 1548. This, however, was only a temporary measure for immediate use. The commissioners applied themselves, under Cranmer's presidency, to the task of framing a complete Book of Prayer. They completed their labours within the year, and submitted the Book to Parliament, by which it was accepted. The Act of Uniformity, passed in Jan., 1549, ordered the Book to come into general use on the evening of Whit Sunday. The objects of the compilers of this Book are stated in their preface to be (1) the formation of a uniform use for the whole realm, (2) the simplification of rubrics, (3) the reading of the whole Psalter in order, (4) the continuous reading of the Bible, (5) the omission of needless interruptions, (6) conformity to the pure Word of the Scripture, (7) the formation of a Prayer-book in the vulgar tongue. The first Prayer-book of Edward VI. followed closely on the Prymer for morning and evening prayer, so as to make as little change as possible. Its chief differences from the Prayer-book now in use are—(1) Matins and Evensong began with the Lord's Prayer and ended with the Third Collect. (2) The Litany followed the Communion office, and there were no instructions for its use. (3) In the Communion office the Commandments were not read; the prayers were differently arranged, and included a mention of the Virgin and prayers for the dead; there was an invocation of the Holy Ghost before consecration; the words used in giving the elements were only the first clause of the two now in use; the priest was ordered to stand "afore the midst of the altar"; the old vestments, albs and copes, were prescribed for the celebrant; water was mixed with the wine. (4) In the Baptismal Service a form of exorcism was used; trine immersion was directed; the child was arrayed after baptism in a white garment, called a chrisom, and was anointed with oil on the head. (5) The Burial Service contained prayers for the dead, and provision was made for a Communion at a burial.

This Prayer-book was well received by the people generally; but an influx of foreigners brought to England opinions more decidedly Calvinistic. The Prayer-book was no sooner in use than a small party called for its revision. They prevailed with the King, who again appointed a committee, with Cranmer at its head. In their work the committee asked the opinions of the learned foreigners, Peter Martyr and Bucer. The results of this revision was the Second Prayer-book of Edward VI., which was published in 1552. It added the introductory portion of Morning and Evening Prayer, appointed the Litany to be used as at present, added the Decalogue to the Communion office, reduced its prayers to the order in which they now occur, omitting the points noticed above; directed the priest to stand "at the north side of the table," and to wear no vestment save the surplice. The tendency of the alterations made are most clearly seen in the substitution of the second clause now used at the administration of the elements for the first clause, which was omitted. The Second Prayer-book showed no desire to retain old uses because they were old, but was a movement towards the doctrines of the Continental reformers.

The Second Prayer-book of Edward VI. had scarcely time to come into use before it was swept away by the Marian reaction. When Elizabeth came to the throne in 1558, she behaved with great caution, and was crowned according to the rites of the Roman Pontifical. A committee was, however, appointed early in 1559 to compare the two Books of Edward VI. and correct them. The commission, of which the chief mover was Edward Guest, after Bishop of Rochester, decided in favour of Edward VI.'s Second Prayer-book, with a few alterations. These were adopted by Parliament, and the revised Prayer-book came into use on June 24, 1559. The alterations were not important, but were significant of Elizabeth's desire for comprehension. The ornaments in use in the second year of Edward VI. were recognised; the two clauses in the administration of the elements at the Communion were put together as they are now; a petition was omitted from the Litany—"From the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities, Good Lord deliver us."

Again the return of exiles from the Continent brought discord, and the Puritan party desired another revision. At the accession of James I. the King agreed to hear the Puritan demands at a conference at Hampton Court in 1603. The Puritans met with little attention, and the changes made in the Prayer-book were slight; chief of them was the addition of the Thanksgiving Prayers, and of the latter half of the Catechism. Charles I. attempted to force on Scotland the use of the English Liturgy, and his attempt led to a revolution. Under the Commonwealth the Prayer-book was swept away. After the Restoration, a conference was held at the Savoy, in 1661, between twelve bishops and twelve Presbyterians, to discuss the wishes of the Presbyterians for a revision of the Prayer-book. This Conference did not show much attempt at conciliation on either side. A committee of bishops was again appointed to revise the Prayer-book, and no steps were taken to meet the wishes of the Presbyterians. What alterations were made rather increased than diminished the scruples of the Puritans against receiving the work. The revised Prayer-book, finally reduced to the shape in which we now have it, was approved by Parliament, and its use was enforced by the Act of Uniformity of 1662. Some printed copies were carefully compared with the original, were then sealed with the Great Seal, and were sent to all cathedrals, to the Courts at Westminster, and to the Tower, to be preserved for ever. Since then the Sealed Books have remained the standard for preserving the Prayer-book in its original form. It is true that in 1689 a committee was appointed to prepare such alterations "as might reconcile, as much as possible, all differences." But Convocation was opposed to all change, and the proposals were never considered.

Prerogative, THE ROYAL. Prerogative has been defined as an exclusive privilege. Historically considered, it is not much more than the legal exercise of the royal authority. An old judge expounded it as "that law in case of the king which is law in no case of the subject." "It is of blood," Bacon said, "to the Common Law; it sprang from sources akin to those from which the Common Law has sprung; it did for the king and still does for the crown, what the Common Law did for the subject."

"It grew," says Bishop Stubbs, "out of certain conditions of the national life, some of which existed before the Norman Conquest, others were the products of that great change, and others resulted from the peculiar course of Henry II. and his descendants." Before 1377 it had actually or virtually parted with most of its legislative and taxing powers. Chief among its admitted and exclusive powers at this time were those of calling, interrupting, and dismissing Parliaments, of ratifying legislation, of creating peers, and conferring every form of honour, of making cities and boroughs, of pardoning criminals, of negotiating with foreign powers, of declaring and conducting war, of nominating to Church dignities and presenting to an immense number of benefices, of appointing all public officials, of coining money, regulating trade, fixing weights and measures, and establishing markets and havens. And a law of uncertain date, but given as 17 Edw. II., called Prerogativa Regis, adds to these the custody of idiots and lunatics, wreck of the sea, whales and sturgeons, and the right to the lands and goods of attainted felons. And, with few exceptions, these advantages are still conceded to Prerogative. But besides these it then claimed, and despite a long and stubborn opposition continued to exercise, the rights of purveyance, and of issuing commissions of array with all the manifold accompaniments and consequences of both. A power to dispense with and even suspend the operation of a statute was also among its demands. Such was the mediæval measure of Prerogative at its widest possible legal stretch, though even to this a king like Richard II., in his days of absolutism, would seek to give an unquestionably illegal extension. During the constitutional rule of the Lancastrian dynasty the tendency opposite to Richard's set in, that of not only dislodging Prerogative from its disputed position, but also of placing its legitimate exercise under Parliamentary control. The Tudor despotism, however, forced this to yield in its turn; and for a time it became the fashion to strain the principle to the utmost, and give it a practically unbounded sphere of action. The high prerogative doctrine then came into vogue, which vested in the king, besides his ordinary power limited by law, an extraordinary power as extensive as the whole province of government, to be resorted to, if the safety of the Commonwealth were judged by the king to require its application, when the constitutional resources of authority were deemed inadequate. This was perhaps what Bacon meant when he described Prerogative as "the accomplishment and perfection of the Common Law," stepping in to the rescue of the State when the Common Law was found wanting. At the same time the erection of exceptional jurisdiction, and the granting of monopolies were regarded as covered by the regular prerogative. The dangerous doctrine and the questionable practices were effaced for ever by the action of the Long Parliament. But the dispensing and suspending powers still lingered; Charles II. and James II. employed them without scruple. These, however, were finally extinguished by the Bill of Rights. The Revolution started a new method of dealing with Prerogative; it was left with most of its powers unimpaired, and some of them even strengthened, but their exercise was gradually drawn under the efficient control of Parliament. This now belongs to a body of ministers who are responsible for it to the Commons and the country, and are virtually chosen and dismissed by both.

Press. THE LIBERTY OF THE, was only secured after long and arduous struggles. Soon after the invention of printing the press throughout Europe was placed under the severe censorship of the Church, and after the Reformation this censorship became in England part of the royal prerogative. Printing was granted as a monopoly, confined by regulations issued by the Star Chamber under Mary to the Stationers' Company; and under Elizabeth it was interdicted, except in London, Oxford, and Cambridge, the licensing being placed in the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London, on special occasions in those of the queen's printer, and in the case of the law-books with one of the chief justices. Mutilation was inflicted on transgressors of the law; for instance, in the case of Stubbes. Further restrictions were imposed by the Star Chamber under James I. and Charles I. In 1637 the number of master-printers was limited to twenty, and of letter-founders to four. The penalty for printing, bookbinding, or letter-founding without a licence was whipping, the pillory, and imprisonment; and even new editions of authorised books had to be submitted to the licensers. It was in the midst of these persecutions that the first newspaper, The Weekly News, appeared (1641), and it was followed after the fall of the Star Chamber by large quantities of tracts and newspapers. The censorship was, however, continued under the Commonwealth, and the Independent writers were suppressed with such severity as to call forth from Milton a noble vindication of freedom of opinion in the Areopagitica. After the Restoration came the Licensing Act of 1662, by which printing was confined to London, York, and the two universities, and the number of master-printers was limited to twenty as before, and all new works subjected to examination by an officer called the licenser. Its cruel provisions were used with terrible harshness by the licenser Roger L'Estrange, and all newspapers stopped except the Official London Gazette and the Observer. The Act expired in 1679, but was revived at the accession of James II., and continued until 1695, when the renewal of the censorship of the press was negatived by the House of Commons.

The press was now free in theory; but still suffered considerable restrictions in practice from the stamp duty, and the law of libel. The first Stamp Act (q.v.) was imposed in 1712, partly as a means of raising revenue, partly as a check upon the scurrility of the cheaper papers. It was gradually raised to fourpence, and in 1820 it was imposed by one of the Six Acts upon tracts and kindred publications. Evasions of the Stamp Act were frequent, and were severely punished by the State. In 1836, however, the stamp duties on newspapers were reduced to one penny, and in 1856 they were altogether abandoned. Another tax on knowledge, the paper duty, was abolished in 1861. The law of libel was exceedingly ill-defined, and was frequently used as an instrument of government oppression under William III. and Anne, among its victims being Defoe and Steele. Sir Robert Walpole, however, who was comparatively indifferent to attack, allowed it to slumber during his long administration, and it was not until the accession of George III., when public opinion had become keenly alive to the corruption of Parliament, that the government and the press came into collision again. Wilkes, by the famous "No. 45" of the North Briton, raised the question of the right to arrest authors and printers of an obnoxious publication on a general warrant, and gained a complete victory. Then came Junius's "Letter to the King," the trial for the republication of which by the bookseller Almon established the important doctrines that a publisher was criminally liable for the acts of his servants, and that a jury had no right to determine the criminality of a libel. The latter theory was, however, evaded at the trial of Woodfall, the original publisher, who was found guilty by the jury of "printing and publishing only;" it was the subject of frequent comments of a hostile nature in both houses of Parliament, and was vigorously combated by Erskine in the cases of the Dean of St. Asaph in 1779, and of Stockdale in 1789. Finally, in 1792, Fox's Libel Act established the important principle of the right of juries to find a general verdict of guilty or not guilty on the whole matter.

The outbreak of the French Revolution unfortunately produced a strong reaction against the freedom of the press. Between 1792 and 1820 the Libel Acts were frequently invoked. The ill-advised prosecutions of the Duke of Wellington's administration in 1830 and 1831 were the last important attempts to suppress the free written expression of opinion. Since that time the press has been completely free to discuss public men and measures. Moreover its position has been established on a firmer basis by Lord Campbell's Libel Act (1843), by which a defendant in a case of defamatory libel is allowed to plead that it is true, and that its publication is for the public benefit, and by which publishers are no longer held liable for the unauthorised acts of their servants. Measures for the suppression of newspapers have frequently formed part of the Irish coercion Acts.

Pretender, THE OLD. [STUART, JAMES EDWARD.]

Pretender, THE YOUNG. [STUART, CHARLES EDWARD.]

Pride's Purge is the name given to the violent measure by which (Dec. 6, 1648) the army excluded a large number of the Presbyterians from the Parliament. At the close of 1648 the army resolved to bring the king to a trial, and to put a stop to the treaty proceeding between him and the Parliament. Parliament on Dec. 5 decided that the king's answers to their proposals offered foundations for a peace. The army, which had occupied London on Dec. 2, surrounded the House of Commons on the morning of the 6th with the regiments of Colonels Pride, Hewson, and Hardress Waller. Pride, with a list of names in his hand, prevented those members from passing whom he judged fit, and locked up those who resisted. The number of those arrested amounted in the course of the next day to 47, and 96 were excluded. On the same day a paper, called the "Humble Proposals and Desires," was presented to the members still sitting on behalf of the council of officers, setting forth the demands of the army. The House, reduced to less than 80 members, decided by 60 to 28 to proceed with the consideration of these proposals (Dec. 7), and in the next three weeks rescinded its late votes, and determined to try the king.

Prior, MATTHEW (b. 1664, d. 1721), was one of the most distinguished of the literary diplomatists and politicians of William III.'s and Anne's reigns. He was educated at Westminster and St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow. He was a friend of Charles Montague, afterwards chief of the Whig party, and wrote with him The City Mouse and the Country Mouse, a satire on Dryden's Fable of the Hind and the Panther. Prior was sent as secretary to the congress at the Hague, and became one of William's gentlemen of the bedchamber. He was appointed secretary to the English legation at Ryswick (1697), and was entrusted with the duty of bringing the treaty to England. Next year he was sent in the same capacity to France under the Duke of Portland. When factions broke out in the court, Prior deserted Portland and attached himself to Albemarle. He was appointed Under Secretary of State to the Earl of Jersey, but was removed from office on the retirement of that nobleman. In 1701 he was elected for East Grinstead and appointed Commissioner of the Board of Trade. Under Anne he remained out of favour while the Whigs were in power; but in July, 1711 he was sent with the Abbé Gualtier to Paris with propositions for peace. In August, 1712, the ministry, weary of the length of the negotiations, sent Bolingbroke to Paris to shorten the work by personal conversation with Torcy. Prior accompanied him, and on Bolingbroke's return he was left as chargé d'affaires, without regular authority, and with scanty remittances. Disgrace rapidly overtook him on the death of Anne. As soon as he returned to England he was examined before the Committee of Safety, of which Walpole was chairman, for his share in the negotiations for peace. He was imprisoned, and on June 10 Walpole moved an impeachment against him, but eventually he was released without trial. The rest of his life was spent in retirement.

Prisons. LEGISLATION ON. As early as 1166 it was enacted (by the Assize of Clarendon, c. 7) that in each county the sheriff should provide a gaol at the king's cost if one did not already exist. In addition to these "common gaols," some of the law courts had special prisons connected with them, such as the Marshalsea, attached to the King's Bench, and the Fleet to the Star Chamber and Chancery. Little attention was paid to the condition of these prisons until the eighteenth century. The gaolers were paid, not by salaries, but by the fees which they could exact from the prisoners, and men were often retained long after their innocence had been pronounced because they could not pay the sums demanded. In 1728 the discovery of certain cruelties perpetrated in the Fleet led to the appointment of a Parliamentary commission. The warden and his agents were put upon their trial for murder, but were acquitted; and the Act passed in 1729 to remedy the worst evils was almost useless. The question was apparently forgotten until Howard began to prosecute his inquiries. In 1774 two acts were passed, one providing that every prisoner against whom the Grand Jury failed to find a true bill should be immediately and without fee released, and that the gaoler should be paid from the county rate; and the other to secure the due cleansing, etc., of prisons. After this time numerous statutes were passed. Of these the most important were those of 1823, 1865, and 1877. The Act of 1823 was largely the result of Mrs. Fry's efforts, and introduced a classification of prisoners. In 1865 the distinction, which had never been carefully maintained, between common gaols and houses of correction—the latter intended only for convicted criminals, was finally abolished; and what was far more important, it was enacted that in all cases imprisonment should be "separate," i.e., solitary. Finally, the Prison Act of 1877, which is now the principal statute on the subject, gave an increased power of control to the Home Secretary and to the Prison Commissioners appointed on his recommendation. It is to be added that between the years 1853 and 1864 transportation was abolished, and penal servitude, i.e., imprisonment with hard labour on public works, substituted.

Probate and Divorce. THE COURT OF, was created in 1567, and received the testamentary and matrimonial jurisdiction, which had previously been vested in the Ecclesiastical Courts. By the Judicature Acts of 1873 this court, together with the Admiralty Court, forms one of the divisions of the High Court of Justice.

Proclamations. In mediæval and later times, when the range of customary and statute law was still comparatively limited, and many practices that gave concern to kings and ministers were left uncorrected thereby, the king took upon himself at times to supply the defect by issuing proclamations, which either expanded and applied the provisions of already existing laws—in any case were presumed to be fair deductions from such laws—or were independent acts of prerogative. They were under the Plantagenet and Lancastrian kings avowedly temporary. Under the Tudors proclamations took a bolder tone, and began to encroach on the domain of legislation, indeed in 1539 they seem to have actually entered it. In that year was passed the astounding Statute of Proclamations, which enacted that the king, with the advice of his council, might set forth proclamations, with penalties in them, as obligatory on the subject as an Act of Parliament, provided they did no damage to the estates, liberties, or persons of the king's subjects, and infringed no law. But the first law of Edward VI. repealed this measure. In Elizabeth's reign they were not seldom used to supplement legislation, assist in the promotion of a policy, or regulate the conduct of the people. The banishment of Anabaptists, fasting in Lent, building houses round London, carrying daggers, or wearing long rapiers, trading with the French king's rebels, are a few of the things that were commanded or forbidden in them under penalties, and it is not clear that very many of them were distinctly illegal; statute law certainly warranted some, the unstrained prerogative others. James I. resorted to the practice so often, and pushed it so decidedly across the boundaries of legality, that in 1610 the alarmed Commons made it a subject of formal complaint, alleging that the king's proclamations touched the liberty, goods, inheritance, and livelihood of men, and that there was a general fear they would grow to the strength of laws. The gravest examples were that which in 1604 dictated rules to the constituencies in choosing members of Parliament, and those which forbade new buildings about London, and the making of starch out of wheat, and in most cases disobedience was made punishable in the Star Chamber. James gave a reassuring reply, and consulted his chief judges. An important consequence followed. The consulted judges, led by Coke, were unanimously of opinion that by his proclamation the king could not create an offence. He could only admonish his subjects to keep the law, and could not make an offence punishable in the Star Chamber if it were not so already. James frankly accepted this statement of the law, and desisted from issuing proclamations imposing fine and imprisonment. But in Charles I.'s reign proclamations were greatly multiplied, especially during the long cessation of Parliament. For staying in London despite a proclamation ordering country gentlemen with their families back to their homes, one Mr. Palmer was, in 1632, fined £1,000 by the Star Chamber. "The illegality of these proclamations," says Hallam, "is most unquestionable." It is curious, however, that they afterwards found no place in the Grand Remonstrance. In the ecclesiastical province the sovereign's action in this respect is less disputable. Proclamations for and against certain religious tenets, practices, and ritual were frequent between 1529 and 1640. That of Charles I., in 1626, "for the establishing of the peace of the Church," is one of the latest examples. The practice survived, but just survived, the great convulsion of 1640-60. To only one or two of Charles II.'s reign has exception been taken. It is significant that no mention is made of them in the Declaration of Rights. Those that are still issued by the Privy Council are invariably warranted, sometimes commanded, by the statute law.

Propheysings was the name given in the reign of Queen Elizabeth to meetings of the clergy, under the superintendence of the bishops, for the discussion and explanation of passages of Scripture. The meetings, which were held in public for the edification of the people, were presided over by a moderator. The system began during the primacy of Archbishop Parker, and were very obnoxious to Elizabeth, as savouring of Puritanism. Most of the bishops were in favour of them, as were many of the Privy Council, and Archbishop Grindal was sequestered for five years from the exercise of his jurisdiction for refusing to put down the "propheysings" at the queen's command. They were finally suppressed by a special command of Elizabeth, about 1577, and never subsequently revived.

Protector, THE TITLE OF, was first given to the governors appointed during the minority or incapacity of the king. It was borne by the Duke of Bedford during the minority of Henry VI. (or in his absence by the Duke of Gloucester), and by the Duke of York in 1454, and again in 1455 during Henry's illness; the Duke of Gloucester in 1483, and the Duke of Somerset from 1547 (Jan.) to 1548 (Oct.). The House of Lords, in answer to Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, thus defined the meaning of the word. "It was advised and appointed by authority of the king assenting the three estates of this land, that ye, in absence of my lord your brother of Bedford, should be chief of the king's council, and devised unto you a name different from other counsellors, not the name of tutor, lieutenant, governor, nor of regent, nor no name that should import authority of governance of the land, but the name of protector and defender, which importeth 'a personal duty of attendance to the actual defence of the land, as well against enemies outward if case required, as against rebels inward, if any were, granting you therewith certain power, the which is specified and contained in an Act of the said Parliament, to endure as long as it liked the king.'" In the case of the Duke of Somerset he was in the instrument signed by the Privy Council on Jan. 31, 1547, said to be appointed because the good government of the realm, the safety of the king, and "the more certain and assured direction of his affairs" required "that some special man of the number aforesaid (the executors) should be preferred in name and place before the other, to whom, as to the head of the rest, all strangers and others might have access, and who for his virtue, wisdom, and experience in things, were meet and able to be a special remembrancer, and to keep a most certain account of all our proceedings." The title of Protector given to Cromwell (which may be compared with that of "custodes libertatis Anglie," assumed by the Long Parliament) was chosen because it was not altogether strange to English ears, and, perhaps, also because it left the definite form of government, whether monarchical or republican, an open question. Cromwell's title was "Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland." It was given to him first in the Instrument of Government, and after his refusal to accept the crown, confirmed by the Petition and Advice.

Protestant Refugees in England.

—As soon as the Reformation was established in England, this country became the principal resort for the oppressed Calvinists of the Low Countries and of western and northern France, just as Switzerland was for the central and southern provinces of the latter. The immigration began before the end of King Henry VIII.'s reign; it received a powerful impulse through the policy which guided the ministers of King Edward VI; and in 1550 a charter was granted to the Protestants settled in London, allowing them free exercise of their religion, and appointing the church of Austinfriars for the joint worship of Dutch, Walloons, and Huguenots. The whole community was placed under the superintendence of John A Lasco, a devoted minister who had abandoned high preferment as a Catholic priest in Hungary, in order to found a Protestant church at Emden, in East Friesland. Driven from his charge there, A Lasco had sought refuge in England in 1548, and took an active part in securing public support for his fellow exiles. A few months after the establishment of the congregation of Austinfriars, the French-speaking portion of it—Huguenots and Walloons—separated to found a distinct church in Threadneedle Street, known as "The London Walloon Church;" in 1840 they removed to St. Martin's-le-Grand. Meanwhile colonies were being formed in other parts of England. The silk-weavers of Canterbury settled there as early as 1547, and from 1561 until the present day, although now their industry can hardly be said to exist, they have worshipped in the crypt of the cathedral. By 1575 colonies were in existence at the seaports of Southampton, Winchelsea, Rye, Dover, Sandwich, and Yarmouth; and inland at Glastonbury, Wandsworth, Maidstone, Colchester, Norwich, Thetford, and Stamford. All, or nearly all, of these had their own religious services. Other sporadic Walloon settlements appear to have existed at Buckingham, Stony-Stratford, Newport-Pagnell, and other places in the southern Midlands. In the first years of this immigration the Dutch and Walloon element seems to have greatly outnumbered the Huguenots. An account of the year 1567 reckons 2,993 Dutch to only 512 French within the City of London proper; but on the south coast the French appear to have almost exclusively prevailed. The success, however, of the Dutch in the resistance to Spanish rule soon put an end to the emigration from that quarter; and the issue also of the Edict of Nantes (1598), which gave a legal status to the Calvinistic community in France, had the natural result of keeping the Huguenots at home. There was, therefore, a pause in the inflow into England until the fourth quarter of the seventeenth century. But the measures preliminary to the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1686), had their effect in a great multiplication of the French settlements in England. Between 1686 and the beginning of the eighteenth century no less than thirty French churches sprang into existence in London and its immediate vicinity. Others arose at Bristol, Barnstaple, Bideford, Plymouth, Stonehouse, Dartmouth, and Exeter, at Faversham, at Thorpe-le-Soken in Essex, and in Edinburgh. A whole set of colonies was founded in Ireland, at Portarlington and Youghal, in Dublin (where the French had three churches), as also at Lisburn, Waterford, Cork, and other places. The last influx of Protestant refugees was that of the mixed multitude of French and Germans who were ejected from the Palatinate in 1709; several thousands of whom were received in England, and the majority, probably, sent on to America. Many of the English congregations named were from the beginning attached to the National Church; nearly all in time became so. The foreigners soon adapted themselves to English customs, and although they experienced much opposition from native tradespeople, were able to exercise their handicrafts to the signal advantage of the country. There are few industries that have not benefited by the work of the immigrants. In particular may be mentioned those in silk (at Canterbury and Spitalfields), linen, cotton, wool, paper, beaver (at Wandsworth), sailcloth, glass, &c. The total number of those who settled in English territory after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes can hardly be short of 80,000.

Prussia, RELATIONS WITH, began with the commercial and crusading intercourse between England and the Teutonic order. The towns of the old Prussian state were all Hanse Towns, and the intimate dealings between England and the Hansa [HANSA] extended to Elbing, Danzig, and Riga. At last rising English commerce was checked by the exclusive system of the Hansa. At the end of the fourteenth century, the quarrels between Prussian and English merchants led the Hochmeister in 1385 to confiscate all English merchants' goods. In 1388 an understanding was arrived at, but the desire of the English for more privileges involved constant disputes all through the fifteenth century. Despite this, crusading expeditions to help the Teutonic knights in their struggle against the heathen were not unfrequent. In 1352 Duke Henry of Lancaster took the cross, and in 1391 Thomas of Gloucester projected, and Henry of Bolingbroke accomplished, a crusade against the Lithuanians. Meanwhile, relations with Brandenburg became friendly during the tenure of the Margraveship by the Bavarian and later Luxemburg houses. The Reformation united Prussia and Brandenburg under the Hohenzollern. The acquisition of the Rhenish duchies brought the Prussian House into relations with James I. and Charles I. The close connexion of the Hohenzollerns with Holland, at first a cause of disunion with England, ultimately became a bond of connection. The Great Elector's last act was to contribute powerfully to the Revolution of 1688, by sending his troops into Holland to invade England. He had felt himself threatened by James II.'s alliance with Louis XIV., and had strongly urged William to seize the English crown. Common alliance with Austria, common hostility to France, now united England and Prussia. Frederick I., the first king, married the sister of George I., Sophia Charlotte. His son, Frederick William I., married his cousin Sophia Dorothea, daughter of George I. Frederick William I. for many years remained on good terms with England. In 1725 he signed the Treaty of Hanover; but secretly deserted the English for the Austrian alliance, and the double marriage project by which Prince Frederick of Wales was to marry Wilhelmina, the king's daughter, and his heir Frederick, the Princess Amelia of Hanover, was never carried out. The accession of George II. hardly mended matters. He bore no goodwill to his brother-in-law, or to his nephew Frederick II., who became king in 1740. The Elector of Hanover feared the growing power of Prussia; yet so important was Prussia's help against France that English diplomacy did its utmost to compel Maria Theresa to acquiesce in Frederick's conquest of Silesia. During the Seven Years' War, Frederick found in England his one important ally. His brilliant feats of strategy won him great popularity in England, where he was regarded, strangely enough, as the "Protestant Hero." The accession of George III. led, however, to England's sudden desertion of Prussia in a way that Frederick never forgave. His later policy of Russian alliance was largely the result of his conviction that no stable alliance could be formed with England. Frederick William II., however, found in England an ally, first against Austria and Russia, next in the intervention in Holland to restore the House of Orange, and, lastly, in the war against Revolutionary France. In 1796, however,

Prussia concluded peace with France at Basel, and refused to join the second coalition of 1799; and delayed in 1805 to join the war until Austria was defeated and Prussia itself threatened by the French. After Jena Prussia was compelled by Napoleon to exclude English manufacturers and join in his measures to reduce the power of his great enemy. The War of Liberation renewed the alliance between Prussia and England, and Blücher and Wellington destroyed Napoleon's last army at Waterloo. The Tory government, after the Peace of 1815, found in Prussia a congenial ally. Since then, the relations between England and Prussia have been generally friendly. The refusal of Prussia to co-operate against Russia during the Crimean War, its attacks on Denmark in order to restore Schleswig-Holstein to Germany, caused some discontent in England. But the sympathy felt for the power which alone could give unity to Germany, and the alliance between the courts, which culminated in the marriage of the Crown Prince of Prussia to the eldest daughter of the Queen of England, have been sufficient to maintain a general friendliness, though the different aims and objects of the two countries would prevent any very intimate alliance.

Prynne, WILLIAM (b. 1600, d. 1669), matriculated at Oxford 1616, and entered at Lincoln's Inn 1620. He was an untiring student of ecclesiastical and legal antiquities, a bitter Puritan, and a voluminous writer on controversial subjects. In 1632 he published a work entitled Histriomastix, attacking the immorality of the stage, and containing words supposed to reflect on the queen. For this he was fined £5,000 by the Star Chamber; degraded from his degree and the practice of his profession, and sentenced to be pilloried and to lose both his ears. Again, in 1637, for attacking the bishops in his News from Ipswich, he was sentenced to imprisonment for life. The Long Parliament released him, and declared these sentences illegal. He became, in 1641, member for Newport, was most active in the prosecution of Laud, and was appointed one of the Visitors of the University of Oxford. As he opposed the king's trial, and considered Charles's answers to the Parliamentary propositions to offer grounds for a treaty he was expelled by Pride's Purge in 1648. In 1659 he exerted himself very actively to procure the restoration of the secluded members, and when admitted worked to bring about the king's return. In the discussions on the punishment of the Regicides, he was one of their severest opponents. In 1660 he was appointed Keeper of the Records in the Tower, which post he held till his death.

Public Worship Regulation Act (1874), THE, was introduced into the House of Lords by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and into the House of Commons by Mr. Russell Gurney. The object of the bill was to give parishioners a ready way of invoking the authority of the bishop, and to enable the bishop to prohibit by his own mandate any practices which he considered improper, or else to submit the question to the decision of a judge specially appointed to decide in such cases. All that was requisite to put this machinery in motion against any clergyman was that three of the parishioners should declare themselves dissatisfied, and proceed to make use of the law. A new court was erected, to which was transferred all the authority of the Court of Arches, and at its head was placed Lord Penzance, as the first judge, who thus became the direct successor of the Dean of Arches. There was a very warm debate on the subject in both Houses. Lord Salisbury, Mr. Hardy, and Mr. Gladstone opposed it with great vehemence as destructive of the independence of the Church. Mr. Disraeli and Sir William Harcourt stood forward as its most prominent champions. The bill was eventually passed.

Puckering, or Pickering, SIR JOHN (d. 1596), after having distinguished himself as a Parliamentary lawyer, was elected Speaker of the House of Commons, 1585, and again in 1586. He was active in promoting the execution of Mary Queen of Scots, and subsequently prosecuted Secretary Davison for the despatch of the warrant for her death. He was counsel for the crown on the occasion of the prosecutions of the Earl of Arundel and Sir John Perrot for treason; and in May, 1592, received the Great Seal with the title of Lord Keeper as the reward of his services to the queen, succeeding Sir Christopher Hatton. He maintained in his new position his reputation as a sound lawyer.

Punjab is the district lying about the five rivers, the tributaries of the Indus. It was inhabited by a half-religious, half-military community, the Sikhs, or Akalees. Their commonwealth was divided into fraternities called misils, the chief of each of which was the leader in war and arbiter in time of peace. Of these chiefs twelve were deemed the foremost in rank. In 1806 Runjeet Singh, the chief of one of these misils, ended a long and gradual course of encroachment by becoming the ruler of the whole Punjab. The old independence still survived, and the "Khalsa," or Sikh, commonwealth was regarded with almost superstitious devotion by the chiefs, people, and soldiery. Runjeet was but the head of the Khalsa, the army was the army of the Khalsa, everything was done in its name and to its honour. On his death (1839) the government fell into anarchy for six years. In 1845 the fears of the ministers launched 60,000 Sikhs, the magnificent army of the Khalsa, across the Sutlej [SIKH WARS]. The victory of the English involved cessations and submission (1846). National indignation at this humiliation produced the second Sikh War, which ended in the annexation of the Punjab (1849). It was placed under a board of commissioners.

Puritans, THE. During the course of the English Reformation a difference sprang up between the moderate Reformers, and those who wished to make the forms and ceremonies of religious worship as simple as possible. The attempt to impose certain external forms and ceremonies gave rise to more open disunion. "The English bishops" (writes Fuller under the date 1564) "conceiving themselves empowered by their canons, began to show their authority in urging the clergy of their dioceses to subscribe to the liturgy, ceremonies, and discipline of the Church: and such as refused the same were branded with the odious name of 'Puritans.'" Up to about 1570 the question at issue between the Elizabethan Puritans and the authorities of the Church was a question of ritual. After that date the institution of Episcopacy was attacked, especially by Cartwright, on the ground of the apostolic ordination of Presbyterianism, and the question of Church government added to the former cause of division. Thus was founded the Presbyterian section of the Puritan party. The first Puritans were anxious to remain within the national Church and reform it after their own ideas. But from the first attempt to enforce conformity some of them began to form separate conventicles. In June, 1567, a company of more than 100 were seized at worship in Plummers' Hall, London, and fourteen or fifteen sent to prison. This is "the first instance of actual punishment inflicted on Protestant Dissenters" (Hallam). Later in the reign a sect arose, called—from their leader, Robert Brown—Brownists (or Separatists), holding that each congregation was in itself a complete Church, denying that the State, or any assembly of the clergy had any right to control it, and proclaiming the duty of separation from the National Church. This was the origin of the Independent section of the Puritan party. The result of the spread of these views was the Act of 1573, enacting imprisonment, banishment, and death as penalties for Nonconformity.

The demands of the Puritan clergy were expressed in the Millenary Petition presented to James in 1603, and at the Hampton Court Conference (1604). They asked for certain definite alterations in the ritual, for a preaching ministry, and for the amendment of the articles in a Calvinistic direction. They wished to maintain uniformity in ritual and in doctrine, but to change the characters of both. After the rejection of their demands, conformity to the existing order was enforced, and about 300 of the Puritan clergy were ejected from their livings, as many had been expelled by Whitgift during the previous reign. English Puritanism in the earlier part of the seventeenth century continued to adhere more and more exclusively to Calvinistic doctrine, and by the mouth of the House of Commons to demand the suppression of the opposite views. The resolution passed by that body on March 2, 1629, declared that "whosoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or by favour seek to extend or introduce Popery or Arminianism or other opinions disagreeing from the true and orthodox Church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and the commonwealth." During the same period questions of ritual and ceremonial became of less importance in Puritan teaching, and the demand for a purer morality and a reformed life more and more its characteristics. The number of Puritans within the Church increased. Baxter describes them thus: "Most men," he says, "seemed to mind nothing seriously, but the body and the world. . . . The other sort were such as had their consciences awakened to some regard of God and their everlasting state; and according to the various measures of their understanding, did speak and live as serious in the Christian faith, and would much inquire what was duty and what was sin, and how to please God; and made this their business and interest, as the rest did the world." Under the government of Charles I. and Laud, a series of measures were directed against the Puritans. Controversial preaching was silenced by a royal proclamation, so that the doctrines at issue between the two parties in the Church could not be freely discussed, the lectureships were suppressed, and writers against the hierarchy or the Prayer-book severely punished. The summoning of the Long Parliament at length gave the Puritans the ascendancy, and they set to work to carry out their ideas on Church Reform. The Grand Remonstrance set forth their programme. They wished (1) to reduce within bounds the "exorbitant power" of the prelates; (2) to unburden the consciences of men of needless and superstitious ceremonies, suppress inno-ventions, and take away the monuments of idolatry; (3) to effect this intended reformation, a synod of British divines, "assisted with some from foreign parts professing the same religion," was to be assembled to discuss and submit to the confirmation of Parliament the necessary measures. At the same time they meant to maintain uniformity of doctrine and discipline. "We hold it requisite that there should be throughout the whole realm a conformity to that order which the laws enjoin according to the Word of God." To carry out these views the Presbyterian system of church government was established in England, and a new Prayer-book and Confession of Faith drawn up, two or three thousand of the clergy were ejected from their livings, and a severe law passed against all heretics and sectaries. But the Independent section of the Puritan party, the successors of the Separatists, defended the cause of toleration and congregational government, purged the Parliament, put a stop to the Assembly of Divines, and finally dissolved both. The advanced section of the Independents would have abolished altogether an Established Church. Cromwell, however, was determined to carry out a more conservative policy, "his definite ideal had come to be a State Church that should comprehend Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists and pious men of all sound evangelical sects with an ample toleration of dissent round about it." This ideal he carried out during the Protectorate. After his death, when the secluded members had been readmitted to sit in Parliament, Presbyterian government was re-established (March, 1660), and the Restoration found it in possession. Charles had promised a liberty for tender consciences, and led the Presbyterians to hope for their comprehension within the Church Establishment. Negotiations for that purpose were carried on, and a conference took place at the Savoy (1661), but attempts at a compromise failed, and the Act of Uniformity was passed (May, 1663). About 2,500 of the Puritan clergy were deprived of their livings in consequence of this change. Those who conformed and remained within the Church formed the Low Church party, those who now definitely separated themselves from it, the Nonconformist, or Dissenting party.

Purveyance. "Purvey" is but another form of "provide." Purveyance, in its general sense, was the obligation believed to be of immemorial antiquity, imposed upon all people of the country-side through which the king was making progress, of providing him and his multitudinous following with the means of support and conveyance, at prices fixed by the royal officers, and paid, if paid at all, in tallies, the value of which was to be deducted from the next taxes that the several victims of the exaction would have to pay. Reduced to particulars, it meant the right of buying for, and the duty of selling goods to, the king in preference to any other purchaser (called pre-emption), the power of demanding personal services, horses, and carts, and everything else that the case needed, from those of the neighbourhood who could give them, at whatever cost of damage, loss, and inconvenience, with no chance of ever being adequately paid, and little of ever being paid at all. No irregular royal right was of greater antiquity, better established, or of longer continuance. We can track it by the efforts to correct its evils from the Great Charter till the Civil Wars; and it was undoubtedly much older than the Charter. Even in its warranted use it was specially oppressive in England; the very eagerness of our best kings to do their work well, by keeping them constantly travelling from place to place, aggravated its hardships. But its nature lent it readily to abuse; it was accordingly grossly abused, and most galling its abuses were. Not only were the purveyors outrageously unjust, dishonest, and unfeeling, making, as an authority states, every old woman tremble for her poultry till the king had gone by, and perverting their office to their own enrichment, but the son or servant of the king was counted as the king himself, and every other colourable pretext for making the requisition was seized without scruple. It was, moreover, construed into a claim to call upon whole counties for supplies of beef, pork, and corn, on great state occasions. Purveyance was, therefore, odious in itself; and it loaded the crown with a heavy burden of unpopularity. No grievance provoked so much legislation; it is prominent in every remedial movement and measure for centuries; we are told that not less than thirty-six statutes were passed to restrain it, ten in Edward III.'s reign alone. Yet its legality was always admitted, nor was there ever any thought of removing the "accursed prerogative" itself, as Archbishop Islip called it. The curtailing legislation was not altogether useless; after 1362, when Edward III. enacted that purveyance should provide for the personal needs of the king and queen only, and that purveyors should change their name to buyers, its abuses would seem to have been less grievous. In process of time, however, an abundant crop of new ones had grown round it; of these the Commons' petition, in 1604, gives a detailed account that shows a wonderful ingenuity on the part of the purveyors and cart-takers in working the prerogative for their own benefit, and to the oppression and vexation of the people. Bacon told the king that their practices were "the most common and general abuse of all others in the kingdom." It was then proposed to compound the right for an annual payment of £50,000, but the proposal fell through. Two years later the king pruned away the worst of the evils by proclamation; and the rage against the officials subsided. In 1610 a surrender of the right by the crown was almost arranged in the bargain known as the Great Contract, but broke down with the collapse of that negotiation. It was discontinued, however, with the relics of feudalism, at the fall of the monarchy, and was not restored with its restoration. In 1660 purveyance was formally abolished by the Convention of that year.

Pym, JOHN (b. 1584, d. 1643), descended from a good Somersetshire family, educated at Broadgates Hall, Oxford, early obtained a responsible office in the Exchequer, and entered Parliament in 1614 as member for Calne. In the second Parliament of Charles I. he was one of the managers of Buckingham's impeachment, and in the third he took a prominent part in the debates about the Petition of Right. In 1640 he was naturally pointed out to head the popular party, and the great speeches in which he summed up their grievances were widely circulated amongst the people. He moved the impeachment of Strafford, drew up with the aid of St. John the charges against him, and was the chief manager of his trial. The Bill of Attainder was forced on him by the extreme party amongst his followers, and Pym did his best to give the proceedings a judicial form. Not only was he a very able debater and Parliamentary tactician, but he had what Clarendon terms "a very comely and grave way of expressing himself." He was a strong Presbyterian, though not at first disposed to go the length of the Root-and-Branch party, and it was probably on account of this relative moderation that it was at one time intended by the king to offer him the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Protestation and the Grand Remonstrance, two appeals to the people, were particularly his work. The influence which he exercised gained him from the Royalists the nickname of King Pym, and marked him out for the impeachment on the charge of treasonable correspondence with the Scots, and attempt to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom brought against him by the king in January, 1642. After the refusal of the guarantees demanded by Parliament, Pym became a leading member of the Committee of Safety (July 4, 1642). He was practically the head of the government, and unceasingly active in directing the conduct of the war, and maintaining the spirit of resistance in city and Parliament. He was excepted from pardon in the king's proclamations, and exposed both to the slanders of the Royalists and to many accusations from the discontented of his own party. But he retained the confidence of the Parliament to the last, and a month before his death they conferred on him the important post of Lieutenant-General of the Ordnance of the Kingdom. His last important work was the bringing about the alliance with the Scots. He died on Dec. 3, 1643, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Clarendon thus describes his position in 1640. "He seemed to all men to have the greatest influence upon the House of Commons of any man; and, in truth, I think he was at that time, and for some months after, the most popular man, and the most able to do hurt, that hath lived in any time."

Pyrenees, THE BATTLES OF THE (July 25—Aug. 2, 1813), during the closing period of the Peninsular War, were a series of combats which resulted in the defeat of Soult's attempt to relieve San Sebastian. In July, Soult had been sent to supersede Joseph. On the 25th and 26th, General Cole was vigorously attacked by Soult at Roncesvalles, and only just managed to maintain his position until Picton and Campbell arrived, while, at Maya, Stewart was all but driven from the pass, after losing two successive positions. Wellington, on returning from San Sebastian, heard of these combats at Imeta, and at once gave orders for all the troops to concentrate in communication with the force at Pampeluna. The retreat of the troops was successfully accomplished. On the 28th a combat took place at Santarem, where Wellington, with very inferior numbers, held a strong position against the attacks of Soult. On the 30th, Hill was attacked at Buenzas in a difficult position, and his position was turned; but in the meantime Wellington had assailed and taken Santarem, and had thrown the French who were engaged against him into hopeless confusion. Soult's position had become desperate, and it was necessary to retreat. In the narrow passes he with difficulty escaped being surrounded and losing his whole army. During nine days' fighting the allies had lost 7,300 men, while the French loss must have been quite double. Soult's army was rendered incapable of further action for the present, and Wellington at once ordered Graham to renew the siege of San Sebastian.

Quadruple Alliance, THE (August, 1718), was the name given to the extension of the Triple Alliance of 1717 between England, France, and Holland by the adhesion of the Emperor to its principles. A treaty was drawn up by the allied powers, with the main object of maintaining the European settlement effected by the Treaty of Utrecht. With a few changes of detail, the chief articles of the treaty were that Spain was to restore Sardinia to the Emperor, and the King of Spain to renounce his claim to succeed to the French crown; while the Emperor renounced all claim to what had been guaranteed to Philip V. by the Treaty of Utrecht. Philip was to renounce his claim to the Italian possessions of the Emperor and to the Netherlands. The Emperor was to be put in possession of Sicily, in return for which the Emperor was to give up Sardinia to the King of Sicily, who was to be confirmed in all the cessions made to him by the Treaty of Turin in 1703; while the Emperor was to acknowledge the house of Savoy's right to succeed to the crown of Spain in case of the failure of Philip V.'s heirs. France and Great Britain promised to aid the Emperor to acquire possession of Sicily; while the Emperor and the French bound themselves to maintain the Protestant succession in England. The Kings of Spain and Sicily were to be forced to submit to these terms, but were allowed three months' consideration. If any one of the mediating powers was attacked, the others should assist him. If both Spain and Sicily held out, Sardinia was to be first conquered, and then Sicily, of which two islands the former was to be put in the guardianship of England; and in case of this resistance on the part of these two powers, the Emperor was allowed to recover the part of Milan ceded by the Treaty of Turin. When once in possession of Sicily the Emperor was to give up all claim upon Spain and the Indies.

Quakers, THE, owe their origin to George Fox, who seems to have commenced preaching about the year 1647, from which time his life was almost constant travel or imprisonment. The term Quaker seems to have been first bestowed upon the new religious body at Derby in 1650, in allusion to Fox's phrase bidding people "tremble at the word of the Lord." Before long his wilder followers began to draw attention to themselves by their strange habits, which disturbed public worship, and by declaiming against all sorts of clergy, against the use of "steeple-houses" and fixed times of assembling. But the extravagances of the new sect were confined to fanatics, and must not be set down to the discredit of its more respectable members like Barclay and Penn. By 1652 the Quakers had already set up assemblies in Lancashire, and, a few years later, held their first separate London meeting in Watling Street. Neal relates, though apparently on somewhat doubtful authority in some cases, the most extraordinary tales of their conduct in these days; and Whitelocke assures us that one Quaker came to the door of the Parliament-house with drawn sword, being "inspired by the Spirit to kill every man that sat in the house." Such extravagant conduct gained them many enemies; but Cromwell was willing to lend them his protection, and was specially averse to the treatment of Naylor, a Quaker who received a severe sentence as a blasphemer, Dec. 17, 1656. On Charles II.'s restoration, they petitioned the king in favour of the four hundred men and women of their sect imprisoned in or near London, and petitioned for toleration. The only answer to this petition was a declaration that if, after a certain date, any people should refuse to take an oath—a ceremony which the Quakers considered wicked—or should assemble for worship, they should be liable to two fines of £5 and £10, and for the third offence to transportation. The Acts of Uniformity and the Corporation Act told upon them as upon other Dissenters. On James II.'s accession they petitioned the new king for toleration, and now had a defender at court in the person of Penn. They gladly accepted the privileges of the Declaration of Indulgence. In 1682 Penn had founded the colony of Pennsylvania, and one of the leading articles of its constitution granted freedom of conscience to all who acknowledged the "one eternal God." The Quakers shared in the benefits of the Toleration Act, and in many of the various Acts by which, in subsequent times, the bounds of religious and civil liberty have been enlarged. In 1833 they were allowed to make a "solemn affirmation and declaration" in lieu of an oath in Parliament and courts of law.

Quatre Bras, THE BATTLE OF (June 16, 1815), was an encounter between the left of the French army and the English advanced guard in the short campaign of 1815. Quatre Bras itself was merely a mass of farm-buildings situated at the point where the four main roads to Brussels, Nivelles, Charleroi, and Namur intersect. Napoleon's orders were that, while he attacked the Prussians at Ligny, on the 16th, Ney should simultaneously overwhelm the British force at Quatre Bras. The attacks began at three o'clock in the afternoon, and as evening wore on, Ney became aware that no reinforcements could reach him; and at the same time fresh troops were arriving for the allies, among whom were two brigades of the Guards. As the attacks became feebler, Wellington ordered all the troops to advance. They at once drove the French before them, and carried every position which the French had won. Night had now fallen, and the troops bivouacked on the field of battle. The reinforcements had now given Wellington a numerical superiority over Ney; but the necessity of forming a connection with Blücher, who was falling back from Ligny, compelled him to forego the opportunity of attacking Ney on the 17th, and at ten o'clock next morning he began a retreat to the field of Waterloo.

Quebec, THE CAPTURE OF (Sept. 13, 1759), was effected by General Wolfe during the campaign in America which formed part of the Seven Years' War. The idea of attacking Quebec, the capital of French Canada, was one of long standing with English ministers, and in 1711 an expedition was sent against it, which returned without being able to make its way through the channel of the St. Lawrence. The town was, from its position, considered impregnable, and was defended by 13,000 French troops under the Marquis de Montcalm. Wolfe's force of 8,000 men, on board Admiral Saunders's fleet, succeeded in landing on the Isle of Orleans before the city, by June 27, 1759. An attempt to destroy the English shipping by means of fire-ships failed, and next day (June 29) Wolfe took possession of the headland of Port Levi, which faces Quebec. The city was situated on a promontory of lofty rocks, which, continuing beyond the city, were called the Heights of Abraham. Montcalm had so disposed his troops as to command the only dangerous position of assault, with the river and the sandbank in his front, and behind him heavy woods. Wolfe commenced to fire on the city from his two batteries, while Montcalm remained for the most part on the defensive. On July 9 Wolfe carried his troops over to the left bank, while a squadron of English ships, passing further up the river, maintained the blockade. At last, being unable to induce Montcalm to move, Wolfe crossed the Montmorency, but was beaten back. Still the two other English armies failed to appear. To add to the other difficulties, Wolfe fell ill of a fever, and there were only between 3,000 and 4,000 effective men. So matters continued till the night of Sept. 12, when Wolfe determined to attempt to scale the Heights of Abraham. In the darkness of the midnight, half his forces were carried across with the tide. Clambering up the precipice by the aid of bushes and stumps, they startled the French company guarding that part of the heights. Before Montcalm could muster his men, the English were at the very back of Quebec. In the engagement that followed, Wolfe was wounded in the groin, and died in the moment of victory, at the early age of thirty-three.

Quebec Act, THE (1774), was passed at the instigation of Lord North, to conciliate, as far as possible, the French Canadians, and to secure their allegiance to Britain in the approaching war with America. This Act restored the old French system, and established the Roman Catholic Church, to which the vast majority of the Canadians belonged, whilst it "confirmed the French Canadians in their possessions, their laws, and rights, on condition of their taking an oath of allegiance which was so worded as not to hurt the conscience of Roman Catholics." It also provided for the establishment of a legislative council, with authority over everything except taxation.

Creeasy, Britannic Empire.

Queen is a word which originally meant no more than woman, wife, though it early came to be used for the wife of a king. Asser, after telling how Ethelwulf upon his return to England with his second wife, Judith, placed her upon a throne by his side, "contrary to the perverse custom" of the West Saxons, proceeds to explain that the evil deeds of Eadburh, wife of Beorhtric of Wessex, had caused the nobles of that kingdom to swear that they would not henceforth allow any king's wife to sit upon the throne beside her husband, or even to be called "queen" (regina). According to Professor Freeman (Norm. Cong.), this explains the fact that in Wessex the usual title for the king's wife was "Lady," Hlafdige, though in Mercia "Queen," cwen, was still used. From the time of Ethelred, however, a special form for the coronation of the queen appears in the rituals; Eadgyth, wife of the Confessor, is said by the chronicler to have been "halloed to queen," though she is afterwards always spoken of as "lady;" and from the coronation of Matilda, wife of the Conqueror, onward, the title "queen" is always applied to the wife of the king. But it still carried with it the sense of king's wife, and this may, perhaps, explain the fact that the Empress Matilda, who claimed the crown in her own right, is never spoken of as "queen," or "regina," but in the chronicles appears as "Empress," and in William of Malmesbury and a charter, as "Domina." On the other hand, Stephen's wife, Matilda, is spoken of as "the king's cwen."

Henry I.'s attempt to secure the accession of his daughter broke down, partly because the rule of a woman was unprecedented, and opposed alike to the old English theory of election, and the new feudal spirit, but still more because of her marriage with the Count of Anjou, the hereditary enemy of the Normans. But till long afterwards there were doubts whether a queen could reign in England. The accession of Mary Tudor was secured alike by her father's will, authorised by Act of Parliament, and by the strong legitimist feeling of the country. To extinguish, however, "the doubt and folly of malicious and ignorant persons," a statute was passed declaring that a queen regnant has the same powers and prerogatives as a king.

Mary, wife of William III., occupied a curious position, midway between that of queen consort and queen regnant, for while the Bill of Rights declared the Prince and Princess of Orange joint sovereigns, and her name accompanied his in all public documents, "the sole and full exercise of the regal power" was entrusted to the prince.

The mediæval queens consort of England usually possessed considerable estates separately administered, and had their own chancellors. In modern times they have had their attorneys and solicitors-general, though the offices are merely nominal. Apparently even before the Conquest the queen consort received "queen's gold" (aurum regina, probably the same as the gersamma regina of Domesday), i.e., one mark of gold for every one hundred marks of silver paid to the king in feudal dues and the like. As there was no queen consort from the death of Henry VIII. to the accession of James I., its payment was suspended, and Anne of Denmark never exacted it. In 1635 writs were again issued for levying it, but Charles afterwards bought the right from his wife for £10,000, and it was never enforced.

By the Act 25 Edward III. it was rendered treason to compass or imagine the death of the queen, or to violate her, and in the latter case the queen herself, if consenting, was guilty of treason. For this offence Anne Boleyn was tried before the peers of Parliament; Caroline, wife of George IV., was proceeded against in a like case by a bill of pains and penalties. The legal position of a queen consort is that of a feme sole, and not of a feme covert. She "is of ability to purchase lands and convey them, to make leases, to grant copyholds, and do the other acts of ownership (without the concurrence of her lord), which no other married woman until very recently could do. She may likewise sue and be sued alone without joining her husband. She may also have a separate property in goods, as well as in lands, and she has a right to dispose of them by will." (Stephen.) But though she can be sued, she is not liable to any amercement.

A queen dowager is not protected by the Statute of Treasons. An Act is said to have been passed in the reign of Henry VI., though of this there is little evidence, rendering any person who dared to marry a queen dowager without special royal licence liable to the forfeiture of his lands and goods. No action, however, seems to have been taken when it was discovered that Lord Seymour of Sudeley had married Catherine Parr before leave was given.

Queen Anne's Bounty was instituted in 1704 for the relief of the poorer clergy. The tax known as the first-fruits and tenths of livings on the Church (the surrender, that is, of the entire income of the first year of every ecclesiastical living, and the tenth part of the income of every subsequent year), had been originally imposed by the papacy, but this had been transferred to the crown by Henry VIII. Under Charles II. the condition of the clergy was miserable in the extreme; their incomes hardly ever amounted to £100 a year—they were often less than £15. At this time the tax only produced £14,000 a year, and the king used it as a fund from which to pension his mistresses and their offspring. In 1697 Bishop Burnet presented to William III. a plan for transferring the proceeds of the tax from the crown to the poor clergy, but the king set it aside. The design was carried out in the next reign. On Feb. 7, the day after the queen's birthday, Sir Charles Hedges, Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced to the House that her Majesty intended to make a grant of her whole revenue, arising out of the first-fruits and tenths of livings, for the benefit of the poorer clergy. The project was warmly approved by the House, and a bill passed empowering the queen to incorporate such persons as she should select as trustees for her bounty. The measure passed through the Lords after some opposition. Various regulations have been made with reference to this fund since it was first handed over for the benefit of the clergy by Queen Anne. Of these Acts the principal are 2 & 3 Anne, c. 20, authorising the queen to establish a corporation for the management of this fund, which was done the same year, consisting of archbishops, bishops, privy-councillors, various law officers, the mayors of cities, custodes rotulorum, and lieutenants of counties, &c. By 1 Geo. I. these trustees were allowed to examine witnesses on oath. £200 was to be invested for the increase of each living with a stipend of less than £10 a year: then those not exceeding £20. To every living under £45 a year the governors might make a grant of £200 on condition of a similar amount being raised from other sources. By 46 Geo. III., c. 133, £6,000 a year was granted for the augmentation of livings not exceeding £150 a year. By 28 & 29 Vic., c. 69, any five of the governors (three being archbishops or bishops) are constituted a quorum. Other statutes have allowed certain advances for repairing chancels, building parsonages, and other similar purposes.

Queen-gold (Aurum Reginae) was a claim made by the Queens of England on every tenth mark paid to the king on the renewal of leases or crown-lands on the granting of charters—matters of grace supposed to be obtained by the powerful intercession of the queen.

Queensberry, JAMES DOUGLAS, 2ND DUKE OF (1662—1709), succeeded to his father's title in 1695. He had been a staunch supporter of the Prince of Orange, and in his earlier years had served in the army. In 1700 he was appointed High Commissioner to the Parliament of Scotland, and in 1702 and 1703 occupied the same office for Queen Anne. In the latter year he was driven out of office for his share in what is popularly called "The Queensberry Plot" (q.v.), but two years later was made Keeper of the Privy Seal, and a Commissioner for the treaty of the Union. For the purpose of carrying the Union through, he was appointed Lord High Commissioner to the last Scotch Parliament in 1706, and on his journey to London was received with the utmost honour in England as some recompense for the execrations he had to encounter in Scotland. As a reward for his services on this occasion he was created an English peer (1708), a pension of £3,000 a year was granted him out of the Post Office, and "the whole patronage of Scotland was vested in his hands." In 1709 his vote in the election of the Scotch representative peers was disallowed, as he now sat in the House of Lords in his own right. His death occurred in 1711. His son Charles, the third Duke of Queensberry, was friend and patron of Prior and Gay.

Queensberry Plot, THE (1703). In March, 1703, Queen Anne granted a pardon to all Scotch political offenders who would take the oath to her government. Encouraged by this act of generosity several of the exiled adherents of the Stuarts availed themselves of this opportunity of returning to their own country for the purposes of stirring up sedition. Amongst those who took advantage of the new state of affairs was Lord Lovat. Before long it got noised abroad that there was to be a great Highland gathering at Lochaber early in August, and people were not long in discovering or inventing a political meaning to this event. Lovat now availed himself of the general feeling of disquietude to gratify a grudge which he had long held against Lord Athole, the Keeper of the Privy Seal. Having in his possession an undressed letter written by the Pretender's queen to some Scotch noble, he filled in the blank of the superscription with the name of Athole, and then forwarded the document to the commissioner, the Duke of Queensberry. The latter nobleman, glad of an opportunity of ruining his colleague, sent on the letter unopened to the queen. Before long, however, one of Lovat's friends revealed the deceit, and the chief plotter had to fly to the Continent. But as a result of his deception Queensberry had to quit office, and even then the effects of this movement were not all over. In December the queen informed the House of Lords in London that there were French emissaries stirring up rebellion in Scotland, and this body at once commenced investigating the question on its own account, but without coming to any very definite result. In the meanwhile, however, the appointment of a committee of inquiry in the House of Lords had wounded the feelings of the Scotch, who naturally considered that such a question should be dealt with by their own Privy Council. At the same time the proceedings of the House of Lords had stirred up indignation nearer home. The Commons discovered in the action of the Peers that this body were assuming powers of criminal inquiry which did not belong to it, and prayed the queen to give orders for the investigation to be carried on by her officers. Accordingly, when the Scotch Parliament met in January, 1704, the queen desired the Privy Council to ascertain how much truth there was in the suspected plot.

Queensferry Paper, THE (JUNE, 1680), was found in the pocket of Henry Hall, one of the leading Covenanters in Scotland. He was captured at Queensferry, and the document that had been in his possession read at the council board. This document was a preliminary sketch of the more famous Declaration of Sanquhar (q.v.).

Queenston, THE BATTLE OF (OCT., 1812), was fought on the shores of Lake Ontario between an invading force of Americans, and the English and Canadian forces led by Generals Brock and Sheaffe. The victory remained with the English, who, however, purchased it by the death of General Brock.

Querouaille, LOUISE DE, Duchess of Portsmouth (d. 1734), came over to England in the train of Henrietta of Orleans, the sister of Charles II., whose mistress she soon became, and who soon created her Duchess of Portsmouth (1673). She appears to have been friendly with Arlington, and to have long kept up a communication with the French ambassadors, being very anxious for the friendship between Louis XIV. and Charles II. to continue. Towards the close of the reign she became a strong partisan of the Exclusion Bill. A little later she became on good terms with the Duke of York, finding that he was willing to guarantee her £5,000 a year from the receipts of the Post Office. Next year (1682) she was mainly instrumental in securing Sunderland's recall to office, and in 1684 was one of the prime movers of the ruling ministers, Sunderland and Godolphin. When the king was seized with his fatal apoplectic stroke, it was she who reminded the Duke of York that his brother was at heart a Catholic, and who thus succeeded in calling Francis to the royal deathbed. By Charles II. she was the mother of the Duke of Richmond; but her own title died with her.

Quia Emptores is the name given to the statute enacted in 1290, which directed that in all future transfers of land the new tenant should hold the land not from the alienor, but from the next lord. Thus if B holding land from A transferred some of that land to C, C would hold it not from B but from A. In this way sub-infeudation was checked, and no new manors could be formed. The real importance of this act consisted in its stopping the creation of fresh manors, and by putting a great bar to the practice of sub-infeudation, largely increasing the chances of the greater landlords, and above all the landlord par excellence, the king, to escheats. From this point of view it may well be compared with the Statute of Mortmain.

Quiberon, THE BATTLE OF (NOV. 20, 1759), was fought between the English and French during the Seven Years' War. Sir Edward Hawke had been engaged during the summer of 1759 in blockading the French fleet, which lay at Brest under De Conflans, and when, in the autumn, he was forced to stand off, the French admiral seized his opportunity to sally forth in the hope of overpowering a few English frigates that were cruising about under Captain Duff, before Sir Edward Hawke could come up to their aid. In this plan, however, De Conflans was unsuccessful, and the united English fleets drove the French—to whom they were slightly superior in numbers—back from the point of Quiberon to coast near the mouth of the Vilaine. The French ships were drawn up close to a shore rocky and set with islands. Shoals and quicksands rendered their position still more dangerous to attack. Nevertheless, Hawke determined on an engagement, and refused to listen to the representations of his pilot, whom he answered with the words, "You have done your duty in this remonstrance; now lay me alongside the French admiral." The battle resulted in a decisive victory for the English, who only lost forty men, and by night two French ships had struck, four were sunk, and the others had drawn up the Vilaine. To set against this, two English vessels were stranded, but their crews were saved. In return for this victory, which relieved England from all fear of invasion, and shattered the French naval power for a time, a pension of £1,500 a year was conferred upon Admiral Hawke.

Quiberon, THE EXPEDITION TO, took place in the year 1795, and was intended to assist the Royalist insurgents of La Vendée and Brittany. After much delay, the expedition, consisting largely of French royalist refugees, left England (July, 1795), and landed at the peninsula of Quiberon, near Carnac. Here they were joined by a large number of "Chouans" and irregular troops, commanded by the Royalist generals De Puisaye and D'Hervilly. The little fort of Penthièvre was captured by these troops; but after that nothing was done, owing to jealousies among the leaders. Meanwhile, Hoche, the Republican general, had raised 10,000 troops, and managed to recapture the fort, and to shut the invaders up in the Peninsula of Quiberon. They were then attacked by the Republicans, and cut to pieces, or driven into the sea. About 900, with the leader, De Puisaye, escaped to the English vessels. The remainder were killed or taken captive. Of the prisoners 700 were shot by their captors after the fighting was over.

Quorum, JUSTICES OF THE. When justices of the peace were appointed in each county, it was customary in empowering any two or more of them to inquire into offences, to specify the names of some few of these justices, without whose presence business could not be transacted. The specifying words were "quorum (i.e., of the whole number) aliquem vestrum, A., B., C., D., &c., unum esse volumus," and from this phrase these more important justices were called "justices of the quorum." It has now, however, become customary to make no distinction between special justices and others; and as a rule, the "quorum" clause simply repeats all the preceding names, with perhaps one exception, for the sake of form. The writ at present used in the appointment of these justices, has continued with very little alteration indeed since the year 1690.

Quo Warranto Commissions were issued by Edward I., for the purpose of inquiring into the questions—(i.) what were the royal manors; (ii.) by what warrant estates that were formerly crown lands; or (iii.) judicial rights that were once exercised by the crown, had passed into the hands of private individuals or corporations. In 1274 the king had appointed a commission of inquiry, which resulted in the "Rotuli Hundredorum," and by the Statute of Gloucester (1278), the itinerant justices were to order the people by proclamation "to show what kind of franchises they had, and by what warrant." These commissions were frequently resisted, notably by Earl Warrenne; but the inquiry was continued through a period of more than twenty years. The most important effect of these commissions was that they prevented any further encroachments on royal property or rights.

Rabbling the Curates, was the name given to the expulsion of Episcopalian clergymen from the south-west of Scotland

by the Cameronians in 1689—90. There seems to have been comparatively little mob violence. Cameronian committees were formed to superintend the ejection, and formal notices to quit were sent to the curates. A subsequent act of the Scottish Parliament legalised these proceedings by declaring the parishes vacant.

The expulsion is described in the Cameronian pamphlet, Faithful Contendings Displayed. Some what opposing accounts will be found in Burton, Hist. Scot., ch. lxxxi., and Cunningham, Church History, ch. xxi., 16—19.

Radoot Bridge, THE BATTLE OF (1387), was a skirmish on the Thames near Faringdon, between De Vere, Duke of Ireland, the favourite of Richard II., and the baronial forces under the Earl of Derby (afterwards Henry IV.). De Vere, finding himself outnumbered, fled, and his men surrendered after a slight skirmish. The result of this defeat was to place the king entirely at the mercy of Gloucester and the other Lords Appellant.

Radical. The exact origin of this term as applied to a political party is unknown; possibly it was derived from a speech delivered by Fox in 1797, wherein he declared that "radical reform" was necessary. The word seems to have come into general use about 1816, and was applied to persons agitating on behalf of extreme measures of Parliamentary reform. The best account of the early character of the movement is given by the weaver Samuel Bamford (Passages in the Life of a Radical). Describing a meeting of representatives from several "Hampden Clubs," he says "Resolutions were passed declaratory of the right of every male to vote who paid taxes; that males of eighteen should be eligible to vote; that parliaments should be elected annually; that no place-man or pensioner should sit in Parliament; that every twenty thousand inhabitants should send a member to the House of Commons. It was not until we became infested by spies, incendiaries, and their dupes, that physical force was mentioned among us." The most important leaders of the party were "Orator" Hunt, Cobbett, and Major Cartwright, it was also patronised by Sir Francis Burdett. Some of the extreme Radicals, however, seem to have planned an armed movement; and the action of the government and public fear caused the terms Radical and rioter to be used as synonymous. Even Brougham said in 1819, "The Radicals have made themselves so odious, that a number even of our own way of thinking would be pleased enough to see them and their vile press put down at all hazards." During the struggle over the Reform Bill of 1832, the term began to be adopted by some comparatively moderate Parliamentary advocates of reform. In the Parliaments which followed they numbered from fifty to seventy, including Grote, Molesworth, Roebuck, Joseph Hume, etc. Henceforth the term came to indicate little more than an advanced Liberal; and after the Reform Bill of 1867 was frequently used as a designation for the whole Liberal party.

For the early Radical movement, besides Bamford, see Martineau, History of the Peace, bk. i.; and Spencer Walpole, Hist. of Eng., vol. i, ch. v.

Raffles, SIR THOMAS STAMFORD (b. 1781, d. 1826), a colonial administrator and naturalist, was the son of a naval captain. He became a clerk in the India House, and was appointed in 1805 under-secretary at Prince of Wales' Island. His ability brought him under the notice of Lord Minto, to whom he suggested the conquest of Java from the Dutch. This island he administered as Lieutenant-Governor from 1811 to 1816. From 1818 to 1824 he was Lieutenant-Governor of Bencoolen in Sumatra, and succeeded in establishing the settlement at Singapore. In Java and in Sumatra he emancipated the slaves, and introduced many reforms. Everywhere he made researches in zoology and botany; and on his return founded the Zoological Society.

Raglan, LORD (b. 1788, d. 1855). Fitzroy Henry Somerset, youngest son of the fifth Duke of Beaufort, entered the army in 1804. In 1808 Sir Arthur Wellesley appointed him his aide-de-camp; in this capacity he served all through the Peninsular War, and was present at Waterloo, where he lost an arm. He was afterwards employed on several diplomatic missions, and sat in the House of Commons for Truro during two Parliaments. In 1852 he was appointed Master General of Ordnance and elevated to the House of Peers. In 1854 he became Field Marshal. On the breaking out of the Crimean War Lord Raglan was appointed commander-in-chief of the British Army. He reached the Crimea in September, 1854, and shared with Marshal St. Arnaud the command of the allied forces during the winter and the following spring [CRIMEAN WAR]. Lord Raglan was heavily weighed down by the anxiety caused by the sufferings of his men in the trenches. His health had been gradually failing before he was seized by the attack of cholera which carried him off (June 28, 1855). Of Lord Raglan's personal bravery and sense of duty there was never any doubt. His merits as a commander were never put to a fair test in the Crimea. He shared a divided command and conducted the operations of the British army at a time when 40 years of peace had reduced our military establishments to the completest inefficiency.

Ragman Rolls, THE, are a collection of documents recording the homage performed by the Scotch barons and clergy to Edward I. on his progress through Scotland in 1296. They are a most important source of information upon the condition of Scotland in the fourteenth century. The Bannatyne Club published the documents in full in 1834.

Rainsborough, COLONEL (d. 1648), one of the Parliamentary officers who took part under Cromwell in the storm of Bristol, where he "had the hardest task of all" (Cromwell's letter). In 1648 he was appointed admiral, but the fleet mutinied and set him ashore. He was assassinated in October of that year in his lodgings at Doncaster by a party of Royalists, who had sallied from the Castle of Pontefract.

Rajpoot Ghaut, THE TREATY OF (Dec. 24, 1805), terminated the war between the East India Company and Jeswunt Rao Holkar. All his territories were restored to him, but he was obliged to renounce his claims to Boondee and Rampoor, and accept the Chumbul as his northern boundary. The treaty was the result of the policy of conciliation and peace adopted in India after Wellesley's return to England.

Rajputana, "the land of the Rajputs," is a considerable district in North-western India, including eighteen native states, of which the most important are Oodeypoor or Mewar, whose Rana is recognised as the overlord of the rest—Jeyppore, Jodhpore, Kotah, Bikanir, Ulwar, and Jeysummir. The Rajputs vigorously resisted the Mohammedan invaders, but internal anarchy caused their division into several states, and thus laid them open to the attack of the Mahrattas. In 1803 Lord Wellesley took them under British protection on condition of their paying tribute, and in 1817 they recognised British suzerainty.

Raleigh, SIR WALTER (b. 1552, d. 1618), was the son of Walter Raleigh of Budleigh, in Devonshire. After spending three years at Oxford, he went in 1569 to France to aid the Huguenots. Returning in 1578, he accompanied his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, on a voyage of discovery to Newfoundland, which proved unsuccessful. In 1580 Raleigh obtained military employment in Ireland, where he distinguished himself by his ruthless severity, and took part in the massacre of the Smerwick garrison. For his services he received 12,000 acres of the Desmond land, and it was upon these that he first planted the potato in 1596. After the suppression of the rebellion he attracted the attention of the queen, whose favour he soon won, and who sent him on a mission to the Prince of Orange in 1582. In 1584 he obtained a charter for the colonisation of any lands not held by a Christian prince; three expeditions were despatched by Raleigh to America, but the colony which had received the name of Virginia had to be abandoned in 1590. In 1585 Raleigh had been knighted, and in 1587 had become captain of the Queen's guard. After taking an active part in the defence of the country against the Armada, he voyaged to Guiana to find El Dorado in 1595, accompanied Essex to the capture of Cadiz in 1596, and joined in the expedition to the Azores in the following year. It was on this occasion that Raleigh, who had taken the island of Fayal without waiting for the arrival of the rest of the expedition, had a serious quarrel with Essex (q.v.) who had all along been his rival. On the accession of James I., he was deprived of his office of captain of the guard, and dismissed from court, owing to the enmity of Sir Robert Cecil (q.v.). He was shortly charged with complicity in Lord Cobham's plot in favour of Lady Arabella Stuart, was found guilty of treason and sentenced to death. The true history of the plot can scarcely be recovered, but it seems certain that Raleigh was guilty of nothing more than vague talk. The sentence of death was, however, not carried into effect, and Raleigh remained a prisoner in the Tower for twelve years, occupying himself in writing his History of the World. In 1615 he was released, in order to conduct an expedition to Guiana in search of gold; on his arrival in South America he was attacked in the Orinoco by the Spaniards, whom he defeated, but the gold mine remained undiscovered, and Raleigh returned to England in 1618. He was badly received by James, who, disappointed at the ill success of the expedition, declared his intention of punishing those who had committed acts of violence "against his dear brother of Spain." Raleigh was executed on his old sentence (Oct. 29, 1618).

Edwards, Life and Letters of Raleigh, the most complete biography. Pope Hennessy's Raleigh in Ireland and Schomburgk's edition of Raleigh's Discovery of Guiana are useful for particular periods. The best discussion of his share in Cobham's plot is in Gardiner, Hist. of Eng., vol. i., and account of his last expedition to Guiana in vol. iii. A useful little sketch has been written by Mrs. Creighton.

Ralph, JAMES, was a native of Philadelphia. He settled in England in 1725. He devoted himself to literature, and produced some plays and dramas of little merit. In 1742 he published a pamphlet in answer to the memoirs of the Duchess of Marlborough, and thus became known as a political writer. He devoted his services to the Opposition and the Prince of Wales' party, and wrote numerous tracts in their interest. He received a pension on George II.'s accession. Among other works he wrote The Use and Abuse of Parliaments, and a History of England during the reigns of Charles II., James II., and William III., which, though possessed of little literary merit, is of some value owing to the facilities which Ralph had for acquiring information on this period.

Ralph of ESCURES, Archbishop of Canterbury (1114–1122), was the son of a Norman baron, and became Abbot of Sees.

He was ejected from his abbey in 1104 by Robert de Belesme, and sought refuge in England with Henry I. In 1108 he was made Bishop of Rochester, and as such, on the death of St. Anselm in 1109, he acted as administrator of the see of Canterbury. For five years Henry refused to fill Anselm's place, but at length he was obliged to consent to an election, and in 1114 Ralph was chosen archbishop. An attempt to exact from Thurstan, Archbishop Elect of York, an acknowledgment of the supremacy of the Archbishop of Canterbury, is the most important event in Ralph's subsequent career. In 1119 he had a stroke of palsy, and died in 1122. He is described by Ordericus as "deeply learned, fluent of speech, good humoured, and popular."

The fullest modern account is in Hook's Archbishops of Canterbury, based on Eadmer, Historia Novorum, William of Malmesbury, and Ordericus Vitalis.

Ramillies, THE BATTLE OF (May 23, 1706), the second of Marlborough's great victories in the War of the Spanish Succession. Both Marlborough and Villeroi, the French commander, were eager for a battle, and the armies met near Ramillies, between Namur and Louvain. Villeroi's right wing was composed of the household troops, while his left, which he considered sufficiently protected by the swamp created by a stream (the Little Gheet), consisted only of a single line of infantry. Marlborough made a feint of attacking the left; Villeroi was at once deceived, and withdrew troops from his right to strengthen it. Then the main body of the English and Dutch attacked the French extreme right, which was also taken in the flank by the Danish cavalry, which had galloped round unperceived. Thus the French position was turned, and now the main body was attacked. After a hard struggle, the household troops retreated. The difficulties caused by the baggage waggons in the rear created a panic, and the whole army fled in the direction of Brussels. Many towns at once surrendered, and before the end of the year the only places of importance held by the French in the Netherlands were Mons and Namur.

Ramnuggur, THE BATTLE OF (1848). At the beginning of the second Sikh war, the British army, under Lord Gough, attacked Shere Sing at Ramnuggur on the Chenab. His position, however, was too strong to storm; and many lives were lost in a charge of the dragoons to clear the Sikhs from the dry sandy bed of the river. A flanking movement was then attempted, whereupon Shere Sing withdrew to Sadoolapoor.

Ramsay, SIR ALEXANDER, of Dalhousie, compelled the English in 1638 to raise the siege of Dunbar (q.v.). After carrying on a successful guerilla war against them for some years, he took the castle of Roxburgh (1542), receiving as his reward the sheriffdom of Teviotdale. This aroused the jealousy of Sir William Douglas, who captured him at Hawick and starved him to death in his castle of Hermitage.

Randolph, Sir Thomas (b. 1523, d. 1590), one of the ministers of Queen Elizabeth, was compelled to seek an asylum abroad during the reign of Mary, owing to his religious opinions. On his return to England, after Mary's death, he was employed on several important diplomatic missions to France and Russia, and more especially to Scotland, in connection with which country his statesmanship was chiefly shown. His first embassy to Scotland was in 1559, when he accompanied the Earl of Arran, and in the following year he was employed by Elizabeth to testify to the Scotch her disapprobation of the Confession of Faith. In 1563—4 he was sent to Mary, Queen of Scots, charged with the delicate mission of recommending a husband for her, the individual selected being Lord Robert Dudley, afterwards Earl of Leicester. In 1564 Randolph was named a commissioner at the Conference of Berwick (q.v.), and in the subsequent year was again ambassador in Scotland, sending to the queen "accounts from week to week of the position of parties and of the progress of the crisis." In the same year he was commissioned to assure the Protestant lords in Scotland of Elizabeth's sympathy, and to promise Argyll and Murray that they should have what aid from England they required. In 1566 the Queen of Scots ordered him to withdraw from her court, knowing, says Mr. Froude, that he "had shared Murray's secrets, that he had been Elizabeth's instrument in keeping alive in Scotland the Protestant faction, and that so long as he remained the party whom she most detested would have a nucleus to gather round." In 1570 he was again sent to the north, but the feeling against England was so strong in Edinburgh that he found that he could not with safety remain. Two years later he was obliged to return to Edinburgh, and was twice shot at. In 1581 he was ordered to demand the release of Morton from James VI.; but the hatred of the English still continued, and the ambassador had to flee for his life. Cautious, trustworthy, and deeply skilled in Scotch politics, Randolph obtained the confidence of the queen and the goodwill of Cecil, who wrote of him, "He is worth more than I fear our time will well consider."

Rangoon, the capital of Burmah, was occupied by the English in 1824, during the first Burmese war. In the second Burmese war, undertaken on account of the oppression of British subjects at Rangoon, the town was taken by storm by the English forces under General Godwin, April 14, 1852. At the conclusion of the war the province of Pegu, including Rangoon, was annexed to British India. Situated at the mouth of the Irrawaddy, it is an extremely favourable situation for trade, and has become one of the most important commercial cities of British India.

Rape, A, is a territorial division of Sussex. Sussex is divided into six rapes, which again are subdivided into hundreds. It is no more than a geographical term, and differs from the lathe of Kent in that the judicial organisation is retained by the hundred. The rape may possibly represent the shires into which Sussex was divided while it was yet an independent kingdom. The original meaning is apparently "share."

Rapparees, were bands of Irish led by dispossessed proprietors who refused to submit to the Cromwellian transplantation to Connaught, and carried on a guerilla warfare against the new English possessors. At first known as Tories, they came later to be called Rapparees, which Burnet, writing in 1690, calls "a new name." But the names Tory and Rapparee came to mean in Ireland only ordinary felons at large. Their numbers were immensely exaggerated: thus in 1707 "there were but six Tories in the county Tipperary, and four in the county of Cork."

Ratcliffe, Sir Richard, was a confidential friend of Richard III. To his advice it was largely due that Richard abandoned the plan of marrying his niece, the princess Elizabeth, for Ratcliffe declared that it would cause him to be suspected of having poisoned his own wife Anne to make way for the match, and that her northern adherents would abandon him if it were not at once disavowed.

Rates are assessments upon owners and occupiers of real property by local authorities and for local purposes; they are in fact local taxes. As the power of levying rates is not recognised by the common law of England, the conditions under which they are to be enforced are always stated in the statutes prescribing them. Most of these are of very recent date, for though contributions for common purposes had been levied for centuries in every parish and borough this was done frequently under local by-laws. The rates authorised by statutes are of various kinds:—(a) By the authorities of the civil parish the poor rate is levied, the management of which was in 1834 taken out of the hands of the vestry and placed in those of overseers [Poor Law]. The highway rate is levied by the highway parish, which need not coincide with the poor-law parish. The control of the roads was under the Turnpike Acts of the last century vested in trustees who defrayed the expenses by tolls, but this system is fast disappearing, and facilities for its abolition were granted by an Act of 1878. Burial board rates may be levied by burial boards, consisting of from three to nine ratepayers, elected by the vestry under the various Burial Acts dating between 1852 and 1875, but the legislation on this point is very confused. The free libraries rate is also collected by the vestry, and the lighting and watching rate by the Act of 1883. (b) The ecclesiastical parish, which may be distinct from the civil parish, levies the church rate through the vestry. This tax, however, ceased to be compulsory in 1868, when it was enacted that it could no longer be enforced by a legal process. (c) In unincorporated towns, improvement rates may be levied by commissioners under special acts. (d) Borough rates are levied by municipal councils as constituted under the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, they are imposed to make up any deficiency in the borough accounts, and are usually assessed on the poor-rate valuation. This rate is often increased considerably by the loans, which, under the Act of 1835 and subsequent Acts, corporations are authorised to borrow. (e) County rates are levied for the general expenses of each county. They are collected like the poor rate from each parish by the overseers, and apportioned by a committee of quarter sessions. Police rates are levied in the same way. (f) Rates for sanitary purposes, such as sewerage rates, and borough baths and wash-houses rates, and water rates, are imposed under the various Public Health Acts which have been passed since 1848. By the Act of 1875 the guardians are constituted the authorities in rural districts; and in urban districts the town council, or the improvements commission, or a local board appointed by the ratepayers. (g) Lastly, school-rates are levied by the Act of 1870, to make up the difference between fees and expenditure. In boroughs they form part of the borough rate, and in parishes outside boroughs part of the poor rate. In the City of London there are nine different rates collected by different authorities. The poor rate is assessed by the Local Government Board, and sanitary votes are controlled by the Board of Works. In 1881 the total receipts for England and Wales were nearly £54,000,000, of which £31,000,000 was raised by local taxation, but in 1867 the total receipts had been only £36,000,000.

Rathmines, THE BATTLE OF. In 1649 the Royalists under Ormonde besieged Dublin, having already captured all the other places held for the Parliament. On August 2 he ordered a night attack, but Colonel Jones, the Parliamentary commander, sallied forth, drove back the advancing force, and attacked the main body encamped at Rathmines. Just outside the walls Ormonde was completely routed, four thousand men were slain, and his artillery and two thousand men captured.

Ravenspur, or Ravenser, near Spurn Head in Yorkshire, was in early times the most considerable port on the Humber, but the encroachments of the sea gradually destroyed it, although it does not seem to have been entirely submerged till the middle of the sixteenth century. It was at Ravenspur that Henry IV. landed in 1399, and Edward IV. in 1471.

Raymond, MICHEL, was a French adventurer, who entered the service of Nizam Ali in 1785, and soon organised a force of 15,000 disciplined troops, officered by 124 Europeans, chiefly French. In the war between Nizam Ali and the Peshwa in 1795, these forces fought well, and they would have become formidable to the English, but for the death of Raymond in 1798. The Marquis Wellesley upon landing as Governor-General demanded the dismissal of the French contingent, to which the Nizam consented in the treaty of Sept. 1, 1798. No adventurer in India ever stood higher than he did. His death, just as the crisis to which he might have been equal was approaching, was the last drop in the cup of ill-fortune which attended French enterprises in India.

Reading, the chief town of Berkshire, mentioned first in 871 when Ethelred and his son Alfred were there defeated by the Danes, though the victory of Ashdown near the town was afterwards won. The town was important as defending the frontier of Wessex against Mercia, since Wessex had been deprived of the lands north of the Thames. Under Ethelred the Unready in 1006 the town was reached by the Danes and burnt. Here Henry I. founded a great monastery in which he himself was afterwards buried. "It was not unfit," says Professor Freeman, "that the victor of Tenchebrai should sleep on a spot all whose associations were purely English, a spot which had won its earlier place in history as the scene of some of the greatest exploits of Alfred." It was frequently favoured by the royal presence, and several parliaments were held here by Henry VI. and Edward IV.

Rebellion, THE GREAT. The struggle between the monarchy and the Parliament which led to the Great Rebellion began with the accession of the House of Stuart to the English throne. James I. and Charles I. inherited the Tudor dictatorship, but the authority which Henry VIII. and Elizabeth had exercised in harmony with the feelings of the nation, they endeavoured to use for unpopular purposes. The Commons, who had grown strong and rich during the sixteenth century, woke to a consciousness of their strength, and headed the opposition to the crown, as the barons had done in the thirteenth. Whilst James I. formulated a dogmatic theory of the sovereign power, and strove to realise it, the Commons revived the constitutional claims of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The Petition of Right in 1628 was an attempt to limit the king's powers, and secure the subject's rights, but there was no impartial authority to interpret the meaning of the contract, and the Commons claimed by virtue of it much that the king had not meant to concede. For eleven years the king governed through the Privy Council without calling a Parliament. The judgment on Hampden's case in June, 1637, definitely settled the question of taxation in the king's favour. But at this very time the king's ecclesiastical policy had called forth in Scotland an opposition which obliged him, after an unsuccessful attempt to suppress it by arms, to have recourse once more to an English Parliament. The Short Parliament, which met in April, 1640, instead of supporting the king in the war, demanded the abolition of ship money and the taxes levied for the support of the army, and was about to petition in favour of the Scots, when it was dissolved. The ill success of the second Scotch war, and the invasion of England, obliged Charles again to call a Parliament, known afterwards as the Long Parliament, on Nov. 3, 1640. On the 11th the impeachment of Strafford was moved by Pym, that of Laud followed a little later, and other leading officials fled abroad. Ship money was declared illegal, and tonnage and poundage were no longer to be levied without the consent of Parliament. The Star Chamber, the Court of High Commission, and other extraordinary jurisdictions were abolished. The Triennial Bill bound the king to summon a Parliament every three years, and he was obliged to consent to an Act prohibiting him from dissolving the existing Parliament. Hitherto the Commons had been united, but the question of Church reform caused a division in their ranks. One party wished to abolish the bishops altogether, the other merely to limit their powers. Thus the king was enabled to gather round him a party which gave him their support on the further questions which rose out of this disagreement. In the Grand Remonstrance the Parliamentary leaders appealed to the people, setting forth the king's misgovernment in the past, and the political and ecclesiastical reforms they demanded for the future. The Irish rebellion, which broke out in Oct., 1641, raised the question whether the king could be trusted with an army. In England war began in the autumn. The king set up his standard at Nottingham on Aug. 22, 1642. On the king's side were the north and west of England; in Wales and Cornwall, and on the border he found his strongest adherents, while the south and east, and the manufacturing districts especially, took the side of the Parliament. The battle of Edgehill (Oct. 23) had no decisive results, and a second battle at Brentford (Nov. 12) was equally fruitless. In the campaign of 1643 the advantage was decidedly on the king's side. In the spring and the summer a Cornish army conquered the west, and the Marquis of Newcastle recovered Yorkshire. The fate of the Parliamentary cause seemed to depend on the question whether Gloucester and Hull would hold out. But the Earl of Essex relieved Gloucester, and defeated at Newbury the king's attempt to intercept his march back to London, whilst three weeks later Newcastle was forced to raise the siege of Hull. In one part of the country, however, in the eastern counties, the Parliamentary cause had not only held its own, but gained ground, and an army had been formed there, headed by the Earl of Manchester, but inspired by Cromwell (q.v.), which exercised a decisive influence on the next campaign. Both king and Parliament sought aid outside England. The king concluded a truce with the rebels, and brought over troops from Ireland. The Parliament made an alliance with the Scots, confirmed by the Solemn League and Covenant, which procured them the assistance of a Scotch army, but bound them to endeavour to bring the three kingdoms to religious uniformity, and to reform the English Church "according to the Word of God, and the example of the best reformed Churches." The Westminster Assembly, which had in July, 1643, commenced the deliberations, ending two years later in the establishment of Presbyterianism in England, was now joined by Scotch divines, and Scotch representatives entered the committee which directed the war. A Scotch army, under the Earl of Leven, crossed the border, joined the troops of Fairfax and Manchester, and laid siege to York. Rupert relieved York, but offered battle under its walls, and the victory of Marston Moor (July 2, 1644) was followed by the conquest of all England north of the Trent. In the west and south the king was more fortunate. He defeated Waller at Cropredy Bridge (June 29), and shut up Essex in Cornwall, where his foot were obliged to surrender (Sept., 1644). But the advance of the Royalist army on London was put a stop to by the second battle of Newbury (Oct. 27, 1644). Whilst the fruitless negotiations of Uxbridge were going on, the Parliament, urged by Cromwell, resolved to adopt a new system of carrying on the war. By the Self-denying Ordinance the members of Parliament who held commands were obliged to resign, and by a second ordinance the army was remodelled, reduced to 21,000 men, and placed under the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax. He was allowed to retain the services of Cromwell, who became his lieutenant-general.

Well armed, well disciplined, and well paid, its ranks full of men "who had the fear of God before their eyes, and made some conscience of what they did," the "New Model" changed the face of the war. Fairfax took the field on May 1, 1645, and on June 14th Charles was defeated at Naseby with the loss of half his army. One after another the king's fortresses in the west were conquered. Winter alone stopped the progress of Fairfax; but in March, 1646, the king's last army laid down its arms, and his last fortress, Raglan Castle, surrendered in August. Charles himself took refuge in the Scotch camp at Newark at the beginning of May. In the negotiations which followed the Parliament's chief demands were the control of the militia and the establishment of Presbyterianism in England. The king delayed giving a definite answer as long as possible, but finally offered to concede the militia for ten years, and the establishment of Presbyterianism for three. The Scots at last, weary of his delays, surrendered him to the Parliament, receiving in return compensation for their expenses in the war (Jan. 30, 1647). The Presbyterian leaders were as anxious to impose uniformity, and as hostile to liberty of conscience and diversity of worship as Laud himself. The army, on the other hand, had fought for religious as well as for civil liberty, and were resolved to secure it. They believed also that "God's Providence" had "cast the trust of religion and the kingdom upon them as conquerors." They had also a special grievance as soldiers in the proposal to disband them without payment of their arrears, so they did not scruple when their demands were refused to seize the king's person (June 4, 1647), march on London, expel eleven of the Presbyterian leaders from Parliament (Aug. 7), and treat directly with the king themselves. The king still continued his attempt to play off one party against the other, and refused to accept the terms of the soldiers. He escaped from the hands of the army (Nov. 11), and took refuge in the Isle of Wight, where, whilst publicly negotiating with the Parliament, he privately concluded a treaty with the Scots, promising in return for his restoration to establish Presbyterianism for three years, and suppress all dissident sects. Parliament replied to his rejection of the Four Bills, in which they had embodied their demands by a vote that no more addresses should be made to the king (Jan. 3, 1648), and a meeting of the officers of the army decided that it was their duty so soon as the expected war was over to call "Charles Stuart, that man of blood," to account for the blood he had shed, and the mischief he had done. In April the second Civil War broke out. Fairfax defeated the Kentish Royalists, shut up the main body of the insurgents at Colchester, and starved them into surrender (Aug. 28). Cromwell, after putting down the insurrection in Wales, attacked and destroyed the Scotch army under the Duke of Hamilton in a three days' battle in Lancashire (Aug. 17, 18, 19). Meanwhile the Presbyterian majority in Parliament had seized the opportunity to pass a severe law against heresy, and reopen negotiations with the king (Treaty of Newport). The victorious army trusted neither king nor Parliament, but resolved to put a stop to the negotiations, and effect a settlement of the kingdom itself. The king was seized at Carisbrooke, and removed to a place of security (Dec. 1). The House of Commons, purified by the exclusion of ninety-six Presbyterian members (Dec. 6), and the voluntary abstention of many others, became the obedient instrument of the army. It passed a resolution to bring the king to justice (Dec. 13), assumed the supreme power (Jan. 4, 1649), and erected a High Court of Justice to try Charles (Jan. 9). The trial lasted from Jan. 20 to 27, and the king was executed on the 29th, but out of the hundred and thirty-five members of whom the court was composed only fifty-nine signed the death warrant. The new government, which took the name of Commonwealth, consisted of a Council of State of forty-one persons exercising the executive power, and a House of Commons, which rarely numbered more than sixty members. Record, COURTS OF, are those "where the acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled in parchment . . . which rolls are called the records of the court, and are of such authority that their truth is not to be called in question." (Stephen's Commentaries.) They have power also to impose fine and imprisonment for contempt of court. A court must either be a Court of Record by immemorial recognition or by modern creation through Act of Parliament. James I. by yielding to the Commons in the case of Goodwin (1603), recognised that their house was a Court of Record.

Record Office. In 1800 a committee of the House of Commons was appointed to examine into the condition of the public records, and in accordance with its recommendations, a royal commission was appointed, which was renewed six times, and lasted till the accession of Victoria. The Record Commission published its Report in 1837, and on its recommendation, by an Act of 1838, the guardianship of the records was conferred upon the Master of the Rolls, with power to appoint a deputy. Under this act the documents have been removed from their many receptacles, and placed in the new Record Office in Fetter-lane, London, and a staff of officials and clerks is employed in their preservation and arrangement. In 1857 the Master of the Rolls began the publication of the series of Chronicles and Memorials known as the Rolls Series (q.v.).

Recorder. Before the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, 159 out of the 246 corporate towns in England, had recorders or stewards. Most of these were nominated by the Common Council, sometimes however by the aldermen only, sometimes by all the burgesses. "They were mostly magistrates within their boroughs, and quorum judges of the Courts of General and Quarter Sessions, and Courts of Record where those existed." But few recorders, however, actually resided in the towns, and in many cases the office was obtained only in order to facilitate the exercise of political influence. By the Act of 1835 all towns without a separate Court of Quarter Sessions were deprived of their criminal jurisdiction; but boroughs were permitted to petition the crown for a separate Court of Quarter Sessions, stating the salary they are ready to pay the recorder. If the petition is granted the crown henceforward nominates the recorder. He must be a barrister of at least five years standing. He holds his court four times a year, or more often if necessary, and is sole judge therein. He is also a justice of the peace for the borough, and has precedence next after the mayor. In 1879 ninety-six boroughs had recorders under the Act.

Recruiters. The Royalist members who deserted the Parliament at Westminster after the outbreak of the Civil War were one by one "disabled" by the House of Commons in 1645. Writs were moved for new elections in their place. More than 230 new members were returned, who were called scoffingly by the Royalist writers, "Recruiters." They were naturally all Puritans, and the Independent element was considerable. The most important of them were Blake, Ireton, Hutchinson, Ludlow, and Algernon Sidney.

A full list of the members of the Long Parliament, with the Recruiters marked, is given in an Appendix to Carlyle's Cromwell.

Redan, THE, was a fortress protecting the southern side of Sebastopol. [CRIMEAN WAR.] On Sept. 5, the English attempted to take it by storm, while the French attacked the Malakoff. The numbers of the attacking party were, however, so diminished while crossing the open ground immediately in front, and there was so much difficulty in sending for reinforcements, that the handful of men who had entered the works were forced to retire. The evacuation of the southern side of Sebastopol during the night made a further attack unnecessary.

Redeswire, THE RAID OF (1575), was a disturbance on the borders arising from a dispute between Forster, the English warden, and Carmichael, the Scotch warden, of the marches. The English were defeated, their warden and the Earl of Bedford being taken prisoners. The affair nearly led to a rupture with the English court.

Red River Expedition, THE. In 1869 the Red River Settlement, in North America, which had been in the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, was transferred to the new Dominion of Canada. Some of the settlers, however, refused to acknowledge the transfer, or to receive the new lieutenant-governor. On Nov. 24 the rebels, under Louis Riel, took possession of Fort Garry, and resisted by force an attempt of Major Boulton to get possession of the place. One of Boulton's followers, named Scott, was seized and shot. An expedition, consisting of about 350 British troops and a number of Canadian militia, under the command of Colonel Wolsley, was sent against them. After a three months' journey in boats across the lakes and rivers, Colonel Wolsley reached Fort Garry (Aug. 23, 1870). The rebels surrendered without resistance. The Red River territory, under its new name, Manitoba, became a lieutenant-governorship of the Dominion of Canada.

Red Sea Expedition, THE. In 1800, the Marquess Wellesley despatched 4,000 Europeans and 5,000 sepoy, under General Baird, to co-operate with the forces under Abercromby in the expulsion of the French from Egypt. The expedition proceeded up the Red Sea to Cosseir; thence they marched 120 miles over the desert to the Nile, reached Cairo Aug. 10, and encamped on the shores of the Mediterranean on the 27th. Before, however, the Indian contingent could be brought into action, the report of its approach, and the energy of General Hutchinson, who succeeded to the command on the death of Sir Ralph Abercromby, induced the French general to capitulate.

Wellesley, Despatches; Alison, Hist. of Europe.

Reduction, ACTION OF, is a process of Scotch law by which a settlement wrongly made is questioned. Acting upon this analogy, the Scotch Government in 1628 drew up "a summons or initial writ of an Action of Reduction, against all copyholders of ecclesiastical property," declaring the king's right to all kirklands. Charles's object was to restore to the Scotch church part of the lands of which it had been deprived at the Reformation.

Redwald, KING OF EAST ANGLIA (s. circ. 599), became a Christian probably owing to the pressure of his overlord, Ethelbert of Kent. Returning home from Kent, where he had received baptism, he was "led astray by his wife and certain perverse teachers, so that, like the ancient Samaritans, he seemed at the same time to serve Christ and the gods whom he had served before; and in the same temple he had an altar to sacrifice to Christ, and another small one to offer victims to devils" (Bede). But it would appear from Bede that even while Ethelbert was living, his place as overlord in Central Britain had been taken by Redwald. So that it is probable a war had arisen between Ethelbert and Redwald from this religious compromise, and had ended in Ethelbert's defeat. "If middle Britain threw off the supremacy of Kent, its states none the less remained a political aggregate; and their fresh union under the King of Eastern Anglia was only a prelude to their final and lasting union under the lordship of Mercia." (Green.) In 617 Edwin of Northumbria took refuge at his court from Ethelfrith, and in the same year Redwald attacked and defeated Ethelfrith on the Idle—"the first combat between the great powers which had now grouped the English peoples about them." But Redwald died soon after, and the East Anglian power seems to have broken up under his son, Eorpwald. Bede ii. 5, after describing Ethelbert's overlordship (imperium), says that Redwald was the fourth king who gained a power of this kind (imperium huiusmodi). In the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle Redwald is placed fourth on the list of Bretwaldas.

Besides Bede and the Anglo-Saxon Chron., s. e. Green, Making of England.

Reeve (Sax. gerefa), a name applied to many classes of officials, especially to those charged with the management of some territorial division; as the so-called Laws of Edward the Confessor say, "est multiplex nomen; greve enim dicitur de scira, de wapentagias, de hundredis, de burgias, de villis." [Of these the most important was the shire-reeve, for which see SHERIFF.] Besides the sheriff, the following uses of the term are to be noted:—High-reeve (heah-gerefa) mentioned in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, s. a. 778, 780, 1001, and 1002. Port-reeve (port-gerefa), borough-reeve (burh-gerefa), and vico-gerefa also frequently occur, in the sense of the chief officer of a town, who presided over its courts, &c. The first title was only used in trading towns (not necessarily ports), and was borne by the presiding officers of several of the smaller towns until recent times. Tun-gerefa is the usual term for the headman of a township. He was probably chosen by the inhabitants in free townships, but would be nominated by the lord in dependent townships. He appeared with the four best men in the hundred court, and in dependent townships was legally responsible for his lord's men. The position of the manor-reeve (the representative of the earlier tun-gerefa) in the thirteenth century is clearly described in Fleta. He was to be a good husbandman chosen by the villani, and was responsible for the cultivation of the land, having especially to watch over the ploughs, and see that due service was rendered. A kind of co-ordinate authority was apparently exercised by the lord's bailiff, and both alike were subject to the seneschal or steward, who often supervised several manors. The term hundred-reeve nowhere appears. But a reeve is mentioned as holding the court of the hundred in the laws of Edward the Elder and Ethelred, and it is possible that there were two officers in the hundred, the reeve representing the king's interests, becoming, after the Conquest, the bailiff of the hundred, and the hundreds-caldor representing the freemen.

The derivation of the name is uncertain. It has usually been connected with German graf, and grau, grey, i. e. old, and explained in the same way as "alderman," "seigneur," &c.; but there are philological objections to this derivation. Schmidt was inclined to follow Spelman, and connect it with refan, to plunder, since a large part of the sheriff's duties was to levy fines, &c., and the term exactor was often applied to him. Kemble suggested that it was derived from refan, to call aloud, and thus denoted banister, the summoning officer. Mr. Max Müller (Lectures on Lang., II. 284, ed. 1890), while regarding the derivation from graw as better than the others, thought some more satisfactory etymology might be discovered. More recently Mr. Skeat (Etymol. Dict., s. v.) has decided that the original sense is simply "excellent," "famous," formed from rof, active, excellent, famous.

Reformation, THE. The process which ended in the separate organisation of the English Church was due to three principal causes: (1) dissatisfaction with the practical operation of the papal headship; (2) a desire to reform the clergy, and render the Church more useful; (3) a conviction that the system of the mediæval Church had in many ways deviated from the teaching of Christ and the apostles, and from primitive custom. The first of these causes showed itself in England in the reign of Henry III., and gradually led to legislative acts by which England endeavoured to protect itself from undue interference on the part of the pope. The Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire secured England against the heavy exactions by which the papacy during the Great Schism oppressed Christendom. [PAPACY.] In the reforming councils of the fifteenth century, which laboured in vain, England did not take a prominent part, because it already had the means of keeping in check the claims of the papacy. It was, however, an Englishman who first gathered together and expressed the dissatisfaction of Europe. John Wycliffe began his career by maintaining the independence of the State from hierarchical interference. To this he added a longing after greater simplicity and spirituality of life. He sent forth preachers among the people. He denounced the worldliness of the papacy as anti-Christian. He undertook the noble task of translating the Bible into English. He wrote numerous tracts to stir up the people to greater earnestness in religion. He asserted the existence of a true spiritual Church founded on faith in Christ, and depending for its rule in the law of the Gospel. Moreover, as a means of reducing the organisation of the Church to greater purity, he attacked the central point of sacerdotalism—the material conception of transubstantiation in the sacrament of the altar. He did not deny the presence of Christ in the Eucharist; he denied only the change of substance in the elements after consecration. Thus Wycliffe united in his teaching the three principles which brought about the Reformation—a strong sense of national patriotism, a deep desire for greater spirituality of life, and an acute criticism of the doctrines on which the existing system of the Church was founded. Wycliffe's teaching drew upon him ecclesiastical condemnation. His opinions spread in Bohemia, and gave birth to the rising of the Hussites. In England his followers, the Lollards, were unfortunately associated with political risings, and were suppressed. Still Wycliffe's translation of the Bible, and many of his writings were passed from hand to hand, and bodies of "Biblemen" scattered here and there throughout the land prepared the way for more decided efforts. [WYCLIFFE.]

The end of the Wars of the Roses saw a great change in the social condition of England. The ideas of the Middle Ages were languishing. The Feudal System had practically passed away. While the nobles were fighting, the middle class had grown more prosperous. A narrow but practical spirit prevailed, which looked enviously on the wealth of the Church, which was unaffected by its sentiment, and which in a dim way wished to see it made more useful. As the new learning made its way in England men like More dreamed of a new organisation of society, and Colet bestirred himself in the cause of a broader system of education. The Church itself was vexatious to the people by the wide extension of its inquisitorial courts of spiritual discipline. The rabble of useless and lazy priests excited the contempt of thinking men. There was small hope of reform from within; for the organisation of the Church depended on Rome, and the secularised papacy of the sixteenth century was powerless to initiate reforms. Politically the English Church, through fear of the Lollards, had relied for help on the crown, and had trusted to the balance of parties. The overthrow of the baronage by the Wars of the Roses left the crown practically supreme, as the people were too much engrossed in business to care for anything save a strong and peaceful government.

The desire for some reform in the Church was felt by Wolsey, who obtained from the pope permission to suppress thirty monasteries, and devote their revenues to educational foundations at Oxford and Ipswich. Perhaps Wolsey's schemes for internal reform would have progressed further, if a crisis in the relations between Church and State had not been brought about by the self-will of Henry VIII. Henry VIII., fascinated by Anne Boleyn, was resolved on a divorce from his wife Catherine. He had married Catherine, his brother's widow, by virtue of a papal dispensation; he needed the papal consent for a divorce. The papacy was the source of ecclesiastical law, the supreme judge, with equitable powers in cases of grievance. So long as Henry VIII. expected to obtain his divorce he was content to wait. But when Wolsey's plans failed, and Pope Clement VII. showed that he dared not gratify the English king at the expense of offending the Emperor, Henry VIII. resolved to give the pope a sample of his spirit. The powerful minister Wolsey was declared subject to the penalties of the Statute of Præmunire, because he had exercised legatine powers without the king's consent. He fell, and no voice was raised in his favour (1529). Henry VIII. appealed from the pope to the learning of Christendom, and proceeded to gather the opinions of the universities on the legality of his marriage, and the propriety of his divorce. Further, to terrify the pope by a display of his power, he involved all the clergy of the realm under the penalties of Præmunire, because they had recognised Wolsey's legatine authority. The Convocation of 1531 was compelled to sue for the king's pardon, and grant him a large subsidy by way of a fine. Moreover, the king demanded that he should be called in the preamble of the Bill granting the subsidy, "sole protector, and supreme head of the Church and clergy of England." With difficulty Archbishop Warham modified the term "supreme head" by the limitation "as far as the law of Christ allows." In the Parliament of 1532 the pope was still further threatened by an Act forbidding the payment of annates to Rome. The clergy were terrified by the presentation by the Commons of a long petition concerning ecclesiastical grievances. It was clear that Henry VIII. was in a position to do what he would. The Commons, as representing the middle class, were on his side, because they had many practical grievances which they hoped to see redressed. The clergy had no strong hold on the people, and had little organisation amongst themselves. They were helpless before the king, and the pope was unable to give them any succour. What is known as "the submission of the clergy" was simply the practical recognition of this fact. Convocation in 1532 "submitted themselves humbly to his highness," and undertook thenceforth to promulgate no ordinance which had not received the royal approval, and to submit the provincial constitutions then in force to revision by a committee of sixteen laymen and sixteen clergy appointed by the king. In 1533 the new Archbishop, Cranmer, took cognisance of the question of the king's divorce, and pronounced his marriage invalid from the first. As the pope had pronounced in favour of its validity, this was a decided assertion of the Act passed in 1532 that appeals in such cases as had hitherto been pursued in the Court of Rome should thenceforth be had within the realm. Henry VIII.'s marriage with Anne Boleyn announced his breach not only with the papacy but with the public opinion of Europe. He had advanced step by step till there was no return possible. The Parliament of 1534 passed Acts confirming the submission of the clergy to the jurisdiction of the crown, forbidding the payment of annates and all other dues to the pope, establishing the king as supreme head of the Church, with authority to reform all abuses, and conferring on him all payments that previously were made to the pope. All that was implied in the papal headship over the Church was now swept away from England. The secular privileges of the pope were conferred upon the crown. The Church, whose machinery had already been broken down by papal encroachments, was left without any power to repair that machinery. Its legislative power was subject to the royal assent, its courts were left unreformed, and appeals were to be heard and decided in some court approved by the crown.

Henry VIII. had overturned the papal headship, and was no doubt aided in so doing by the example of those German states where the ideas of Luther had prevailed. But Henry himself was opposed to Luther's teaching, and had no sympathy with the cause of doctrinal reform. He wished the Church to remain as it had been, save that the rights of the pope were transferred to the crown. Even Cranmer, though he had broken the rule of clerical celibacy, did not meditate any great change. But in Oxford and Cambridge especially men turned their attention to German theology. At the end of 1534 Convocation petitioned the king to decree a translation of the Bible into English, a work which was not allowed till 1537. The visitatorial power of the crown, vested in the hands of Cromwell as Vicar-general, was not allowed to lumber. The visitation of the smaller monasteries led to an Act in 1535 giving to the crown all religious houses below the annual value of £200. In 1539 the suppression of the greater monasteries followed. The centres of the reactionary and papal party were abolished. The wealth and social importance of the Church was greatly diminished. The political power of the Church in the House of Lords was reduced. Those who were accused, with some reason, of making the ecclesiastical profession a cloak for idleness were dispersed.

These changes were not made without profoundly affecting English society. The bulk of the lower classes were attached to the old state of things, and suffered from the abolition of the monasteries. The number of those who were influenced by the teaching of Luther increased in activity. The middle class alone was satisfied, and Henry VIII. took care to satisfy them in his measures. To define the position of the English Church, Ten Articles "to stablish Christian quietness" were put forward by the southern Convocation in 1536, which asserted as "laudable ceremonies" the chief uses of the old Church. In 1537 was issued the Bishop's Book, or Institution of a Christen Man, which discarded the papal monarchy, but otherwise maintained the existing system. Free discussion of dogmatic questions was not according to Henry VIII.'s views. He valued his reputation for orthodoxy, and in 1539 the Six Articles inflicted the punishment of death on all who should call in question the chief dogmas and practices of the mediæval Church. So long as Henry VIII. lived no further changes were made in the position of the Church of England. His strong hand kept contending parties from struggling, and his strong will impressed itself on the nation.

With the accession of Edward VI. long pent-up antagonisms made themselves felt. One party, headed by Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, was contented with the abolition of the papal headship, and was opposed to further change. The reforming party was divided into three chief bodies—one consisted of revolutionary sectaries, whose wild talk had already created alarm; another body of advanced reformers had absorbed much of the theology of the Swiss teacher Zwingli, and regarded the sacraments as external symbols; the more moderate reformers, headed by Cranmer, leaned to the teaching of Luther and Melancthon; they were willing to reform superstitious errors, but they held by the sacraments and the system of the Church. This last party succeeded in getting matters into their hands, and expressed their views in the first prayer-book of Edward VI., and in the Book of the Homilies. The prayer-book provided a uniform use for the service of the English Church; the homilies provided for the restoration of preaching as a means of teaching the people; the Bible was already translated. The practical character of the English Church was thus emphasised. It aimed at meeting the national needs, and appealed to the national intelligence. But the first Prayer-book did not satisfy the more ardent reformers, whose numbers were reinforced by a large influx of foreign teachers driven by religious persecution from the Continent. Under their influence Cranmer's views developed, and in 1552 a second Prayer-book was issued, which simplified vestments, omitted some usages which were deemed superstitious, and re-modelled the Communion Service that it might be more acceptable to the followers of Zwingli and Calvin. The formularies of the Church were also set forth in Forty-two Articles, which in the main followed the ideas of the Saxon reformers, while retaining much of the conservatism which especially marked the beginnings of the English movement. No sooner had this been done than the accession of Mary produced a reaction, which the bulk of the people regarded with indifference. The progress of the Reformation under Edward VI. had been too rapid. It had been accompanied by many outrages on the opinions of those who held by the old forms. It showed little tenderness or consideration for others, and was endured rather than welcomed.

Under Mary, Gardiner and his party prepared to return to a recognition of the papal headship. England was again reconciled to the papacy. Many of the English reformers fled to the Continent; many who remained, amongst them Cranmer, suffered death for their opinions. But Mary's government was a failure. Her religious persecution was carried on in a spirit of narrow fanaticism, which stirred the popular mind against her. Her brief reign of five years undid the ill effects of the excessive zeal of the reformers under Edward VI., and disposed men to look regretfully on the reign and policy of Henry VIII. Elizabeth had lived through both, and had conformed to Romanism under Mary. She made no change at first, but Anne Boleyn's daughter could not seriously contemplate a reconciliation with the papacy. Her first Parliament in 1559 passed an Act to "restore to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the estate ecclesiastical and spiritual, and abolish all foreign jurisdictions repugnant to the same." Elizabeth explained the meaning of the royal supremacy so re-established to be "under God to have the sovereignty and rule over all persons born within these her realms of what estate, either ecclesiastical or temporal, soever they be, so as no other foreign power shall or ought to have any superiority over them." At the same time heresy was defined to be what was contrary to the canonical Scriptures, or the first four general councils. The Prayer-book was revised and legalised, and uniformity of worship was enforced by an Act bidding all men to resort to their parish church. The greater part of the Marian bishops refused to take the oath of supremacy, and were deprived of their sees. Matthew Parker, the new Archbishop of Canterbury, brought great learning and much moderation to the difficult task of re-organising the English Church upon a basis which should be at once comprehensive and definite enough to form a strong institution. The exiles who had fled before Mary's persecution returned to England, strongly imbued with the ideas of Calvin. The Catholic party resented its loss of supremacy. Elizabeth supported as a compromise the system which her father had devised. The old order and ceremonies of the Church were left untouched, while room was made for the exercise of the spirit of personal religion. At first the Elizabethan system was not strong in its hold on the popular mind. It was tolerated because it was the only means of securing peace. Soon the feeling of the mass of the people gathered round it, and the events of the reign of Elizabeth identified it with the English spirit. A body of Calvinists, known as Puritans or Precisions, objected to some of its ceremonies, and to its episcopal organisation. They vainly strove to make alterations, and the "Martin Marprelate" controversy (1588) is a testimony to their zeal. They were strong in the House of Commons, and grew in strength under James I. and Charles I., so that the Great Rebellion was as much a religious as a political controversy. On the other hand, the Romanists organised themselves into a political party. Elizabeth was excommunicated in 1570, and Jesuit missionaries flocked into England. They were persecuted, and the great mass of the English Catholics remained loyal to their queen and country against the attacks of Spain. Practically the reign of Elizabeth saw England established as a Protestant country. The Church of England has in the main adhered to the lines then laid down, while Romanists and Nonconformists have gradually been admitted to civil and religious equality.

Reformation in Ireland. The Parliament which met at Dublin in May, 1536, rapidly copied the measures which the English Parliament had just passed. In the first session the king was declared supreme head of the Church of Ireland, and given the first-fruits; and appeals to Rome were abolished. To facilitate the work, Poyning's Act was suspended, so that the English statutes needed only to be copied, and it was not necessary to send drafts to London and back. No opposition was offered by the laity; but the spiritual peers sturdily resisted the progress of the bills; and the proctors of the clergy (who were in Ireland members of Parliament, though not apparently sitting with the Commons, but in a separate house) were so energetic in obstruction that the Privy Council decided that they had no right to vote, and caused an Act to be passed in the next session depriving them of the privilege. In 1537 certain monasteries were suppressed, and this was soon followed by a general dissolution. A small part of the monastic revenues were transferred to bishoprics; but, as in England, the greater portion of the land was sold at nominal prices to private persons. An important part was played in these transactions by George Browne, the "Cranmer of Ireland," who had been Provincial of the Austin Friars, and had been created Archbishop of Dublin in 1535. The Bidding Prayer issued by him in 1538 is the first document in which the union of the churches of England and Ireland is declared. Until the accession of Edward VI., no change was made in worship or belief. But when an attempt was made by the council without Act of Parliament to enforce the use of Edward's Prayer Book, the Archbishop of Armagh and most of the bishops and clergy refused to obey. Only Browne and five bishops accepted the new liturgy. As Armagh was in the land of O'Neil, and beyond the control of the council, the primacy was transferred to Dublin, and some of the vacant bishoprics were filled up by advanced Reformers, of whom the most important was Bale of Osory. Under Mary the old state of things was restored. Browne, the conforming bishops, and the married clergy were deprived. In the second year of Elizabeth, a carefully packed Parliament passed the Act of Uniformity, and copied the contemporary English measures. Three bishops alone refused to conform; but in a large part of the country mass continued to be performed, and where the new system was really introduced, the dissolution of the monasteries, which had in many places served the parish churches, left half the parishes without clergy. The English Church, which had been imposed by the English Government, and was used as a means of Anglicising the Irish, never laid hold of the Irish people. They adhered firmly to the old opinions, and persecution only intensified their steadfastness. The disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1869 was an admission that the Reformation in Ireland had been a failure, and that the people were practically Roman Catholic.

Reformation in Scotland. The Reformation was the first national movement in Scotland which originated with the people, who now came forward for the first time as a power in the State. By the beginning of the fifteenth century the church in Scotland had become very unpopular. Favourable by the crown it had amassed riches and lands. Its prelates held the great offices of state, and were arrogant and overbearing, delighting in displays of their pomp and power. This roused the jealousy of the baronage. The burden of the tithes and church dues, and the greed and injustice that were exercised in extorting them by the clergy, in whom the spirit of avarice was dominant, woke the hatred of the people, who lent a willing ear to the reformed doctrines. These doctrines were imported by the fugitives, who fled over the Border to seek safety from the Marian persecution in England. Sympathy with their sufferings overcame the prejudice against their nation, and roused a Protestant reaction among the people. Many of the landowners, inspired by a desire to get hold of the church lands, joined the popular movement. The Reformers signed the bond which pledged them to united support [COVENANT] in 1557. Abjuration of Papal authority and adoption of the English Bible and Prayer-book were its principles. The "Lords of the Congregation," as the supporters of the bond were called, demanded of the regent, Mary of Guise, a reformation of religion in accordance with these principles. She refused, and summoned their preachers before the Privy Council. This roused a tumult. The mob, excited by John Knox, rose in Perth, sacked the religious houses, and defaced the churches (1559). Their example was followed throughout the country. The regent employed French soldiers to quell the insurgents, and thereby excited a civil war. The congregation took up arms and appealed to England for support. On the death of the regent the estates passed the Reformation Statutes, which abjured the authority of the pope, adopted the Genevan Confession of Faith, and declared the celebration of the mass a capital offence (Aug. 25, 1560). Thus the Church of Scotland was nominally separated from that of Rome. But these statutes were not confirmed by the crown, for the queen, Mary Stuart, was in France. When she arrived in Scotland (1561), though she did not attempt to restore the old church, she demanded toleration for herself and her attendants, and re-established the mass in her private chapel. Meanwhile the ministers and the lairds fell out over the disposal of the church lands. Most of the richest of the ecclesiastical estates had been already secured by laymen. Of the lands that were still unappropriated the Privy Council set aside one third to pay the stipends of the ministers of the reformed Church. The rest remained in possession of the churchmen who held it, and as they died off it was to fall to the crown. But the Lords refused to accept the First Book of Discipline, a code of stringent statutes drawn up by the ministers for the government of the Church, even more tyrannical in spirit than the exactions of the old church, which had been found so galling. For the Presbyters imagined that they had succeeded to the power of the pope, and assumed the right of interfering in matters secular as well as spiritual. On the deposition of the queen (1567) the Earl of Murray, her half-brother, was made regent for the infant king. He had been foremost as a leader of the Congregation, and during his regency Presbyterianism was in the ascendant. The government of all ecclesiastical matters was committed to the General Assembly, a council of Presbyters elected by their brethren. Liturgical worship, however, was not altogether swept away with the rites and ceremonies of the Romish Church. A prayer-book, called the Book of Common Order, was in daily use in the churches. Under the regency of Mar episcopacy was again restored (1572). But the bishops were merely nominal, as they had neither lands nor dignities, and were subject to the authority of the General Assembly. In 1592 this shadowy episcopacy was again abolished, and the Presbyterian polity established. Each Presbyter was supreme in his own parish. A certain number of parishes formed a Presbytery or council of Presbyters, who despatched the ecclesiastical business of the district. The Synod, composed of several Presbyteries, was a court of appeal for matters of graver import, while the supreme court, the General Assembly, met yearly at Edinburgh. It was formed of ministers and laymen, elders as they were called, sent up as deputies by the several Presbyteries. The king, or his commissioners, was the secular president. There was also a moderator elected from among the Presbyters as acting president. The Covenant, based upon the principles of the first bond, was very generally signed, and the second Book of Discipline, drawn up by Andrew Melville, was accepted as a code for the government of the church. Shortly after, the accession of King James to the English throne again restored episcopacy. The General Assembly was not, however, abolished, though deprived of its despotic power. No change was made in the established form of worship. The attempt made by Charles I. to substitute the English Liturgy for the Book of Common Order, and a Book of Canons for the Book of Discipline led to the outbreak of the Civil War. Under Cromwell Presbyterianism was again established, and again displaced by episcopacy under Charles II. After the Revolution the bishops and the episcopal clergy were turned out. The Presbyterian Church was re-established by law (1690).

Since that date it has been the Church of Scotland. And at the Union the liberty of the Church was secured by a provision that the Presbyterian should be the only church government in Scotland from that time forward.

Reform Bills. The question of Parliamentary Reform was first raised in a practical shape by Pitt, when he brought forward in 1785 a motion, proposing to disfranchise thirty-six rotten boroughs returning two members each, and to give the members to the counties and to London. The motion was rejected by 248 to 174. The breaking out of the French revolution a few years afterwards, and the European war, diverted men's minds from the subject, and produced a disinclination towards the extension of popular liberty. In 1793 both Burke and Pitt opposed Mr. Grey's Parliamentary Reform motion, which was negatived by 232 to 41, and met with no better fate when brought forward again in 1797. The Fox ministry had no leisure, and the Portland ministry no inclination, to attend to the matter. In 1817 a motion of Sir Francis Burdett was lost by 265 to 77, and a bolder attempt of the same member to introduce manhood suffrage the following year found not a single supporter beside the mover and seconder. In 1820 Lord J. Russell carried a Bill for withholding writs from the rotten boroughs of Camelford, Grampond, Penryn, and Barnstaple, which was thrown out by the Lords. Each year from 1821 to 1829 Lord J. Russell or some other Whig introduced a motion for reform, which in each case was rejected. In Feb., 1830, the Marquess of Blandford moved an amendment to the address in favour of reform, which was rejected by 96 to 11. The same year Calvert's Bill to transfer the representation of East Retford to Birmingham, and Lord J. Russell's motion to enfranchise Leeds, Manchester and Birmingham, were rejected. When Lord Grey became Prime Minister in this year the subject was at once taken up by the Cabinet. On March 1, 1831, Lord J. Russell introduced the Reform Bill. After most animated debates the second reading of the bill was carried (March 2) by a majority of one (302 to 301). On an amendment in committee for reducing the whole number of members the ministry were defeated. On April 22 Parliament was dissolved, to meet again in June with the reformers in a great majority. The Reform Bill was again carried, this time by 367 votes to 231. On Sept. 22 the bill finally passed the Commons, but was thrown out by the Lords (Oct. 8) by 199 to 158. In December a third Reform Bill was brought in and carried by a majority of 162. The Bill sent up to the Lords in 1832 passed the second reading on April 14 of that year. But on May 7 the Peers, by a majority of 35, postponed the disfranchising clauses of the Bill, thus virtually rejecting it. The king refused to create new Peers, the ministers resigned, and the Duke of Wellington attempted to form a Tory ministry. But the attempt was hopeless, and the nation almost in a state of insurrection. On May 15 the Grey ministry returned to office, and the king was prepared to create new Peers if necessary. The Lords, however, at length gave way, and on June 4 the Bill was passed. The Reform Bill of 1832 disfranchised 56 boroughs, having less than 2,000 inhabitants, and deprived 30 other boroughs of one member each. Of the 143 seats gained, 65 were given to the counties, 22 of the large towns received two members each, and 21 others one each. A uniform £10 household franchise was established in boroughs, and in the counties the franchise was given to copyholders, leaseholders and tenants-at-will holding property of the value of £50 and upwards. Reform Bills with analogous provisions were also passed for Scotland and Ireland in 1832. Between 1832 and 1850 motions for further extending the franchise were frequently made and lost. In 1852 and 1854 Lord J. Russell introduced Reform Bills which were withdrawn. In 1859 Mr. Disraeli, on behalf of the Conservatives, introduced a bill, which was defeated by 39 votes. In 1866 (March) a comprehensive Reform Bill was introduced by Mr. Gladstone. The "Adullamite" section of the Liberals had, however, seceded from their party, and the Bill, after fierce debate, was carried only by 5 votes, and in June the government were defeated on an amendment. The Liberals resigned and the Conservatives, in Feb., 1867, brought forward and passed (Aug.) Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill of 1867. This bill conferred a household and lodger franchise in boroughs, though it still left a property qualification in counties [ELECTIONS]. Between 1872 and 1883 motions in favour of household franchise in the counties were moved (generally by Mr. G. O. Trevelyan) and rejected. In 1884 Mr. Gladstone introduced a Reform Bill intended to render the franchise uniform in England, Scotland and Ireland, and to assimilate it in counties and boroughs. No provisions for the redistribution of seats were made, but the government undertook to bring in a Bill dealing with the subject at an early date. After several amendments in favour of joining the Franchise Bill with a Redistribution Bill had been thrown out in the Commons, the bill passed its third reading in the lower house by a majority of 130. The Lords, however, declared by a majority of 51 that no bill would be satisfactory which did not deal with the two subjects of extension of the franchise and redistribution. The government Bill was accordingly abandoned for the session.

Regalia, the insignia of royalty, including various articles used at coronations and on state occasions. The most important of these were under the charge of the Abbot of Westminster till the Reformation; they are now preserved in the jewel office at the Tower. In 1649 the crowns were broken to pieces; new ones were made for the coronation of Charles II., and have been used ever since.

Regency may exist during the absence or the incapacity of the sovereign through nonage or disease. William I., on his visit to Normandy in 1067, left Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, and William Fitz Osbern, Earl of Hereford, joint guardians of his kingdom, though he assigned to each a special province. When the functions of the chief justiciar became defined, the vice-regency of the kingdom was reckoned among them, though the relative rights of this officer and of the members of the royal house were not settled. Henry II., during his absence, caused his authority to be vested in his son, the younger Henry, even before he associated him with himself in the kingship. On the death of Henry II. Eleanor acted as regent until the return of her son, and on the fall of the justiciar Longchamp, while Richard was on the crusade, the barons recognised John as the vice-gerent of the kingdom. From the time of Henry III. it became customary for the king to appoint certain lieutenants, and sometimes his eldest son, though an infant, to act during his absence. Accordingly William III., on leaving England in 1695, Queen Mary being then dead, appointed seven lords justices for that purpose. George I. left the Prince of Wales as regent during his first absence from England, but never did so again on any like occasion. The question of the exercise of the royal authority during the absence of the king is now of little importance.

As the common law does not recognise incapacity in the sovereign, special provisions have been made as to regency when occasion required. On the accession of Henry III. at the age of nine, the barons appointed the Earl of Pembroke as regent with the title rector regis et regni, and associated certain councillors with him. When Edward III. succeeded his father at the age of fourteen, the Parliament nominated a council to advise him. No regent was appointed during the nonage of Richard II., but the magnates in this case nominated the council. On the accession of Henry VI., his uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, claimed the regency as next of kin, and by the will of the late king. Both these claims were disallowed by the council, and Parliament constituted the Duke of Bedford protector, allowing Gloucester the protectorate during the absence of his brother. When the king fell ill in 1454, the Duke of York was appointed protector by the Lords, with the assent of the Commons. On his renewed illness the next year, the lords in again appointing the duke assumed the right of choice, though the assent of the Commons appears in the Act of Ratification. On the death of Edward IV. his widow tried to obtain the guardianship of her son, but the Duke of Gloucester was made protector by the council. In 1536 Parliament granted Henry VIII. authority to name such guardians as he chose, in the event of his leaving a successor under eighteen, if a male, or under sixteen if a female. The king accordingly appointed his sixteen executors as guardians of his son Edward VI., constituting them a council of government. In spite of this arrangement these councillors invested the Earl of Hertford with the protectorate.

After the death of Frederick, Prince of Wales, in 1751, Parliament provided for a possible minority by enacting that the Princess of Wales should be regent and guardian of the king's person, and by nominating a council of regency to which the reigning king had the right of adding four members. George III., after a severe illness in 1765, wished Parliament to allow him the right of appointing any person regent whom he chose. A bill, however, was passed naming the queen, the Princess of Wales, and any descendant of the late king, as those from whom a regent might be selected. When the king was deprived of reason in 1788—9, Fox asserted that the Prince of Wales had a right to the regency, and, though he soon substituted "legal claim" for the word "right," maintained that Parliament had only to recognise the prince's claim, and could not lay restrictions on his authority. Pitt on the other hand declared that the prince had "no more right to the royal authority than any other subject," and having caused Parliament to be opened by commission under the great seal, introduced a bill restricting the power and patronage of the proposed regent. The recovery of the king prevented the settlement of these questions for the time. On a like occasion in 1811, Parliament passed a bill imposing restrictions on the regent's authority. The next regency bill, passed in 1830, provided that, in the event of the death of William IV., before the queen was of the age of eighteen, the Duchess of Kent should be regent, no council being appointed. As on the accession of the queen, the King of Hanover became heir presumptive, a Regency Act passed 1837, provided that, on the decease of her majesty, the royal function should be discharged by lords justices until the arrival of the king. Another Act, passed on the marriage of the queen in 1840, provided that, should Her Majesty leave a successor under age, Prince Albert should be regent, without any council, and with full powers save that he might not assent to any bill for altering the succession, or affecting the rights of the Church of England or the Church of Scotland. From these examples it will be gathered that the right of selecting the person and determining the power of a regent pertains to the estates of the realm assembled in Parliament. Regency Bills. "In judgment of law the king, as king, cannot be said to be a minor," says Coke; he has, therefore, by common law no legal guardian, nor has any provision been made for the exercise of the regal authority during his youth or incapacity. It has accordingly been necessary to make special provision as occasion has arisen, and the various measures which have been adopted have been of considerable political importance.

(1) 1751. Upon the death of Frederick Prince of Wales, an Act was passed appointing the Princess of Wales regent in the event of the death of George II. before the Prince of Wales was eighteen years old. She was to be assisted by a council of regency nominated in the Act, to which the king was empowered to add four others.

(2) 1765. Upon the recovery of George III. from his first attack of mental disease, it was thought desirable to provide for the regency during any such illness as should incapacitate him, or in case of his death, during the childhood of his children. With his lofty views of royal power, George III. was not ready to place the nomination of a regent in the hands of Parliament, but proposed that Parliament should confer on him the power of appointing any person he pleased as regent. He almost certainly intended to nominate the queen, but the ministers feared lest the Princess of Wales should be nominated, and thus her favourite, Bute, become all powerful. George had so far yielded to his ministers that he consented to the limitation of his choice "to the queen and any other person of the royal family usually resident in England," and a bill had been introduced into the House of Lords to this effect. After the doubt as to whether the queen was naturalised, and so capable of acting as regent, had been set at rest by the opinion of the judges that marriage with the king naturalised her, the question arose as to the meaning of the term "the royal family," and most of the ministers, moved by hatred of Bute, declared it did not include the Princess of Wales. Having caused a resolution introducing her name to be rejected, they persuaded the king to consent to the introduction of a clause limiting his choice to the queen and the descendants of the late king, on the ground that otherwise the Commons would exclude the princess by name. The Commons, however, reinserted her name, and this evidence of the duplicity of his ministers was one of the main causes of the fall of the Grenville ministry. It is to be noticed also that the Act nominated a council of regency, consisting of the king's four brothers and of his uncle, the Duke of Cumberland, and the great officers of state, and empowering the king, in the event of the death of a brother or of an uncle, to nominate another person in his place.

(3) 1788—89. In 1788 the king, after proroguing Parliament, lost his reason, and it became necessary to provide for the regency. Parliament met without royal summons on the day to which it had been prorogued, and, after a fortnight's adjournment, proceeded to discuss the question. Fox laid down that "the Prince of Wales had as clear a right to exercise the power of sovereignty during the king's incapacity as if the king were actually dead, and that it was merely for the two Houses of Parliament to pronounce at what time he should commence the exercise of his right," while the Premier, Pitt, declared that "unless by decision of Parliament, the Prince of Wales had no more right—speaking of strict right—to assume the government than any other individual subject of the country." The position taken up by the two statesmen is explained by the fact that if the prince had become regent, Fox would at once have been made Prime Minister; and Pitt was anxious to delay the creation of a regent. In this he was assisted by the Opposition, who resisted the proposal to limit the future regent's authority. At last, on Feb. 5, 1789, after Parliament had been formally opened by letters patent under the Great Seal affixed by authority of Parliament, the bill in which, among other limitations, the prince was forbidden to bestow peerages except on royal princes, was introduced in the Commons, and soon sent up to the Lords; but the king's sudden recovery put an end to further proceedings, and, though the king was anxious for some permanent provision for a regency, nothing was done.

(4) 1810. When George III.'s mind finally gave way, the precedent of 1788—89 was followed exactly. The bill passed both Houses; and consent was given to it by commission under Great Seal affixed by authority of Parliament.

Hist.—28

(5) 1830. The Duchess of Kent was appointed regent, in the event of the Princess Victoria succeeding to the throne before arriving at the age of eighteen. The regent was not to be controlled by a council, as in previous Regency Acts, but to govern through the ordinary ministers.

(6) 1837. On the accession of Victoria, as the King of Hanover was presumptive heir, an Act was passed providing, in the event of the queen's dying while the successor was abroad, for the carrying on of the government by lords justices until his return.

(7) 1840. Upon the marriage of Victoria, an Act was passed enacting that in the event of any child of her Majesty coming to the throne under the age of eighteen, Prince Albert should become regent, though without power to assent to any bill for altering the succession, or affecting the worship of the Church of England, or the rights of the Church of Scotland.

Regiam Majestatem (so called from its opening words) was a code of Scotch law dating from the reign of David I., which was regarded until recent times as the independent work of Scotch lawyers of the twelfth century. It is, however, scarcely more than a copy of Glanville's Treatise on the Laws and Customs of England, and was probably prepared by some Scotch lawyer, who incorporated with it fragments of earlier local usage, and of the ancient customs known as "the Laws of the Brete and the Scots." The character and history of the Regiam Majestatem illustrate the process of feudalisation in Scotland and the extent of English influence.

Begicides, THE. Those persons who sat in judgment on Charles I., or were instrumental in his death, were both at the Restoration included under this title. The ordinance nominating the High Court of Justice finally appointed 135 persons to judge the king. Not half of these attended the trial, the number present at the opening, counting Bradshaw, the president, was sixty-seven, and sixty-seven also were present on Jan. 27, 1649, when sentence was pronounced. Out of these sixty-seven, fifty-eight, and one other person (Ingoldsby) signed the death warrant. At the Restoration, the House of Commons ordered that "all those persons who sat in judgment upon the late king's majesty when the sentence was pronounced for his condemnation," should be forthwith secured (May 14). In all the House of Commons placed in the category, eighty-four persons, viz., sixty-seven present at the last sitting, eleven frequently present, four officers of the court, and two executioners. Out of these the Commons proposed to punish capitally only twelve persons, viz., seven judges, three court officers, and two executioners. The House of Lords went further, and proposed to except for capital punishment all those who had been present at the last sitting, or signed the warrant, saving only Colonels Hutchinson, Tomlinson, and Ingoldsby, in all sixty-six persons. But the Commons resolutely opposed the Lords' amendment. In the Bill of Indemnity as it finally passed (Aug. 29, 1660), the penalties of the Regicides were ordered as follows:—(1) Four dead Regicides excepted by posthumous attainder for high treason, viz., Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshawe, and Pride. (2) Twenty dead Regicides excepted as to their estates, to be subject to future fines or forfeiture. (3) Thirty living Regicides (viz., twenty-two judges and eight others) absolutely excepted. (4) Nineteen living Regicides, excepted with a saving clause, stating that they might be legally attainted; but that their execution should be suspended "until his majesty, by the advice and assent of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, shall order the execution by Act of Parliament to be passed for that purpose." (5) Six more living Regicides were excepted, but not capitally. (6) Two Regicides excepted, but with the sole penalty of incapacitation for office, viz., Hutchinson and Lascelles. Tomlinson and Ingoldsby escaped without any penalties whatever. The trial of the Regicides took place in October before a court of thirty-four commissioners (Oct., 1660). Twenty-nine were condemned to death, of whom ten were executed; the remaining nineteen with six others who had not been tried, were mostly imprisoned till their deaths, though the fate of some is still obscure. There were still nineteen fugitives living in exile, of whom three were subsequently caught in Holland, brought over and executed, and one (Lisle) assassinated in Switzerland.

Registration Act, THE (1836), created an elaborate machinery for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages. It regulated the method of registration, the appointment of the necessary officials, and the creation of a central registry office at Somerset House under a Registrar-General, who was to present annual reports to Parliament. The system then established has remained substantially unaltered till the present.

Regium Donum was the endowment of £1,200 a year granted by William III. to the Presbyterian clergy of Ireland to reward them for their activity against James. In 1695 the Lords Justices advised the discontinuance of the grant, but William refused to do so. From 1711 to 1715 the Irish House of Lords succeeded in preventing its being paid. But on the accession of George I. it was revived and increased to £2,000. In 1870, in consequence of the Irish Church Act, it was abolished, but a compensation was granted to all interested parties.

Regni, THE, were a British tribe occupying the present county of Sussex, with a chief town Regnum (Chichester).

Regulating Act, LORD NORTH'S (1773), was the first important intervention of the English government in the direct administration of British India. The difficulties of the East India Company drove them in 1772 to seek a loan from Parliament, and the ministry in consequence brought in a bill for the better government of India, which was carried in spite of the opposition of the India House. Its provisions were that the administration of Bengal should be vested in a Governor-General and four councillors, and that this government should be supreme over the other presidencies; that the first Governor-General and councillors, who were nominated in the Act, should hold office for five years, and be irremovable except by the crown on representation of the Court of Directors; that vacancies should be supplied by the court subject to the approbation of the crown; that a Supreme Court of Judicature should be established at Calcutta to consist of a chief justice and four puisné judges to be nominated by the crown, and paid by the Company; that the qualification for a vote in the India House should be the possession of £1,000 stock, and that the possession of more should entitle to a plurality of votes in a fixed proportion; that the directors should be elected for four years, and that one-fourth of the entire number should be renewed annually; that all the Company's correspondence relating to civil and military affairs, the government of the country, or the administration of the revenues should be laid before one of his Majesty's secretaries of state, and that no servant of the crown or Company should receive presents.

Remonstrance, THE GRAND. In the first week after the Long Parliament met, it was moved by Lord Digby "to draw up such a remonstrance to the king as should be a faithful and lively representation of the state of the kingdom." In the following August it was resolved that this proposal should be adopted, and the remonstrance was brought forward on Nov. 8th, finally discussed on Nov. 22nd, and passed by 159 votes to 148. It was presented to the king on Dec. 1st, ordered to be printed on Dec. 15th, and answered by Charles on Dec. 23rd. In aim and substance the remonstrance was "an appeal to the nation rather than address to the crown." It stated the case of the Commons against the king, described the condition in which they had found the nation, what reforms they had already effected, what they proposed for the future, and what difficulties they had to struggle against. The preamble explained the causes which made a remonstrance necessary. Clauses 1 to 104 traced the history of the king's misgovernment from his accession to the meeting of the Long Parliament. Clauses 105 to 142 described the abuses abolished and reforms effected and prepared by the Parliament. Clauses 143 to 180 enumerated the obstructions to the work of reformation, evil counselors and slanderers, the army plots, and the Irish rebellion. Clauses 181 to 191 explained and defended the scheme of the Parliamentary leaders for the reform of the Church. The last fourteen clauses (192 to 206) pointed out the remedial measures the Commons demanded; the establishment of certain safeguards against the Roman Catholic religion; securities to be given for the better administration of justice; the king to choose for ministers and agents such persons as the Parliament "might have cause to confide in." The earlier clauses, which merely set forth the king's past misgovernment, were adopted without opposition, but the ecclesiastical clauses met with an able and vigorous opposition from Hyde, Colepepper, and others. The final debate also was long and excited, and the two questions whether the remonstrance should be printed, and whether the minority might enter their protestations, nearly led to a personal struggle. It was the fact that it was a party manifesto which led to this opposition, and brought the Civil War nearer.

Remonstrants. THE. In 1650 a schism took place amongst the Scotch Presbyterians. Warned by the defeat of Dunbar (Sept. 3), and the attempt of Charles II. to join the Scotch Royalists, Argyle and his followers determined to unite with the Royalists to oppose Cromwell. Against this policy two leading divines, Guthrie and Gillespie, with Johnston of Warriston, and the chiefs of the rigid Presbyterians of the south-west, presented to the Committee of Estates "a remonstrance of the gentlemen commanders and ministers attending the forces in the west" (Oct. 22, 1650). Those who joined in this opposition were called Remonstrants or Protesters.

Repeal Agitation is the name given to the movement headed by Daniel O'Connell for the repeal of the English and Irish Union. From his first appearance in public life, O'Connell displayed a steady hostility to the Act of Union. His activity was long absorbed in the great struggle for Emancipation, but he consistently avowed his purpose of using Emancipation as a step to Repeal. The Catholic controversy had two abiding results: it substituted the power of the priests for the power of the landlords in Ireland, and it gave an immense impetus to the system of organised agitation in English politics. When the Act became law, O'Connell applied the machinery which carried it to the promotion of Repeal. The agitation was suspended in 1831, renewed after the Coercion Act of 1833, and again suspended on the accession of Lord Melbourne to power in 1835. The Emancipation Act had been in force for six years, but Catholics were still systematically excluded from office by the government. O'Connell believed that the new premier would admit them to the equality they demanded, and upon those terms he was prepared to drop the question of Repeal. His expectations were not altogether disappointed. The Whig administration carried many just and useful reforms, and dispensed its Irish patronage between the rival creeds. But in the end O'Connell's support was fatal to his allies. Sir Robert Peel returned to office in 1841. The Repeal agitation was at once revived. It was conducted by a "Repeal Society," modelled on the lines of the Catholic Association. The ecclesiastical organisation of the popular Church, which necessarily permeated every corner of the land, was again the basis of a political movement. The subscribers were classified according to the amount of their payments, which were collected by the priests. Repeal wardens administered the several districts. The great agitator himself controlled the whole. The educated Catholics had dissevered themselves from O'Connell early in the Emancipation contest. They held utterly aloof from Repeal. Their conduct gave a last blow to their political power. The Repeal Society manipulated elections, prepared gigantic petitions, and, above all, devoted itself to the promotion of "monster meetings." These enormous gatherings proved in O'Connell's hands the most striking feature of the agitation. It is credibly reported that at Tara (Aug. 15, 1843) he addressed an audience of 250,000 men. On Oct. 1 there was a demonstration at Mullaghmast, in Kildare. Arrangements were made to hold another at Clontarf on the 8th. The government were seriously alarmed. The Clontarf meeting was prohibited by proclamation on the 7th. Ample military measures were taken to enforce obedience. The action of the government, as O'Connell afterwards complained, had made a massacre imminent. Such an event would probably have strengthened his position; but he shrank from bloodshed. By strenuous exertions he succeeded in inducing his followers to disperse. The Repeal movement virtually ended with the Clontarf proclamation. O'Connell was tried for conspiracy, and convicted on Feb. 12, 1844. The judgment was reversed by the House of Lords on Sept. 4. The agitation completed the division of classes in Ireland, and made the Union essential to the existence of the minority.

Reyngdon, PHILIP (d. circa 1434), was one of the chief supporters of Wiclif at Oxford, but subsequently being alarmed at the progress of Lollardy he became one of its strongest opponents. In 1408 he was made Bishop of Lincoln and cardinal by the Pope, but in 1419 he was compelled to resign the see, having violated the Statute of Præmunire in accepting the cardinalship without royal consent. After this he seems to have lived in obscurity for some fifteen years longer.

Representation. [ELECTIONS; PARLIAMENT.]

Representative Peers are those peers of Scotland and Ireland selected by their order to represent them in the House of Lords. By the Act of Union with Scotland (1707) it was enacted that Scotland should be represented in the British House of Lords by sixteen peers chosen by the whole body of the Scotch nobility (at this time numbering 154). The proportion of Scotch to English members of Parliament had been fixed at one to twelve, and the same proportion was observed in the House of Lords. The representative peers were to be elected for each Parliament by open voting, and proxies of absent nobles were allowed. No fresh Scotch peerages were in future to be created. In 1711 the House of Lords denied the right of Scotch non-representative peers who had been given English peerages to sit among them. This, however, did not prevent the conferring of English titles on the eldest sons of Scotch peers, and after a decision of the judges in 1782 the crown recommenced to grant patents of peerage in Great Britain to Scotch peers. More than half the Scotch peers are now also peers of England, and ultimately only sixteen will remain without an hereditary right to sit, and these will doubtless be made hereditary peers of Parliament. It may be added that one of the proposals of the Peerage Bill of 1720—21 was to substitute twenty-five hereditary for sixteen elected peers from Scotland. By the Act of Union with Ireland (1801), twenty-eight Irish representative peers were added to the House of Lords: these, however, were to be elected for life, and not, as in Scotland, for one Parliament only. One new Irish peerage may only be created when three have become extinct. But when the number shall have fallen to 100 it is to be kept at that figure by the creation of one new peerage whenever a peerage becomes extinct, or an Irish peer becomes a peer of Great Britain.

Lords' Report on the Dignity of a Peer; May, Practical Treatise.

Requests, THE COURT OF, was an offshoot of the Privy Council in its judicial capacity. The creation of a minor court of equity was necessitated by numerous failures of justice in the common law court, which refused to afford any remedy beyond that specified by the king's original writ. Accordingly an order for regulating the Council, of the 13th Richard II., required the Keeper of the Privy Seal and a certain number of the Council to meet between eight and nine o'clock in order to examine and despatch the bills of people of lesser charge. In the 11st of Elizabeth this court, which was frequently resorted to, was declared illegal by a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, and was finally abolished, together with the Star Chamber, by the Long Parliament. There were also local tribunals, known as courts of request or courts of conscience for the recovery of small debts, limited at first to sums under 40s., and afterwards under £5. The first of these was established by Act of Parliament in 1625, which confirmed a court which had been instituted in London by order of Council in the reign of Henry VIII.; and similar courts were soon afterwards set up by Act of Parliament in various parts of the kingdom. They proved, however, very inadequate, and were suppressed by the County Court Act of 1846.

Rescissory Act, THE, was an Act passed by the Scotch Parliament of 1661. "It rescinded or cut off from the body of the law all the statutes passed in the Parliament of 1640 or subsequently. This withdrew from the statute-book all legislation later than the year 1633, for the Parliament of 1639 passed no statutes" (Burton). It was proposed by Sir Thomas Primrose with the object of annulling the Acts establishing Presbyterianism in Scotland. It was brought in and passed in one day (March 28th), and immediately approved by Lord Middleton, the High Commissioner, without waiting for leave from the king. Burnet says of it, "This was a most extravagant thing, and only fit to be concluded after a drunken bout."

Burnet, Hist. of his Own Time; Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

Resolutioners was the name given to the supporters of the coalition between the Scotch Royalists and the Presbyterian party proposed by the Argyle government in the autumn of 1650. In the Kirk commission, which met at Perth, a resolution was passed empowering the government to relax the Act of Classes, and allow the Royalists to take part in the war. Those who supported this policy were called Resolutioners.

Responsibility of Ministers. As now understood, this phrase expresses the grand working and motive principle of parliamentary and party government. That every holder of a ministerial office should have at any moment to give an account of his stewardship, not to the power that nominally appoints and dismisses him, but to the Commons and the country, who can withdraw from him the confidence that is essential to his staying in office, is a practical doctrine that has turned the nobler parts of government into a self-acting machinery of rare efficiency hitherto. This is now the outcome and function of ministerial responsibility, when the great officers of state have come to be clothed with the whole prerogative of the crown. Once it was something different, and served another purpose. It was once a device for reconciling the inviolability of the sovereign with the rights of the subject, and the legal saw, "the king can do no wrong," with the fact that the subject was often wronged by the crown, and the rule of law that every wrong has a remedy. Officers of the king were answerable for the king's measures to the courts of justice and to the High Court of Parliament, and might have to smart for them. This principle was early admitted; Hallam finds it to have been an essential check on the royal authority, though somewhat halting in its operation, in 1485; and it was ruled to be the law on a most solemn occasion—the trial of the Regicides in 1660. "The law in all cases," said Bridgman, "preserves the person of the king, but what is done by his ministers unlawfully, there is a remedy against his ministers for it." The higher action of the principle, that which has brought the entire ministerial system into subjection to the Commons and the country, has only recently reached its final development. Its germs, however, were sown with the rise of Parliament, and attempts to reduce it to practice were made from time to time as Parliament became strong. In 1341 a pledge was exacted from Edward III. that the Chancellor and other great officers should be appointed in Parliament, and their work tested by Parliament; according to Bishop Stubbs this implies "that it is to the nation, not to the king only, that ministers are accountable." In 1378 another was given, that during Richard II.'s minority the great ministers should be chosen by Parliament. But neither of these engagements stood; Parliament has never succeeded in permanently enforcing its will by the direct method. In the invention of impeachment the right path towards the indirect and smoother way of working the principle was hit upon; but even impeachment was premature. Under the house of Lancaster signs that this first of constitutional powers was among the births of time are easily discoverable; but under the Tudors there is not a trace of such a promise. With the Stuarts they reappear. The Parliamentary prosecutions of Bacon and Cranfield, the proceedings against Buckingham, Strafford, and others, were all manifestations of the instinct that was pushing the Commons towards the momentous issue; and when Charles I. thought of admitting Pym and Hampden to important office, and actually bestowed such on Essex and Falkland, he gave a hint, the earliest in history, of what proved to be the true manner of working the principle. But Pym had no perception of this; his aim was to make Parliament immediate master of the administration. After the Restoration the movement began in earnest, and on the right line; in the fall of Clarendon, of the Cabal, and of Danby, we see one thing clearly, that the Commons had learned the secret of turning out ministers. The incidents of Danby's overthrow are specially instructive; they show that the responsibility of ministers had become a reality, and was on its way to great ends. When the Revolution had been consummated, the doctrine was established beyond dispute; it became the rule that the sovereign should choose the ministers, but Parliament should decide whether his choice should hold good. By one power office was given, to another the men who held it were responsible; gained by favour of one, it could be kept only by favour of the other. The voting power in the country could take away but not give. By getting the control of this voting power, at one time the great families, at another King George III., contrived to intercept the effect of the principle, and for more than a century it operated only in seasons of unusual excitement. But the first Reform Bill first brought into play its logical consequence. Since 1835 the Commons and voting power of the country have virtually indicated to the sovereign the men who must compose the ministry, as well as dismissed it when so minded. However, since a ministry is now a solid mass, usually entering on and resigning power with unbroken ranks, it would be more accurate to name the doctrine the responsibility of ministries.

Resumption Bill (1700). At the time of the conquest of Ireland by William III., a bill had been introduced providing for the application to the public service of forfeited Irish lands. This bill, however, had not been carried through, and William had freely disposed of the forfeitures—some 1,700,000 acres in all. Of these a quarter was restored to the Catholics in accordance with the Articles of Limerick; sixty-five other great proprietors were reinstated by royal clemency; and a part was bestowed on persons who had commanded in the war, such as Ginkel and Galway. But the greater part was lavishly granted to courtiers and favourites, chief among them Woodstock, Albemarle, and Lady Orkney. In 1699 the Commons "tacked" to a Land Tax Bill a clause nominating seven commissioners to examine into forfeitures. The majority report of these commissioners, with its exaggeration of the value of the grants, and bitter attacks upon the government for favouring Catholics, was welcomed by the Commons, who finally passed a Resumption Bill, appointing trustees, in whose hands the lands were to be vested. This they again tacked to the Land Tax Bill; the Lords were inclined to resist, but the country was on the side of the Commons, and the peers were induced to yield.

Revenue, THE. The collection and assessment of the revenue previous to the Conquest was a simple matter. The machinery of government was supplied by the people themselves, notably by the obligations of the Trinoda Necessitas (q.v.); and all that had to be supplied were the personal wants of the crown. These were met by the fee-farm of the folkland, fines in the law courts, market and harbour dues, the right of maintenance, afterwards known as purveyance and heriots. Extraordinary taxes, such as the Danegeld, were imposed by the Witenagemot. Under the Norman kings the rents from the public lands were commuted and became the ferm of the shire; the Danegeld continued, while the heriot was supplanted by the feudal aids. The fines of the local courts, and the port and market dues, were still raised. Under Henry II. the towns began to be an important source of taxation; aids were raised from them, which subsequently acquire an evil significance under the title of talliage. Taxes on movables, afterwards so frequent in the form of thirteenth, fifteenth, &c., were established by the Saladin tithe in the same reign. By the fourteenth century they had supplanted scutage and talliage, which were levied on land. They fell chiefly on the clergy, who, with the merchants, contributed from this time the greater part of the revenue. In the reign of Richard the principle of sworn recognitors was first applied generally to purposes of taxation. The reigns of John and Henry III. are noted for the illegal pretexts by which all classes were oppressed, and the more or less successful resistance of the baronial party. Edward I. first instituted the customs by the tax on wool imposed in 1275, although this important article had frequently been seized by previous kings. [CUSTOMS.] In this reign taxes ceased to be imposed locally, and were voted by the estates sitting in Parliament. Among the financial experiments of the fourteenth century we may note the poll-tax, which was afterwards abandoned; and tannage and poundage, which was perpetuated. The kings showed great ingenuity in evading the maxim,

"What touches all should be allowed of all." Among illegal sources of revenue were loans from foreign merchants, forced loans from individuals, which became known as benevolences, purveyances, and exactions from the towns for forced levies of men, known as commissions of array. The revenue in the fourteenth century may be estimated at about £65,000 in times of peace, and £130,000 in times of war. To go into the financial devices of the Yorkist and Tudor dynasties with any minuteness is not possible here; it is enough to notice the creation of monopolies in the latter period, and the institution of fines for religious nonconformity. When the king became the head of the Church, the support of the establishment fell upon the crown, and then the tithe system originated as it existed until commuted in 1836. The Stuarts were adepts at inventing methods for raising revenue. A permanent source of income which dates from the reign of Charles I. is the excise, first imposed by the Long Parliament in 1643, and presented to the crown after the Restoration upon the surrender of the feudal dues. At the Restoration the revenue was fixed at £1,200,000 a year, and after the Revolution at the same figure. The hearth-tax was abolished at the latter date. [For the arrangement by which the hereditary revenues of the crown were separated from the taxes for the support of government, see CIVIL LIST.] It would be impossible here to give a thorough account of the many devices for raising revenue adopted since the Restoration. We may notice the rapid multiplication of import and export duties under the mercantile system, and their abandonment on the introduction of free trade; the stamp duties introduced 1671 and diminished in the present reign, the land-tax imposed in 1689 and first commuted in 1798, the succession duty relegated in 1863, and lastly the income-tax. The chief sources of revenue at present (1884) are the customs, excise, stamps, land-tax and house-duty, property and income-tax, post office, telegraph service, the crown lands, and the interest on advances to local works.

Revolution, THE (1688—89), is the name usually given to the series of events by which James II. was expelled, and William and Mary established on the throne. In the three years of his reign, James II. succeeded in making many enemies. Two events precipitated his fall—the trial of the Seven Bishops and the birth of the Prince of Wales. So long as the clergy could expect that in a few years James would be succeeded by the Princess Mary, they were able patiently to bear reverses. But this hope was now destroyed; the young prince would be brought up a papist, and would be surrounded by papist counsellors. So necessary was it to the success of James's plans that Mary of Modena should have a son, that the majority of the people sincerely believed the Jesuits had schemed a great imposture. The whole nation, Whig and Tory, were anxious to be saved from the rule of a Catholic prince, however parties might differ as to the means to be employed.

Such was the state of things when, on June 30, 1688, an invitation was sent to William of Orange to come to England at once with an armed force. It was signed by seven persons of influence—the Earl of Devonshire, one of the chiefs of the Whig party; the Earl of Shrewsbury; the Earl of Danby; Compton, Bishop of London; Henry Sidney, brother of Algernon Sidney; Lord Lumley, and Edward Russell. The Prince of Orange at once determined upon action. The birth of the young prince destroyed the hopes which he had built upon the probability of his wife's accession to the English throne. If he could succeed in dethroning James, he might expect to gain far more power than that of a king-consort; if he could bring the power of England into the confederation against Louis XIV., his pre-eminence among the allies would be assured. But there were almost insuperable difficulties in the way. The magistrates of Amsterdam had long been opposed to the Orange princes and attached to France; the opposition of one town would be sufficient to prevent the States-General from consenting to the expedition to England, and if it did not altogether stop it, might cause a dangerous delay. If Louis determined to begin the impending war by an attack upon Holland, William's troops must be retained at home to defend their country. And, finally, if only James could induce his English troops to fight one battle against the Dutch invaders, whatever its issue might be, national feeling would be enlisted upon his side, and he might be able to retain his throne. But the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and the recent alterations in the French tariff had destroyed the French party in Amsterdam, and all the states and towns of the republic were enthusiastic in support of Orange. The preparations which were being made in Holland did not escape the observation of the French ambassador, and his master did what he could to save James. A French envoy was sent to London to offer naval assistance. But James petulantly declared he would not be patronised; the French envoy could gain no answer to his message; and the European powers were informed that the close alliance of England and France was a mere invention on the part of Louis. In anger Louis left him to his fate; he determined to open the war by an invasion of Germany, and William could venture for a while to leave Holland unprotected. In his negotiations with Catholic powers, William was able to represent his undertaking as one which had little to do with religion, and his expedition certainly had the good wishes of the sovereign pontiff. And the folly of James in bringing Irish troops into England, and William's wise policy of putting forward his English supporters on every occasion when a conflict seemed likely to occur, threw national sympathy on the side of the Prince of Orange, and removed the most formidable difficulty out of his way.

Before the expedition started, a declaration was drawn up and published. It set forth that the fundamental laws of England had been violated, illegal measures had been taken to favour Catholics, prelates venturing to petition their sovereign had been imprisoned, judges had been dismissed, and preparations were being made to bring together a packed Parliament. Moreover, just doubts were entertained as to the birth of the Prince of Wales. For these reasons, it was declared, William was about to enter England with an army in order to assemble a free Parliament, to whose decision all the questions in dispute should be referred.

James was terrified when at last he heard of the impending storm. A formidable fleet was put under the command of Lord Dartmouth, and troops were brought from Scotland and Ireland. All the dismissed magistrates and deputy-lieutenants were replaced, and a proclamation was issued announcing the king's intention to abandon the attempt to repeal the Test Act, and his desire to carry out the Act of Uniformity. Witnesses were brought before the Privy Council to prove the birth of the young prince; and at the request of the bishops the Court of High Commission was abolished and the borough charters restored. But these concessions were too evidently dictated by fear to be of use, and James still obstinately refused to give up the dispensing power.

On Oct. 19 William set sail from Helvoetsluys with a force of some 14,000 men, the fleet being wisely placed under the command of the Englishman Herbert. He was driven back by a gale, but set out again on Nov. 1. A favouring breeze carried the fleet into the Channel, while it held Dartmouth in the Thames; on the 6th William landed unmolested at Torbay. Hence he proceeded to Exeter, where he began to be joined by the neighbouring gentry. Soon the defections from James became numerous; very significant was the desertion of Clarendon's son, Viscount Cornbury, doubtless prompted by Churchill. James at once set out for Salisbury, but here Churchill and Grafton left him, and no longer daring to trust his army, the king returned to London. On his way he was abandoned by Prince George and Ormonde, and when he reached the capital he found that the Princess Anne had taken flight. In desperation the king yielded to the advice of the Council, and issued writs for a Parliament. Halifax, Nottingham, and Godolphin were appointed commissioners to treat with William, but this negotiation, as James told Barillon, was only a feint to gain time. Meanwhile the prince had advanced to Hungerford, and there, on Dec. 8, the commissioners met him. William's terms were scrupulously moderate; all questions should be referred to a Parliament, and in order that its deliberations might be free, neither army should come within forty miles of the capital, though James and William were each to be allowed to visit Westminster with a body-guard. These terms were arranged on Dec. 9; on the 10th Mary of Modena and the young prince were sent out of the country under the care of the Count of Lauzun, and next day James himself took flight. Such peers as were in London met in the Guildhall under the presidency of Sancroft, and drew up a declaration that now that the king had left the country they had determined to join with the Prince of Orange, and until his arrival would act as a provisional government. But greatly to the vexation of William, James was stopped in his flight, and returned to London. It now became William's object to terrify him into again leaving the country. Remaining himself at Windsor, William sent Dutch troops to occupy Whitehall, and peremptorily insisted that James should remove to Ham. Again meditating flight, James proposed Rochester instead, and to this Orange readily consented. Next day, Dec. 19, William entered London, and on the 22nd James fled from Rochester, and this time succeeded in reaching France.

William had already called together the Lords and the members of Charles II.'s Parliaments, together with the City magistrates. These advised the prince to assume the administration provisionally, and summon a Parliamentary convention. The Convention Parliament met on Jan. 22, 1689. One party, especially among the clergy, were in favour of negotiating with James and restoring him upon conditions, but they could scarcely venture to propose this when James was himself issuing manifestoes declaring all their grievances imaginary. Another party, headed by Sancroft, proposed that the royal title should be left to James, but that the government should be put into the hands of William with the title of regent. A third but smaller section, the chiefs of which were Danby and Compton, urged that by the flight of James the throne had been vacated, that judgment must go by default against the claims of the young prince, and that Mary was already de jure queen. But Mary refused to exclude her husband from the throne, and William himself declared that he would not remain merely as his wife's usher. The Whigs, meanwhile, were unanimous in proposing to confer the crown on William and Mary together, and to put the executive into the hands of the prince, and after long discussions this was agreed to by both Houses. The principal resolution of the Commons accepted by the Lords, ran thus: "King James the Second, having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom by breaking the original contract between king and people, and by the advice of Jesuits and other wicked persons having violated the fundamental laws, and having withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, has abdicated the government, and the throne has thereby become vacant." Of this resolution, as Macaulay justly says, the one beauty is its inconsistency; "There was a phrase for every subdivision of the majority. The mention of the original contract gratified the disciples of Sidney. The word abdication conciliated politicians of a more timid school. There were, doubtless, many fervent Protestants who were pleased with the censure cast on the Jesuits. To the real statesman the single important clause was that which declared the throne vacant; and, if that clause could be carried, he cared little by what preamble it might be introduced." On Feb. 13, the crown was offered to William and Mary, accompanied by the Declaration of Rights. This they accepted, and the same day were proclaimed king and queen.

The same general plan had been followed in Scotland. There the withdrawal of troops had left the ground clear for the Whig lords. While the Covenanters rose in the west, and carried out a violent ecclesiastical change, the leading peers went to London, and advised William to call a Convention of Estates. This was done, and upon its advice the Estates were summoned for March 14. After an easily balked attempt of the Jacobite minority to hold a rival convention, a declaration was drawn up almost in the same terms as in England, with the addition that prelacy was an insupportable grievance. In Ireland, Londonderry and Enniskillen declared for William, but the rest of the country under Tyrconnel's administration remained firm in its allegiance to James, and not till the Irish had been crushed in war was the Revolution settlement accepted by them.

Reynolds, WALTER, Archbishop of Canterbury (1313–1327), was a man of humble origin. He was made by Edward I. preceptor to Prince Edward, and subsequently treasurer. He obtained a considerable influence over the prince, and on Edward II.'s accession, Reynolds was made almost at once Chancellor, and Bishop of Worcester. On the death of Winchelsey, the king obtained from the Pope his nomination to the archbishopric. After the defeat at Bannockburn, Reynolds resigned office, and in the latter part of the reign we find him siding with the queen against his benefactor. He crowned Prince Edward, and preached the coronation sermon, taking as his text, Vox populi, vox Dei. Shortly afterwards he died. Dean Hook says with truth, "of all the primates who have occupied the see of Canterbury, few have been less qualified to discharge the duties devolving upon a Metropolitan than Walter Reynolds. He was not equal to the situation, whether we have regard to his talents, his learning, his piety, or his virtues."

Rhé, EXPEDITION TO, 1627. In 1627 a rupture took place between England and France, and Charles resolved to defend the independence of the French Protestants, and maintain his own claim to the mastery of the sea. For both these objects the possession of the island of Rhé, lying in face of Rochelle, and commanding the commerce between France and Spain, would be valuable. The English fleet, commanded by the Duke of Buckingham, sailed on June 27, and a landing was made on the island on July 12. St. Martin's, the capital, was besieged from July 17 to Oct 29. The destruction by a storm of the expedition destined to reinforce the besiegers, and the failure of an assault attempted on Oct. 27, combined with the landing of a French force in the island, compelled the duke to raise the siege. These French troops, to the number of 6,000, commanded by Marshal Schomberg, had gradually been collected at the fort of La Pré, which Buckingham had neglected to take immediately after his landing. They now assailed the English during their retreat, and inflicted a very heavy loss on them. The re-embarkation took place on Oct. 30. The English loss during the siege and retreat was about 4,000 men.

Rhuddlan Castle. A fortress was first built at Rhuddlan, a position of considerable military importance commanding the vale of Clwyd, by Llewelyn ap Sitsyll early in the eleventh century. Upon the rebellion of the Prince Gruffydd, in 1262, Harold marched upon him at Rhuddlan; Gruffydd escaped to the sea about two miles distant, but Harold burnt the castle. It was rebuilt, and afterwards conquered by a nephew of Hugh Lupus. Edward I. caused a stately castle to be erected near the site of the former one; here Queen Eleanor gave birth to a daughter; and here a baronial assembly was held by the advice of which, in 1284, the "Statute of Wales" was drawn up, assimilating the administration of that country to that of England. The castle was held for the king in the civil wars, but captured by the Parliamentary general, Mytton, in 1646, and dismantled by order of Parliament.

Ribbon Society, THE, was a secret Irish confederacy, consisting of small farmers, cottiers, labourers, and in the towns small shopkeepers and artisans, which appeared about 1820 (the name "Ribbon" not being attached to it till about 1826); and gained great strength from 1835 to 1855. "In Ulster it professed to be a defensive or retaliatory league against Orangeism. In Munster it was at first a combination against tithe proctors. In Connaught it was an organisation against rack-renting and evictions. In Leinster it often was mere trade-unionism, dictating by its mandates, and enforcing by its vengeance the employment or dismissal of workmen, stewards, and even domestics." Though the society was vigorously opposed and denounced by the Catholic clergy, it remained entirely Catholic. It was never more than an agrarian combination, though its chief officers seem to have sometimes endeavoured to give it a political object. To belong to a Ribbon Society was declared illegal by the Westmeath Act of 1871; since which time the confederacy has died away, or become merged in other secret associations.

Rich, St. EDMUND, Archbishop of Canterbury (1234-1240), was born at Abingdon, came to Oxford at the age of twelve, after staying there several years begged his way to Paris, and upon his return to Oxford became one of the most popular teachers of theology and philosophy. About 1222 he was appointed Treasurer of Salisbury Cathedral, and became the spiritual adviser of the Countess of Salisbury, widow of King John's half-brother. Upon the death of Archbishop Richard le Grand some dispute arose as to the election of a successor, and Pope Gregory IX. induced the monks who had gone to Rome to elect Rich upon their return, a measure to which the king's consent was readily obtained. But Edmund was not disposed to act as a tool of king or pope, though the latter had written urging him to persuade the English to overcome their prejudices against the aliens. Immediately after his consecration he visited the king, insisted on the reform of abuses, and the dismissal of foreign ministers, especially Peter des Roches, and threatened him with excommunication if he refused. Henry yielded, and Peter and his creatures were dismissed. "Edmund was a bishop of the type of Anselm, with somewhat of the spirit and practical instincts of Langton; but he lived in an unhappy period for the display of either class of qualities, under a pope whom he knew only as a taskmaster, and under a king whose incapacity and want of firmness made it as hard to support as to resist him" (Stubbs). To diminish his influence Henry III. applied to the pope to send a legate to England, and Edmund had to struggle during the rest of his life against Otho's efforts to obtain benefices for foreigners in England. The archbishop also came into conflict with Henry in the matter of the marriage of Simon de Montfort to the king's sister Eleanor, widow of the Earl Marshal, whom he refused to free from her vow of perpetual widowhood. In 1238 Edmund visited Rome to obtain papal support in his attempt to enforce discipline in the monasteries of Canterbury and Rochester. But the pope in revenge for his action in the matter of the alien clergy treated him with studied insult, and decided all the appeals against him. At last in despair Edmund retired to the abbey of Pontigny in France, and died at the neighbouring priory of Soissy in 1240. The popular belief in his sanctity and the miracles reported from his tomb forced Innocent IV., much against his will, to consent to his canonisation in 1246.

Hook, Archbishops of Canterbury, vol. III., based on a contemporary Life by Bertrand, Abbot of Pontigny. Green, Hist. of English People, gives some account of his Oxford life, and Stubbs, Const. Hist., ch. xiv., of his constitutional action. [W. J. A.]

Rich, RICHARD, LORD RICH, (d. 1560), who "brought a greater strain upon the bar of England than any member of the profession" (Campbell), was in 1533 made Solicitor-General; took a prominent part in the trial of Sir Thomas More (1535), giving as evidence an untrue version of a private conversation with More, and so securing his conviction. He was rewarded in 1537 by being recommended to the office of Speaker, and during the rest of the reign was a ready agent of the court in the prosecution alike of Protestants and of Roman Catholics. Under the will of Henry VIII. Rich was appointed a councillor to assist in the government during the minority of Edward VI., and in October (1547) succeeded Paulet as Lord Chancellor of England. In 1549 he drew up the articles charging Lord Seymour of Sudeley with treason, and subsequently joined the Earl of Warwick, taking an active part in the proceedings against his former patron Somerset. In 1561 he retired from public life.

Richard I., KING, (b. Sept. 13, 1157, s. July, 1189, d. April 8, 1199), was the second son of Henry II. and Eleanor of Aquitaine. He was destined by his father to rule his mother's possessions in the south of France, and when still quite young was entrusted with the government of Aquitaine, where he speedily joined in the great conspiracy of 1173 against his father. Pardoned at the suppression of the revolt, he passed several years in a series of chivalrous and brilliant exploits among the wild feudal nobles of Guienne and Poitou. His success made his elder brother so envious that he insisted on Richard doing homage to him, and on his refusal a war broke out between the brothers (1183). In alliance with Bertrand de Born, Richard's great enemy, Henry and Geoffroy reduced Richard to such straits that Henry II. had to go to his assistance. The death of the younger Henry concluded the war, but in 1184 another quarrel between Richard and his father ensued on the former's refusal to gratify the latter by surrendering a portion of Aquitaine to his brother, John. Richard's restless temper was constantly involving him in wars with his neighbours, from which nothing but his father's influence could extricate him. Yet in 1189 he inspired that last successful revolt, in the midst of which the old king died.

Despite his constant revolts, Richard secured the succession without difficulty. He hurried to England, not with the view of taking possession of the government so much as to secure means to embark on the projected crusade, into which he threw all his energy. He held a great council at Pipewell, in which he displaced Henry's old ministers, sold a large number of places, and made arrangements for the government during his absence. About three months after his coronation he left England.

The history of Richard's reign naturally divides itself into two main subjects—the personal adventures of the king in Palestine, Germany, and finally in France, and the government of the country during his absence. The brilliant and chivalrous spirit of the king, and that martial prowess which gave him the name of Cœur de Lion were nowhere better displayed than in his adventures in the east. After some delays in France, Richard and Philip Augustus landed in Sicily in June, 1190. After rescuing his sister from the hands of the usurper, Tancred, and incurring the French king's hostility by repudiating the latter's sister, Alice, to whom he had been long contracted in marriage, in favour of Berengaria of Navarre, Richard set out for Palestine, conquering Cyprus on his way, and bestowing it on Guy of Lusignan. He arrived in Palestine in time to save Acre, but the return home of Philip Augustus, and the quarrel of Richard with the Duke of Austria, made the barren victories against the Saracens of little avail in effecting the deliverance of the Holy City. At last in 1192 Richard was glad to conclude a three years' truce with Saladin, which saved the remnants of the Frankish kingdom, and gave pilgrims free access to Jerusalem. On his way home he was imprisoned by his old enemy the Duke of Austria, and handed over to the Emperor Henry VI., who as the representative of the Hohenstaufen, was glad to get hold of the uncle and protector of Otto the Guelf.

Meanwhile the soundness of the administrative system which Henry II. had established was being thoroughly tested in England. Despite the incompleteness of Richard's arrangements, despite the intrigues of Earl

John, England remained in a prosperous condition during the whole of the period. Four successive justiciars ruled the land as practically independent sovereigns, burdened only by the heavy tribute which the absent king exacted. The first, William Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, was unpopular as a foreigner, and Earl John profited by this to excite the baronage against him. In 1191 the Archbishop of Rouen, Walter of Coutances, arrived with a commission from Richard to supersede him. His government, which lasted till 1193, was disturbed by the unsuccessful rebellion of John, in connection with an attack of Philip on Normandy, and by the exertions necessary to raise the enormous ransom of £100,000, which the Emperor required for the release of Richard. At the end of 1193 he was succeeded by Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, whose administration continued until 1198. The latter at once succeeded in suppressing John's revolt. When Richard paid his second and last visit to his kingdom in the spring of 1194 the land was in profound peace. At a great council at Nottingham the accomplices of John were punished, the sheriffs removed, and money raised by all possible means. A second coronation at Winchester was a solemn declaration that, whatever humiliation Richard had been subjected to in his captivity, his royal dignity remained unimpaired. As soon as he had got all he could Richard hurried to France, where he spent the rest of his life in a constant petty warfare against Philip of France, until he met his death in 1199, while besieging the obscure castle of Chalus. Meanwhile Hubert Walter administered England with success. The judicial iter of 1194, and the first germs of the offices of coroner and conservator of the peace, showed that he not only maintained, but also developed, the system of Henry II. In 1198 the refusal of a royal demand for money by the great council led to his resignation. His successor, Geoffrey FitzPeter, had not long entered upon his office when the king died.

Richard I. is the most un-English of our kings. He knew and influenced England, where he hardly ever lived, either before or after his accession, less than any other prince. Yet, besides his fame as a knight-errant, he had no inconsiderable talent for rough and ready statesmanship. But he was a bad king, careless, extravagant, and neglectful of all his duties. The main interest of his reign in English history is its story of quiet administrative routine and constitutional development.

Bishop Stubbs' Editions of Hoveden, and of the Chronicles and Memorials of Richard II., in the Rolls Series, are, with his Const. Hist., the most important works bearing on Richard's reign. See also Pauli, Geschichte von England; Lytton, Henry II.; and Michaud, Histoire des Croisades.

Richard II. (b. Feb. 1366; r. June 22, 1377—Sept. 30, 1399), was the son of Edward the Black Prince and Joan of Kent. Soon after his father's death he was created Prince of Wales, and recognised as heir to the throne. During the early years of his reign he was in tutelage, but the boldness and presence of mind which he showed during the peasant revolt seemed to augur a successful and prosperous career. He appears to have been suspicious of the designs of his uncle, Gloucester, and to have determined to surround himself with ministers of his own choosing, and it must be admitted that they were selected with judgment, and (with perhaps the exception of De Vere) they hardly deserve to be stigmatised as favourites. But they were not successful administrators, and the heavy taxes which were imposed afforded an opportunity to Gloucester and his associates to denounce them. In 1386, Richard's minister, Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, was impeached by the Commons, and the king was compelled to agree to the appointment of a Commission of Regency, consisting of the Dukes of Gloucester and York, and eight other lords and prelates. In the following August (1387), Richard procured from the judges a declaration that the Commission was illegal. But Gloucester entered London with a large force; and the king, unable to resist, was obliged to give way and to allow his chief advisers to be appealed of treason (Dec., 1387). The Parliament of 1388, the "Merciless Parliament," condemned Vere, Suffolk, and six others to death; and though the two chief personages escaped, the sentence was carried out in four cases. The power of Gloucester lasted till 1389, when Richard suddenly declared that he was old enough to manage his own affairs, and dismissed the Council of Regency. But he did not resort to his former methods of government; on the contrary, he was reconciled to Gloucester and his associates, and was content to admit them to a share in the government. For some years nothing happened to disturb the harmony between the king and the nobles, and the first symptoms of a revival of troubles was in 1395, when Richard proposed to marry Isabella of France and form a firm alliance with that country. This was strongly opposed by Gloucester, who was suspected by the king of treasonable designs, was arrested, and sent to Calais to await his trial, but died before it came on, murdered, it was generally believed, by the king's orders. It would seem that Richard was panic-stricken at the thought of a plot against his life, and determined to resort to the most arbitrary measures to secure his position. At any rate a complete change came over his conduct. The pardons granted to the barons in 1388 were annulled; two of the most prominent were appealed of treason. Arundel was executed, and his brother, the archbishop, banished. The proceedings of the Merciless Parliament were rescinded, and the power of Parliament delegated to a small committee. Thus Richard seemed to have established his absolute power, but still there were rumours of conspiracies. The Duke of Hereford (Henry of Bolingbroke, son of John of Gaunt), and Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, accused each other of treason, and were sentenced to banishment, the latter for life, the former for six years. Richard now resorted to various illegal methods of raising money, and he had already alienated the people from him, as well as the leading nobles, when, in 1399, he committed two acts of reckless folly which were the immediate cause of his downfall. He had promised Hereford that if during his exile his father were to die, the Lancastrian estates should be secured to him. Nevertheless, on Gaunt's death, he seized the whole of his domains into his own hands. This gave an excuse to Hereford (or Lancaster, as he had now become) to return to England to claim his patrimony; and the circumstances were most auspicious for him, for Richard had gone upon an expedition to Ireland, leaving the Duke of York as regent in England. Henry of Lancaster landed in England, declared that he came simply to obtain his lawful inheritance, was joined by many of the great nobles, and not opposed by the Duke of York; so that when Richard returned from Ireland he found the kingdom was lost. Discovering his true position, Richard offered to resign the crown. The abdication was accepted by Parliament, which drew up articles of accusation against him, enumerating all the illegal and despotic acts he had been guilty of. Henry challenged the vacant throne and was accepted as king. After this, Richard disappears from history, and nothing is known for certain of the time, manner, or place of his death. According to one account, he was murdered at Pontefract by Sir Piers Exton, while other writers assert that he starved himself to death. The Revolution of 1399 was not a popular movement, but was brought about by a series of circumstances to a considerable extent unconnected with each other, but which all combined to produce one result—a change of dynasty. The Church was opposed to Richard on account of his supposed Lollard tendencies and his treatment of Archbishop Arundel; the nobles hated him because he had refused to govern according to their views, and had endeavoured to curb their independence. The people supported Henry as being the representative of Thomas of Lancaster, and having been unjustly defrauded by Richard; while many asserted that Richard was not the son of the Black Prince, but a supposititious child, and others maintained that Henry was the true heir to the throne as the representative of Edmund Crouchback, who it was said was in reality the elder brother of Edward I. The extravagance and foreign manners of the court were extremely distasteful, and the war party strongly resented the French marriage. Among the charges alleged against Richard by Parliament the most important are these:—The tampering with the judges in 1387; the revocation of the pardons of the Appellants; the murder of Gloucester; the ill-treatment of Lancaster and Arundel; illegal taxation; alienation of crown lands; excessive power of the household courts; and rash words asserting his own absolute authority. The truth probably is that Richard attempted to do what Edward IV. and Henry VII. were able to effect later on—to crush the power of the nobles, rule by means of ministers, avoid expensive foreign wars, and keep the Church in submission. Like them, he worked by means of Parliament, and thus obtained a legal sanction to his most unconstitutional acts. The chief reasons why they succeeded where he failed were, that by the time of Edward IV. the strength of the baronage had been utterly broken by the Wars of the Roses, the Church had lost its power, and the nation was anxious for peace under a strong government. In Richard's own character there was much that is attractive. He is to be compared, says Dr. Stubbs, rather to Edward III., "the chivalrous magnanimous king who left him heir to difficulties which he could not overcome," than to the feeble and worthless Edward II. If his theory of kingship was too lofty for the age, it was at least an intelligible one, and he seems to have kept before him with steadiness and purpose the idea of a despotic but reforming monarchy. Though his fate was immediately caused by his own deeds, the misfortunes of his career were in great part due to the events and policy of his grandfather's reign. "In personal appearance," says Mr. Gairdner, "he was handsome. There was a delicate beauty in his features which corresponded with a mode of life too luxurious for the age. He was a lover both of art and literature; the patron of Froissart, Gower, and Chaucer, and the builder of Westminster Hall. But he was thought too fond of show and magnificence, and some of his contemporaries accused him of too great love of pleasure. Yet of positive immorality we have no real evidence, and his devotion and tenderness to both his queens (child as the second was) is a considerable presumption to the contrary." Richard was twice married, first in 1382 to Anne of Bohemia, daughter of the Emperor Charles IV., and secondly in 1396 to Isabella, daughter of Charles VI. of France. He left no issue.

Richard III., KING (b. October 21, 1450, s. July 6, 1483, d. August 22, 1485), was the son of Richard, Duke of York, who was killed at Wakefield, and brother to Edward IV., and George, Duke of Clarence. Born at Fotheringay in 1450 he was early inducted into state affairs. In 1461 he was recalled from Flanders, where he had been sent for safety, and created Duke of Gloucester and Lord High Admiral. He held faithfully to his brother during his reign, and showed himself a wise councillor to him, a good soldier, and a vigorous administrator in the capacity of Warden of the Scottish Marches and other posts. In 1470, on the outbreak of Warwick's insurrection, Richard left the kingdom with Edward, and returned with him to take part in the battle of Barnet (April, 1471). Immediately afterwards he engaged in the campaign of the West, and contributed to the victory of Tewkesbury. In 1472 he married Anne Neville, the widow of Prince Edward, and in consequence became involved in a violent quarrel with his brother Clarence about the inheritance of the Earl of Warwick. The rivalry between the two brothers was keen, but it is not certain how far Richard was responsible for Clarence's downfall, or for his murder, if he was murdered. During the remainder of Edward's reign Gloucester was much occupied with Scottish affairs, and the management of the Border. In April, 1483, he left the North, and on the 30th of the month got possession of the young king, Edward V., as he was being taken to London. In May Richard was appointed Protector, and immediately entered upon the functions of government. A violent quarrel broke out between Richard and the queen's party in the council, which was headed by Lord Hastings. In June Richard, at a sitting of the council, charged the queen and her friends with a plot against his life. Hastings was seized and beheaded without trial on the spot. Lords Grey and Rivers, the queen's relations, were beheaded, and the young prince Richard of York was surrendered to the custody of the Protector. On June 22 Dr. Shaw, in a sermon at Paul's Cross, asserted the claim of Richard to the crown, on the ground that Edward V. and his brother were illegitimate; and on June 24 Buckingham, joined by a crowd of the citizens of London, urged Richard to accept the crown. This Richard did on June 26, and on July 6 he was crowned. Richard now adopted a policy of conciliation, but there was considerable disaffection against him, especially in southern England. The young prince disappeared soon after, and though nothing certain has ever been discovered about their fate, it was believed, and it is extremely probable, that Richard had them put to death. The story increased the feeling against Richard, and meanwhile a rapprochement took place between the queen's party and the Lancastrians, headed by Henry of Richmond. Richard's chief supporter, Buckingham, joined the conspiracy. In October Buckingham headed a rising in the West of England which came to nothing. The duke was captured and put to death without trial. But the conspiracy was not crushed, and active preparations were made by the Lancastrians during the next year. Meanwhile Richard was becoming thoroughly unpopular in England. His finances were in disorder, and he was obliged to have recourse to the raising of money by benevolences, though he had himself passed a bill through Parliament the previous year to put an end to that system. In Aug., 1485, Richmond landed at Milford Haven. The Welsh were in his favour, for they looked upon him as a national leader; the old nobility were alienated from Richard, and the new nobles disliked him; his own chief followers, the Stanleys, were in correspondence with the enemy; and the people were indifferent or favourable to the invaders. Richard met them at Bosworth (Aug. 22, 1485). In the crisis of the battle Lord Stanley, with his troops, suddenly joined Richmond. The king was killed fighting desperately. Richard has been represented as a monster of iniquity by Sir Thomas More and other historians who wrote under the Tudors. Unscrupulous, cruel, and violent as Richard was, he was, however, probably no worse than contemporary princes and statesmen; no worse, certainly, than his brother or his successor. His capacity was undoubted, and he seems to have made an effort at the beginning of his reign to govern well. He attempted to restore order, to check the tyranny of the nobles, and to develop commerce. He, however, lacked the astuteness that enabled Henry VII. to accomplish in a great measure the work he had attempted. His private character was not without amiable traits, and had he lived in times of less difficulty, and held the throne by a more secure title, he might have obtained a more favourable verdict from posterity.

Richard, Archbishop of Canterbury (1174—1184), was Prior of Dover, and three years after the murder of Becket was chosen to fill the vacant see. He was essentially a moderate man, and his appointment was welcome to the king as well as the supporters of Becket's policy. His great work was the rebuilding of Canterbury Cathedral, which had been destroyed by fire previous to his enthronement. He was frequently employed by Henry II. on affairs of state: e.g., in 1176, we find him negotiating a marriage between the Princess Joan and King William of Sicily.

Richard, DUKE OF YORK (b. 1472, d. 1483), was the second son of Edward IV. In 1477 he was married to Anne, daughter and heiress of John Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk. Soon after Edward IV.'s death, his mother fled into sanctuary with him, but was subsequently induced to let him join his brother in the Tower, where he was murdered by his uncle's orders.

Richard Fitz-neal succeeded his father, Bishop Nigel of Ely (nephew of Roger of Salisbury), in the office of Treasurer (1169), and became Bishop of London in 1189. He was the author of the Dialogus de Scaccario, the main source of information for the administrative system of Henry II.

Richard of Cornwall (b. 1209, d. 1271) was the son of John by his second wife Isabella. In 1240 he led a crusade to the Holy Land, and succeeded in securing very favourable terms for the Christians by a treaty with the Sultan of Egypt. In 1252 he was offered, but declined, the crown of Sicily; in 1257 he was elected King of the Romans, but was never crowned emperor. During the long years of disputes between Henry III. and his barons, Richard tried to act the part of a mediator, but when war broke out he sided with his brother and commanded the left wing at the battle of Lewes, where he was taken prisoner, and he did not recover his liberty till after the battle of Evesham. He married first Isabel, daughter of William Marshall; secondly Sanchia, daughter of René of Provence; and thirdly Beatrice, niece of the Archbishop of Cologne. It is very difficult to obtain a true view of Richard's character, as, with scarcely an exception, all the contemporary writers are on the baronial side, and strongly prejudiced against him, but "he must have been on any showing," says Dr. Stubbs, "a man of much more enterprise and energy than his brother Henry."

Richborough (Rutupiæ), a Roman town and citadel guarding the eastern entrance to the Wantsum—an inlet of sea between Thanet and the mainland. Richborough was the chief port for commerce with Gaul, and the starting point for the great high road of Kent through Canterbury and Rochester to Dover. The fortress was the head-quarters of the legion protecting the Saxon shore, but after the withdrawal of the Romans it was but feebly defended, and it seems to have been captured by Hengest toward the end of his life.

Richmond, EDMUND TUDOR, EARL OF (d. 1456), was the eldest son of Owen Tudor by Catherine, widow of Henry V. He was created Earl of Richmond in 1452, and married Margaret Beaufort, daughter and heiress of John, Duke of Somerset, by whom he had one son, afterwards Henry VII.

Richmond, HENRY FITZROY, DUKE OF (b. 1517, d. 1536), was a natural son of Henry VIII. by Elizabeth Blount, wife of Sir Gilbert Tailbois. Before he was seven years of age he was made a Knight of the Garter, and created successively Earl of Nottingham and Duke of Richmond and Somerset. At the same time he was appointed Warden of the Marches towards Scotland, and placed in possession of many great estates. He was also subsequently raised to the dignity of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the actual duties of his position being performed for him by his deputy, Sir William Skeffington. He was married to Mary, daughter of the Duke of Norfolk, but died before the consummation of the marriage. Had he lived he would almost certainly have been nominated in Henry's will to follow Edward VI. in the succession to the crown.

Ridge Way, THE, one of the great Roman roads, was a branch of the Iknield Way, from which it separated at Streatley in Berkshire. It proceeded along the Berkshire and Wiltshire downs to Glastonbury, thence to Taunton, and through Devonshire to Stratton in Cornwall, thence keeping along the hills to Redruth and the Land's End. [ROMAN ROADS.]

Ridings, is the name applied to the three divisions of Yorkshire, and with the arrangement of the country appears to be of Scandinavian origin. The four things into which Iceland was partitioned were divided into thirds, thrithungar; and the fylker, or petty kingdoms of South Norway were similarly divided. As such a partition of the land is in England only found in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire (for Lindsey, one of the three "parts" of Lincolnshire was at the time of Domesday divided into ridings, though the name afterwards dropped out of use), it seems natural to attribute it to the Danish occupation. The loss of the th of thrithing may be due to misdivision of the compound words "north-thrithing," &c. At the time of the Conqueror the ridings of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire seem to have had their own moots, though these do not appear later; at present each riding in Yorkshire has its own lord-lieutenant, and is treated as a distinct county for poor-law purposes. By the Reform Bill of 1832 two members of Parliament each were given to the east and north ridings, while the west was arranged in two divisions, each with two members; by that of 1867 three divisions were made of the west riding with two members each.

Ridley, NICOLAS, Bishop of London (b. 1500, d. 1556), was educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he gained a fellowship. After studying theology for a couple of years at Paris and Louvain, he returned to Cambridge, and became proctor and public orator. His learning and energy commended him to the notice of Cranmer, whose chaplain he was appointed in 1537, and who speedily obtained for him the mastership of Pembroke, and a royal chaplaincy. In 1547 he became Bishop of Rochester, and took a considerable part in the preparation of Edward VI.'s first Prayer-book, and in carrying out the changes which accompanied it. Upon Bonner's deposition by the Privy Council, Ridley was translated to London (April, 1550). In the same year he is found vainly attempting to convince Joan Bocher of her errors, and assisting in the trial of Gardiner. As in Rochester Cathedral so in St. Paul's, he caused the altars to be destroyed; in St. Paul's he substituted a table for the high altar, and in 1557 placed it in the nave before the screen, setting it with its sides north and south. Like Cranmer and Latimer, he was disgusted by the violence of the council, and in a sermon before the king in 1552 spoke strongly of the distress caused by the seizure of the guild revenues. His fear lest Mary might restore the old worship led him to join in the attempt to secure the throne for Jane Grey, and on July 16, 1553, he preached at St. Paul's Cross that Mary and Elizabeth were bastards, and, therefore, without right to the throne. As soon, however, as Northumberland and the council had declared for Mary, he set out to meet the princess to obtain pardon, but he was taken prisoner at Ipswich, and sent to the Tower. Here he remained some eight months, Bonner meanwhile regaining his bishopric. In April, 1554, he was sent to Oxford, with Cranmer and Latimer, and committed to the charge of one of the aldermen. After being made to appear in a disputation, wherein he denied transubstantiation, and being in consequence excommunicated, he was remitted to custody, and nothing further was done till Sept., 1556, when he was tried for heresy before three bishops, commissioned by Pole as legate. On Oct. 16 he was executed, together with Latimer, in front of Balliol College. One of the most careful modern investigators of the period writes:—"Ridley has left few remains to vindicate the reputation for theological learning which has been demanded for him by modern biographers, but he was a learned man; in his way he was a moderate man, and certainly he was a man of great resolution. His decision of character supported the primate; the gravity of his manners commended him to all who knew him, and he rose into notice at a very opportune time for the credit of the Reformation. But his temper had a vehemence which sometimes betrayed him into rashness, and in his nature there was something of severity, and even of hardness" (Dixon).

Ridolfi Conspiracy, THE (1571), so-called from one of the chief agents, Robert Ridolfi, a Florentine banker residing in London, was a plot formed by the Catholic party in England for the deposition of Elizabeth, and the elevation of Mary Stuart to the throne by the help of Spain, and her marriage to the Duke of Norfolk. The chief conspirator was Leslie, Bishop of Ross, who was in communication with most of the Catholic nobles, whilst the Duke of Norfolk was involved in the scheme apparently against his will. During 1571 frequent negotiations were carried on between Mary Stuart, Philip II., the Duke of Alva, and the Pope. Ridolfi was sent to Madrid to request the aid of Philip, which was at once promised. On his way he had an interview with the Duke of Alva in Brussels, but the messenger conveying the news was arrested at Dover in possession of a packet of treasonable letters. For these letters, however, the Bishop of Ross contrived, by the connivance of Lord Cobham, the warden of the Cinque Ports, to substitute others of a comparatively innocent nature, and although the messenger confessed on the rack that he had received the letters from Ridolfi, and although the Bishop of Ross was arrested, and Mary severely cross-examined, nothing definite was discovered. Suspicion had, however, been aroused, and in Sept., 1571, the whole of the plot was discovered through the instrumentality of a merchant, who had been employed by Norfolk to convey money and letters to his secretaries. Several of the leading conspirators, including the Bishop of Ross, the Earls of Arundel and Southampton, and Lord Lumley, were at once arrested. The bishop made a full confession, and Norfolk, as the centre of the plot, was executed (June, 1572).

Rievaulx, AELRED OF. [AELRED.]

Rigby, RICHARD (b. 1722, d. 1788), was the son of a Bedford linen-draper, who had made a fortune as factor to the South Sea Company. He attached himself in early life to the Prince of Wales, but quarrelled with him before long. The Duke of Bedford became his patron, and on becoming Lord-Lieutenant in 1758, took him to Ireland, as his private secretary, and procured for him the sinecure office of Vice-Treasurer of Ireland with a salary of £3,500, to which he afterwards added the emoluments of the Mastership of the Rolls of that country. On returning from Ireland, the duke had procured the return of Rigby for Tavistock; and when the duke became president of the council in 1763, he procured for his faithful henchman the most lucrative of all offices—the paymastership of the forces. When county meetings were being held on all sides in 1769, to protest against the rejection of Wilkes by Parliament, "Rigby made a summer tour through the east of England, and, by the admission of his opponents, checkmated the party of action in at least three counties." After his patron's death, he succeeded in maintaining his position as "boat-swain of the Bloomsbury crew," according to one of the lampoons of the day; and still lived on his sinecure offices. He was, however, disturbed for a moment by being accused in 1778 of appropriating public money, as paymaster-general, though as Lord North's administration had strong reason for not inquiring too deeply into cases of peculation, the matter was allowed to drop. Again, in 1782, when he opposed with imprudent warmth a motion for reconciliation with America, Pitt rebuked him sharply, and told him that the nation was tired of paying him. He lived till 1788, drawing money alike from the revenues of Ireland and England, building up for himself a lasting reputation as the most notable placeman of the age.

Right, CLAIM OF. [CLAIM OF RIGHT.]

Right, PETITION OF, THE, was the manifesto drawn up by the House of Commons in 1628, in the form of a petition to the king, stating the principles of the Constitution which Charles had broken. The events leading up to the Petition of Right may be briefly summarised. Charles I. had dissolved his first two Parliaments before they had granted any supplies, and, as he was determined to retain his minister, Buckingham, and to carry out his policy of war with France and Spain, he was obliged to have recourse to a loan. Those persons who refused to subscribe were imprisoned, but five of them, of whom one was Sir Thomas Darnel, demanded their habeas corpus. The crown lawyers fell back upon the king's prerogative power to imprison without showing cause whenever he deemed it necessary, and this doctrine was accepted by the judges. When, therefore, a new Parliament met in 1628, it at once began to discuss the recent forced loan and the arbitrary imprisonments. Wentworth, at this time leader of the Commons, proposed that a short bill should be drawn up merely reciting and confirming Magna Carta, De Tallagio, &c., with the addition of a clause confirming Habeas Corpus; but the king objected so strongly even to this moderate proposal that it was resolved, upon the motion of Coke, that a Petition of Right should be drawn up. Not only would such a petition receive an immediate answer, instead of being sent up at the end of the session and almost certainly rejected by the king when he had gained supplies, but it would contain a definite statement that the king had broken the law. As finally drawn up, the petition demanded "that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by Act of Parliament"; that no one should be imprisoned without cause shown, and that if imprisoned they should be entitled to their habeas corpus; that soldiers and sailors should not be billeted upon private persons without their consent; and that martial law should be abolished. Of these clauses the first two were far the most important, and it is clear that, however Charles may have abused his power, his predecessors had without remonstrance exercised the right of imprisonment without showing cause. The Lords accepted the measure, after in vain searching for a formula which should allow the king to imprison in cases of real emergency. Meanwhile Denbigh had been unsuccessful at Rochelle, and the king needed supplies. He demanded from the judges "whether, if the king grant the Commons' petition, he did not thereby exclude himself from committing a subject for any time or cause whatsoever without showing a cause." They answered that every Act had its exposition, which can only be by the courts of law as each case occurs, "and, although the petition be granted, there is no fear of conclusion as is intimated in the question." Thereupon the king went to the House, and instead of the usual form of assent, read a meaningless declaration that the statutes should be duly executed. The Commons were bitterly annoyed, and proceeded to attack Buckingham. Charles at last yielded, and gave his assent in the accustomed formula (June 7, 1628). In the next session the Commons renewed the struggle on the ground of Tunnage and Poundage, which had been levied, although no Act had as yet granted it to Charles. Its levy was, they declared, in violation of the Petition of Right. But the words of the petition, interpreted by the usage of the day, certainly did not carry that meaning; and neither the Commons nor the king had the matter in mind when the petition was being discussed. The question became involved with that of religion, and the struggle on these two points led to the dissolution of 1689.

[W. J. A.]

Rights, THE BILL OF. A committee appointed by the Commons in the Convention of 1689 to consider what measures should be taken to protect liberty against future sovereigns, recommended that the main constitutional principles violated by James II. should be solemnly declared to be the ancient rights of the nation, and also that several new laws should be enacted. It was easy to carry out the former proposal; the latter would be a work of considerable difficulty, and might occupy years. After much discussion, therefore, it was resolved to fill the throne at once, but to insert in the instrument which conferred the crown on William and Mary a declaration of the fundamental principles of the constitution; all questions of further reform were postponed till a more suitable opportunity. Accordingly a committee, presided over by Somers, was appointed to draw up a Declaration of Rights, which, when framed, was accepted by the Lords with some unimportant amendments. On Feb. 13, 1689, this declaration was read before William and Mary, and the crown tendered to them; William, in accepting it, assured the two Houses that his conduct should be governed by those laws which he had himself vindicated. In the December of the same year, the Convention having meanwhile been declared by statute to be a Parliament, the Declaration of Rights was confirmed in the form of a Bill, with certain additions. The Bill of Rights, as finally adopted, was arranged as follows:—

Its first section recited the Declaration of Rights. It began by stating the various acts by which James did "endeavour to subvert and extirpate the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of this kingdom," and then, almost in the same words, proceeded to declare: That the pretended power of suspending of laws and the execution of laws, by regal authority without consent of Parliament, is illegal; That the pretended power of dispensing with laws by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal; That the commission for creating the late court of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and all other commissions and courts of the like nature, are illegal and pernicious; That levying of money for or to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative without grant of Parliament, for longer time or in any other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal; That it is the right of the subjects to petition the king, and that all commitments or prosecutions for such petitions are illegal; That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of Parliament, is against law; That the subjects which are Protestants may have arms for their defence suitable to their condition, and as allowed by law; That election of members of Parliament ought to be free; That the freedom of speech and debates, or proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament; That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted; That juries ought to be duly impanelled and returned, and that jurors which pass upon men in trials for high treason ought to be freeholders; That all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons, before conviction, are illegal and void; And that for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws, Parliament ought to be held frequently.

The second section declared the resolution of Lords and Commons, that William and Mary should become king and queen, to be succeeded by their lawful issue if there were any such; in default of that by the issue of the Princess Anne, &c. The third contained the new oaths of allegiance and supremacy. The fourth recorded the acceptance of the crown by the prince and princess; who (v.) were pleased that the Lords and Commons should continue to sit and make provision for the settlement of the religion, laws, and liberties of the country. Parliament, therefore, now again (vi.) declares the above to be the indubitable rights of the English people; recognises (vii.) that James having abdicated, William and Mary have become their sovereign lord and lady, and fixes (viii.) the succession as above. The ninth section contains an important addition: as it has been found by experience inconsistent with the safety and welfare of this Protestant kingdom to be governed by a popish prince, or by any king or queen marrying a papist, it is enacted that all persons who shall hold communion with the Church of Rome, or shall marry a papist, shall be excluded from the throne, and the crown shall descend to the next heir. Every king or queen therefore (x.), on the first day of their first Parliament, shall subscribe and audibly repeat the declaration mentioned in the statute 30 Charles II., i.e., the Test Act (a declaration against transubstantiation, adoration of the Virgin, and the sacrifice of the mass). Finally in the twelfth section it is declared that no dispensation by non obstante of or to any statute shall be allowed, except such dispensation be allowed in the statute, or shall be specially provided for by one or more bills to be passed during the present session of Parliament. The Lords had already softened the article of the Declaration of Rights against the dispensing power by the insertion of the words "as it hath been exercised of late," and now this last section was added to provide for cases where it might be desirable that the dispensing power should be used. Though, however, in the next Parliament, the judges were ordered by the House of Lords to draft a bill for this purpose, the matter dropped. [REVOLUTION].

Rinuccini, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, Archbishop of Fermo, was sent to Ireland in 1644 as the pope's nuncio, with a supply of arms and money, narrowly escaping capture on the way from a Parliamentary frigate. In 1645 he opposed Glamorgan's treaty and also the Dublin treaty of 1646. In 1648 he opposed Lord Inchiquin's armistice, and after an unsuccessful tenure of office as the president of the Kilkenny Council, fled to Owen Roe O'Neil, and then to Galway. He was recalled by the pope in 1649.

Riot Act, THE (1715), was passed at a time when there were apprehensions of Jacobite rising. If twelve persons continued together for one hour after a proclamation bidding them disperse has been made to them by the magistrate, they were guilty of felony. The magistrate was required to apprehend persons refusing to disperse, and those who acted at his orders were indemnified for any injury which they might commit. This practically meant that an hour after the proclamation the military might be ordered to fire on the mob, or charge them. The question afterwards arose as to the legality of military interference without the order of a magistrate. It was decided by Lord Mansfield in a case arising out of the Gordon Riots in 1780, that it is the duty of every subject to resist persons engaged in treasonable or riotous conduct, and that this duty is not less imperative upon soldiers than upon civilians. This decision was confirmed in 1831 in a case arising from the Bristol Riots.

Ripon, FREDERICK JOHN ROBINSON, EARL OF (b. 1782, d. 1859), was the second son of Lord Grantham. Entering Parliament as member for Ripon in 1807, he received office under Perceval as Under Secretary for the Colonies, and became in 1818 President of the Board of Trade. Created Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1823, he assisted Huskisson in his free trade measures, was made Secretary for the Colonies and Viscount Goderich in 1827, and was for a few months Prime Minister after Canning's death. But he was unable to arrange a satisfactory ministry, and resigned. From 1830 to 1833 he was again Colonial Secretary, becoming in the latter year Lord Privy Seal and Earl of Ripon. Though he afterwards became President of the Board of Trade under Peel, he had long ceased to be of any political importance.

Ripon, THE TREATY OF (1640), concluded the second Scotch war. After the successful invasion of the northern counties, the Council of Peers, assembled at York by Charles I., resolved, on the motion of Lord Bristol, to appoint sixteen commissioners to treat with the Scots (Sept. 24). The first meeting of the sixteen English and eight Scottish commissioners took place at Ripon on Oct. 2: the last on Oct. 26. A cessation of arms was agreed upon, the two northern counties remaining in the possession of the Scots, who were to receive from the contributions of the inhabitants £850 a day for their maintenance. Further negotiations were removed to London, where peace was finally concluded in Aug., 1641.

Rishanger, WILLIAM (d. 1250), was a monk of St. Albans, who continued the Chronicle of Matthew Paris from 1272 to 1306, the intermediate portion, from 1253 to 1272, being the work of an unknown author. He also wrote an account of the Barons' War, and a Life of Edward I. Though inferior to Matthew Paris, Rishanger takes high place among mediæval chroniclers, but his strong feeling in favour of Simon de Montfort prevents his being altogether an impartial authority.

His Chronicle has been published in the Rolls Series, and his Wars of the Barons by the Camden Society. For the vexed question of the authorship of the St. Alban's Chronicles from 1233 to 1272, see Sir T. Hardy, Descriptive Catalogue, on the one side, and Mr. Gairdner, Early Chroniclers, on the other.

Rivers, ANTHONY WOODVILLE, EARL (d. 1483), was the son of the first Earl Rivers, and brother-in-law of Edward IV. He married the daughter and heiress of Lord Scake, and in 1462 was summoned to Parliament as Baron Scake. He took part in the siege of Alnwick, and in 1470 accompanied Edward in his flight to the Netherlands, returning with him in the next year. In 1469, by the death of his father, he became Earl Rivers. He received many honours from Edward, and, among other offices, held that of Captain-General of the Forces. On the death of Edward IV., he was appointed one of the Council of Regency during the minority of his son, but the jealousy of the old nobility favoured Gloucester's designs, and Rivers was seized by Gloucester's orders at Northampton, and carried to Pontefract, where, after a short imprisonment, he was beheaded.

Rivers, RICHARD WOODVILLE, EARL (d. 1469), was one of Henry V.'s esquires, and was made by him seneschal, and in 1424 Governor of the Tower of London. He fought in the French wars in Henry VI.'s reign, and married Jaquetta of Luxemburg, widow of the Duke of Bedford. For this clandestine marriage he was fined a thousand pounds, but was soon afterwards restored to favour, and in 1448 made Baron Rivers. In the Wars of the Roses he fought on the Lancastrian side, but in 1464 his daughter Elizabeth, who was the widow of Sir John Grey, was secretly married to the young king, Edward IV. By his son-in-law Rivers was raised to high honours, made Constable of England, and in 1466 created Earl Rivers, and his sons received equal advantages from their connection with the sovereign. The Woodvilles were hated by the old nobility on account of their rapid rise, while the people complained of their avarice. In 1469 a rebellion broke out, headed by Sir William Conyers, the insurgents complaining of the influence of the queen's friends. Having defeated the Royal troops at Edgecote, the rebels seized Earl Rivers and his son, and put them to death at Coventry.

Rizzio, DAVID, a native of Turin, became musician to Mary, Queen of Scots, and soon afterwards her private secretary. The queen's favour quickly rendered its recipient odious to the Scotch nobles, who banded themselves together against him, and were aided by Darnley, who had become jealous of the Italian. On March 9, 1566, Holyrood Palace, where Rizzio was at the time, was surrounded by an armed force under Lord Morton. Others of the conspirators, chief of whom was Lord Ruthven, entered the queen's apartment at the instigation of Darnley, and dragged her favourite from her presence. He was despatched in Darnley's room, and with Darnley's sword, though not by his hand. It is extremely improbable that Rizzio was, as Darnley coarsely insinuated, the queen's paramour, or that he was any more than a confidential friend and faithful servant. His worst faults, in the eyes of the conspirators, were his arrogance and his religion.

Robert I., KING OF SCOTLAND. [BRUCE.]

Robert II., KING OF SCOTLAND (s. 1371, d. 1390), the first of the Stuart dynasty, was the son of Walter, Lord High Steward of Scotland, and Marjory, daughter of Robert Bruce. On the death of David II. without children, Robert, then 55 years old, succeeded to the throne unopposed. In early life, as Steward of Scotland, he had done good service against the English; had been present at the battle of Halidon Hill, and had long acted as regent of Scotland. He married first Elizabeth Mure of Rowallan and secondly Euphemia Ross. In 1375 an Act of Parliament settled the crown on the king's sons by his first wife, a measure rendered necessary by the fact that these children were by ecclesiastical law illegitimate. England at this time was not in a position to be aggressive, and, although the usual border raids continued, Robert's reign was on the whole a peaceful one. A close alliance with France at the beginning of the reign, however, led in 1385 to a French army being sent to Scotland with the view of attacking England from the north. The usual course of border devastation followed; but the French, dissatisfied with their reception by the Scotch, soon returned home. In 1388 an invasion of England was planned, resulting in the defeat of the English under the Percies at Otterburn. In 1390 Robert died, "leaving the character of a peaceful ruler over a quarrelsome people."

Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

Robert III., KING OF SCOTLAND (s. 1390, d. 1406). He was a man of weak and indolent character, ill fitted to cope with the turbulent spirits of the age. The early years of his reign were disturbed by quarrels amongst the Highland clans and by lawlessness in the Lowlands to such an extent that in 1398 the Scotch Parliament appointed the Duke of Rothesay, his eldest son, lieutenant of the kingdom. In 1400, Henry IV. of England invaded Scotland with the intention of exacting homage from Robert; he failed, however, to take Edinburgh Castle, and retreated without effecting anything. An invasion of England by the Scots was repelled by the Percies at Homildon Hill (1402). On the capture of his son, Prince James, by the English, Robert died, it is said, of a broken heart.

Robert (b. 1056, d. 1135), DUKE OF NORMANDY, called Curthose on account of his short stature, was the eldest son of William the Conqueror. In 1073 he was made Count of Maine, which was to be held as a fief of Anjou. In 1077 he rebelled against his father and demanded the Duchy of Normandy. War ensued between father and son; after the Battle of Gerberoi in 1080, peace was made, and the succession to Normandy secured to Robert. On the death of his father he claimed the English throne, but William Rufus's prompt action disconcerted him, and he was obliged to make a treaty by which the survivor was to succeed to the other's dominions if either died without heirs. In 1094 Robert again made war with William, but shortly afterwards, being eager to join the first Crusade, he pledged Normandy to his brother for the sum of £6,000. In the Holy Land Robert fought with great bravery, and was offered but refused the crown of Jerusalem. Soon after his return he learnt that William was dead, and determined to enforce his claims to the throne. He invaded England in 1101, but was induced by Henry to make a compromise whereby he resigned the crown of England and contented himself with the full possession of Normandy and 3,000 marks a year. Quarrels soon broke out again between the brothers, Henry complaining that the rebellious English nobles found a shelter in Normandy. A war ensued in which Henry won the battle of Tenchebrai in 1106 and took Robert prisoner. He was sent to the castle of Cardiff, where he was kept in captivity till his death in 1136. By his marriage with Sibyl, daughter of the Count of Conversane, Robert had two children, William Clito and Henry.

Robert of Avesbury, of whose personal history nothing is known except that he describes himself as keeper of the register of the court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, wrote a Historia de Mirabilibus Gestis Eduardi III., which, after briefly mentioning the deposition of Edward II., gives the history of his son down to the battle of Poitiers. This work is one of the main authorities for the period it covers, and is particularly valuable for the many original documents which it contains. The Historia serves as a useful corrective to Froissart.

Robert of Jumièges, Archbishop of Canterbury (1051—1062), was a Norman who, after having been Prior of St. Ouen's at Rouen, became Abbot of Jumièges in 1037. Edward the Confessor formed a close friendship with him during his stay in Normandy, and two years after his return (1044) conferred upon him the bishopric of London—the first occupation of an English see by a foreigner since the Conversion. He at once became the leader of the French party at Edward's court, and the great enemy of Godwin and his family. In 1050, upon the death of Archbishop Eadsige, the monks of Christ Church elected in his place Aelfric, a member of their own house and a kinsman of Godwin. But the king refused to acquiesce in their choice, and in the mid-Lent meeting of the Witan nominated Robert of London, to the indignation of all England. The new archbishop visited Rome to obtain his pallium, and was enthroned July 17. Henceforth his one object was to bring about the fall of Godwin, whose opposition to the French party had been embittered by this frustration of his kinsman's hopes as well as by Robert's refusal to consecrate the Englishman Spearhafoc to the see which he himself had left vacant. The archbishop claimed for the Church certain lands held by the earl, and even renewed the old accusation against him of complicity in the murder of Edward's brother, Alfred. The attack of the men of Dover upon the escort of Eustace of Boulogne and Godwin's refusal to punish them gave Robert his opportunity. By his advice Godwin was summoned before the Witan to answer charges old and new. With Godwin's outlawry the archbishop's triumph seemed complete (September, 1051). Spearhafoc was deposed, and a Norman became Bishop of London; and, what was still more important, William of Normandy was invited to England.

But in September, 1052, Godwin returned, and the nation declared in his favour. Robert dared not remain in England, and with Ulf, Bishop of Rochester, took to flight, cutting his way through London, and riding to what is now Walton-on-the-Naze, where they found a vessel which took them to Normandy. He was immediately outlawed by the Witan and deprived of his bishopric, "for that he had done most to cause the strife between Earl Godwin and the king," as the chronicler says; the uncanonical method of his deposition gave William of Normandy afterwards one of his pretexts for invasion. Meanwhile Robert had retired to his monastery of Jumièges, where he continued the building operations which he had commenced before he went to England; and here he died in 1058.

Robin Hood, the hero of a cycle of popular ballads, according to tradition an outlaw commanding a band of freebooters in Sherwood forest in the reign of Richard I. Stow, writing in 1590, and doubtless giving the popular story, tells us that "he suffered no woman to be oppressed . . . poor men's goods he spared, abundantly relieving them with that which by theft he got from the abbeyes, and the houses of rich old carles." It is, however, doubtful at what time he lived, or, indeed, whether he existed at all. No contemporary historian mentions him: he is first alluded to in Piers the Ploughman, and the earliest chronicle which speaks of him is the Scotichronicon (of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries). An inscription is said to have been found on a tomb at Kirklees in Yorkshire in which he is called Earl of Huntingdon, and the date of his death is given as 1247; but this is apocryphal. Thierry thought he was chief of a Saxon band warring against the Norman oppressor; Grim, that he was purely mythical. It has been attempted to identify him with a "Robyn Hod" who served as "porteur" to Edward II. in 1223, but the evidence is very weak. The earliest ballads concerning him date from Edward III.; Wynkin de Worde published the Lytel Geste of Robin Hood in 1495.

Modern editions of the Ballads are by Ritson, 1795, and Gutch, 1847.

Robin of Redesdale. In 1469 an insurrection took place in Yorkshire, caused by a dispute about tithes due to the hospital of St. Leonard at York, which was led by Robert Hilyard, called Robin of Redesdale. This rebellion was suppressed by Lord Montague. Taking advantage of the discontent existing among the commons of the north, Sir William Conyers, adopting the popular name of Robin of Redesdale, succeeded in raising a force, estimated at 60,000 men, in the summer of 1469. They published a manifesto charging the king with misgovernment, and demanding reform. This revolt was probably instigated by Warwick; it was certainly approved, supported, and made use of by Clarence and the Nevilles. The king's forces were defeated at Edgecote, near Banbury, the king's adherents, such as William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, Humphry Stafford, Lord Rivers, and others seized and beheaded, and the king himself became the prisoner of the Archbishop of York, and was obliged to make terms with the rebels, and issue a general pardon.

Robinson, JOHN, Bishop of Bristol, and afterwards of London (b. 1650, d. 1723), went in 1685 as chaplain to the English embassy in Sweden, where he stayed more than a quarter of a century, and filled the posts, during the absence of the ambassador, first of resident and afterwards of envoy extraordinary, coming back to England in 1708 with the reputation of being a skilful diplomatist acquainted with all the details of northern politics. Anne rewarded his political services and good churchmanship with the deanery of Windsor and the bishopric of Bristol. Upon the accession to office of the Tory ministry (1711), and the sudden deaths of the Duke of Newcastle and the Earl of Jersey, to whom the Privy Seal had been offered, the vacant place was conferred on Robinson, the last churchman to hold political office. Next year he was appointed English plenipotentiary, together with the Earl of Strafford, at the Congress of Utrecht, and signed the treaty on March 31, 1713, without waiting for the acquiescence of the emperor. On the death of Compton, 1714, Robinson was translated to the see of London.

Robinson, SIR THOMAS, a politician of little ability, who having been minister at Vienna for twenty years, and being acceptable to George II. on account of his sympathy with the king's German policy, was chosen by the Duke of Newcastle, on the death of his brother Henry Pelham, to act as leader of the House of Commons with the office of Secretary of State. "The Duke," said Pitt to Fox, "might as well send his jack boot to lead us." These two, though both in office at the time, united to attack him, and covered him with ridicule, until Fox was won over by a seat in the cabinet, and came to his assistance. In 1755 Robinson retired to his former office of Master of the Wardrobe with a pension of £2,000 on the Irish establishment. In 1761 he was raised to the peerage as Lord Grantham.

Rob Roy, MACGREGOR CAMPBELL (b. 1665, d. 1735), was at first a grazier, but entering upon large speculations in cattle breeding had ill-luck, and finally absconded with money borrowed from the Duke of Montrose, who thereupon seized his small estate. Rob Roy gained the patronage of the Duke of Argyle, and proceeded to wage a predatory warfare against Montrose, and also against all favourers of the union with England. He took part in the rising of 1715 and was attainted, but continued his career of freebooting, and evaded all attempts to capture him. The last few years of his life seem to have been more peaceful, and Rob died in 1736.

Robsart, AMY or ANNE, the daughter of Sir John Robsart, married in 1549 Lord Robert Dudley, afterwards Earl of Leicester, by whom she is said to have been murdered at Cumnor near Oxford in 1560. The charge against her husband cannot be proved, and it is probable that, though Lady Dudley was murdered, the crime was committed by some of the earl's friends, who thought to derive benefit from his marriage with Queen Elizabeth, which, it was believed, would at once take place were he free.

Rochelle, EXPEDITIONS TO. In 1625 Rochelle, the chief stronghold of the Huguenots in the south of France, had rebelled against Louis XIII., but had made terms in the beginning of 1626. James I., who understood that Richelieu represented not the principle of religious intolerance, but that of national union, had promised to lend a certain number of English ships to assist in the attack. But on the accession of Charles an attempt was made to escape from this promise, and though the English government were outwitted, and the ships were actually used against the town, the French king was annoyed by Charles's action. The dismissal of Henrietta Maria's attendants, and the attitude of protector of the Protestants assumed by Charles in his proposals of mediation, led to a declaration of war between England and France. In 1627 Buckingham commanded an expedition to Rhé, where he landed in July. It was not, however, till the end of August that the Rochellese yielded to the advice of Buckingham and of the great Huguenot nobles, and openly revolted. In October the English were forced to retreat from Rhé. In May of the next year another English fleet was sent, under Denbigh, to attempt the relief of the town, which was now blockaded by land and sea. But the English ships were unable to break through the barrier of palisades and vessels, and returned in May. In spite of the death of Buckingham another attempt was made in September. But there was no enthusiasm in the fleet, and the commander Lindsey could do nothing. Charles declared he would renew his efforts, but the Rochellese were now starving, and capitulated in October 18.

Roches, PETER DES (d. 1258), Bishop of Winchester, was a Poitevin friend of John, appointed Justiciar of England on the death of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, in 1213. It was he who anointed and crowned Henry III. at Gloucester three years later, and who was associated with the Earl of Pembroke and Gualo the Legate as chief councillors to the young king. On the death of the above-mentioned earl (1219) Peter des Roches seems to have become guardian of the royal person and president of the council; but he soon showed that his policy was at variance with that of his predecessor, as he steadily set himself to support the foreign influence which Langton and the Justiciar had opposed so vigorously. He was soon looked upon as the head of the party of the strangers, and persuaded its members to resist the resumption of the royal desmesne that Hubert de Burgh was striving to accomplish. But in this he was unsuccessful, and was soon forced to go abroad, on pretence of joining a crusade (1221). Three years later his power was still further reduced in the fall of Falkes de Breauté, but only for a time. The young king, however, seems to have continued under the tutelage of Peter des Roches till 1227, when he announced his intention of ruling himself, and his late governor departed on another crusade, from which he did not return till 1231. But on the Bishop of Winchester's return, all his old influence revived; the king, at his instigation, dismissed his old ministers on the plea of peculation, and Hubert de Burgh suffered imprisonment and forfeiture. The new councillor, however, was soon overthrown; the barons, headed by the Earl Marshal, refused to meet him, and the bishops threatened him with excommunication. On the death of this nobleman, Edmund Rich, Archbishop of Canterbury, declared himself ready to excommunicate even the king; and then Henry at last gave way. Peter des Roches was confined to his spiritual duties, and his friends fell with him (1234).

Rochester early gained importance, during the Roman occupation, as commanding the point where the main high road of South-Eastern England, that from Richborough to London, passed the Medway. So strongly was it fortified that the Jutes seem not to have ventured upon attacking it until they had conquered the rest of Kent. It is possible that Rochester was the capital of a West Kentish kingdom dependent upon the King of East Kent, a relation reflected in the dependence of the Bishop of Rochester on the see of Canterbury. The dedication of the church of Rochester to St. Andrew may possibly be due to the fact that it was from the monastery of St. Andrew at Rome that Augustine came. The town walls were strong enough to resist Ethelred, when in 986 he attempted to punish the inhabitants for sedition; and also withstood an attack of the Danes. The cathedral was rebuilt by Bishop Gundulf, in the reign of Rufus, and, in spite of later additions, remains one of the smallest of English cathedral churches. Within the town walls, upon a cliff overlooking the Medway, had very early risen a fortress of earthwork and timber, and here Gundulf built for Rufus a castle of stone. It was probably the earlier fortress which was occupied by Odo of Bayeux, when in 1088 he declared for Robert of Normandy against Rufus. The tower, which was built by Archbishop Walter of Corbeuil in the reign of Henry I., is one of the finest examples of Norman military architecture, and was in vain besieged in 1215 by John, and in 1264 by De Montfort. It was, however, taken by the peasantry in the revolt of 1381.

Rochester, LAWRENCE HYDE, EARL OF, the second son of the great Earl of Clarendon, became First Lord of the Treasury in Nov., 1679. He energetically defended the Duke of York during the struggle over the Exclusion Bill, and was rewarded by being created Viscount Hyde in 1681, and Earl of Rochester in 1682. He was in favour of a return to the foreign policy of the earlier years of the reign, a close alliance with France, while Halifax advocated the policy of the Triple Alliance. The influence of Halifax was the stronger, and Rochester was removed from the Treasury in 1684. But shortly afterwards Charles died; James at once created his brother-in-law Lord Treasurer, and he became practically Prime Minister. But Rochester, though ready to go far in the direction of despotic government, was strongly attached to the English Church, and by no means inclined to support James in his measures for the restoration of Catholicism. A struggle for office ensued between Rochester and the more pliant Sunderland, and when the former definitely refused to change his religion he was dismissed (1687). In 1700 William thought it necessary to court the support of the High Church party, and called its leader, Rochester, to the cabinet. In the same year he was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Dissatisfied with the admission of a few Whigs into the first ministry of Anne, he came over from Ireland and strenuously opposed the carrying on of the war with France. He was ordered to return to Ireland, refused to do so, and sent in his resignation in 1703. In 1710 he became Lord President in Harley's ministry, and died in 1711.

Roehford, GEORGE BOLEYN, BARON, was ennobled immediately after the marriage of his sister Anne with Henry VIII. In 1536 he was accused of immoral intercourse with his sister, and executed on May 17. His wife was executed with Katherine Howard (Feb.

Rockingham, CHARLES WATSON WENTWORTH, MARQUIS OF (b. 1730, d. 1782), succeeded his father in the marquise in 1750, and was in the following year appointed Lord Lieutenant of the North and West Ridings of Yorkshire. From his great wealth and influential position, rather than on account of any great ability, he was early recognised as one of the chiefs of the Whig party. When George III. succeeded to the throne, and displayed his intention of freeing himself from the Whig control, the Marquis of Rockingham, with the rest of his party, found himself in opposition alike to the ministry and the court, and was one of those dismissed from their lord-lieutenancies in 1762. On the death of the Duke of Devonshire in 1764, Rockingham was at once acknowledged as the leader of the Whig party; and in 1765 the king, unable any longer to endure the haughty independence of Grenville, threw himself into the arms of Rockingham. The king, however, never intended to entrust the government of the country for any length of time to a minister whose principles differed from his own on every point, and soon began to thwart the government in every measure by a secret and thoroughly organised opposition. In spite of this, the marquis managed to carry some beneficial measures. He soothed the ill-feeling which had been aroused in the American colonies by the Stamp Act, by repealing the obnoxious measure; and at home he passed an Act declaring general warrants illegal. But circumstances were too strong for him. He was always a bad speaker, and had thus failed to acquire much personal influence in Parliament, or to offer any effectual opposition to the secret influence of the court party. In May, 1766, he resigned, and for the next sixteen years remained out of office. He offered all the opposition in his power to the ruinous policy which Lord North pursued towards the colonies, and gave what aid he could to Wilkes in his struggle against the tyranny of the House of Commons on the question of the Middlesex election. By his consistent conduct and unflinching integrity he held his party together through a long period of opposition, until, on North's resignation, he for the second time became Prime Minister in March, 1782. He formed a cabinet which had all the elements of strength and apparently of permanence. Negotiations with the American colonies were opened on a broad and liberal basis, which soon resulted in a peace between the two countries. Burke introduced a large scheme of economical reform; but death prevented the execution of the liberal plans which had been the programme of the administration.

Rockingham, THE COUNCIL OF (Mar. 11—14, 1096), was held to discuss the question whether Anselm could acknowledge Urban II. as pope, in spite of the refusal of Rufus to recognise either of the contending pontiffs. Anselm himself had asked that a council should meet to decide whether obedience to Urban was consistent with allegiance to William; if it decided against him, he declared he would leave the kingdom. Rufus consented to summon a council of magnates, which met in the castle of Rockingham, in Northamptonshire. But when it had come together, the king's party, including most of the bishops, led by William of St. Calais, carefully evaded the real point at issue, and persisted in treating Anselm as a person on trial. Anselm rejected their advice to submit entirely to the king, and, greatly to the disgust of Rufus, who had been promised by his bishops that Anselm would easily be crushed, the laymen present distinctly showed their sympathy with the archbishop. Rufus vented his spite upon the prelates by demanding that they should abjure all obedience to Anselm, and those who would not go further than to abjure such obedience as was claimed by the pope's authority could only re-win the royal favour by heavy bribes. Finally the king yielded to the proposal of the lay lords, and the discussion was adjourned till May 20. But before that date the legate, Walter of Albano, had induced Rufus to acknowledge Urban.

A detailed account of the Council, based on Radmer, is given in Freeman, W. Rufus, I., ch. iv., § 4. [W. J. A.]

Rodney, GEORGE BRYDGES, LORD (b. 1718, d. 1792), was born at Walton-on-Thames, and was the son of a naval officer of some renown. He entered the navy when very young, and in 1742 attained the rank of captain. In 1747 he commanded the Eagle in the action off Cape Finisterre. Two years later he was appointed Governor of Newfoundland. On the breaking out of war with France in 1757 he was fully occupied, and served under Hawke and Boscawen on the French coast. In 1759 he was promoted to be rear-admiral of the Blue, and made a most daring and successful raid upon the stores which had been collected in Havre with a view to the invasion of England. In 1761 he was on the West India station. On the conclusion of the war he was made a baronet, and four years later became Master of Greenwich Hospital. In 1768 he was returned, after a very severe contest, for Northampton, and his resources were so crippled that he had to retire to France to retrench. While residing there, offers were made by the French to tempt him to desert his country; but he rejected the overtures, and was rewarded in 1778 by being promoted to be an admiral. It was not, however, till the following year that he obtained active employment as commander on the Leeward Isles station. On his way to that station, he conducted a convoy of supplies to Gibraltar, which was then in the midst of its long siege. While in charge of this convoy, he captured off Cape Finisterre, on Jan. 8, 1780, a valuable fleet of Spanish merchantmen on their way to Cadiz, and a week later encountered a powerful Spanish fleet, which he totally defeated. On his return to England, he was received with loud acclamations, and was returned with Fox to Parliament for Westminster. Early in 1781 he was ordered to the West Indies, and captured St. Eustatia; but, failing to induce the French admiral, De Grasse, to try an engagement, he returned to England. Being appointed Vice-Admiral of Great Britain, he shortly afterwards sailed again for the West Indies. At length, on April 5, 1782, he obtained his long-wished-for opportunity of meeting De Grasse, who sailed out in the hope of effecting a junction with the French and Spanish fleets at Hispaniola. Rodney pursued, and, after a partial engagement, succeeded in overhauling the French fleet between Guadaloupe and Dominique. The fight on April 10 was gallantly contested, but the English victory was decisive. One of the French ships was sunk, and five others were taken. Rodney returned to England, to receive the title of Baron Rodney and a pension of £2,000 per annum. He survived his accession to these honours ten years, but does not seem to have been happy, partly owing to his straitened circumstances. Like Nelson, he was not more brave than kind, and was almost as much beloved by his men.

ROGER, BISHOP OF SALISBURY, was a poor priest of Caen, who winning the favour of the Ætheling Henry by the rapidity with which he performed mass, became his chaplain and private adviser. When Henry gained the English throne, Roger became Chancellor, in 1107 Bishop of Salisbury, and at the same time Justiciar. "Under his guidance, whether as chancellor or as justiciar, the whole administrative system was remodelled, and the jurisdiction of the Curia Regis and Exchequer carefully organised" (Stubbs). He swore to the succession of Matilda, though, according to the account he afterwards gave, only on condition that she should not be married to any foreigner without consent of the magnates. Stephen had little difficulty in gaining his support and the royal treasure which he guarded. But in a short time the king began to be jealous of his great minister. Roger and his family monopolised all the important offices in the administration; his son Roger was Chancellor, his nephew Nigel, Bishop of Ely, was Treasurer, and another nephew, Alexander, was Bishop of Lincoln. Moreover, Roger and his nephews had been building great castles in their diocese, the most important being those of Roger at Sherborne and Devizes, which are also interesting as "bringing to perfection that later form of Norman architecture, lighter and richer than the earlier type, which slowly died out before the introduction of the pointed arch" (Freeman, Norman Conquest, v., 638). The motives of Roger in so doing are not quite clear; it may have been merely for personal aggrandisement, or, as is not improbable, in order to strengthen the administration in the approaching struggle. At any rate Stephen in June, 1139, caused the bishops of Salisbury and Lincoln and the Chancellor to be arrested at Oxford, and they were not released until the castles had been surrendered. This action on the part of Stephen led at once to the break-up of the administration, and was one of the main causes of that king's later difficulties. Roger died in Dec. (1139).

ROGER OF PONTIGNY, the possible author of a certain anonymous life of Becket. It was ascribed to Roger, and printed under his name by Dr. Giles (1845-6), because the author speaks of himself as having ministered to Becket at the time of his exile; while another contemporary writer says that a monk named Roger was the minister of Becket while at Pontigny. But the life gives no such information as could be derived from close personal knowledge, and becomes slighter and not more detailed on reaching the settlement at Pontigny.

It was edited by Canon Robertson for the Rolls Series, in 1879, in volume iv. of Materials for History of Becket.

ROHILCUND was so called from the Afghan Rohillas, who took possession of the country under Ali Mohammed Khan in the first half of the eighteenth century. About 1770 the Rohillas were unable to pay the Vixier of Oudh some forty lakhs, for which he had become security to buy off the Mahrattas. The vizier gained the loan of an English force from Warren Hastings, with which the country was conquered. In 1801 a large part was ceded to England, instead of the tribute which the vizier had bound himself to pay. Rohilcund is now a commissionership in the North West Provinces.

ROLLS, THE MASTER OF THE. John of Langton was the first person who bore the title "Keeper of the Rolls of Chancery" (1256), though the office had doubtless been some time in existence. At first the Keeper or Master was merely the most important of the clerks of Chancery. As such he naturally had custody of the Great Seal during the absence of the Chancellor from court. With the fall of the Justiciar from his high political position, his place was taken by the Chancellor, whose judicial duties were gradually devolved upon the Master, who began to sit in Chancery and to transact most of the ordinary business of the court. Thus almost all the legal work of the first lay Chancellor, Bouchier (1340—41), was done by the Master, though in important matters the Chancellor insisted on acting himself. The Masters of the Rolls were often also Masters of the House of Converts (for Jews) in what is now Chancery Lane. At the end of the reign of Edward III., the mastership of this house was permanently annexed to the office. In the reign of Richard II. the Master for the first time received his office, "quamdiu bene se gesserit," and by the statute of 12 Richard II. he was given precedence before the judges. In modern times his duties have been defined by an Act of 1833, and by the Supreme Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875

Rolls Series is the name usually given to the collection known officially as Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain and Ireland during the Middle Ages. As early as 1822 the House of Commons urged, in an address to George IV., the advisability of publishing "a complete edition of the ancient historians of this realm." But nothing resulted from this address till 1857, when the government accepted a scheme laid before them in that year by the Master of the Rolls, Lord Romilly. The plan of the volumes is summed up in Lord Romilly's proposal "that each chronicle and historical document should be edited in such a manner as to represent with all possible correctness the text of each writer . . . and that no notes should be added except such as were illustrative of the various readings . . . that the preface to each work should contain a biographical account of the author . . . and an estimate of his historical credibility and value." The series now includes editions by the most competent of English scholars, of the chief mediæval chroniclers of England, including works of Hoveden, Matthew Paris, Roger of Wendover, Simeon of Durham, Henry of Huntingdon, Giraldus Cambrensis, the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, such public records as the Muniments of the Guildhall of London, and the Black Book of the Admiralty, and miscellaneous collections, such as Mr. Brewer's Monumenta Franciscana and Mr. Anstey's Munimenta Academica. In many cases the value of the text is increased by most learned, luminous, critical, or historical introductions by the editors. The whole work has been published in a manner in the highest degree creditable to English scholarship. Its value to the student cannot be over-estimated.

Nearly all the works as yet published in the Rolls Series will be found specified, with the letters (B.S.) appended, under Authorities.

Roman Roads, THE, were perhaps the most durable of the memorials which the Romans left behind them in Britain. Their occupation of the island was primarily of a military character, and the extreme importance of establishing easy means of communication between the various garrisons led to the gradual establishment of a very complete system of roads. The method of their construction largely varies with the nature of the country traversed. But they were uniformly raised above the surface of the neighbouring land, and ran in a straight line, almost regardless of hills, from station to station. The more important lines were very elaborately constructed with a foundation of hard earth, a bed of large stones, sometimes two more layers of stones and mortar, and of gravel, lime, and clay, and above all the causeway paved with stones. The width was generally about fifteen feet, and at regular intervals were posting stations. The distance was regularly marked off by mile-stones. The principal Roman roads were used for traffic many centuries after the Romans had abandoned the island. During the Middle Ages they were perhaps the only good roads in the country. In the eleventh century, the "four Roman roads" (Watling Street, the Foss Way, Icknield Street, and Ermine Street) were specially protected by the king's peace: a privilege afterwards extended to all the highways of the country. Of these Watling Street probably ran from London to Wroxeter (Uriconium). The Peace of Wedmore made it the boundary between Alfred's dominions and the Danelagh. Its northward and westward continuations from Wroxeter into Wales, its southern connection between London and Dover, seem also to have received the same name. The Foss ran from the sea-coast at Seaton in Devonshire, the Roman Maridunum, to Lincoln, with a continuation known as High Street to the Humber. The Icknield Way seems to have extended from east to west from Icklingham near Bury, underneath the chalk-ridge of the Chilterns and Berkshire downs, to near Wantage, and thence to Cirencester and Gloucester. The Ermine Street ran north and south through the Fenland from London to Lincoln. Besides the four great lines, "spacious in their dimensions, admirable for their construction, protected alike by the edicts of our kings, and the written laws of the land," as Henry of Huntingdon says, were many scarcely subordinate ones. There were several Icknield Streets. The mines of the Mendips, of Wales, and of the Forest of Dean were opened out by other lines of highway. One great road ran from the Land's End to Exeter in continuation of the Foss. Another ran from Venta Silurum to near St. David's Head; another to the Sarn Helen up the western Welsh coast to Carnarvon.

Romans in Britain. Direct intercourse between the Romans and Britons began with the two expeditions of Julius Caesar in B.C. 55 and 54, but he rather prepared the way for future conquest, by exacting the submission of the tribes of the south-east, than began the conquest himself. Though British kings sought the protection of Augustus, it was reserved for Claudius to add Britain to the Empire. The campaign of Aulus Plautius in 43 A.D., the Emperor's own conquest of the stronghold of Cunobelin, Ostorius Scapula's completion of the conquest of the south and east (50), Suetonius Paulinus's great campaign against Caractacus and the Silures (58), the suppression of the revolt of the Iceni after the inactive governments of Aulus Didius and Veranius, the reduction of the Brigantes by Petilius Cerealis (69–70), and the final submission of the Silures to Julius Frontinus (circa 77), prepared the way for the final triumphs of Julius Agricola (78–85). That great general successively defeated the Ordovices and the Brigantes, and, advancing to the north, ravaged the district as far as the Tay, fortified the isthmus between the Forth and Clyde, visited the Western Highlands, and finally, after a three years' war, defeated the Caledonians at "Mons Grampius." But these northern districts were never really subdued, and the building by Hadrian of the first Roman Wall between the Tyne and the Solway (120) marks the northern limit of the organised province. But in 139 Lollius Urbicus, the governor for Antoninus Pius, built a second wall, or rather an earthen rampart, between the Forth and the Clyde, which now became the ultimate northern boundary of the Roman dominions. A series of incursions of the northern barbarians led to its being further strengthened by Severus, from whom it often takes its name. One remarkable feature in the later history of the province is the constant tendency of the legions in Britain to set up Emperors of their own, such as Carausius, who governed the province from 287 to 294, when he was slain by Allectus, while Britain was reconquered in 296 by Constantius Chlorus. That prince effected important reforms in the government, and fought successful campaigns against the Picts, as the inhabitants of the unconquered north now began to be called. In 369 Theodosius restored the province, after it had been ravaged by Picts and Scots, Saxons and Attacots. In 383 the revolt of Maximus, and his unfortunate attempt to win for himself the whole Empire, led to the withdrawal of the army, and to fresh barbarian inroads on the unprotected land. In 396 Stilicho sent a single legion to help the struggling provincials, but its withdrawal in 402 led to fresh invasions. In 406 Stilicho again restored the army, but the successive usurpations of Constantius and Gerontius showed the feeble Honorius that the army in Britain was a danger rather than an assistance to his struggling Empire. In answer to a request for help he bade the provincials defend themselves. In despair the Britons rose, and drove out the civil governors. The unity of the state at once disappeared. The Roman rule in Britain was at an end.

During more than three centuries the Romans had governed Britain, but they were unable to effect more than a military occupation. They had lost that capacity for assimilating the conquered races with themselves, which had made Gauls and Spaniards more Roman than even the Italians. The Roman civilisation, which Agricola had found the best means of enslaving the Britons, had never penetrated very far. A series of military posts, connected by a magnificent system of highways, a few commercial and mining centres, an occasional urban settlement, were all that could really be called Roman in Britain. The summer villas of the conquerors were planted amidst British tribes, who retained their old language and customs, and, so far as it was compatible with the central government, their old tribal organisation. The continued existence of the Welsh language in a district nearly three hundred years a Roman province, the few traces of Roman influence in the earliest Welsh laws and institutions, their similarity to those of the Irish, never subdued by the Romans, show very clearly the limited extent of their power. The influence exerted by the Romans in Britain was analogous to that of the English in India, and the diffusion of a thinly-spread veneer of culture is less important than the great material works, such as walled towns, paved roads, aqueducts, and great public buildings, or the development of trade and commerce. These remained to testify to the greatness of Rome long after the more direct civilising influences, and long after the political organisation of Rome had ceased to have much influence in Britain. There is no need to suppose that everything that was Roman left the country in 410, or to think that the English necessarily made a clean sweep of all that had previously existed. Yet the contention that the direct influence of the Roman province on subsequent English history was really great, or that there was any real continuity, as, for example, in municipal institutions, cannot really be sustained, despite the brilliant theories and solid stores of learning that have been wasted in the attempt.

It remains to speak of the military and political organisation of the province of Britain. The number of troops quartered there seems always to have been large. Some were planted throughout the country in garrisons, but the greater number were massed along the northern wall, and on the east coast, which was so exposed to the assaults of Saxon pirates. The sixth legion had its headquarters at York, the twentieth at Chester, the second at Caerleon, the second for a time on the Wall, afterwards at Rutupiae (Richborough). Troops of nearly every known nation were comprised within their numbers. The practice of the same legion being stationed for a long time at the same place must have led to a good deal of intercourse between the Britons and their conquerors. Not unfrequently the soldiers married native women, and settled down when their term of service was expired upon the lands allotted to them in their adopted country. The Roman soldiers took a prominent part in road-making, building dykes, working mines, and in the other great engineering operations which marked the Roman rule. The chief towns—most of which, such as York, London, Chester, Lincoln, Bath, Colchester, have continued ever since to be centres of population—very largely owed their origin to their importance as military stations.

The system of government of the province more than once was radically changed. The province as a definite administrative district was begun under Aulus Plautius. Its exposed position naturally caused it to be an imperial rather than a senatorial province, and its governor was the legate. Its great extent and the difficulty found in properly defending it led to its division into two districts by Severus, which Dio calls Upper and Lower Britain. Their relative situations are not certainly known. Diocletian's reorganisation of the Empire involved the division of Britain into four provinces—Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Maxima Caesariensis, and Flavia Caesariensis—the positions of which are quite undetermined. In 369 a fifth province, called Valentia, the result of Theodosius's victories, was added. The two latter were consular, the three former each under a praeses. The whole were under the Vicar Britanniarum, and he was subject to the Praefectus Praetorio Galliarum. The troops were under the command of the Dux Britanniarum and the Comes Litoris Saxonici.

During the latter part of the Roman occupation, Christianity crept silently into Britain. Before the legions left, it was the religion of the Roman State; but the Britons seem only to have been partially converted, and the traces of an organised British Church are few, though distinct. But the Roman Church in Britain depended on Gaul almost as much as, after Diocletian's reforms, the governors of Britain necessarily did.

Horsley, Britannia Romana, and Camden's Britannia, the early part of the Monumenta Historica Britannica, and Hübner's edition of the British Roman Inscriptions in the seventh volume of the Berlin Corpus Inscriptionum

Latinarum, are the great repositories of the materials for the history of Roman Britain. Hübner's preface to the Inscriptions, and treatise Das Römische Heer in Britannien give the best account of the civil and military government. Coote's Romans in Britain collects all that can be said for the permanence of Roman influence. Skene's Celtic Scotland and Elton's Origins of Eng. Hist. are modern authorities of great value on the general history. Scarth's Roman Britain gives a useful summary of the whole subject. [T. F. T.]

Romans, KING OF THE. [RICHARD OF CORNWALL.]

Rom-feoh, or Rome-scot, afterwards known as PETER'S PENCE, was a tax of a penny on each hearth, which is said to have been first imposed by Ini, and sent to the Pope to provide for the support of the English school at Rome. But for this there is little evidence. The payment of the tribute probably commenced under Offa, who in this way gained papal sanction for the establishment of a new archbishopric at Lichfield. From the beginning of the tenth century, Rom-feoh was exacted from the whole country, and sent annually to Rome. In the confusion of Stigand's primacy, and of the first years of Norman rule, it seems to have fallen into arrears; but William I. promised about 1076 that it should be paid regularly. It succumbed to the general tendency, and became fixed at a comparatively small amount. In 1213 Innocent III. complained that the bishops retained 1,000 marks out of it, and only sent 300. In 1306 Clement V. exacted a penny from each household instead of £201 9s., which had for a long time been the customary payment. The threat of withholding Peter's Pence became a useful instrument in the king's hands; thus in 1366, and for some time after, it was not paid, in order to induce the Pope to acquiesce in the Statute of Præmunire (q.v.). Peter's Pence is to be clearly distinguished from the annual tribute of 1,000 marks promised by John.

Romilly, SIR SAMUEL (b. 1757, d. 1818), the son of a jeweller of French extraction, was born in Westminster. In 1778 he entered at Gray's Inn, but was so broken down by his industrious application, and his exertions in helping to quell the Gordon Riots, that he went to Paris to recruit his health. There he became acquainted with D'Alembert and Diderot, from whom he probably gained many of his liberal opinions. He was called to the bar in 1783, but for five years got little or no business. He was at first much impeded by a nervous diffidence, which did not allow him fair play among his able rivals. But when he had overcome this difficulty, he rose rapidly, and in 1797 he had come to be recognised as a brilliant leader of the bar. In 1800 he was made a king's counsel, and in 1806 was appointed Solicitor-General by Fox, being returned to Parliament for Queenborough.

In this position he was one of the managers of the impeachment of Lord Melville, and also took an active part in procuring the abolition of the slave trade. When he had been successful in accomplishing this object, he turned his attention towards the reform of the penal code; and though he was prevented from carrying out his reforms as he desired, he succeeded in mitigating some of its severity. In 1812 he was defeated at Bristol, but being returned for Arundel, he continued to support every measure that tended to improve the condition of the people, and was an ally of Sir Francis Burdett in his constant attempts to procure a reform in the system of parliamentary representation. With him he was returned at the head of the poll for Westminster in 1818. But he did not live long enough to take his seat in the House. His wife died on Oct. 29 of the same year; and Sir Samuel's mind was so shattered by the blow that he lost all self-control, and within four days committed suicide. Wilberforce said of him that he was "a man whose general knowledge was only equalled by his professional attainments; and who brought to the subject all the lights of the understanding, and all the advantages of experience." "Year after year," says Sir Erskine May, "he struggled to overcome the obduracy of men in power. The Commons were on his side; Lords Grenville, Lansdowne, Grey, Holland, and other enlightened peers supported him; but the Lords, under the guidance of Lord Eldon, Lord Ellenborough, and their other judicial leaders, were not to be convinced. He did much to stir the public sentiment in his cause; but little, indeed, for the amendment of the law."

ROOKE, SIR GEORGE (b. 1650, d. 1709), entered the navy at an early age, and in 1689 became rear-admiral of the red. He took part in the battle off Beachy Head, was made vice-admiral of the blue in 1692, and commanded under Russell at La Hogue (May 19). For the skill with which he led a night attack upon a part of the French fleet which had escaped into the harbour out of reach of the English ships, he was rewarded with knighthood, and the post of vice-admiral of the red. Upon peace being made with France in 1697, Rooke gained a seat in Parliament for Portsmouth, and supported the Tory party. In 1702 he was created by Anne "Vice-Admiral and Lieutenant of the Admiralty" under Prince George. When war was renewed, Rooke took command of the English fleet, stormed Vigo, and in 1704 took Gibraltar. In the same year he fought a great but indecisive battle off Malaga. On his return to England he found himself treated with coldness by the Whig government, and retired to his country seat in Kent, where he died.

Root and Branch. This phrase was derived from a petition asking that episcopacy might be destroyed "root and branch," signed by 15,000 citizens of London, and presented on Dec. 11, 1640, by Alderman Pennington. The party in the Commons which supported this petition was called from it the Root and Branch party. "Of the chief leaders," says Clarendon, "Nathaniel Fiennes and young Sir H. Vane, and, shortly after Mr. Hampden (who had not before owned it) were believed to be for root and branch, which grew shortly after a common expression, and discovery of the several tempers, yet Mr. Pym was not of that mind, nor Mr. Hollis, nor any of the northern men, or those lawyers who drove on most furiously with them." The Root and Branch Bill was drawn by St. John, and then through Vane, Cromwell, and Hazelig handed to Sir Edward Dering, who brought it in on May 27, 1641. It was read a first and second time on the same day, and passed the second reading by 135 to 108 votes. The bill proposed to appoint in each diocese a number of commissioners, half lay, half clerical, to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction in place of the bishops. It was dropped in August, 1641.

Rosamund Clifford, commonly called the FAIR ROSAMUND (d. circa 1175), was the daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, and mistress of Henry II., by whom she had two sons, William Longsword, Earl of Salisbury, and Geoffrey, Archbishop of York. The story of her being poisoned by Queen Eleanor has no authority whatever; and nothing is known of her death. She was buried before the high altar at Godstow nunnery, but about twenty years after her death Hugh, Bishop of Lincoln, ordered her body to be removed to the Chapter-house, where it remained till the Reformation.

Roses, THE WARS OF THE, is the name commonly given to the dynastic civil war in the fifteenth century, which may be considered to begin with the first battle of St. Albans in 1455, and to end with Bosworth Field in 1485, though during this period of thirty years there were long intervals of peace. The name was given to these wars on account of the badges worn by the representatives of the houses of York and Lancaster, the Yorkists taking as their cognisance the white rose, the Lancastrians the red rose. The ostensible cause of the wars was the rival claims to the throne of the families of York and Lancaster, both descended from sons of Edward III.: the former could show strict hereditary right, while the latter had possession and Parliamentary title. But there were other causes, without which it may fairly be said that the struggle would never have occurred. It was not till some years after the first battle of St. Albans, that York put forward his claims, and even then such a compromise as was come to in 1460 might very fairly have been adhered to, but the other causes which were at work prevented this, and the controversy was decided by the sword. The house of Lancaster had in great measure lost its hold on the sympathies of the people; the loss of France, the marriage with Margaret of Anjou, her haughty and overbearing spirit, the suspicious death of the popular favourite Gloucester, all combined to estrange the people from the Lancastrian dynasty. The two ministers of the latter part of Henry VI.'s reign, Suffolk and Somerset, were unfortunate and unpopular, and the one strong man who seemed at all able to restore good government to the country was the Duke of York. The nobles who for so many years had been ranging over France, now found themselves cooped up in England, and mutual jealousies arose which made them only too ready to take part in a civil war, while the birth of Prince Edward in 1453 perpetuated the Lancastrian claims, and so rendered any compromise impossible. With regard to the character of the two parties: ever since the time of Richard II. there had been some branches of the royal house which were opposed to the reigning branch; and the opposition princes usually found it convenient to associate themselves with the party in the country that cried out for reform and good government, as Thomas of Gloucester and Henry of Lancaster had done under Richard II. In Henry VI.'s reign, besides the opposition branch of the royal house, the York princes who were naturally antagonistic to the rival Lancasters and Beauforts, there existed the great family of the Nevilles, which had absorbed the territorial possessions of the Beauchamps, and now held a semi-royal position in the country. They were allied by marriage with the family of the Duke of York. In the north of England the Nevilles were great rivals of the powerful family of the Percies; and since the latter were firmly Lancastrian, this alone would almost have sufficed to make the Nevilles Yorkist. The war was mainly a quarrel among these and the other great houses. But it is possible to find certain geographical and political issues. There was general discontent with the government of Henry VI., its failures abroad, and its close connection with the clerical party; and on this account York was hailed as the champion of reform, and was very popular in the towns and among the mercantile population of the southern counties. The Lancastrians more closely connected with the Church and the nobility, excluding a few of the great families, were stronger in the north, where feudalism was strong, trade undeveloped, and reforming ideas had made little headway. The effects of these wars upon our history were very great. They almost entirely destroyed the old nobility, and so paved the way for the absolutism of the Tudors, for the new nobility owed its rise entirely to the crown, and so was extremely servile. The people had no leaders, and were moreover glad of a strong government to preserve them from the horrors of another civil war. The Church, too, which had rested on the support of the barons, became greatly weakened, and was unable to resist the crown. The commercial classes and the great towns had taken but little part in the wars, but had steadily increased in power and influence, and with this goes the gradual rise of the House of Commons as one of the great powers of the realm, no longer to be dependent on the nobles, but, though at first apparently considerably weakened, in reality a gainer by having to stand alone. The following is a chronological list of the battles fought during the wars; a description of each of them will be found in its place.

First Battle of St. Albans . . .	May 22, 1455
Battle of Mores Heath . . .	Sept. 23, 1459

ROSS, ALEXANDER, EARL OF, was named, from the character of his retainers, "the Wolf of Badenoch;" he was the brother of Robert II. of Scotland, and lord of Badenoch, Buchan, and Ross. He was governor of the northern part of Scotland, where he ravaged the lands of the Bishop of Moray, for which act of impiety he was excommunicated.

ROSS, SIR JAMES CLARK (b. 1801, d. 1862), entered the navy 1812, under his uncle, Sir John Ross, with whom he continued to serve in the Baltic, the White Sea, and on the coast of Scotland. He accompanied his uncle, as a midshipman, in his first voyage in search of the North-west Passage. Subsequently, from 1819 to 1825, he was engaged with Captain Parry in his three voyages, being promoted during his absence in 1822 to the rank of lieutenant. He again accompanied Captain Parry in 1827, and on his return was appointed commander. He also joined his uncle Captain John Ross from 1829 to 1833, on his second voyage in search of a North-west Passage, and on his return was elevated to the rank of a post-captain, in recognition of his valuable services, among which was the discovery of the Magnetic Pole. He was afterwards employed by the Admiralty in a magnetic survey of Great Britain and Ireland. In 1839 he was appointed to the command of an expedition in the Erebus and Terror to the Antarctic Seas, the chief purpose in view being magnetic investigations. This voyage, which occupied a period of four years, was rich in additions made to the previous knowledge of the Antarctic regions in geography, geology, zoology, and botany. In 1844 he was knighted. In 1847 he published the results of his discoveries and researches in the southern and Antarctic regions, in two volumes. In January, 1848, he made a voyage in the Enterprise to Baffin's Bay in search of Sir John Franklin, but was unsuccessful.

Rotheram, THOMAS, Archbishop of York (1480—1500), had been one of Edward IV.'s chaplains, and in 1468 became Bishop of Rochester. In 1476 he was translated to Lincoln, and in 1474 was made Lord Chancellor. He held the Great Seal till 1483, when he was obliged to resign it by the Duke of Gloucester. He was imprisoned by Richard for some little while, and after his release does not seem to have taken any part in public affairs. In 1480 he had been created Archbishop of York.

Rothés, JOHN, 6TH EARL OF, was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester. After the Restoration he became Lord Treasurer and Chancellor of Scotland, and in 1680 was created a duke. On his death, however, in 1681, without male heirs, the duchy became extinct.

Rothessay, DAVID, DUKE OF, the eldest son of Robert III. of Scotland, was a man of profligate and idle habits; in 1398 he was appointed lieutenant of the kingdom by a Scotch Parliament, and two years afterwards successfully defended the castle of Edinburgh; the same year he married Marjory, daughter of Archibald, Earl of Douglas. Soon afterwards he was seized at the instigation of his uncle, the Duke of Albany, and imprisoned in Falkland Castle, where he died of starvation (March, 1402).

Rothschild's Case (1847). Baron Nathan de Rothschild, a Jew, was returned as one of the members for the city of London in 1847. His return was perfectly legal, but he was unable to take the oath because it contained the words, "on the true faith of a Christian." He therefore sat below the bar for four sessions in expectation of relief from the legislature. Being disappointed, he resolved to try his rights by the existing law. He therefore, in 1850, presented himself to be sworn. After some discussion he was allowed to be sworn on the Old Testament, but omitted the words, "on the true faith, &c." He was immediately directed to withdraw, and after a learned discussion it was resolved that he could neither sit nor vote till he had taken the oath in the usual manner. In consequence,

Baron Rothschild was prevented from taking his seat. [Jews.]

Roundhead. The name of Roundhead took its rise at the same time as the name of Cavalier, in the tumults which occurred during the discussion of the Bishops Exclusion Bill at the end of 1641. Like Cavalier, it referred originally to the external characteristics of the men, whose party name it afterwards became. "These people, or citizens," says Lilly, "who used to flock unto Westminster, were, most of them, men of a mean, or a middle quality. . . . They were modest in their apparel, but not in their language; they had the hair of their heads very few of them longer than their ears, whereupon it came to pass that those who usually with their cries attended at Westminster, were by a nickname called Roundheads." According to Rushworth the word was first used on Dec. 27, 1641, by David Hide, a disbanded officer, who in one of the riots drew his sword, and swore to "cut the throats of those round-headed dogs that bawled against bishops," "which passionate expression of his, as far as I could ever learn, was the first mentioning of that term or compellation of Roundheads, which afterwards grew so general." "From these contestations," says Clarendon of the tumults, "the two terms, Roundhead and Cavalier, came to be received in discourse, and were afterwards continued for the most succinct distinction of affections throughout the quarrel." A different story of the origin of the name is given by Baxter. "Some say it was because the queen at Stafford's trial asked who that round-headed man was, meaning Pym, because he spoke so strongly." The name did not go out of use till after the Revolution.

Round Robin, THE (February, 1789), an engagement in writing between twenty Irish peers and thirty-seven commoners, with the Duke of Leinster at their head. It bound all who signed it to make government impossible if the viceroy punished any one of them by loss of office or pension for their conduct on the regency question. Lord Buckingham encountered them by an increase of the pension list, and the majority being frightened consented to give up their engagement. The Duke of Leinster and the Ponsonbys, however, held out and lost their places.

Rous, JOHN (d. 1491), chaplain at Guy-cliff-upon-Avon in Warwickshire, wrote a History of England from the earliest times to the accession of Henry VII. It is of some importance for the reigns of Edward IV. and Richard III. This work has been published by Hearne.

Rowena is said to have been the daughter of Hengest, and to have become the wife of Vortigern. But there is absolutely no authority for her existence, and her name is certainly not Teutonic. The legend of Rowena and Vortigern is told by Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Rowton Heath, THE BATTLE OF, was fought during the Great Rebellion (Sept. 24, 1645). After Naseby Charles I. took refuge in Wales, where he strove to collect fresh troops. In the middle of September he formed the plan of marching northwards to join Montrose, and raising the siege of Chester on his way. The king himself, with part of his forces, succeeded in entering Chester, which was not completely invested. But the besiegers under Sir William Brereton were reinforced by a body of Yorkshire horse under Colonel Poyntz and Sir Marmaduke Langdale, who commanded the troops charged with the duty of raising the siege, attacked rashly, and was taken between the forces of Brereton and Poyntz, and utterly routed. He lost 300 killed and wounded, and 1,000 prisoners. This defeat, and the news of Montrose's defeat at Philiphaugh, obliged the king to abandon his plan.

Roxburgh, one of the four burghs, was surrendered to the English (1174), as security for the fulfilment of the Treaty of Falaise (q.v.), being restored to Scotland by Richard I. (1186). In 1216 it was burnt by John. In 1296 it was given up to Edward I. In 1312 it was surprised by the Black Douglas, and having been regained by the English, was in 1342 stormed by Sir Alexander Ramsay. In 1346 it was retaken by the English, who, although the town was destroyed in the reign of James I., held the castle until 1460, when it fell into the hands of the Scotch after a severe siege, in which James II. was killed by the bursting of a cannon. The abbey of Roxburgh was destroyed by the Earl of Hertford (1545).

Royal Commissions of inquiry may be appointed by the crown at its discretion, or upon the direction of an Act of Parliament, or upon the address of one or both Houses of Parliament; and it is only to obtain an inquiry into corrupt practices at elections that it is necessary (by the Act 15 & 16 Vict., c. 57) that both Houses should unite in the address. It is not usual to appoint members of the government unless the inquiry affects their own departments, or is non-political; and members of a commission who subsequently enter office are usually superseded, or abstain from signing the report. In commissions appointed under an Act of Parliament the members are sometimes nominated in the Act itself (the first example of this being the Commission on Land Tax Assessment in 1692). But in a Royal Commission strictly so called, names are not usually communicated to Parliament beforehand. A commission cannot compel the production of documents, or the giving of evidence, nor can it administer an oath, except by special Act of Parliament. The most notable case of the conferment of such authority is the Act of 1867, which not only gave the above powers to the Trades' Union Commission, but also empowered it to indemnify witnesses from the penalties of the illegal acts they might have committed, upon condition of complete confession.

A good account of the procedure in Royal Commissions will be found in Alphons Todd, Parliamentary Government in England, ii., p. 345. [W. J. A.]

Royal Society, THE, grew out of two small groups of friends who met occasionally in London and Oxford to discuss scientific questions about the middle of the seventeenth century. These were organised into a definite society in 1660; in 1662 it was granted a charter by Charles II., and incorporated as the Royal Society. The king, as well as his brother James, placed their names in the list of members. Its early meetings took place in Gresham College, and afterwards in Crane Court: they were transferred in 1782 to Somerset House, and to Burlington House in 1867.

Rudyard, SIR BENJAMIN. In the Parliament of 1621 Rudyard, who had recently been appointed Surveyor of the Court of Wards, was one of "that band of politicians who hoped to reconcile a stirring foreign policy with the fullest devotion to the crown." In 1624 he was put forward as the exponent of Buckingham's new policy of war with Spain, and in subsequent Parliaments was "the usual mouthpiece of the government." At the beginning of the Long Parliament he was so far convinced of abuses in the government that he proposed the removal of evil counsellors from the king, though without punishing anyone; and when the Bishops Exclusion Bill was being discussed, he advocated in a vague way a return to primitive episcopacy. He seems to have been a well-meaning dealer in useless commonplaces, without any force of character.

The index to Gardiner, Hist. of England, gives references to his chief speeches.

Rullion Green, THE BATTLE OF (November, 1666), resulted in a defeat of the insurgent Covenanters under Colonel Wallace at the hands of the royal troops led by General Dalziel. Rullion Green is a valley dividing the Pentland Hills.

Rumbold, RICHARD (d. 1685), was an officer in Cromwell's regiment. He guarded the scaffold at Charles I.'s execution, and was present at Dunbar and Worcester. After the Restoration he settled down at the Rye House near Hoddesdon in Hertfordshire. Here, in conjunction with others, he planned the assassination of Charles II. and the Duke of York. The conspiracy was discovered, and Rumbold had to flee. In 1685 he took part in Argyle's invasion, was captured and put to death. "Surrounded by cowardly and factious associates," says Macaulay, "he had, through the whole campaign, behaved himself like a soldier trained in the school of the great Protector, had in council strenuously supported the authority of Argyle, and had in the field been distinguished by tranquil intrepidity."

Runes, or Runic characters, comprise the alphabet used by the Teutonic nations. There were sixteen letters in this alphabet, which was ascribed to the god Odin (B.C. 508). Probably it was introduced by Phœnician traders to the people living on the Baltic coast.

Runjeet Singh (b. 1780, d. 1839). Upon the fall of the Mogul empire, its territories were divided between the Maharrattas in the south and the Sikhs, a religious sect, in the Punjab. It was the work of Runjeet Singh, the son of a sirdar of one of the Sikh principalities, to weld the loose Sikh confederacy into a kingdom. Gaining, in 1799, the governorship of Lahore in return for the aid he had given to Zeman Shah of Afghanistan, he practised upon the religious fanaticism of his Sikh countrymen, and organised the "khalasa" or "the liberated" into an army under European officers, which resembled in many points the Ironsides of Cromwell. He speedily conquered the neighbouring sirdars, but he found himself shut in on the east by the river Sutlej, the boundary of the British territory. He was wise enough to make a treaty of peace with the English in 1809, and to this he was faithful till his death. He captured Moulton in 1817, Peshawur in 1819, and Cashmere in 1819, and in that year assumed the title of Maharajah (King of Kings). The Afghans inflicted upon him a defeat in 1836, but his authority was too firm to be shaken by disaster, and he seemed to leave behind him a firmly-established power on his death in 1839.

Rupert, PRINCE (b. 1619, d. 1682), was the third son of Frederick V., Elector Palatine, and Elizabeth, daughter of James I. Upon the outbreak of hostilities between king and Parliament, Rupert received the command of the Royalist cavalry, and took part in all the important engagements of the first Civil War. He showed impetuous courage, but little judgment, and to this defect the Royalist defeat at Marston Moor was largely due. His surrender of Bristol in August, 1645, caused Charles to deprive him of his command. In 1648, however, he was given command of the Royalist fleet, and showed considerable skill in eluding Blake. At last, in 1651, Blake inflicted on him a crushing defeat and destroyed most of his vessels. With the remnant, Rupert escaped to the West Indies, where he carried on a buccaneering warfare against English merchantmen till 1653, when he managed to reach France. After the Restoration he again obtained high naval command, and did good service under Monk in the war against the Dutch. The later years of his life were spent in scientific researches, Rupert taking the greatest interest in the proceedings of the Royal Society, of which he was a leading member.

Rushworth, JOHN (b. 1607, d. 1690), a member of Lincoln's Inn, was appointed Assistant Clerk to the Commons at the opening of the Long Parliament, became in 1645 secretary to his relative, Sir Thomas Fairfax, in 1652 one of the committee for the reform of the common law, and M.P. for Berwick in the Parliaments of 1658 and 1660. After the Restoration he was for some years in obscurity, but in 1677 he was appointed secretary to Lord Keeper Bridgeman, and appears in 1679 and 1681 again as M.P. for Berwick. In 1684 he was arrested for debt, and died in the King's Bench Prison in 1690. His position gave him opportunities for witnessing the most important events of the period, and his Collections of Private Passages of State, Weighty Matters of Law, and Remarkable Proceedings in Five Parliaments, chiefly drawn up from his own shorthand notes of debates and from State papers, is one of the most valuable sources of information for the years it covers.

The Collections is in eight vols. They are thus arranged:—Vol. i. (1618–1639), published 1659; vols. ii. and iii., forming Part II. (1639–1640), 1680; Trial of Lord Straford, usually counted as vol. viii., in the same year 1680; vols. iv. and v., forming Part III. (1640–1645), 1692; vols. vi. and vii., forming Part IV. (1645–1648), 1701. Though fairly impartial, an outcry was raised against them, and Nelson's Impartial Collections appeared in 1682–83 as a corrective from the loyalist side.

Russel, LADY FRANCES (b. 1638, d. 1721), the youngest child of Oliver Cromwell. According to Burnet, Charles II. thought of asking for her hand to secure his own restoration, but this is scarcely probable. In 1657 she became the wife of Robert Rich, grandson of Lord Warwick, who, however, died in three months. She subsequently married Sir John Russel, by whom she had a large family.

Russell, THE FAMILY OF, was one of the most ancient in Dorsetshire. In 1506, during the brief stay of Philip of Austria on the coast of Dorsetshire, where he was compelled to put into by stress of weather, he made the acquaintance of Mr. John Russell, and recommended him for employment to Henry VII. Russell received an appointment in the Privy Chamber, and was henceforth constantly employed in the public service. In 1539 he was made Lord Russell, and in 1542 Earl of Bedford, receiving large grants of the confiscated lands of the abbeyes of Woburn and Tavistock. In May, 1694, William, fifth earl, was created Duke of Bedford.

Russell, EDWARD, EARL OF ORFORD (b. 1651, d. 1727), was the grandson of Francis Russell, fourth Duke of Bedford. When his kinsman William, Lord Russell, was beheaded, he retired from court. He joined the Opposition, and was one of the seven who signed the invitation to William III. On the accession of William he was placed on the Privy Council. He began in 1691 to intrigue with James, and complained bitterly to William of the neglect of the Whigs. In 1692 he fought the battle of La Hogue. James had imagined that the English fleet was friendly to him, and trusted the assurances of Russell. But the ill-timed declaration of the exiled king, and the queen's spirited letter to the fleet, had quite changed the mind of the admiral. He went from ship to ship encouraging the crews, who fought bravely and won a great victory. In the same year he had a violent quarrel with Nottingham because he decided that the summer was too far spent for further enterprise. William found it impossible to keep both ministers in office, and therefore gave Russell a rich place in the household. He was sent to the Mediterranean with most of the English and Dutch ships. On his return he was exceedingly popular, and was elected for Middlesex without opposition. On the accession of the Whig Junto to power in 1696 Russell became First Lord of the Admiralty. In 1697 he became Earl of Orford and Viscount Barfleur. In 1701 he was impeached, together with Portland, Somers, and Montague, by the victorious Tories, and charged with complicity with the crimes of Captain Kidd, an accusation so absurd that it soon fell to the ground. During the reign of Anne he was excluded from office until 1709, when he became First Lord of the Admiralty till 1710. On the accession of George I. (1714) he was again placed at the head of the Admiralty Commission, but henceforth he took but little part in politics.

Russell, JOHN (d. 1494), was frequently employed in affairs of state by Edward IV., and in 1476 was made Bishop of Rochester. He was translated to Lincoln in 1480, and was one of the executors of Edward's will. In 1483 Gloucester appointed him Chancellor, which office he held till 1485, when Richard, suspecting him of treachery, took the Great Seal from him. The rest of his life was spent in the affairs of his bishopric.

Russell, JOHN, EARL (b. 1792, d. 1878), was the third son of the sixth Duke of Bedford. He was educated at Edinburgh, and entered Parliament in 1813 as member for Tavistock in the Whig interest. In 1818 he took up the question of Parliamentary Reform and moved four moderate resolutions, henceforth specially associating himself with the Reform movement, and annually moving a resolution on the subject. In 1828 he carried a motion for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and a bill was subsequently passed to that effect. In 1830 he became Paymaster of the Forces under Lord Grey, and was entrusted with the presentation of the Reform Bill to the House (March 1, 1831). His reputation was greatly increased by the ability which he displayed in the passage of the bill; and when Peel gained office, Russell was recognised as leader of the Opposition. In 1835 he became Home Secretary under Melbourne, and in 1839 Secretary for War and the Colonies. At the general election of 1841 Russell was returned for London, a seat which he retained for twenty years. In 1845 he declared himself in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws, in a letter to his constituents, and in 1846 he became Prime Minister. Four years later, in 1850, he made the great mistake of countenancing the No-Popery agitation by his Letter to the Bishop of Durham upon the creation of a Catholic episcopate in England, and by carrying the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, which, however, remained a dead letter. At the end of 1851 he quarrelled with and dismissed Palmerston, who in the next year brought about the fall of the Russell ministry. In Aberdeen's ministry Russell was at first Foreign Secretary, and afterwards President of the Council; in 1855 he resigned, and came back to the Foreign Office under Palmerston in 1859. In 1861 he was created Earl Russell, and became again Prime Minister on Palmerston's death in 1865. He was defeated in 1866 on the Reform Bill, and resigned. He never afterwards held office, though he continued to take an active part in politics, and in 1869 introduced a bill empowering the crown to confer life-peersages. Earl Russell was a voluminous writer, and edited himself selections from his Speeches and Despatches with introductions, 2 vols., 1870.

Russell, WILLIAM, LORD (b. 1639, d. 1683), the third son of the fifth Earl of Bedford, appears as one of the chiefs of the Opposition towards the close of the Long Parliament of Charles II. He commenced the attack upon the Duke of York which led up to the Exclusion Bill, by moving an address in the House of Commons, on Nov. 4, 1678, that the duke should be removed from the royal councils. So popular was he in the country, that at the general election in 1679 he was chosen for two counties. He was nominated a member of the Privy Council as reorganised by Temple, but it was impossible that a council containing such discordant elements should work together, and the Whig leaders speedily sought their dismissal. During the Exclusion Bill debates Russell was practically leader of the House, and it was he who took up the bill to the Lords (Nov. 15, 1680). But the court was victorious, and in 1683 took revenge by accusing Russell of participation in the Rye House Plot, though it is almost certain that Russell and his friends had merely discussed the possibility of a popular agitation for a new Parliament, and did not contemplate the employment of force. He was tried for high treason at the Old Bailey on July 13, 1683, declared guilty, and executed on the 21st, refusing to the last, in spite of the arguments of Tillotson and Burnet, to assent to the doctrine of non-resistance.

Russia, RELATIONS WITH. During the Middle Ages there were practically no relations between England and the barbarous kingdom of the Czars. The English captain, Chancellor, began in 1553 both commercial dealings by his voyage to the White Sea, and diplomatic intercourse by bearing to Moscow a letter of Queen Mary to Ivan the Terrible. In 1568 this mission bore fruit in Ivan's proposal of a commercial treaty giving exclusive rights to English merchants, and a political alliance against Poland and Sweden; but neither of these were ever executed. In 1645 Alexis Mikhailovitch sent Gersim Doktourof to England; but on finding the king to whom he was accredited a prisoner of his own subjects, the envoy withdrew in disgust, and the execution of Charles was followed by the expulsion of English merchants from Russia. After the Restoration, the embassy of Lord Carlisle restored diplomatic relations (1663); but nothing of any importance happened until Peter the Great's famous visit to England in 1697. The distant friendship of the two nations was readily broken in 1717 by the coalition of Peter with Charles XII. and Alberoni, with the intention, among other objects, of depriving Hanover of Bremen and Verden, and of helping the Pretender to the English throne. But these projects soon passed away, and on the whole friendly relations between the two countries were maintained for the greater part of the eighteenth century. The close alliance of Russia and Austria, the notion that the development of Russia would help in keeping down France and its northern ally Sweden, the common policy of maintaining the Cap faction in power in the latter country, and the importance of the trade between the two nations, all helped to establish their alliance. In 1748 the advance of a Russian force secured for England and her allies the Peace of Aachen. But in the Seven Years' War Russia did her best to overthrow England's ally, Prussia. Yet Chatham always maintained the policy of the Russian alliance, and in 1769 England assisted the fleet of Alexis Orlov in its long voyage from the Baltic to the aid of the revolted Greeks, and an Englishman conducted the fire-ships which destroyed the Turkish fleet in the Bay of Tchesme. Less justifiable was the acquiescence on the part of England in the first partition of Poland in the year 1774; which was ill requited by Catherine II.'s abandonment, in the latter part of her reign; of the English alliance in favour of a connection with France. Thus, in 1780, Catherine joined the Armed Neutrality. Little less offensive to England was her close alliance with Joseph II., whose policy in the Netherlands was diametrically opposed to that of the English. The younger Pitt was the first English statesman who took up that position of hostility to Russia which in later times became so general. While Fox eloquently pleaded for a continuance of the old connection, Pitt formed an alliance with Poland, Prussia, and Sweden, against the "Colossus of the North;" but his threats were vain to prevent Russia's triumph in the Turkish war, and the inglorious defeat of Gustavus III. of Sweden. The struggle against revolutionary France brought back, however, the old relations. Catherine in her old age was content with denouncing the Revolution. Paul I. joined the Second Coalition, and in 1799 English and Russian troops joined to fight an unsuccessful campaign in Holland, which led to mutual jealousies and recriminations. As a result Paul formed a close connection with his hero Napoleon, and established a second Armed Neutrality in the north. After Paul's murder, Alexander I. joined the next coalition, but from 1807 to 1812 his alliance with Napoleon isolated England and allowed the establishment of the Continental System. After 1815 the Tory government kept up a friendship with the instigator of the Holy Alliance. The judicious policy of Canning of joining with Russia to obtain the liberties of Greece, was ignored by the ministry which called Navarino an untoward event. The triumph of Liberalism in England, the sympathy excited by the Polish insurgents, the antagonism of interest in the Levant, and, before long, in Asia as well gradually produced a settled divergence between the two countries, culminating in the Crimean War, and nearly leading to a second explosion in 1877. [CRIMEAN WAR.]

Ruthven, ALEXANDER (the Master of Gowrie), conspired, with his brother, the Earl of Gowrie, to kidnap King James VI. at Gowrie House, and to convey him by sea to Fastcastle (1600). Ruthven having prevailed upon the king to visit his brother's castle, attacked him there, but was himself slain by the king's retainers. This affair is known as the Gowrie Conspiracy.

Ruthven, The RAID OF (August, 1581), was the name given to a plot formed against Lennox and Arran, the favourites of James VI., which was carried out by seizing the young king at Castle Ruthven, and committing him to the charge of the conspirators. In 1582 an Act of Indemnity was passed in which the thanks of the nation were voted to the Earls of Gowrie, Mar, and Glencairn for their rescue of the king from his obnoxious ministers. In 1583, however, James wishing to recover his freedom, collected a body of troops under Argyle and Huntly, and defeated the Ruthven party, and Gowrie was executed (1584).

Butland, CHARLES MANNERS, DUKE OF (b. 1754, d. 1787), was appointed Viceroy of Ireland by Pitt in 1783. He found Ireland in a state bordering on open rebellion. His firmness, however, prevented a proposed congress from meeting (1784); and, though unable to carry the commercial treaty, he put down the Whiteboy insurrection, and restored internal quiet. He was very popular, and was much lamented when he died.

Butland, HENRY MANNERS, 2ND EARL OF (d. 1563), was instrumental in procuring the condemnation of Lord Seymour of Sudely, by bringing forward evidence of his designs against his brother, the Protector. In 1549 he was employed in the relief of Haddington, which was being besieged by the French; and in 1553 was imprisoned for a short time as a supporter of Lady Jane Grey. In 1558 he collected a small fleet for the relief of Calais, but was too late to save the town.

Rye House Plot, THE (1683), is the name given to a conspiracy formed by some of the extreme Whigs in Charles II.'s reign, after the failure of the Exclusion Bill; its object was the murder of the king and the Duke of York. The king was to have been murdered at a place called the Rye House, in Hertfordshire;

but the plot never came to anything, and was revealed to the court by traitors among those concerned in it. It is not probable that the prominent Whig leaders were privy to this scheme, which was chiefly formed by Rumbold and some of the more violent and obscure members of the party. But William, Lord Russell, Algernon Sidney, and the Earl of Essex were arrested for complicity in it. Essex died in the Tower, probably by his own hand; Russell was condemned on the evidence of one witness and executed, together with Sidney (July 21, 1683), at whose trial unpublished writings of his own were admitted as evidence against him.

Rymer, THOMAS (b. 1639, d. 1714), was born at Northallerton, and educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. He was entered at Gray's Inn in 1666. He wrote several dramas, translations, and works on constitutional history. In 1692 he received the appointment of historiographer royal. Rymer died in poverty, and was buried in St. Clement Danes Church. Rymer's chief interest to the student of English history is his connection with the work called Fœdera. Early in the seventeenth century began the publication upon the Continent of general collections of treaties, such as that of Goldast (Frankfort, 1607—14). Such works became very popular, and the Codex Juris Gentium Diplomaticus of Leibnitz (1693) seems to have suggested to Halifax and Somers the advisability of publishing a similar collection for England at the national expense. The government accepted the proposal, and entrusted the work to Rymer. The first volume was issued in 1704. Fifteen volumes appeared during Rymer's lifetime, and five subsequently; and the Fœdera immediately became one of the prime sources of English history for the period it covers (1101—1654). It is a very valuable collection, containing an immense number of treaties, charters, and other documents.

It is necessary carefully to distinguish the various editions:—(i.) Original, 15 vols., ed. Rymer (1704—1713), the later volumes departing from the original plan, and including a large number of documents which touch only domestic affairs; 16th vol. (1715), prepared from Rymer's papers by his assistant, Sanderson, who edited the remaining volumes; 17th (1717), the last two being still more miscellaneous in the character of their contents. An 18th vol. appeared first in 1728 but was withdrawn on account of the remonstrances of the Commons against the breach of privilege committed by printing part of their Journal; it was recalled and reissued (1731). Two more volumes were published in 1733 and 1735. Churchill published the first 17 vols.; Tonson the last three. (ii.) Tonson's (1727—1729), a reprint of the first 17 vols. (ed. Holmes), published by Tonson through subscription. (iii.) Hague (1737—1745), an edition of the first 17 vols., with Holmes's corrections, and of Sanderson's three last vols., published in 10 vols. at the Hague, with an important abridgment by Rapin. (iv.) Record Commission (1816—1880), 3 vols. in 6 parts, and a portion of 4th vol. covering the period down to 1888, with additions. To these must be added : (v.) Syllabus of Fœdera, in English, by Sir Thos. Hardy, 2 vols. (1869—1872), for Record Commission. In the prefaces to this most valuable work a full account and criticism is given of the various editions.

Ryswick, THE TREATY OF (Sept. 10, 1697), terminated the war which had begun in 1689 between France and the coalition composed of the Empire, Spain, England, Brandenburg, and Holland. Louis had opened negotiations in 1696, but the other powers had broken them off. At length, in March (1697), the French plenipotentiaries assembled at the Hague, those of the coalition at Delft, and conferences were held at Ryswick. But, impatient of delay, Louis and William appointed Marshal Boufflers and the Duke of Portland to hold private meetings together. Terms of peace were concluded (July 6). Spain and the Emperor refused to agree to them; but Spain soon gave way, and on Sept. 10 the treaty was concluded between France, Holland, Spain, and England. The terms were that France should acknowledge William as King of England, Anne as his successor, and that all assistance should be withdrawn from James. France also surrendered all conquests made since the Treaty of Nimeguen, and placed the chief fortresses of the Low Countries in the hands of Dutch garrisons. A month later, a treaty was concluded between Louis and the Emperor. France restored all towns captured since the Treaty of Nimeguen, with the exception of Strasburg, together with Freiburg, Breisach, Philipsburg, and the French fortifications on the right bank of the Rhine. Lorraine was restored to its duke, who, however, granted a passage through his dominions for French troops. The Elector of Cologne was recognised, and the rights of the Duchess of Orleans upon the Palatinate compromised for money. "The Prince of Orange," says Ranke, "who was formerly spoken of contemptuously as the little lord of Breda, had won himself a position in the presence of which the mightiest monarch the western world had seen for many a century was compelled to give way."

Sa, DOM PANTALEON, brother of the Portuguese ambassador in London, killed a man in a fray (Nov. 22, 1653). He took refuge at the embassy, where it was maintained that he was responsible only to his own sovereign. Arrested and tried, and induced to plead by the threat of the peine forte et dure, he was condemned. Cromwell, while pardoning his accomplices, was inexorable against the principal. On July 10 Sa was executed, amidst great popular rejoicings. Cromwell's firm government was no respecter of persons, and not even the divinity which hedged ambassadors suffered them to violate the municipal law of the state in which they were sojourning.

Saadut Ali (d. 1814), the brother of Asaf-ul-Dowlah, was by a treaty made by Sir John Shore in 1788 assigned the vacant throne of Oude, upon terms which gave the English the right of garrisoning the important places, and completely subjected Oude to the English power. Saadut Ali rapidly became so unpopular that he lost all control over his own troops, who, while useless for the defence of Oude, remained a source of great expense. After the insurrection of Vizier Ali, which had to be put down by British troops, Lord Wellesley insisted peremptorily on their dismissal. In 1800 the Nawab announced that he intended to abdicate in favour of one of his sons. Lord Wellesley informed him that he would consent to the abdication provided it was made in favour of the Company. The Nawab thereupon withdrawing his abdication, Lord Wellesley ordered him to choose between the cession of the whole or part of his dominions. After trying every possible means of escape, the Treaty of Lucknow was concluded (Nov. 10, 1801). Its provisions were that the Vizier should cede a large territory, and in return should be released from all future demands on account of Oude or its dependencies; that the Company should always protect and defend the Vizier, and that he should only support a few of his own troops for revenue purposes; that the English should guarantee to him his remaining territories; that in the exercise of his authority he should in all cases be guided by the advice of the officers of the Company. On Jan. 10, 1802, Lord Wellesley and the Vizier met at Cawnpore, where the former insisted on such a reform in the administration of Oude as should remove the evils and abuses which had so long corrupted all the state machinery. Various remonstrances were at intervals addressed to him on his government, especially during Lord Minto's administration, but he had no mind for reforms which would embarrass his arrangements and curtail his revenue. He died in 1814.

Sabert, King of the East Saxons, and nephew of Ethelbert, King of Kent, received Christianity from Augustine, and instituted the bishopric of London with Mellitus for its first bishop. On his death, his sons relapsed into heathenism.

Sac and Soc was an Anglo-Saxon phrase, also extensively used in the Norman period, meaning the right of jurisdiction possessed by private individuals. When extensive tracts of folklund were turned in bookland, in favour of churches, monastic bodies, or private individuals, such jurisdiction as had been previously vested in the king, in or out of the popular courts, was transferred to the recipient of the grant. Where previously the royal officers had sat in judgment, the lord or the lord's reeves now sat; and the profits of the jurisdiction now went, not to the national exchequer, but to that of the lord. And, as in the later Anglo-Saxon times the tendency was for all folklund to pass into bookland, "the national courts became more and more the courts of the landowners. The ancient process was retained, but exercised by men who derived their title from the new source of justice." (Stubbs.) The grants of sac and soe did not as a rule give immunity from the county courts, though they did from the hundred courts. They became, in fact, the basis of the later manor court leet, which exercised petty criminal jurisdiction over the tenants of the manor. The name is derived from two words, one of which (sacen) properly means a thing, and so presumably a thing in dispute and litigation; the other (soen), jurisdiction. But, as Bishop Stubbs says, "the form is an alliterative jingle which will not bear close analysis."

Sacheverell, HENRY, D.D. (d. 1724), the son of a Low Church clergyman, entered the Church, and early attached himself to the school of Laud. He became a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1705 he was elected chaplain of St. Saviour's, Southwark. In November, 1710, he preached his celebrated sermon on "The Perils of False Brethren both in Church and State," a tirade against the Revolution principles, Dissenters, and the Whig ministry, especially Godolphin, whom he attacked under the name of Volpone, or Old Fox. It is said that 40,000 copies of this sermon were sold. The ministry were naturally angry, and Sunderland proposed that Sacheverell should be impeached. The idea was taken up by Godolphin, but opposed by Somers and Marlborough. Sacheverell's answer to the articles was uncompromising. The Commons foolishly resolved to attend Westminster Hall in a body. The trial lasted three weeks. It was soon very evident that the sympathies of the populace were all on his side. "Sacheverell and the Church!" became a popular cry. At the close of the trial, Sacheverell read an eloquent defence, supposed to have been written for him by Atterbury. The Lords declared him guilty by sixty-nine to fifty-two. He was suspended for three years, and his sermon was burnt by the common hangman; but a motion that he should be incapable of preferment was thrown out. The sentence was considered an acquittal; a living was bestowed on him in Wales, and his journey thither was like a royal progress. The queen saw how unpopular the ministry had become, and hence was encouraged to carry out her plans for its overthrow. [ANNE.] After the period of Sacheverell's suspension was over, the queen presented him with the living of St. Andrew's, Holborn. His first sermon, on the text, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," he sold for £100. The Commons, to mark their disapproval of the conduct of the previous ministry, appointed him to preach before them on Ascension Day. Burnet's views of his character are hardly overdrawn: "He was a bold, insolent man, with a very small measure of religion, virtue, learning, or good sense; but he resolved to force himself into popularity and preferment by the most petulant railings at Dissenters and Low Churchmen in several sermons and libels, written without chasteness of style or liveliness of expression."

Sacket's Harbour, THE BATTLE OF (1813), was fought on Lake Ontario, between the English and Canadians under Sir George Prevost, and the Americans under the command of General Brown. The advantage lay with the Americans.

Sackville, LORD GEORGE (b. 1716, d. 1785), was the son of Charles, Duke of Dorset. He served at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy, and fought under the Duke of Cumberland at Culloden. In 1753 he was sent as secretary to Ireland, and quarrelled with the Speaker, Boyle. In 1758 he refused the command on the coast of Brittany, preferring to serve in Flanders, on the ground that he was "tired of buccaneering." He commanded the English and German cavalry on the right of the allies under Ferdinand of Brunswick at the battle of Minden, and when orders were sent him to charge, he obstinately refused to do so, affecting to misunderstand the order, probably from motives of jealousy. After enduring several slights from Ferdinand, he resigned his command, and on his return home, a court-martial adjudged him unfit to serve in any military capacity. On the death of George II., he attempted to return to court. In the year 1760 he was elected member for Hythe; and in 1762 we find him complaining of the expenses of the war. In 1766 he was restored to the Privy Council. In 1770, in consequence of inheriting an estate, he assumed the name of Germain. In the following year he fought a duel with Governor Johnstone. In 1776 he was made Secretary of State for the Colonies, but his military knowledge and talents ill-atoned for his rash and violent temper. He quarrelled with his subordinates, especially Sir Guy Carleton and Sir William Howe, and in 1778 threatened to resign, in a fit of anger on Carleton's being appointed Governor of Charlemon. He superintended the preparations for the American War. In the year 1782, in order to rid themselves of him, the ministry persuaded the king to raise him to the peerage. There was great outcry at this, and his first speech in the House of Lords was an attempt to remove the imputation of cowardice at Minden. We subsequently find him acknowledging the fact that the king was his own minister. Lord Sackville was a man of undoubted talents and great ambition, but of a violent temperament, which urged him to ill-judged courses.

Sackville, SIR RICHARD (d. 1666), the father of the famous Lord Buckhurst, was a man of great financial abilities, which he so made use of to his own advantage as to gain the nickname of "Fill Sack." Under Queen Mary he was a Catholic, and Chancellor of the Court of Augmentations; under Elizabeth, a Protestant, and Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Sadleir's Case (1857). Mr James Sadleir, member for Tipperary, had been deeply concerned with his brother, John Sadleir, member for Sligo, in a series of fraudulent banking transactions. On the discovery, John Sadleir committed suicide and James Sadleir fled. The latter was thereupon formally expelled from the House of Commons (Feb. 19) on the motion of the Attorney-General for Ireland.

Sadler, SIR RALPH (b. 1507, d. 1587), a protégé of Thomas Cromwell, was much thought of by Henry VIII. for the skill and ability which he displayed as a diplomatist. In 1539 he was sent on an embassy to James V. of Scotland, to endeavour to detach him from his alliance with France, and to aid the cause of the Reformed religion in Scotland, and fulfilled his mission with such discretion, that Henry appointed him one of the twelve councillors who were to assist his executors in the government during the minority of Edward VI. In 1547 he was present at the battle of Pinkie, and greatly distinguished himself; while in 1549 he aided in suppressing Ket's rebellion. "The able and truthful Sir Ralph Sadler" became one of Elizabeth's most trusted diplomatic agents, and a strong Puritan, and was often employed in Scotch negotiations. In 1559 he was sent to the Scotch border with instructions "to treat in all secrecy with any manner of persons in Scotland for the union of the realms," and to assist the Protestant party with secret sums of money. He was one of the English commissioners at the Treaty of Leith (1560), and in 1568 was on the commission of York on the occasion of the inquiry into the murder of Darnley. In 1584—85 Sir Ralph Sadler acted as gaoler to Mary Queen of Scots in Tutbury Castle; but found the charge of her whom "he had held in his arms as a baby" so irksome, that he petitioned to be removed. After the execution of Mary, in whose trial he took part, he was again sent on a diplomatic errand to Scotland to announce to James VI. his mother's death, and to explain that Elizabeth was in no way to blame. This delicate mission, which he successfully accomplished, was his last, as he died a month or two later.

Sadoolapore, THE BATTLE OF (Dec. 3, 1848), was fought during the Sikh War. After the failure at Ramnuggur, Lord Gough ordered Sir Joseph Thackwell to cross the Chenab at Wuzerabad and turn the Sikh position. Shere Sing thereupon withdrew from Ramnuggur, and the two armies met at the village of Sadoolapore. For two hours the British sustained the fire of the enemy without returning till they were fully in range, when their artillery opened with deadly effect. The Sikhs retired slowly, and Sir Joseph did not deem it wise to follow. The advantage of the action doubtless rested with Shere Sing, who had marched away at his own will to a better position, but Lord Gough thought fit to claim the victory. [SIKH WAR.]

St. Albans, in the immediate neighbourhood of the famous Roman municipium of Verulamium, is famous as the site of one of the greatest Benedictine abbeys. It gains its modern name from Alban, said to have been martyred there under Diocletian. The abbey was erected in his honour by Offa of Mercia in 796. The town dates from the days of Abbot Ulfsgie, who built the three parish churches. The oppressions of the abbots led the town to join the peasants' revolt of 1381. In 1455 and 1461 two battles of more political than military importance were fought between the Yorkists and Lancastrians. The abbey church, made parochial at the Dissolution, has recently been made into a cathedral.

St. Albans, THE FIRST BATTLE OF (1455), was the first engagement in the Wars of the Roses. It was brought about by the recovery of Henry VI. in 1455, and the termination of York's protectorate. The Somerset party were again in power, and York, seeing his influence at an end, determined to secure by force of arms the downfall of Somerset. Accordingly he collected troops in the north and marched towards London. The king advanced in force to meet him, and after a vain attempt at negotiation, a battle followed which, though only lasting half an hour, had most important results. Somerset was slain, together with other Lancastrian nobles, the king wounded, and York completely victorious.

St. Albans, THE SECOND BATTLE OF (1461), was fought by Queen Margaret and the Lancastrians against the Earl of Warwick. After the victory at Wakefield Margaret marched towards London, and was met at St. Albans by Warwick. The Lancastrians gained the day, the king was released, and Warwick compelled to retire. But with incredible folly the results of the battle were altogether thrown away. London was not occupied, nor was the Earl of Warwick prevented from effecting a junction with Edward. The Lancastrians retired to the north, and within a fortnight the Yorkists were in possession of London, and Edward recognised as king.

St. Albans, THE COUNCIL OF (Aug. 4, 1213), was one of the general councils of John's reign. It is extremely important in constitutional history as a step in the progress of the representative system, since it was attended, not merely by the great barons, but by representatives (the reeve and four others) of the people of the towns in the royal demesne. The Council was called by the Justiciar Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, who promised to abide by the laws of Henry I. henceforth. In the same year, in a summons to a Council at Oxford (of the proceedings of which there is no record; indeed, it is possible that it never met), each of the sheriffs is ordered to send four discreet men from his shire.

St. Albans, FRANCIS BACON, VISCOUNT (b. 1561, d. 1626), often called (though of course incorrectly) LORD BACON, was the son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper under Elizabeth. At twelve he was sent to Cambridge, at sixteen he became a member of Gray's Inn, and went to France in the retinue of the English ambassador, Sir Amyas Paulet. Here he stayed a couple of years, until he was recalled to England by the death of his father. Left with but scanty means, he now applied himself assiduously to the study of law, and began that long struggle for preferment in which was spent the greater part of his life. In 1584 he entered Parliament, and in 1586 became a Bench. But for some years after this he made no progress. Lord Burleigh, to whom he naturally looked for assistance—for the Treasurer had married the sister of Bacon's mother—distrusted him, and paid no attention to his frequent appeals; while the younger Cecil was probably jealous of his cousin's ability, and constantly threw obstacles in his way. In 1593, however, Bacon's friendship with Essex seemed about to open to him the path to distinction. The place of Attorney-General became vacant, and Essex demanded it for him, but in vain; for the influence of the Cecils was victorious, and their nominee Coke was appointed. From this time dates that bitter rivalry between Bacon and the great master of the common law, which was ultimately to bring about the fall of both. Essex failed even to gain for his friend the Solicitor's place, and attempted to console him by the gift of an estate worth some £1,800. Yet in spite of the many services Essex had rendered to him, Bacon took a prominent part on the side of the crown in the prosecution of the earl for high treason, and was employed to write a pamphlet to justify the action of the government.

At James's accession, Bacon, with a crowd of others, was knighted. He was a prominent figure in the Parliament of 1604, and, while acting as spokesman of the Commons, pleased the king by flattery, and by the skill with which he arranged compromises, especially in the matter of the Buckinghamshire election. On the question of the union of the two kingdoms Bacon heartily sympathised with the king; he was appointed to draw up the proposals to be laid before the commission, and as a member of it argued ably in support of James's project. In 1606 he married Alice Barnham, an alderman's daughter. In June, 1607, he at last gained a foothold upon the ladder of promotion, and became Solicitor-General. As such his work was chiefly of a routine character; in the Commons, however, he took a leading part in the discussions upon the Great Contract. After Salisbury's death, in 1612, Bacon was able to come into closer contact with the king, and henceforth his rapid rise was certain. In Oct., 1613, he was made Attorney-General; but though this office gave him a prominent place among the royal ministers, his work was but to carry out and defend royal decisions, and he had no influence upon the general policy of the government. He took part in the trials of Peacham and Somerset, defended the benevolence of 1614—15, and assisted in the humiliation of Chief Justice Coke in 1616. Having succeeded in gaining the favour of Buckingham, Bacon became Lord Keeper in March, 1617, in Jan., 1618, Chancellor, in the July of the same year Baron Verulam, and in Jan., 1621, Viscount St. Albans. He was still a mere agent of the government, and when he chanced unintentionally to offend Buckingham in the matter of the marriage of Coke's daughter, he had to make a degrading submission.

When Parliament met in January, 1621, there was no sign of any public hostility to the Chancellor. The Commons were eager to join the king in a contest with Spain, but James refused to declare for a war policy; whereupon the Commons in disgust turned to the discussion of domestic grievances. Foremost amongst these were the monopolies. An attack began upon the referees, i.e., those law officers (including Bacon) and others who had certified to the legality of the monopolies; and Coke, now one of the leaders of the House, turned the assault especially upon the Chancellor. Meantime a committee had been sitting to inquire into abuses in the courts of justice. Apparently to the surprise of the world, Bacon was in March accused of having received bribes; the Lords, after hearing witnesses, were convinced of his guilt; and, what is most strange of all, Bacon made no attempt to defend himself, but threw himself on the mercy of the Lords and the king. Yet it is the opinion of Mr. Gardiner, who has given a detailed account of the most important accusations brought against him, that "the charge that Bacon knowingly and corruptly sold or delayed justice falls entirely to the ground. The only possible explanation of his conduct is that, with his usual carelessness of forms, he contented himself with knowing that the immediate reception of the money, which he believed himself to have fairly earned, would not influence his decision; in other words, that without a corrupt motive he accepted money corruptly tendered" (Hist., iv. 81). Bacon saw that the attack was due to political animosity, and that no defence would save him; by complete submission he might escape with a more lenient sentence. Moreover, though he was confident, and justly, of his own integrity, he could not fail to see how evil was the practice which he had allowed to continue: "I was the justest judge that was in England these fifty years. But it was the justest censure in Parliament that was these two hundred years." He was sentenced to a heavy fine, to imprisonment during royal pleasure, to exclusion from Parliament, office, and court. The fine was remitted and Bacon was released from the Tower after two or three days' imprisonment; but, though his advice was occasionally sought by the government, he never again obtained office, and spent the remaining years of his life entirely in literary work.

More important, perhaps, than the events of his life are the political theories which he consistently advocated. His ideal was a paternal monarchy. The king, aiming at the good of his people, able to employ the wisest counsellors, and possessed of wide information, must be better able to guide the nation aright than the unorganised body of well-meaning country gentlemen called the House of Commons, though he ought to use their help and explain his purposes to them. The work of government demanded an intellectual power such as trained statesmen alone possessed; the king, unmoved by the interests of any class, could provide for the welfare of all classes better than lawyers or squires. Yet facts proved too strong for Bacon, as they afterwards proved too strong for Strafford, who may be regarded as a Bacon in power. Bacon was employed as a useful tool; he was seldom seriously consulted on important matters. None of his great projects were carried out, and while he was holding up in many a carefully written state paper the picture of a patriot king, the country was being governed by Buckingham. Bacon's life was a dual one. His dominant interest was the increase of human knowledge by the new way which he could teach (Advancement of Learning, 1605; Novum Organum, 1620). There will always be a question as to the relation between Bacon's active and speculative life. Probably he wished for power chiefly because it would enable him to carry out his great plans for the social good, alike in politics and philosophy; yet he was not without a real fondness for the pomp of office, and for political activity for its own sake.

The main sources of information about Bacon are his Works, edited with most valuable introductions, &c., by Spedding and Ellis. For Bacon in relation to the history of the time, Gardiner, Hist. of Eng., especially vol. iv., must be consulted. See also Charles de Bémusat, Bacon sa Vie, &c. A very useful short biography is written by R. W. Church. Kuno Fischer, Frans Bacon von Verulam und Seine Nachfolger, is an exhaustive statement of Bacon's philosophical position. [W. J. A.]

St. Brice's Day. THE MASSACRE OF (Nov. 13, 1002), is said to have been occasioned by the report that the Danes in England had formed a plot for murdering the king and the Witan. Accordingly orders were sent forth that all the Danes should be slain. Mr. Freeman thinks the story of the massacre has been greatly exaggerated, and that it only included those Danes who had stayed behind from Sweyn's army.

St. Carilef, WILLIAM OF, or SAINT CALAIS, was first Prior of St. Calais in Maine, and then Abbot of St. Victor's in Le Mans, and ultimately became Bishop of Durham in 1080. Famous in the history of his see for substituting monks for secular canons in his cathedral church, he has a place in history as the foremost adviser of William Rufus in the beginning of his reign. The chronicler of Peterborough says (s.c. 1088), "So well did the king to the bishop that all England followed his counsel and did so as he would." But in a few months he joined the feudal movement against William, apparently under circumstances of great treachery. Involved in the general failure, his temporalities were seized, his lands were ravaged, and he himself brought to trial before the king's court. "His trial," says Mr. Freeman, "is of great constitutional importance, both as illustrating the procedure of the Norman courts at an early stage of development, and because in the course of it William made the first recorded appeal to Rome against the judgment of the 'Wise Men.'" After every legal subtlety had been exhausted, William was banished to Normandy. But in 1091 he was restored to his see, and again exercised great influence over Rufus. The first appellant to Rome now figures as the king's adviser against Anselm. But in 1095 he reverted to his old policy by joining the feudal rising of Mowbray, and only his death on Jan. 1, 1096, saved him from a second trial before the Witanagemot. He was buried in the chapter-house, that the monks who loved their founder might ever have his tomb before their eyes. Apart from his liberality to his church, he appears in history as a thoroughly unscrupulous man.

The only full account of William of St. Calais is in Freeman's William Rufus, vol. I, and vol. II, note c. Mr. Freeman complains of the scanty notice taken of the story by modern writers.

St. Charles, in Lower Canada, was the scene of the defeat of the Canadian rebels, in 1837 by Colonel Wetherall.

St. Denis, in Lower Canada, was the scene of a partial victory of the Canadian rebels in 1837 over the government troops under Colonel Gore.

St. Eustache, in Lower Canada, was the scene (1837) of the total defeat of the rebel Canadians under Girod by Sir J. Colborne. This was the last skirmish in the Canadian insurrection.

St. Giles's Fields, THE MEETING IN (1414), was planned by the Lollards. A large body (report said a hundred thousand in number) was to assemble in St. Giles's Fields outside London, where they would be met by thousands of city apprentices, and headed by Sir John Oldcastle. Their design, it was said, was to murder the king and his brothers, make Oldcastle regent, and destroy all the cathedrals and monasteries in the land. The vigilance of Henry V. defeated their designs; the gates of the city were closed, and St. Giles's Fields occupied by troops, who easily put the insurgents to flight.

St. Helena, an island in the South Atlantic, was discovered (1501) by Juan de Nova Castella, a Portuguese navigator; in 1513 a small settlement was formed by some Portuguese, but had only a short existence. In 1588 the island was visited by Captain Cavendish, and in 1645 was occupied by the Dutch, who, however, relinquished it in 1651 for the Cape of Good Hope. About 1662 the East India Company obtained a charter for the occupation of the island from Charles II., and a large settlement was speedily formed. In 1672 the island was surprised and captured by the Dutch, but was retaken in the following year. It was held by the East India Company until 1833, when it was surrendered to the British government. St. Helena is celebrated as having been the place of imprisonment of Napoleon Bonaparte, who died there (1821). The climate is very healthy, and the island is much frequented by ships, which use it as a victualling station. It hardly possesses, however, at present the importance which it once had.

St. John, OLIVER (b. circa 1598, d. 1673), a prominent lawyer and politician of the time of Charles I., was called to the bar in 1626, and soon identified himself with the popular party. He distinguished himself by his defence of Hampden in the question of Ship-money. He was an active member of the Short and Long Parliaments, and in January, 1641, the king, with a view of conciliating the popular party, made St. John Solicitor-General. Notwithstanding this, he was one of the managers of Strafford's impeachment, and on every occasion opposed the wishes of the king, till at last, in 1643, he was removed from his office. He was made by Parliament one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal in 1643, and held this office till 1646. In 1648 he was appointed Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and was soon after made a member of the Council of State. He was closely connected with Cromwell by marriage, and supported him in his expulsion of Parliament, but was opposed to the Protectorate, though we subsequently find him favouring the idea of kingship, and he was one of the members of Cromwell's House of Lords. After Cromwell's death he supported the Parliament against the army, and on the Restoration he very narrowly escaped being excepted from the Act of Indemnity. The rest of his life was passed in retirement. His character is painted in unfavourable colours by all historians. Mr. Carlyle speaks of him as "a dusky, tough man, whose abstruse fanaticisms, crabbed logics, and dark ambition issue all in dreaded avarice at last;" and Clarendon describes him as being "a man reserved, of a dark and clouded countenance, very proud and conversing with very few, and those men of his own humour and inclinations."

St. Kitt's (St. CHRISTOPHER'S), one of the Leeward Islands, was discovered by Columbus, 1493, and was the first West Indian island colonised by the English; they settled there under Sir Thomas Warner (1623), who three years later was made governor of the island by Charles I. In 1629 the colony was attacked by the Spaniards, and many of the settlers killed. Part of the island was occupied by French planters, between whom and the English there was a perpetual internal war; which lasted until the island was finally ceded to the English by the Peace of Utrecht, 1713. In 1782 St. Kitt's was taken by the French, and in 1805 was again ravaged by a party of marauders of the same nation. The government, which was representative, was vested in a lieutenant-governor, a legislative and executive council, and a house of representatives. In 1871 St. Kitt's joined the federation of the Leeward Islands; its local legislature being now under the control of a president. The climate is extremely healthy. The chief production of the island is sugar.

St. Leger, SIR ANTHONY, was sent over to Ireland in 1540 as commissioner of forfeited lands, and in August, 1540, became Lord Deputy. His government was vigorous and successful. He subdued the Kavanaghs, and their chief had to give up the title of "The MacMurrough." At a Parliament held by him about this time, even Desmond attended, and this was considered a great achievement. He was able to send Irish troops to Scotland and France to take part in the king's wars. In 1546 he subdued the long refractory clans of the O'Moores and O'Connors. In 1550 Sir James Croft succeeded him as Lord Deputy, but he was again Lord Deputy from 1553 to 1558. His sons both in turn became Lord Presidents of Munster.

St. Leger, SIR WARHAM, son of Sir Anthony St. Leger, succeeded in relieving Haddington, 1548, when besieged by the French and Scotch. In 1566 he defeated Shane O'Neill, and in 1579 did good service in the Desmond rebellion in spite of Ormonde's opinion of him, that he was "an old alehouse knight, malicious, impudent, void of honesty; an arrogant ass that had never courage, honesty, or truth in him."

St. Leonards, EDWARD BURTENSHAW SUGDEN, LORD (b. 1781, d. 1875), was the son of a hairdresser of Duke Street, Westminster. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn (1807). In 1822 he became a king's counsel and bencher of Lincoln's Inn. He at different times was returned to the House of Commons for Weymouth, Melcombe Regis, and St. Mawes; took a prominent part in Parliamentary discussions, and was foremost among those who opposed the Reform Bill. In June, 1829, when the Duke of Wellington was Prime Minister, he was appointed Solicitor-General; and in 1834, when Sir R. Peel formed a ministry, Sir Edward Sugden went to Ireland as Lord Chancellor. Resigning that office on the retirement of the cabinet, he was returned for the House of Commons for Ripon, and vacated his seat in September, 1841, on resuming under Sir R. Peel's ministry his position as Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in which he continued until the disruption of the Conservative party in 1846. For some time he did not figure prominently in public affairs, but accepted the post of Lord Chancellor in Lord Derby's first administration in 1852, and was raised to the peerage as Lord

St. Leonards. In 1858 Lord Derby was desirous that Lord St. Leonards should again receive the Great Seal, but he declined the responsibility in consequence of his advanced age, though he afterwards took an active and influential part in the business of Parliament, and exerted himself to keep up the character and efficiency of the House of Lords as a judicial tribunal, and to correct by legislation several anomalies in the law of property.

St. Lucia, one of the Windward Islands, was discovered by Columbus in 1502. In 1635 it was taken possession of by the French, and four years later an English settlement was formed on the island, though the colonists were almost all murdered shortly afterwards by the natives. In 1664 the island was taken by an English expedition from Barbadoes, headed by Lord Willoughby, but was evacuated in 1667. In 1718 St. Lucia was granted by Louis XV. to Marshal D'Estrées, and in 1722 by George I. to the Duke of Montague. The result was a collision between the two parties of colonists (1723), which ended in a compromise; by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) the neutrality of the island was recognised, but in 1756 it was seized and garrisoned by the French, to whom it was given up by the Treaty of Paris (1763). In 1778 it was again taken by the English, and held by them for five years. At the end of which time it was exchanged for Grenada. In 1794 it was taken by Lord St. Vincent, but evacuated in the following year, though in 1796 it again fell into the hands of a British expedition under Sir Ralph Abercromby. In 1802 St. Lucia was restored to France by the Peace of Amiens, but the next year was taken by General Greenfield, and has ever since remained under British rule. The government of the island is representative; there is a legislative and an executive council. The climate is very unhealthy. The chief product of St. Lucia is sugar.

St. Mary's Clynst, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 3, 1549), was fought near Topsham in Devonshire, between the royal troops under Lord Russell and the West country insurgents under Humphrey Arundel; the latter were defeated after a severe engagement.

St. Ruth (d. 1691), a distinguished French general, and a merciless persecutor of the Huguenots, arrived at Limerick in 1691, with D'Usson as his lieutenant, to take command of the Irish army. He had commanded Irish troops in Savoy, and did his best to discipline his forces. Unfortunately, he quarrelled both with Sarsfield and Tyroconnel. Irritated at the capture of Athlone, he determined to give battle to the English in opposition to the advice of his Irish officers. At Aghrim, at the critical moment of the battle, his head was carried off by a cannon-ball. If he had lived, the result of the battle might well have been different. He was buried in the monastery of Loughrea.

St. Vincent, one of the Windward Islands, was discovered by Columbus (1498). In 1627 it was granted by Charles I. to Lord Carlisle, but no permanent settlement was made in the island until 1719, when some French colonists came from Martinique. In 1748 the neutrality of St. Vincent was recognised by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, but in 1762 the island was taken by the English and confirmed to them by the Treaty of Paris in the following year; in 1779 it again fell into the hands of the French, but was restored to England by the Treaty of Versailles (1783). In 1794 an insurrection broke out amongst the natives owing to the intrigues of the French planters, and on its suppression 5,000 negroes were sent out of the island. The government of St. Vincent, which extends to some of the Grenadine Islands, is representative, and is vested in a lieutenant-governor, a legislative council nominated by the crown, and an elective representative assembly. The chief wealth of the island is derived from sugar, coffee, and cotton.

St. Vincent, JOHN JERVIS, EARL (b. 1736, d. 1823), entered the navy at the early age of ten, and first saw active service in the expedition against Quebec in 1759, after which he was promoted to be a commander. In 1774 he was appointed to command a ship of eighty-four guns, and in 1778 took a distinguished part in Keppel's engagement off Brest. In 1782 he was knighted for capturing a large French ship when separated from the rest of his fleet by a fog. In 1784 he was returned to Parliament for North Yarmouth. In 1790 he was returned for Wycombe, and was at the same time promoted to be rear-admiral. He vacated his seat on the outbreak of war, and was despatched to the West Indies. His health suffered considerably, but in 1794 he took the command in the Mediterranean, where he won the battle off Cape St. Vincent. Created Earl St. Vincent, he rendered invaluable service in the mutiny of the sailors, by his resolution and prudence. In 1800 he was appointed to command the Channel fleet in succession to Lord Bridport, but threw up the command in the next year on being appointed to preside over the Admiralty. There he set to work to reform some of the many abuses which had long existed in the management of the navy. In May, 1804, he was superseded by Viscount Melville, and on Fox's accession to office in 1806, again took the command of the Channel fleet. In that year he was accused in the House of Commons of "gross neglect in the building and repairing of ships." The charge was, however, refuted by most convincing details: and Fox moved that "the conduct of the Earl St. Vincent, in his late naval administration, has given an additional lustre to his exalted character, and merits the approbation of the House." The motion was agreed to without a division. In the following March, Earl St. Vincent retired from his command, but devoted some of his time to politics, and was a keen opponent of the Perceval ministry. In 1814 he was appointed Governor of Marines, and in 1821 Admiral of the Fleet. A great and original commander at sea, Earl St. Vincent gained by his impartial justice the love and admiration of his men, and when he was appointed to the Admiralty he devoted all his energies to put an end to the terrible abuses which were almost undermining the strength of the navy.

St. Vincent, THE BATTLE OF CAPE (Feb. 14, 1797), ended in the complete defeat of the Spanish fleet. The Spanish admiral, having been falsely informed that Sir John Jervis had only nine ships, determined to attack him with his twenty-seven. Nelson, sailing to join the English fleet, had fallen in with the Spaniards, and on arriving at Sir John's station off Cape St. Vincent on Feb. 13, informed him of the enemy's movements. The next morning the Spaniards hove in sight, and were attacked before they could form in line. By a rapid movement, Sir John passed through their fleet, and thus at once cut off nine ships, which were unable to join their companions, and soon took to flight. The admiral then devoted his attention to the main body, and gave the signal to attack in succession. Nelson, in the rear, using his own judgment, disobeyed the order, and at once came into action with seven Spanish ships at once. He was joined by Trowbridge, and together for nearly an hour they supported this unequal contest. Then Collingwood came up, and took two of the ships off his hands. By these tactics Nelson prevented the main body from joining the nine separated ships, or of getting off without an engagement. The battle was, however, confined chiefly to that part of the fleet which Nelson had engaged. These, however, formed the most important part of the fleet, and they were nearly all captured. The greater part of the enemy's fleet got safely away without being severely engaged. Sir John Jervis fully recognised the great service rendered by Nelson, and publicly thanked him. The victory was decisive, and for some time rendered the Spanish fleet almost powerless. The news of it was received in England with rapturous applause, and Jervis was created an earl.

Salabut Jung (d. 1782), son of the Nizam-ul-Mulk, was appointed to the sovereignty of the Deccan on the death of Mirzapha Jung, in 1751, without grown-up children. His elevation was the result of Bussy's influence, and his close adherence to the enterprising Frenchman made the French masters of the whole Deccan. A quarrel soon broke out between the Nizam and Bussy, which, though healed for a time, became permanent in 1759. This threw Salabut Jung into the hands of the English, with whom he speedily concluded a treaty, and was recognised as lawful Nizam by the Treaty of Paris.

Saladin Tithe, THE, was levied in 1183 for the support of the Crusaders against the powerful Saracen chief, Saladin. Its chief importance lies in the fact that it is the first instance of a tax on personal property, a tenth of all movables being exacted from clergy and laity alike, except those who had themselves taken the cross. It is also interesting as illustrating the employment of jury to assess doubtful cases.

Salamanca, THE BATTLE OF (July 22, 1812), was one of the most decisive of Wellington's victories in Spain. At noon, Marmont, whose object was to cut off the English retreat, despatched the whole of his left wing to seize the road from Salamanca to Ciudad Rodrigo, while many of his troops were still marching through a thick forest of cork trees. Wellington at once perceived the opportunity of cutting off the entire left wing thus separated from the rest of the army. The English hurried down from their vantage-ground on the hills, and at five o'clock Pakenham fell upon the head of Marmont's division, which was marching in disorder, under the idea that the British were in full retreat. In half an hour the French left was utterly overwhelmed, and fell back in hopeless confusion upon the centre and right, both of which were already retiring before the attacks of the fourth and fifth divisions. The chief French generals had fallen, and the command devolved on Clausel, who tried to form a connection with the remnants of Marmont's division. But before the French could rally, the English cavalry, supported by infantry, were upon them; and what the former left undone, the latter completed. Even now Clausel attempted to retrieve the disaster. Bringing up some fresh troops, he made so fierce an attack on the fourth and fifth divisions, already exhausted by their previous struggles, that they were only saved from destruction by the arrival of Clinton with the sixth division, which had been hitherto unengaged. Their arrival finally decided the battle. The French were hopelessly routed, and it required great skill on Foy's part to save even the relics of his army.

Meanwhile the road to Madrid was now open to Wellington. [PENINSULAR WAR.]

Salar Jung, SIR (d. 1883), was descended from the great Meer Allum. In 1853 he was appointed minister to the Nizam. Under his able management the Hyderabad State continued to prosper. He never swerved in his allegiance to England, even during the Indian Mutiny. In 1860 he was made a Knight of the Star of India. He continued to rule the Hyderabad State with judgment and beneficence until his death.

Salbhye, THE TREATY OF (May 17, 1782), was concluded between the East India Company and Scindia on behalf of the Mahrattas. Its stipulations were that all territory acquired by the English since the Treaty of Poorunder should be restored; that the Guicowar should be replaced in his original position in Guzerat; that Ragoba should be allowed three lacs of rupees a year; that Hyder should be required to relinquish all his conquests in the Carnatic, and to release all his prisoners within six months, and, in case of refusal, should be attacked by the forces of the Peishwa.

Salé, SIR ROBERT (b. 1782, d. 1845), after a long and distinguished military career, commanded a column in the second Burmese War. He went with the Afghan expedition in 1839, and was present at the siege of Ghuzni, where he was severely wounded in a hand-to-hand encounter. After the occupation of Cabul and the evacuation of Afghanistan, he retired into Jellalabad for winter quarters. Here he was besieged by Akbar Khan (1842), but was relieved by General Nott after a gallant defence. He was killed at Moodkee.

Salisbury was the seat of a bishopric which was transferred to it from the adjacent town of Old Sarum in 1217. The Sarum bishopric had been founded in 1058. In 1295 Old Sarum returned a member to Parliament, though Salisbury, or New Sarum, was even then a more important place, and did so regularly from 1360 to 1832, till disfranchised by the Reform Act of 1832. The cathedral of Salisbury was begun in 1220.

Salisbury, COUNCILS AT. (1) In 1086, after the completion of the Doomsday Survey, William I. summoned a meeting of all the landowners of England, "of whomeoever they hold their lands," to take the national oath of allegiance to himself. (2) In 1116 a similar gathering was convoked by Henry I. to swear to the succession of the Etheling William. These councils were of great constitutional importance as illustrating the permanence of the national element in the English state during the most flourishing period of feudalism.

Salisbury, JOHN DE MONTACUTE, EARL OF (d. 1400), was the son of Earl William, and one of Richard II.'s chief friends. He took part in the proceedings against Gloucester in 1397, and in 1400 joined the conspiracy against Henry IV. He was seized by the people at Cirencester, and beheaded without trial.

Salisbury, JOHN OF (d. 1180), studied at Paris under Abelard, and other great philosophers of the day. On his return to England he was made Secretary to Archbishop Theobald, and through his influence was employed by the king on diplomatic errands. He was the confidential adviser of Becket, and shared his disgrace and exile. In 1176 he was made Bishop of Chartres, which see he held for four years. His most important work is the Polyorations, in which he attacks the vices of the age, and particularly those of the court. Besides this, he wrote a life of his friend Becket, and numerous letters of his have been preserved, and are of considerable historical value.

Salisbury, RICHARD NEVILLE, EARL OF (b. 1400, d. 1460), was a son of Ralph Neville, Earl of Westmoreland, and obtained the earldom of Salisbury by marrying Alice, heiress of Thomas Montacute. He served in France under his brother-in-law, the Duke of York, became Warden of the West Marches, and strenuously opposed the surrender of the English princes in France. He was a strong opponent of Somerset, and in 1459 Lord Audley was commissioned to arrest him, but he defeated Audley at Blore Heath. For this he was attainted and obliged to flee to Calais. In the next year he returned and joined the Duke of York, but being defeated and taken prisoner at Wakefield, he was beheaded. His eldest son was the famous Earl of Warwick.

Salisbury, ROBERT CECIL, EARL OF (b. 1550, d. 1612), the son of Lord Burleigh by his second wife, after a somewhat distinguished Parliamentary career, was appointed a Secretary of State in 1596, in spite of the intrigues of the Earl of Essex to procure that office for Sir Thomas Bodley. On the death of his father, Sir Robert managed to obtain a large share of the queen's confidence, and so roused the enmity of Essex as to cause him to attempt his removal from court: Cecil was subsequently a chief instrument in the earl's disgrace and fall. During the last few years of Elizabeth's life, Cecil was engaged in a secret correspondence with James, and on her death was the first to proclaim the new king, by whom he was confirmed in all his offices. Cecil, who was the bitter enemy of Spain, found himself at variance with James on that point, but nevertheless managed to become so indispensable a minister that he was created in 1604 Viscount Cranborne, and in the following year Earl of Salisbury. In 1608, on the death of the Earl of Dorset, he became Lord Treasurer, and acquired immense power, being practically the king's only minister; he died in 1612, as it was said "of too much business." The four years of his government were marked by vigorous administration, and by disputes on the question of the prerogative of the crown in taxation, the crowning example of which was the issue of the Book of Rates. [JAMES I.] Salisbury was a man of wisdom and experience. He kept up the traditions of Elizabeth's government in the court of James, and though too arbitrary for the Parliamentary party, and too little addicted to a Protestant policy abroad to please the Puritans, his removal gave room for much worse advisers for James.

Salisbury, ROBERT ARTHUR TALBOT GASCOIGNE CECIL, MARQUIS OF (b. 1830), was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford; was elected to a fellowship at All Souls' College; and was returned to Parliament for Stamford in the Conservative interest (1853). He represented that borough till 1868, when he succeeded to the marquissate. In Lord Derby's third administration he was, in July, 1866, appointed Secretary of State for India. In 1869 he was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford, to succeed Lord Derby. In 1874 he again took office as Secretary of State for India. During his tenure of office he introduced and carried the University Commission Bill for the reform of the colleges of the two universities. In 1878, on the resignation of Lord Derby, he was appointed Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and in that capacity accompanied Lord Beaconsfield to the Conference at Berlin. He retired from office with his chief (1880); and on the death of the latter became leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords.

Salisbury, THOMAS, one of the six conspirators in the Babington Plot, who were specially told off to assassinate Elizabeth, was arrested in Cheshire, and executed at Tyburn (September, 1586).

Salisbury, WILLIAM MONTACUTE, EARL OF (d. 1346), was, as Lord Montacute, one of Edward III.'s chief friends and advisers, and devised the plan for seizing Mortimer. For his services he was made Seneschal of Aquitaine and Lord of Man, and in 1337 was raised to the earldom of Salisbury. He was admiral of the fleet, and took a prominent part in the Scotch and French wars.

Salomons' Case. In 1851 Mr. Alderman Salomons, a Jew, was returned for the borough of Greenwich, made his appearance in Parliament, and took the oaths, omitting the words "on the true faith of a Christian." He was directed to withdraw. Later, however, he entered the House and took his seat above the bar, and was only removed by the interposition of the Serjeant-at-Arms. The House of Commons agreed to a resolution in the same form as in the case of the Baron de Rothschild. "In the meantime, however," says Sir Erskine May, "he had not only sat in the House, but had voted in three divisions; and if the House had done him an injustice, there was now an opportunity for obtaining a judicial construction of the statutes by the courts of law. By the judgment of the Court of Exchequer affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, it was soon placed beyond further doubt, that no authority short of a statute was competent to dispense with those words which Mr. Salomons had omitted from the oath of abjuration." Sampford Courtenay, THE BATTLE OF (August, 1549), was fought between Lord Russell and the Western insurgents, resulting in the final defeat of the latter. Sampson, THOMAS (b. 1517, d. 1589), one of the Reformers of the reign of Edward VI., was compelled to live abroad during the Marian persecution on account of his religious opinions. Sancroft, WILLIAM (b. 1616, d. 1693), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Fressingfield, in Suffolk, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Ejected from his fellowship in 1649 for royalism, he remained in exile till Charles II.'s accession. In 1662 he was made master of his college, Dean of York and Bishop of London in succession, and in 1677 archbishop. Soon after the accession of James II. he came into collision with the king. On the promulgation of the Declaration of Indulgence, Sancroft and six of his suffragans presented a petition to the king against the measure. In consequence, the seven prelates were committed to the Tower (June, 1688), and tried in the Court of King's Bench for misdemeanour (June 28), but the jury, in spite of pressure from the government, acquitted them. Sancroft was an honest but narrow-minded man, a strong Tory and High Churchman. Though he led the Seven Bishops against James II., he advocated the regency scheme in the Convention Parliament, and ended by refusing to take the oaths to William and Mary. He was sus-pendent from his see in 1691, and died two years later at Fressingfield.

Sanctuary was the name given to a place privileged as a safe refuge for criminals and political offenders. All churches and churchyards were, down to Henry VIII.'s time, invested with this protective power. The possible stay in sanctuary of any fugitive was strictly limited to a period of forty days, at the expiration of which time he was bound to quit the realm by the nearest port assigned him by the coroner to whom he had communicated the circumstances of his case. During his journey to the sea-coast for the purpose of carrying out this self-banishment, the claimant of sanctuary privileges was guaranteed immunity from molestation as he journeyed on, cross in hand. In Henry III.'s reign, Hubert de Burgh's non-compliance with the forty days' sanctuary regulation, placed him in the hands of his enemies. By Henry VII.'s time, the custom of sanctuary was very much abused, having become the means of shielding criminals of all kinds from justice, and at his request Pope Innocent VIII. made three important alterations in it. First, that if a man, while enjoying the privileges of sanctuary, should take advantage of his position to commit some further offence against the laws of his country, he should at once and for ever forfeit the benefit of sanctuary; secondly, that the benefit of sanctuary should be strictly limited to a man's personal safety, and in no degree apply to the protection of his private property; thirdly, that when treason was the motive for seeking sanctuary, the king might have the offender specially looked to. By 27 Henry VIII., c. 19, sanctuary men were ordered to wear distinctive badges, and were forbidden to carry weapons, or to be out at nights, on pain of forfeiture of their privileges. Until the twenty-first year of James I., the custom still continued, and criminals continued to seek refuge in the places to which the privilege of sanctuary was attached; at this time, however, a statute was passed abolishing sanctuary privileges altogether.

Sanders, DR. NICHOLAS (d. 1581), was educated at Winchester, and afterwards became fellow of New College, Oxford. An ardent Romanist, he left England in 1558, and was present at the Council of Trent. In 1572 the English refugees sent him to Rome to try and get help. In 1575 he had to leave Rome without having accomplished anything. In 1577 he was in Spain, but was again unsuccessful. He in the same year published a book called, The Origin and Progress of the English Schism. He accompanied Stukeley, but, unable to persuade Philip to send more men, he remained in Spain. On July 17, 1579, he, as legate, landed with Fitzmaurice at Dingle. He attached himself to the Earl of Desmond, had many narrow escapes, and by 1580 he had come to the conclusion that Ireland could not be saved by the Irish. He left Smerwick before the siege. The manner of his death is uncertain.

Sandilli was a Kaffir chief who took an active part in the war against the colonists in 1846.

San Domingo is the name given by the Spaniards to the island of Hayti. It was discovered by Christopher Columbus about 1493, and soon became a valuable plantation. In 1586, war having broken out between England and Spain, Sir Francis Drake took the town of San Domingo. Meanwhile the western part of the island had been colonised by the French, and was ceded to them by the Treaty of Ryswick (q.v.). It was off San Domingo that Admiral Rodney, in 1782, defeated and captured the French admiral, De Grasse. After the English expeditions against the island ceased, it was contended for by the French and Spaniards, the native population being ready to rebel whenever a chance presented itself. The struggle for freedom on their part, under Toussaint L'Ouverture, in 1801, aroused great admiration in this country. San Domingo is now a free republic.

Sandwich, EDWARD MONTAGU, EARL OF (b. 1625, d. 1672), son of Sir Sidney Montagu, took the popular side in the Civil Wars, fought at Marston Moor, and commanded a regiment in the New Model. In 1645 he entered the House of Commons as knight of the shire for Huntingdon, and acted with the Independents till 1648. In the years from 1648 to 1653 he took no part in political life, but in 1653 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the Admiralty, and joined Blake in the command of the fleet. In 1659 he communicated with the king, and used his command of the fleet charged to arbitrate between Denmark and Sweden, to forward the Restoration. For this service he was made Earl of Sandwich. In the first Dutch War he commanded a squadron at the battle of Harwich (June 3, 1665), and commanded at the attack on the Dutch fleet at Bergen (Aug. 12). Obligated by attacks in Parliament to give up the command of the fleet, he was appointed ambassador to Spain, and succeeded in 1668 in bringing about the treaty which secured the independence of Portugal. He was killed in the battle of Southwold Bay.

Sandwich, JOHN, 4TH EARL OF (b. 1718, d. 1792), early in life obtained public offices of importance. As plenipotentiary to the States-General, he signed in 1748 the preliminaries of the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. He became First Lord of the Admiralty on his return to England, and became so intimately connected with the Bedford faction, that when Pelham wished in 1751 to rid himself of that faction, he began by the dismissal of Lord Sandwich. During the next twelve years, Lord Sandwich was out of office, and was much more congenially employed with the gay brotherhood of Medmenham, of which he was a conspicuous member. In 1763 he became First Lord of the Admiralty, and the same year was made one of the Secretaries of State as a colleague of Lord Halifax. In this post he signalled himself by his violent denunciation of Wilkes, of whom he had but lately been a boon companion. As the head of a department, he was in his proper sphere, for his industry, as Walpole says, was so remarkable that the world mistook it for abilities. In 1765 he was guilty of using the meanest misrepresentation to the king in order to induce him to strike out the name of the Princess of Wales from the Regency Bill. The king was furiously indignant; and within two months dismissed the ministry. In 1767, when the Duke of Grafton made an alliance with the Bedford faction, Lord Sandwich "took over the salary and the patronage of the Post Office." He remained in that office until the Grafton ministry gave way to Lord North's administration, in which Sandwich returned to the Admiralty. He failed signally both in the general conduct of business and in reducing the revolted colonies. In April, 1779, Fox attacked him fiercely. Narrowly escaping a direct vote of censure, Sandwich fell with Lord North in 1782, and thenceforth lived in retirement, unrespected and unloved.

Sandys, EDWIN, Archbishop of York (b. 1519, d. 1588), was at the time of Edward VI.'s death Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge and a zealous Protestant. He favoured Northumberland's scheme, and preached a powerful sermon in favour of Lady Jane Grey, for which he was sent to the Tower, and subsequently compelled to leave the country. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England and became Bishop of Worcester, and in 1570 Bishop of London, in which capacity he exhibited much rigour towards the Nonconformists. In 1576 he was made Archbishop of York.

Sandys, SAMUEL, was first returned for Worcester in 1717, but did not become prominent until 1741, when he was chosen to bring forward a motion for the removal of Sir Robert Walpole from the king's council. His speech, "probably concerted with the principal Opposition leaders, was elaborate and able." But the motion was lost by a large majority. On the fall of Walpole he became Chancellor of the Exchequer under Wilmington, but soon afterwards resigned office, being raised to the peerage and receiving a place in the royal household.

San Juan Award. The question as to the boundary westwards between Canada and the United States having been submitted to the arbitration of the German Emperor William, the following award was given:— That according to the Treaty of Washington (1846) the boundary, after it had been continued westward along the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and had further been drawn southerly through the middle of the said channel and of Fuca Straits to the Pacific, should run through the canal of Haro as claimed by the United States, and not through the Rosario Straits as claimed by the British government. San Juan itself was a small island near Vancouver's Island, and by this award became American territory. It was evacuated by England in consequence (1873).

Sanguhar Declaration. This was issued by Richard Cameron, Donald Cargill, and others of the extreme Covenanters at Sanguhar in Dumfriesshire (June, 1680). It declared that Charles II. had forfeited the crown of Scotland "by his perjury and breach of covenant both to God and His kirk." Charles was at the same time excommunicated by Cargill. [CAMERONIANS.]

San Sebastian. THE SIEGE OF, during the last campaign of the war in the Peninsula (Aug. 31, 1813), was necessary, to enable Wellington to cross the Pyrenees and conduct the war in France. The first siege was begun on July 10, 1813; but an assault on the town on the 25th was repulsed with terrible loss. Wellington, repairing to San Sebastian, ordered Graham to turn the siege into a blockade. During nine days of ceaseless movement, ten engagements had been fought, the effect of which was that Soult was in retreat, while Wellington's position was so strong, that he was secure from offensive action on the part of the French, and could resume the siege of San Sebastian under the direction of Graham. The natural and artificial difficulties of the siege were very great, but they were intensified by the negligence of the government at home, who would not supply a sufficiently large fleet or suitable ammunition. Still the works went on gradually, under the energetic commander; various positions were successively won, and on the 30th, 500 yards of the eastern sea-front were laid open. On the morning of the 31st, the assault was made, and after a terrible attack the town was carried, though the castle held out. For some days the town became the scene of atrocities "which would have shamed the most ferocious barbarians of antiquity." When the troops had in some measure recovered, batteries were raised against the castle, which surrendered on Sept. 8, leaving Wellington free to transfer the war into the south of France.

Santal Revolt. The Santals were a tribe inhabiting the hill ranges of Rajmahal. Being harassed by the processes and bailiffs of the courts, and by the demands of Bengalee money-lenders, they suddenly rose in rebellion (July, 1855), and carried fire and destruction among the villages of the Europeans. No troops were available but the hill rangers, who were driven back. The railway now for the first time brought up troops; the rebels were hemmed in and hunted down; the cholera likewise made great havoc among them. The rebellion was extinguished on the last day of the year. The district was now converted into a non-regulation province, and placed in charge of a commissioner.

Saragossa. THE BATTLE OF (1710), was fought during the War of the Succession in Spain. After the defeat at Almanza, King Philip hastily retreated on Saragossa. The allies followed with difficulty. On Aug. 19 Stanhope found the Spaniards drawn up before Saragossa, with the Ebro on their left, a range of hills upon their right, with a deep ravine on their front. The Archduke Charles determined to risk a battle. Stanhope commanded the left of the allies formed of the English, Dutch, and Palatines, and eked out his cavalry by interspersing among them some battalions of foot. The allies' right wing consisted of Portuguese foot, and a part of the Germans under Count Atalaya. The Spaniards had about twenty-five, and the allies about twenty-three thousand men. The left was the first to engage. Then the Portuguese at once made off, attracting large bodies of the enemy in pursuit. The remainder of the allies steadily stood their ground, and at length drove back the enemy. On the right, the Dutch and Germans soon threw the enemy into confusion. In the centre the veteran Spaniards, after a steady resistance to Staremberg, retreated in good order. Six thousand prisoners were taken, with a large number of cannon, and possession of Saragossa was secured to the victors. After considerable debate, the allies, in accordance with Stanhope's desire, advanced on Madrid.

Sardinian Convention (1855). On Jan. 26 the King of Sardinia acceded to the convention between the English and French governments of April 10, 1854, and agreed to furnish and maintain at full for the requirements of the war 15,000 men under the command of a Sardinian general. By a separate article England and France agreed to guarantee the integrity of the king's dominions. England undertook the charges of transporting the troops to and from the Crimea, and under the treaty a recommendation was to be made to Parliament to advance a million sterling to the King of Sardinia at four per cent. [CRIMEAN WAR.]

Saratoga, THE CONVENTION OF (Oct., 1777), during the American War of Independence, was the closing scene of General Burgoyne's disastrous campaign, which resulted in his retreat on Saratoga, where he found himself (Oct. 10, 1777) with 3,500 men opposed to Gates with 13,216 men. Burgoyne receiving no tidings of Clinton, with scarcity in his army developing almost into famine, made proposals for negotiations. Gates offered terms, which were at once rejected as degrading, and not wishing to drive to despair a body of brave men, he finally agreed to the terms proposed by Burgoyne. The chief of these were that the troops should lay down their arms, and should be allowed a free passage to England, on condition that they would not again engage in the war, and that the treaty should be called a convention, and not a capitulation. These terms were agreed to on the 17th, and on that day the British troops marched out. The importance of the surrender was felt throughout the world, as was shown by the fact that France at once acknowledged the "Independent United States of America," and entered into a treaty with them. Spain followed the lead of France, and Holland did not long remain neutral. Lord Stanhope has said of it, that "even of those great conflicts, in which hundreds of thousands have been engaged, and tens of thousands have fallen, none has been more fruitful of results than this surrender of thirty-five hundred fighting men at Saratoga."

Sarsfield, PATRICK (d. 1693), was an Irish Jacobite of great military genius. He held a commission in the English life-guards, and served under Monmouth on the continent. He fought brilliantly at the battle of Sedgemoor against his former general. Soon after the landing of the Prince of Orange he was defeated in a skirmish at Wincanton. He sat for the county of Dublin in the Irish Parliament of 1688. In 1689 he was sent by James II. as commander into Connaught. He secured Galway, and drove the English from Sligo. Shortly afterwards James created him Earl of Lucan. He was present at the battle of the Boyne, and insisted on making a stand at Limerick against the advice of Tyrconnel. He surprised the English artillery and compelled William to raise the siege (Aug., 1690). His administration of that town was not altogether successful. On the arrival of the French general, St. Ruth, he soon quarrelled with him; and his advice to avoid a battle, given after the fall of Athlone, was pertinaciously disregarded. At the battle of Aghrim he commanded the reserve, and through some misunderstanding never received orders to charge. He covered the retreat. Once more his arrangements for making a stand at Limerick were hampered by his colleagues. The death of Tyrconnel, however, left him in supreme command, but he soon despaired of the defence. He therefore opened negotiations with Ginkell. Limerick capitulated on Oct. 3, 1691, and the majority of its garrison chose to follow Sarsfield into the French service. He was given a command in the intended French invasion of England in 1692. He fought with great gallantry in the French ranks at the battle of Steinkirk, and was mortally wounded at Landen. "A perishing nationality," says Ranke, referring to Sarsfield, "has sometimes men granted to it in whom its virtues are represented."

Sauchie Burn, THE BATTLE OF (June 18, 1488), resulted in the defeat and death of James III. of Scotland at the hands of his insurgent barons, headed by Angus "Bell the Cat," Home, Hepburn, and Bothwell, who had plotted to get hold of James's son to make use of him against his father's authority.

Saunders, ADMIRAL SIR CHARLES (d. 1775), served under Anson in his expedition to the South Seas. In 1741 he became post-captain. In 1747 he aided Hawke in his victory over the French, and in 1750 was returned for Plymouth. He became Treasurer of Greenwich Hospital (1754), and Comptroller of the Navy (1755). In 1757 Saunders was appointed commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean squadron, and in the following year became rear-admiral. In 1759 he commanded the fleet which conveyed Wolfe to Quebec. He received the thanks of the House of Commons for his co-operation, Pitt calling him a man "equalling those who have taken armadas." In 1760 he went to the Mediterranean as commander-in-chief. He was made vice-admiral. In 1765 he became Lord of the Admiralty. Saunders subsequently became First Lord of the Admiralty and Privy Councillor (1766), and admiral in 1770. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Savile, SIR GEORGE (b. 1721, d. 1784), came of an old Yorkshire family, which county he represented through five successive elections. He did not often speak in Parliament, but there was perhaps no one in the House more thoroughly respected as a man of liberal principles and unbending integrity; and he was one of the most reliable bulwarks of the Whig party. He was a strenuous and consistent opponent of the American War in all its stages. He resisted the prosecution of Wilkes. He was the first to relieve in some measure the disabilities of Roman Catholics, by carrying a bill for that purpose in 1778; and he was consequently one of the principal sufferers by the Gordon Riots. Later, he brought in a bill against Popish conversions.

But perhaps the most celebrated measure connected with the name of Sir George Savile is the Nullum Tempus Bill, which had its origin in an attempt on the part of the ministry and the crown to put into force against the Duke of Portland the old maxim "Nullum tempus occurrit regi"—"that no length of continuance or good faith of possession is available against a claim of the crown." Savile's bill abolished this maxim—"the opprobrium of prerogative and the disgrace of our law"—by providing that an uninterrupted enjoyment for sixty years of an estate derived from the crown should bar the crown from reclaiming its gift under pretence of any flaw in the grant or other defect of title.

Savile, SIR HENRY (b. 1549, d. 1622), a man of great learning, was tutor in Greek to Queen Elizabeth. In 1585 he became warden of Merton College, and in 1596 provost of Eton. At Oxford he founded the Savilian professorships of geometry and astronomy. This "magazine of learning," as he was called, edited, amongst other works, four books of the History and the Agricola of Tacitus, the works of St. Chrysostom, and a useful collection of the old chroniclers, which he styled Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores post Bedam Præcipui (1596).

Savoy, BONIFACE OF, Archbishop of Canterbury (1245—1270), was a prince of the reigning house of Savoy, and uncle of Henry III.'s queen. To this he owed his early advancement to the archbishopric, for which he had very few qualifications. His rule was intensely unpopular, as that of a foreigner and dependent of the court. He has made little mark in the history of his see. The palace of the Savoy in the Strand took its name from his brother Peter.

Hook, Archbishops of Canterbury, vol. iii.

Savoy Conference, THE (1661), was held in the Savoy Palace for the purpose of discussing the relations of the Puritans towards the Church, and the proposed changes in the Liturgy. It consisted of twelve bishops, among whom were Cosin, Sanderson, Pearson, and Sparrow; and twelve Puritan divines, including Baxter, Calamy, Reynolds, and Lightfoot. After sitting from April 15 to July 24, they came to no practical conclusion, and reported that "The Church's welfare, unity, and peace, and his majesty's satisfaction, were ends upon which they were all agreed; but as to means, they could not come to any harmony." The failure of the Savoy Conference excluded a large number of Puritans from the Church. [For the alterations in the Liturgy, which so far as they had any effect emphasised rather than minimised

the differences between Anglican and Puritan, see PRAYER BOOK.]

Sawtre, WILLIAM (d. 1401), a clergyman at one time beneficed at Lynn, and later in London, was the first person burnt in England for Lollardy. Proceedings were taken against him during the same session in which the Act, De heretico comburendo, was embodied in the statute of the year; but his execution on the simple authority of the king's writ has given some occasion for controversy as to whether, before the passing of the new Act, the king had power to issue writs De heretico comburendo. The absence of precedent, however, makes the supposition improbable.

Sawyer, SIR ROBERT, an eminent Tory lawyer, was Attorney-General at the time of the Rye House Plot, and distinguished himself by his zeal, if not rancour, in prosecuting the Whigs concerned in that measure. Continuing long in office, in 1686 he refused to help James II. in vindicating the dispensing power, yet such was his fame, and the difficulty of getting a successor, that he was not dismissed till 1688. He was leading counsel for the Seven Bishops, and after raising difficulties, accepted the Revolution. In 1690 he was violently attacked for his conduct in relation to the trial of Sir R. Armstrong, a Rye House plotter, excepted from the Act of Indemnity, and expelled the House of Commons.

Saxons, THE. The earliest contemporary reference to Saxons in extant literature—that of the geographer Ptolemy, who wrote about 120 A.D.—describes them as dwelling in the country now called Holstein, and three adjoining islands. They are next mentioned as fringing the sea-board of the ocean. In 287, when the first authentic notice of their piracies and plunderings was written, they had not only stamped their name on the British coast [SAXON SHORE], but extended it over the northern lands between the Elbe and the Ems; and in the seventh century broad tracts of Britain, and broader tracts of Germany between the Rhine and the Oder, were in the possession of people called by their name. Those that stayed in Germany were long known as Old Saxons, to distinguish them from the settlers beyond the sea. Those clung tenaciously to their primitive usages and national forms of rule after the others had begun to abandon them. Whether the expansion of the Saxon name on the Continent was due to immigration and conquest, as it was in Britain, is, though possible, extremely doubtful. It is thought more likely that it was merely extended to a number of separate but neighbouring tribes already inhabiting those regions, as the common designation of a huge confederacy. Such peoples as the Chauci and Cherusci, while keeping their proper tribe names among themselves, would be called Saxons by those that were outside the confederacy, just as Salii and Ubii were known as Franks. This is the readiest way of explaining the sudden spring of the Saxons from an obscure tribe, confined to a narrow territory, into a greatness and notoriety that have left a broad mark on human destiny. From the third to the sixth centuries these Saxons were swarming in their "keels" over and up and down the narrow seas, spoiling and wasting the property, and at length depopulating and seizing the soil of civilised peoples within their reach. If Claudian be believed, they watered the Orkneys with their blood; they certainly founded several kingdoms in Britain, and at least one settlement in Gaul. So deep was the impression made by their strength, ferocity, and persistence on the men whose lands they took that these men gave their name to all the German invaders, and, later still, their subjugation in their native homes cost Charlemagne a generation of effort. Ethnology classes them as a Low German race, with fewer and fainter affinities of language and character to the High German than their partners in conquest, the Angles. The fair hair, blue eye, and robust animal nature, characteristic of the southern English peasant, are ascribed to his Saxon origin. The derivative meaning of the name is disputed; it has been variously interpreted as seamen, users of the short knife (seax), settlers (sas), adversaries (sachs), and other things. Their efficiency as makers of history in early days is traced to their having been untouched by Roman civilisation, to their long continuance, as Professor Freeman words it, "in a state of healthy barbarism."

Saxon Shore, THE, was in Roman times that part of Britain especially liable to the inroads of the Saxon pirates. This necessitated the presence of a large force of Roman soldiers. Their commander was the Comes Litoris Saxonici (Count of the Saxon Shore), whose jurisdiction extended from Norfolk to Sussex. There is no reason for believing, as some have maintained, that the Saxon Shore was inhabited by "Saxon" colonies. The expression "Litus Saxonicum" is exactly analogous to the Welsh March of later times, which meant the district specially open to Welsh attacks.

Say, WILLIAM FIENNES, VISCOUNT (b. 1585, d. 1662), educated at Winchester and at New College, Oxford, succeeded his father as Lord Say in 1613, and was created viscount in 1624.

He was a strong Puritan, "for many years the oracle of those who were called Puritans in the worst sense, and steered all their counsels and designs" (Clarendon). He was one of the founders of the colony of Connecticut, and thought of emigrating himself. He was also one of the foremost opponents of ship-money, but the government preferred to try Hampden's case rather than his. In 1639 he was committed to custody for refusing to take the military oath against the Scots required by the king. He was appointed in May, 1641, Master of the Court of Wards, when the king thought of winning the popular leaders by preferment, but remained firm, voted for the exclusion of the bishops, became a member of the committee of safety, and raised a regiment of foot for the Parliament. He continued to sit in the House of Lords until its abolition. In 1648 he acted as one of the Parliamentary commissioners at the Treaty of Newport, and voted in favour of an accommodation with the king. Cromwell appointed him to sit in his House of Lords, but he refused to accept the offer. In 1660 he took part in the intrigues to bring about the Restoration, and was rewarded by being made Lord Privy Seal. His contemporaries charged him with duplicity, and nicknamed him "old subtlety."

Say and Sele, JAMES FIENNES, LORD (d. 1450), was Treasurer of England from 1448 to 1450, and a strong supporter of the Duke of Suffolk. Hence he gained great unpopularity, and, on the insurgents under Jack Cade reaching London, he was seized, and after a mock trial beheaded.

Say and Sele, WILLIAM FIENNES, 2ND LORD (d. 1471), son of the preceding, fought on the Yorkist side at Northampton. He was subsequently made Lord High Admiral by Edward IV., fled with the king in 1470, and, returning in the next year, was slain in the battle of Barnet.

Scales, THOMAS, LORD (d. 1460), distinguished himself in the French wars and in repressing Jack Cade's rebellion. He was a faithful follower of the Lancastrian cause, and in 1460, after the battle of Northampton, was captured by the Yorkists, and put to death.

Schaub, SIR LUKE, was a Swiss in the British service. He first appears in 1718 as the confidential secretary to Stanhope in Spain. In 1720 he was knighted, and sent as minister to Paris in 1721, and in the following year received from the regent communications concerning Atterbury's Jacobite plot which led to its detection. He returned to England in 1724, having attempted, as the friend of Carteret, to obtain a dukedom for the intended husband of a daughter of Madame de Platen, the sister of the king's mistress, the Countess of Darlington. Horace Walpole was sent by Townshend to counteract his designs, and, as the affairs were at a deadlock, George was compelled to recall him. His subsequent diplomatic career was unimportant.

Schism Act, THE, was passed in May, 1714. It was a measure devised by the extreme High Church party, and encouraged by Bolingbroke as a party move against Oxford. It was introduced by Sir William Wyndham. Its object was to confirm a clause in the Act of Uniformity which precluded schoolmasters and tutors from giving instruction without previously subscribing a declaration of conformity to the Established Church. This restriction, although not abolished by the Toleration Act, had long been practically suspended. The Schism Act therefore imposed severe penalties on all tutors and schoolmasters who presumed to instruct without having first received a licence from a bishop. It easily passed its two first stages, but at the third reading it was vigorously opposed by the Whigs. In the Upper House several amendments were made in committee. Teachers merely of reading, writing, arithmetic, and navigation were excluded from its operations. The power of convicting offenders was lodged in the superior courts alone. By an absurd clause, the tutors of the sons of noblemen were declared exempt from its restriction. But the bill was most unjustly extended to Ireland. This iniquitous measure was repealed, together with the Occasional Conformity Act, in spite of much opposition, in 1717.

Schleswig-Holstein Question, THE (1863). The long desire of the patriotic party in Germany to detach from Denmark the German Elbe duchies, which already in 1848 had caused a serious war, came to a head in the quarrel between the two countries in 1863. Throughout the negotiations Lord Russell had given the Danish government sound and sensible advice, to the effect that they must treat the German populations of those two provinces fairly, and give no ground of complaint to the German government. On July 23, 1863, when the struggle seemed approaching, Lord Palmerston was questioned as to the course England intended to pursue during the struggle, if such should arise, and he replied: "We are convinced—I am convinced, at least—that if any violent attempt were made to overthrow the rights and interfere with the independence of Denmark, those who made the attempt would find in the result that it would not be Denmark alone with which they would have to contend." This statement Lord Palmerston afterwards explained to be merely intended to convey his own impression that, in the event of Denmark being attacked, some European power would interfere; but it was undoubtedly taken at the time to mean that England would support Denmark. The Danes, therefore, counted on England, and the English public was eager for war. The English government proposed to France to intervene with arms, but the French emperor refused. The Danes were consequently left to take care of themselves. The English conduct, however, though prudent, had been decidedly open to censure, for, whether intentionally or not, the government had certainly led Denmark to believe in English assistance. When, therefore, the war was ended and Denmark crushed, a vote of censure was proposed in both Houses by the Opposition. In the Lords the vote was carried; in the Commons Mr. Disraeli made a most telling speech against the government policy, and the vote was only averted by an amendment which evaded the question entirely.

Schomberg, FREDERICK HERMANN, COUNT OF (b. 1618, d. 1690), was born at Heidelberg. His father was an officer in the household of the Elector Palatine, his mother an English lady of the Dudley family. As a Protestant, he fought against the Imperialists in the Thirty Years' War, for the Dutch, Swedes, and French. After the Peace of Westphalia (1648) he became chamberlain to the Prince of Orange. In 1650 he repaired to France, and served under Turenne until the Peace of the Pyrenees (1660). He then entered the Portuguese service, and it was chiefly by his assistance that that country compelled Spain to recognise the sovereignty of the house of Braganza (1668). He then returned to France, where he was naturalised, and obtained the bâton of a marshal of France (1675). During the next years he served in Flanders. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes caused a complete change in his fortunes. After a short visit to Portugal, to negotiate a marriage between Pedro II. and Maria Sophia, daughter of the Elector Palatine, he entered the service of Frederic William, the "Great Elector" of Brandenburg. On the death of that prince, his successor, Frederic, generously gave up the great commander to aid William of Orange in the execution of his plans. He was immediately made William's second in command, and rode side by side with him through the streets of London. He was made Knight of the Garter, created duke, and appointed Master of the Ordnance. The Commons voted £100,000 to him in gratitude for his services. In 1689 he was placed at the head of an expedition to Ireland, his forces consisting mainly of raw recruits. He landed in the north of Ulster, took Carrickfergus, and marched into Leinster. Outside Dundalk he declined battle with the enemy, who were greatly superior in numbers. Still James's army did not attack, and the duke retired into Ulster for winter quarters. His conduct was severely but unjustly criticised in England. In June, 1690, William landed at Carrickfergus at the head of a large army. Schomberg met him near Belfast, and the united troops marched on the Boyne. He pronounced strongly against William's intention of attacking the Irish there. The battle was won; when Schomberg, seeing the enemy's cavalry making a gallant resistance, rushed at them, crying aloud to his Huguenot troops, "Come on, gentlemen; there are your persecutors." They were his last words. "His military skill," says Macaulay, "was universally acknowledged. For his religion he had resigned a splendid income, had laid down the truncheon of a marshal of France, and had, at nearly eighty years of age, begun the world again as a needy soldier of fortune." Schomberg, MEINHART (d. 1709), second son of Marshal Schomberg, commanded William III.'s right wing at the battle of the Boyne. He marched some miles up the river, and crossed it by the bridge of Slane, thus turning the French flank and rear. In 1691 his father's services and his own were rewarded by creating him Duke of Leinster. In 1693 he was placed at the head of an expedition against the coast of Brittany. But Russell and the other English admirals decided that the year was too far advanced for such an enterprise. Consequently the armament never set out. After the outbreak of the war of the Spanish Succession, he was placed at the head of an English and Dutch force, which disembarked at Lisbon. He proved inefficient, and was soon afterwards recalled, and Galway sent out in his stead. "Schomberg," says Mr. Wyon, "seems to have been one of those weak men, who, when beset with difficulties, can do nothing but sit down and complain."

Silly Islands, THE, were inhabited in the earliest times as the abundance of pre-historic remains found there shows. They were probably the Cassiterides of the Greek writers. Their position exposed them to Danish occupation. In 938 they were conquered, either from the Danes or the Cornish Welsh, by Athelstan, and were granted to the monks of Tresco. Afterwards they were transferred to the Abbey of Tavistock. They became part of the Duchy of Cornwall. Queen Elizabeth granted them on lease to the Godolphin family. They afterwards were leased by the Duke of Leeds. The lessee has very considerable powers. In the Civil War they held out for Charles under Sir John Granville, and became a centre for privateers. In 1651 Blake reduced them to obedience to the Commonwealth.

Scinde is the country comprising the lower valley and delta of the Indus. It was divided into three principalities, Upper Scinde, Meerpoore, and Lower Scinde. The rulers of these provinces were called Ameers, and were almost as independent of each other as the princes of Rajpootana; and Lord Auckland, in consequence, entered into separate treaties with them in 1839, which imposed on them a subsidiary force and tribute. They had formerly been dependent on Cabul, but had not paid any tribute since 1800. Their secret hostility to the English during the Afghan expedition of 1839 compelled the latter to take some steps against them, and they were forced to accede to a subsidiary alliance. During the three subsequent years in which Afghanistan was occupied by our troops, and Scinde had become the basis of our operations beyond the Indus, their conduct was marked with good faith if not cordiality. They permitted a free passage to the troops; they supplied the garrisons of Cabul and Candahar and other places with provisions. But two or three of the Ameers were emboldened to hostility by our reverses; and Lord Ellenborough, on hearing of this, determined to inflict signal chastisement on them. Sir Charles Napier (q.v.) was sent to Scinde to inquire into the matter (September, 1843). Violently prejudiced against the Ameers, he soon declared that the treaty of 1839 had been violated, and the draft of a very disadvantageous treaty was forwarded to be negotiated with the Ameers. The intrigues of Ali Moorad, one of the Ameers, who desired to become rais, or lord paramount of Upper Scinde, to the exclusion of Meer Roostum, caused Sir Charles to believe that all the Ameers, except Ali Moorad, were disaffected. Meer Roostum was so alarmed by his attitude that he fled to the camp of Ali Moorad. The double traitor thereupon persuaded Sir Charles that this was intended as an insult, and a proclamation was issued deposing Meer Roostum, and appointing Ali Moorad rais in his place. To show his power, Sir Charles captured Emangurb, a fort deemed inaccessible. A conference was now held at Hyderabad between Major Outram and the assembled Ameers, who denied that they had infringed the treaty. The city was in a state of commotion, and on the 15th a large body of Beloochee troops attacked the Residency.

After a gallant defence of three hours, Major Outram retired with the loss of seventeen killed, wounded, and missing, to the armed steamer anchored in the river. Sir Charles Napier now marched on Hyderabad, and came upon the Beloochee army at Meanee (Feb. 17, 1843), where a complete victory was gained. Lord Ellenborough now issued a proclamation annexing Scinde. This was followed (March 22, 1843) by a decisive victory near Hyderabad. The complete subjugation of the country followed. The Ameers were pensioned off at Benares, and are State pensioners still. Sir Charles Napier himself remarked of these proceedings, "We have no right to seize Scinde, yet we shall do so, and a very advantageous, useful, and humane piece of rascality it will be."

Scindia, the name of one of the chief Mahratta princes. The first of the house was Ranojee Scindia, a feudatory of the Peishwa, who in 1743 received as a fief from that chieftain a considerable territory in Malwa. His son Mahdajee Scindia (1750—1794), after nearly losing life and territory in the Afghan War, became the most important of the Mahratta princes. As guarantee of the Treaty of Salbhye (1782), as conqueror of Gwalior in 1784, as the champion of the Mogul against the Sikhs, and as the first native prince who endeavoured, with the aid of French officers, to discipline his army after the European model, he plays a great part in the history of his times. "He was," says Grant Duff, "a man of great political sagacity and considerable genius, of deep artifice, restless ambition, and implacable revenge." He handed on his power to his grand nephew, Dowlut Rao Scindia (1794—1827). The latter joined the great Mahratta confederacy, which was broken up at Argauum and Assaye. He had to surrender much of his territory, and ruled quietly over the diminished territory of Gwalior until his death. The next important event in the history of the Scindias is the minority of Bhagerat Rao Scindia, when British intervention to stop the anarchy which the minority occasioned led to the Mahratta War of 1843, and the temporary occupation of Gwalior by the English. At a later date Bhagerat Rao did his best for the English during the mutiny of 1858.

Scone, situated on the east bank of the Tay in the old district of Gowrie, became the capital of the Pictish kingdom, and continued to be regarded as the seat of royalty in later history. The Moot Hill, or Hill of Belief, at Scone was the place of assembly for the king's counsellors, and it was at Scone that the Coronation Stone, or Stone of Destiny, was "reverently kept for the consecration of the Kings of Alban" until it was removed to Westminster by Edward I. In 729 Scone was the scene of a conflict between Alpin, King of the Picts, and Nectan. Many of the later Kings of Scotland, notably Malcolm Canmore, Alexander III., Robert Bruce, Robert II., and James I., were crowned there, as well as Charles II. in 1651.

Scoory, JOHN, Bishop of Hereford, obtained the see of Rochester (1551) as a reward for his support of the Reformation. He was afterwards translated to Chichester, but was deprived of his preferment on the accession of Mary. He subsequently assisted at the consecration of Bishop Parker in 1559, receiving as the price of his support the see of Hereford. He then, in conjunction with Bishop Barlow, assisted the archbishop to consecrate the other prelates appointed by Elizabeth. He was a man of indifferent character, and of no very great influence.

Scotale is an obscure term denoting an oppressive local custom in towns, which was levied by the sheriff for his own profit. Some have thought that the sheriff could compel the burgesses to grant him quantities of malt, from which the Scotale was brewed, and which belonged to him. Others maintain that the name simply indicates a meeting of the townsmen, in which they were forced to contribute to the same object, or at which heavy fines were exacted on those absent. To obtain exemption from scotale was a great object for the towns in the early stages of the history of corporate town-life. It was probably so important because a step towards their being freed from the jurisdiction of the sheriff. The etymology of scotale is uncertain. Probably it simply comes from scot and ale, though some have thought that the latter syllable comes from tallie, a payment, or hall, as in gildhall.

Scot and Lot literally signifies "taxes in general," and "the share paid by each household." In many towns municipal privileges were vested in all those who paid "scot and lot," i.e., those who bore their rateable proportion in the payments levied from the town for local or national purposes.

Scotland. The history of Scotland has been more influenced than that of most other countries by the physical features of the land. The southern part of the modern kingdom differs little in character and conformation from the north of England. This part, known as the Lowlands, is pleasantly diversified with hill and dale, well watered and well wooded, affording rich tracts of pasture and arable land. North of the Lowlands the country is almost intersected by the two Firths of Forth and Clyde, and beyond the firths it wholly changes its character and becomes barren and mountainous in the west and north. A strip of lowland runs north along the eastern coast. The early inhabitants of these districts differed as much in race as the country in aspect. While the indigenous Celts inhabited their native mountains, the southern and eastern lowlands were peopled by English or Scandinavian invaders. When first Scotland emerges from pre-historic obscurity, it is as Caledonia, a country of woods and mountains, so stern and wild that the Romans abandoned their attempted conquest, and had great difficulty in protecting the southern province from the inroads of the fierce inhabitants. They were of the Celtic race, and are vaguely spoken of as Picts and Scots. The first event of which we have any certain knowledge is the introduction of Christianity. It came in the wake of the Scots from Ireland. In the sixth century these Scots settled on the western coast, and founded the nucleus of the Scottish kingdom. Columba, Abbot of Durrow, came over to join them. The King of the Scots gave him the islet of Iona to settle on. Here he, and the twelve monks who shared his fortunes, made a monastery of the rudest kind—a few wattle huts clustered round a wooden church. From this centre they went forth on missionary journeys to the neighbouring mainland and islands. By this means the Picts and the English of Northumbria were converted to Christianity. In 843 the King of Scots, Kenneth MacAlpin, became king of the Picts also. Thus the Celtic peoples north of the firths were nominally united into one kingdom, though the chiefs of the north, whether Celts or Norsemen, were virtually independent sovereigns. In the tenth century Malcolm I., the King of Scots, got possession of Strathclyde. It was granted to him as a territorial fief by Edmund of England. His grandson, Malcolm II., was invested with Lothian, hitherto part of the English earldom of Northumbria (1018). This acquisition influenced the whole after-history of the kingdom. At first merely a dependence of the Celtic kingdom, Lothian finally overshadowed it. The Kings of the Scots identified themselves with this, the richest part of their dominions and with its Teutonic inhabitants, while the Celts of the original kingdom came to be looked on as a subject-race, the natural enemies of the richer and more civilised people of the Lowlands. The reign of Malcolm III., surnamed Canmore (1057—1093), is a turning point in the history of Scotland. His marriage with Margaret, sister of Edgar Atheling, introduced an English element which gave its colour to the national development. There were also other influences at work which all turned in the same direction. The Norman Conquest displaced many Englishmen. Such of these exiles as turned northward were well received at the Scottish court. Territorial grants were conferred upon them.

The English system of land tenure was introduced, and led to the ecclesiastical division into parishes. The Scottish clergy were induced to give up their distinguishing peculiarities, and were brought into conformity with Rome. Malcolm repeatedly invaded England, and his army brought back so many captives, that English slaves fell to the lot of the poorest households. These slaves, more civilised than their Celtic masters, influenced the domestic manners of the people. The frequent aggressions of the Scots provoked retaliation from the Normans. William the Conqueror invaded Scotland (1072), and at Abernethy he compelled Malcolm to acknowledge him as over-lord. This submission was a fertile source of dissension in later times. On the strength of it the English sovereigns laid claim to supremacy over the whole kingdom of Scotland, while the Scots maintained that Malcolm did homage for Strathclyde and Lothian, which he held from the English crown; but in no respect violated the independence of his hereditary kingdom. The purely Celtic period of Scottish history concludes with the accession of Edgar, son of Malcolm (1097). The second period, during which English influence was in the ascendant, was one of continued development. The three sons of Malcolm, Edgar, Alexander, and David, reigned in succession, and carried out more fully the Anglicising policy of their parents. The marriage of their sister Matilda with Henry I. of England strengthened the friendly relations between the kingdoms. The accession of David (1124), who held also the English earldom of Huntingdon, led to a great influx of Normans, to whom the king made large territorial grants. Thus the feudal system was introduced, and took firmer root in Scotland than it ever did in England. Most of the ecclesiastical foundations, as well as the social and political institutions of the later kingdom, date from the reign of David. He founded or restored the six bishoprics of Dunblane, Brechin, Aberdeen, Ross, Caithness, and Glasgow. He endowed many religious houses affiliated with the great monastic orders. Among his foundations was the Abbey of the Holy Rood, which afterwards became the favourite palace of the Scottish sovereigns. He introduced a new code of laws, framed on the English model, appointed sheriffs for the maintenance of order, favoured and encouraged the royal burghs, and added to their number and their privileges. Under Malcolm IV. (1153), David's grandson and successor, Galloway was reduced to direct dependence on the crown, and the isles and western coast were brought to subjection by the defeat and death of Somerled, Earl of Argyle, so that the kingdom now extended to the boundaries of modern Scotland. William the Lion (1165), Malcolm's brother, in his efforts to regain the English earldom of Northumberland was taken prisoner, and to regain his liberty sacrificed the independence of his kingdom, agreeing in the "Convention of Falaise" to hold it as a fief from the English king. About the same time the Scottish Church rejected the claim to superiority over it put forward by the Archbishop of York, and procured a papal bull (1188) confirming their claim of independence of any spiritual authority save that of Rome. The reigns of the Alexanders (II. and III.) was a period of peace and social improvement. The border line between Scotland and England was fixed for the first time (1222). The last and most formidable invasion of the Northmen was repelled in the battle of Largs (1263). The long peace with England, which lasted nearly a century, was marked by rapid internal development. Agriculture flourished, and the proportion of arable land was much increased. The country was opened up by the making of roads and bridges. The extension of trade and commerce brought wealth and consequence to the trading towns. This prosperity was suddenly checked by the sudden death of the king (1286). His grandchild and heir, Margaret, was a young child, absent in her father's kingdom of Norway. This child-queen died before she reached her kingdom. A swarm of competitors appeared to claim the vacant crown. Edward of England, who was appealed to as arbiter, placed it on the head of John Baliol (1292), whom he compelled to acknowledge him as over-lord. John's weakness and incapacity soon embroiled him with his subjects, who compelled him to revolt against England. This gave Edward a pretext for carrying out his cherished scheme of conquering Scotland. With a large army he crossed the Border, deposed the king, received the homage of the nobles and prelates, placed English garrisons in the strongholds, and entrusted the government to Englishmen.

These measures roused a spirit of patriotism among the people, and the War of Independence began. They revolted against the English authority, and under the leadership of William Wallace, defeated the English at Stirling (1297), and slew or expelled the English governors. A second time Edward in person subdued Scotland, Wallace was defeated at Falkirk (1298), taken and put to death; the English rule was re-established. Henceforth Scotland was to be incorporated with England. But just when the subjection of the Scots was deemed complete, they rose again under Robert Bruce, the next heir to the crown after Baliol. Had Edward lived, it is most likely that this effort would have been crushed like the former one. But he died on the Border (1307) just as he was about to enter Scotland for the third time, to subdue it more utterly than before. For seven years the struggle lasted, till the total rout of the English at Bannockburn (1314) re-established the national independence. The "War of Independence" had lasted twenty years, and during that time Scotland had suffered fearfully. Thrice she had been laid waste by foreign invasions. She had been torn in pieces by internal contests, for the struggle had much of the character of a civil war, as many of the Scottish nobles fought on the English side. This war completely changed the current of Scottish history by implanting among the people that bitter hatred of England and every thing English, which was the most strongly marked feature of the national character for centuries to come. This drove them into close alliance with France, the sworn enemy of England. France became the model for imitation, which England had been during the previous period, and French influence tinged the manners, the arts, the learning, and the laws of the succeeding centuries.

This French alliance involved Scotland in the frequent wars between the French and English. Whenever war broke out, Scotland took up arms, and invaded England in favour of her ally. By the Treaty of Northampton (1328) England acknowledged the independence of Scotland. By this treaty the old vexatious claims of superiority were swept away. Henceforward the Lothians and Strathclyde were on the same footing as the Celtic kingdom. The war had welded more firmly into one the different races of which the nation was composed. Throughout the contest it was the Lowlanders who were most determined not to be annexed to England, but to maintain the independence of the Celtic kingdom to which they were joined. The Celts in the north cared little whether the king, to whom they owed a nominal allegiance, reigned in Edinburgh or London. The struggle also brought the people, for the first time, prominently forward in the state. It was by the support of the people and the church that Robert Bruce succeeded in winning the crown. This had two important results. The people obtained a voice in the National Assembly. In the Parliament of Cambuskenneth (1326) the third Estate, the deputies of the burghers, appear for the first time. The baronage was in great part renewed, as Bruce granted to his friends the forfeited estates of his opponents. A law passed to prevent the taking of the produce or revenue of the land out of the kingdom, compelled the holders of land in both England and Scotland to make a definite choice of nationality. Those whose estates in England were the richer left Scotland altogether. Bruce also greatly increased the power of the baronage by granting powers of regality along with the lands. During his life Bruce did what he could to consolidate the kingdom and repair the ravages of the war. But his death (1329) placed a child, his son David, on the throne, and left the country a prey to invasion from without and anarchy within.

The next stage in the history of Scotland extends to the Reformation. During that period reliance on France and distrust of England were the principles of foreign policy. Within the kingdom there was a constant struggle between the crown and the baronage, under whose tyranny the people groaned in vain. The crown was too weak to redress grievances or to maintain law. The king was little better than a chief with a nominal sovereignty over other chiefs, often more powerful than himself. His only means of reducing a rebel subject to subjection was by empowering another to attack him. In a country thus torn by the feuds of a lawless and turbulent baronage there was little room for social improvement. Hence Scotland at the Reformation was little if at all beyond the point of civilisation reached before the outbreak of the War of Independence. The accession of the infant son of Robert Bruce was the signal for the revival of the claims of Baliol. His son Edward was crowned king by his adherents, and civil war again broke out. David was taken by the English, and as he passed most of his life either in captivity or in France, he was the mere shadow of a king, and the government was carried on by a regency. On his death Robert, the grandson of Bruce by his daughter Margery, and the first sovereign of the family of Stuart, mounted the throne. In this family the crown passed from father to child without a break for nearly three centuries. Robert III. succeeded his father. He was so weak both in mind and body that his brother Albany held the reins of government. To maintain himself in power he contrived that his nephew, the heir to the kingdom, should fall into the hands of the English, and on the death of Robert, acted as regent in his nephew's name. To maintain his own position he winked at the misdeeds of the barons, and when James I. was at length released and came to claim his crown (1424), he found himself surrounded by hostile subjects, each one of whom was as powerful as himself. His first care was to break their power by numerous executions. He then turned his attention to maintaining effectively law and judicial reform. By summoning frequent Parliaments, he gave importance to the National Assembly, which in his reign first became defined in the form of the "Estates." The lesser barons who felt the duty of attending Parliament a grievous burden were relieved of it, and allowed to send commissaries, two for every shire. These, with the members for the burghs, formed the third Estate. But they were in no sense representatives of the Commons. Indeed, the Commons of Scotland, outside the burghs, could not be said to be represented in Parliament until the passing of the Reform Bill. The Estates met in one chamber. In this reign the custom of delegating the chief business of the Parliament to a committee became recognised as a regular part of Parliamentary procedure. This committee was called the Lords of the Articles. Its members were elected by the three Estates, and to it was confided the work of maturing the measures to be passed, which were then approved and confirmed in a full Parliament.

From this reign dates also the publication of the Acts of Parliament in the spoken language of the people, and the beginning of statute law. The king caused a collection of the statutes to be made, and separated those which had fallen into disuse from those still in force. He also established the office of treasurer, and set up the Supreme Court of Law, which afterwards developed into the Court of Session. This court, which met three times a year, consisted of the Chancellor, who was president, and three other persons chosen from the Estates. They were deputed to hear and decide the causes which until then had come before the Parliament. James also established schools of archery, and patronised and encouraged learning and letters. He was barbarously murdered by a band of malcontents on the verge of the Highlands (1436). Five kings of the same name succeeded James I. There is little to distinguish one reign from another. The general characteristics of all are the same. Each was ushered in by a long minority, and closed by a violent death. These frequently repeated minorities were very disastrous to Scotland. The short reign of each sovereign after he reached manhood was spent in struggling to suppress the family that had raised itself to too great a height during the minority. He could only do this by letting loose on the offender a rival, who in turn served himself, becoming heir not only to the former's estates but to his arrogance, and proving himself the disturber of the succeeding reign. Fruitless invasions of England, and abortive attempts to bring the Celts of the north within the power of the law, alternated with the feuds of the rival barons. Under James III. the Orkney and Shetland Isles were annexed to Scotland. They had hitherto belonged to Norway, and were made over to the King of Scots as a pledge for the dowry promised with his wife, Margaret of Norway, but they were never redeemed. James V. worked out more fully the project of his ancestor, James I., of establishing a supreme court of law by founding the Court of Session or College of Justice. It was formed on the model of the Parliament of Paris, and was composed at first of thirteen judges, though the number was afterwards increased to fifteen. As the members of the court were chosen from the Estates it was supreme in all civil cases, and there was no appeal from its decisions to Parliament, nor could it be called upon to review its own judgments. Scottish law was, like the French, based upon the Civil Law, which was adopted and received as authority except where the feudal law had forestalled it. The three universities (St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Aberdeen) which were founded during this period were modelled on that of Paris, which differed widely from the English universities. Provision had also been made for the advancement of elementary education. Grammar schools were founded in the burghs, and by Act of Parliament (1496) all "barons and freeholders" were commanded to make their sons attend these schools until they were "competently founded," and have "perfect Latin," under penalty of a fine of £20. The introduction of the printing press by Walter Chapman gave a further stimulus to the pursuit of letters. A purely mythical history of Scotland was fabricated, which was supposed to add to the dignity of the kingdom by assuming for it an important position in times of remote antiquity. These ridiculous legends were put into form by Hector Boece, first Principal of the University of Aberdeen, whose History of Scotland is wholly unworthy of belief. Unfortunately these legends took root in the national mind, and were accepted as fact by all subsequent historians, who based their works upon them, and it is only in our own days that research has sifted fact from fiction. In the front rank of the Scottish poets stand the two kings, James I. and James V. The favourite themes of the poet's satire were the bucksliding and corruption of the priesthood. The Church had become too powerful to be popular. All classes of the community were eager to attack it, and tried to incite the king to follow the example of his uncle, Henry VIII. The danger was only warded off by the adroitness of Beaton, who was the most powerful man in the State. He turned to account the long-cherished jealousy of England to spoil the schemes of Henry, and induced the king to turn a deaf ear to all their suggestions of religious reformation. The discussion of the subject ended in an outburst of war. The attack on the temporalities of the Church had already begun. The benefices in the gift of the crown were conferred on laymen, generally the king's natural children, who held them in commendam with the title of Commendator. Since the War of Independence the Church had totally changed its character. In the incessant internal struggles that disturbed the ensuing period the Church always supported the crown, which in return conferred estates and privilege on the Church. On account of their superior learning the great offices of state were filled by Churchmen. This gave them a political influence, which in addition to their wealth was a constant cause of offence to the barons. The two principal sees—St. Andrews (1471) and Glasgow (1492)—had been raised to the dignities of archbishoprics, and their holders vied with each other in an arrogant display of pomp and state to support their dignity as princes of the Church. The two Beatonas (uncle and nephew) who succeeded one another in the primacy swayed the affairs of the state during the entire reign of James V. and the beginning of that of Mary. They held a great number of benefices in France as well as Scotland. This gave them wealth far beyond that of any of the temporal peers, and corresponding power. They used this power to retard the movement of religious reform by persecuting the teachers of the new doctrines, which had made their way into the kingdom from England and Germany, and were rapidly becoming popular. The first sufferer for liberty of opinion in Scotland was Reseby, a Lollard, who was burnt to death in 1408. After this there are casual notices of persons being called in question for alleged heresy. But Patrick Hamilton, who was burnt by Beaton, is called the proto-martyr, as he was the first to suffer for the doctrines which were afterwards embodied in the Established Church. His death did more than any other measure to hasten the impending Reformation. The unexpected death of the king just after a disastrous defeat on the Border, leaving only an infant of a few days old to succeed him, gave it an opportunity for breaking forth. The first open act of violence was the murder of the Primate, Cardinal Beaton (1545). The doers of the deed were taken after sustaining a long siege in the cardinal's own castle, but it was only a manifestation of the ferment that could be no longer controlled, and which now broke forth into the civil war which effected the Reformation.

The Reformation effected a complete revolution in the policy of Scotland, and in the current of popular opinion. With the change of religion the French influence came to an end, and religious sympathy did much to stifle the hatred of England that had become hereditary. This great national movement had much of the character of the peasant wars of France and England. It was the protests of an oppressed peasantry against the exaggerated feudalism under which they groaned: the struggle of the people for life and liberty disguised under a show of religious opinions. The movement in the beginning was a popular one. But the barons turned it to their own advantage by taking the lead under the specious title of Lords of the Congregation, and appropriating the greater part of the spoil. The refusal of the Regent Mary of Lorraine to reform the Church in accordance with the principles of the First Covenant (1557) was followed by the Reformation riots, in which the religious houses and cathedrals were sacked by the mob. The regent employed French troops for the restoration of order. The congregation called English auxiliaries to their aid. Scotland was turned into the battle-field on which French and English fought out their differences. The death of the regent brought a temporary lull. The foreigners withdrew. The Estates seized the opportunity of passing the Reformation Statutes, so that by the time Queen Mary returned from France the old church had been formally overthrown, and the faith of Geneva established in its stead. Mary was an ardent Romanist, and would not give up her own form of worship, although she did not interfere with the form her subjects had chosen. Though she did not confirm she did not reverse the Reformation Statutes, nor did she openly favour her co-religionists. Still she did not choose her advisers from among the Protestants. Murray and some other leaders of the congregation rose in open rebellion on the queen's marriage with her cousin Henry, Lord Darnley, and finally withdrew to England. Mary's suspected complicity in the murder of her husband, and the favour she lavished upon Bothwell, and her marriage with him gave the disaffected among her subjects an excuse for her deposition (1567). They placed her infant son upon the throne, while Murray, as regent, was at the head of the government. For eighteen years Mary was held a prisoner in England. This kept the two countries at peace. The government of Scotland dared not disagree with England for fear of having the queen let loose upon them. Four regents, Murray, Lennox, Mar, and Morton, three of whom died deaths of violence, held the reins of government in succession until the majority of James VI. Though Protestantism was still in the ascendant, the episcopal form of Church government was restored under the regency of Mar. In 1588 the Protestant re-action, excited by the Spanish invasion of England, found vent in once again abolishing episcopacy, and the Presbyterian polity was re-established. After the accession of the king to the English throne (1603), he again restored episcopacy. And on the one occasion, after the union of the crowns, when he revisited his native kingdom, he gave great offence by reviving a ritualistic service in his private chapel. He also made the Assembly pass the "Five Articles of Perth." These enjoined kneeling at the Sacrament, the keeping of Saints' days and Holy days, and other observances considered Popish. The attack thus began on the liberty of the people through their religion was continued by Charles I.

The attempt to displace the liturgy of John Knox by that of England drove the Scotch to rebellion (1637). The Covenant was renewed and signed all over the land. It became the war-cry of the Protestant party. The flame kindled in the north soon spread to England, and both countries were once more plunged into the horrors of civil war. The attempt of the Scots to place Charles II. on his father's throne failed, and Cromwell accomplished what had baffled an earlier conqueror—a legislative union of the two kingdoms of Britain (1654). But under the Commonwealth the Scotch did not enjoy perfect religious liberty. The Assembly was closed, and the power of the church courts abolished. At the same time the obnoxious bishops were removed. The Restoration (1660) threw the country into a ferment by re-installing the bishops and the episcopal clergy. No change was made in the form of the service, and as the service-book of John Knox had now fallen out of use the Church now presented the anomaly of a church with bishops, but without a liturgy. Party spirit ran high, and though the cause of dispute was really little more than a question of words, it roused a spirit of persecution on the one side, and obstinacy on the other, that set the whole country in a flame. When the Revolution (1688) set William on the throne, the Episcopal clergy were in their turn ejected, and the Presbyterian polity finally established. The union of the crowns had not been beneficial to the people of Scotland, for the kings identified themselves with the richer kingdom, and only used the increase in their power to assume despotic power and influence on the liberty of their Scottish subjects. This state of things could not continue. It was imperatively necessary to preserve the peace between the two nations that they should become one in law and in interest. This could only be done by a legislative union, which was effected in 1707. By this union Scotland was in every respect the gainer. She was allowed to share in the English trading privileges. The energy of the Scottish people had now for the first time free scope for development. The rebellions in favour of the Stuarts, twice in the eighteenth century, disturbed the peace of the country. Good, however, here came out of evil. The Highlanders were still half savages and looked on by the Lowlanders as an alien race, and their country as an unknown region. The breaking-up of the clan system and the making of roads which followed the rising (1745) first opened up these wild regions for the entrance of civilisation. The abolition of heritable jurisdictions (1748) at last broke the chain of feudalism, which till then had curbed the progress of the people. [HIGHLANDS.] Since the interests of Scotland and England have become one, Scotland has risen to the level of the sister kingdom in agriculture, commerce, and manufactures.

Scotland, CHURCH OF. Christianity was introduced into Celtic Scotland by the Scots who came over from Ireland in the sixth century. Columba, Abbot of Durrow, left his native land of Ireland, and with twelve monks founded a mission station on the islet of Iona, lying off the west coast. From this germ the Church of Scotland sprang. A group of watted huts clustered round a wooden church formed the monastery, and from this centre the missionary zeal of the monks carried the Christian faith to the Orkneys and adjacent islands; eastward to the kingdom of the Picts, and southward to the English kingdom of Northumberland. The Church thus founded was quite independent of the see of Rome, and differed in some points from the general usages of Western Christendom. The fashion of the tonsure and the mode of reckoning the date of Easter were two of these points. The system of Church government was monastic. The power of controlling ecclesiastical affairs was in the hands of the abbots to whom the bishops were subordinate. It was not until the eleventh century that these peculiarities were abolished, and the Scottish Church brought into conformity with the rest of Christendom. This was effected by Margaret, the English queen of Malcolm Canmore. By that time the Church had fallen from its primitive purity and simplicity. The dignity of abbot had become hereditary in lay families. A body of irregular clergy called "Culdees" were in possession of the religious foundations. The reforms begun by Margaret were more fully carried out by her son David, whose bounty to the Church won him the honour of canonisation. He established the bishoprics of Dunblane, Brechin, Aberdeen, Ross, Caithness, and Glasgow, founded the Abbey of the Holy Rood, which afterwards became the favourite palace of the later sovereigns, and many other religious houses. The Archbishop of York laid claim to the spiritual superiority over Scotland on the ground that the country came within the limits of his province. This claim, which was closely intertwined with that of the English overlordship, had from time to time been hotly contested. At length, in the council of Northampton, 1176, the archbishop formally summoned the Scottish clergy to acknowledge their dependence. This led to an appeal to Rome. The Pope Clement III. vindicated their independence, and declared Scotland to be in immediate dependence on the Holy See (1188).

During the War of Independence the Church was strongly opposed to the English annexation; and it was in great measure due to the support of the clergy that Bruce was in the end successful. During the succeeding period, which was a time of almost continued struggle between the baronage and the crown, the Church is invariably found on the side of the crown. In an age of ignorance the superior learning of the clergy gave them great influence, as it threw all the chief offices of state into their hands. The see of St. Andrew was raised to the dignity of an archbishopric by Sixtus IV. (1471); Glasgow received the same honour some twenty years later. This led to continual strife. St. Andrews claimed the superiority over the see of Glasgow on the ground of seniority, while Glasgow asserted its independence. The brawls between their respective adherents penetrated to the steps of the altar, and the appeals to Rome were so constant that the Estates at last forbade them as being the cause of "inestimable dampage" to the realm. During this period the Church did much to promote the welfare of the people. The regular clergy were the fosterers of education and letters, and the promoters of all agricultural and industrial advancement. The schools in connection with the cathedrals and religious houses were the germs from which have grown the grammar schools of later times; and it was the monks who awakened the taste for the fine arts, of poetry, painting, music, and architecture. It was they also who showed the people how to make the most of the barren soil and ungenial climate by skilful cultivation. They naturalised foreign fruits and vegetables, first discovered the great coal-fields that have since been such a source of wealth to the country, and showed how the coal could be used for fuel. It was they also who introduced the making of glass and other profitable industries. The foundation of the universities was likewise due to the liberality of Churchmen: that of St. Andrews was founded by Wardlaw (1410); that of Glasgow by Turnbull; and that of Aberdeen by Elphinstone, in the same century. In each instance the founder was bishop of the see. During the long minority of James V. the Church was at the zenith of its power. James Beaton, the primate, swayed the state at his will, and on his death his nephew David, the cardinal, succeeded to all his preferments, and to even more than his influence and power. The policy pursued by the two Beaton was to foster the old enmity to England, and to widen the breach if possible, while they strove to knit more closely the long-standing alliance with France. Their aim in so doing was to stave off if possible the Reformation, which in England and Germany was sapping the foundations of the Church. But the causes which provoked a similar movement in Scotland were already at work, and had originated within the Church itself. The wealth and extent of the Church lands; the political influence which their tenure of the highest offices of state, and the riches resulting from the custom of conferring many preferments gave to the prelates, aroused the jealousy of the baronage, and even of the crown. Already the practice had begun of conferring the richest abbeys and priories on laymen who held the land in commendam, with the title of Commendator. The natural sons of the king were commonly provided for in this way. On the other hand, the priesthood had alienated the people by the abuse of excommunication, and by the rigorous extortion of tithes and church dues. They were, therefore, ready to lend a willing ear to the proposals of reform, which promised to free them from this spiritual tyranny. The first indication of the striving after religious freedom is the burning of John Reseby as a heretic (1408), and at the close of the century we find thirty persons accused of being Lollards. From England in the sixteenth century the reformed doctrines came into Scotland, and spread rapidly among the people. The Beatonians were both persecutors of the so-called heretics. The burning of George Wishart (1545) provoked the murder of Cardinal Beaton, which was the first outbreak of the revolutionary movement. [REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND.] This was the first religious war from which Scotland suffered, but it was not to be the last. The contest between Popery and Protestantism may be called a question of doctrine. The second religious war was waged for the disputed form of a liturgy, and the third was based on the contention whether the overseers of the Church should be styled bishop or presbyter. The Act of 1690, confirmed by the Act of Security at the Union, settled the dispute for ever by establishing Presbyterianism. Since then the Church has been shaken to its foundations by the contention as to the rights of patrons to induct ministers to parishes without consulting the wishes of the congregation. The Veto Act, passed by the General Assembly, 1834, declared it to be a "fundamental law of the Church that no pastor shall be intruded on a congregation contrary to the will of the people." This Act, however, was proved to be illegal, and had to be rescinded. This led to the Disruption, when more than a third of the clergy, the promoters of the Veto Act, left the Church and founded another sect, known as the Free Church, which differs only from the Establishment in having no state support, and giving to each congregation the right of electing its own minister. Since the majority of patrons have now voluntarily resigned their rights of presentation, even this slight cause of difference has been removed. [CHURCH, CELTIC; SCOTLAND; REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND.]

Scots, THE, was a name originally bestowed upon the inhabitants of Ireland, a fact which until recently has hardly been sufficiently appreciated by historians. After numerous previous expeditions a colony of Scots (who were Gaelic in race) from Ulster crossed over to Argyle (498), where they established the kingdom of Dalriada. There was for long a close connection between the Irish and Scotch Dalriadas, two members of the same family often ruling in Irish and Scotch Dalriada at the same time. The independence of the Scots was asserted by Aidan (576) at Drumcat; it was not till the tenth century that the name Scotia ceased to be applied to Ireland, and was transferred to Scotland; it was even later before the term Scot acquired a national signification. Besides this the independence of Strathclyde ceased altogether. Shortly afterwards Constantine II. procured the throne for his brother Donald, thus paving the way for the amalgamation of the Britons and the Scots, and for the subsequent annexation; a branch of the Macalpin family continued to rule in Strathclyde till the time of Malcolm II. In 945 Cumbria, i.e., Strathclyde, which had already in 924 chosen Eadward the Elder "to father and lord," was harried by Eadmund, and given up to Malcolm to be held on condition of fealty. On the death of Edgar in 1107 he left Strathclyde to his youngest brother David, to the chagrin of Alexander I., who saw that his kingdom would be much weakened in consequence. Alexander, however, died without heirs, and David succeeded to the whole kingdom; from his reign dates the rise of Southern Scotland.

Scot's Water was a name given to the Firth of Forth, the old boundary between the Anglian Lothians and the Celtic kingdom of Scotland.

Scott, SIR WALTER, of Buccleuch, tried unsuccessfully to rescue James V. from the custody of Angus in conjunction with the Earl of Lennox. He was murdered at Edinburgh by a member of the Clan Ker, who were his hereditary enemies.

Scroggs, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1683), of whose birth and parentage nothing is known, was called to the bar in 1653. In 1676 he was appointed by Danby to a judgeship in the Common Pleas, and in 1678 was advanced to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench. He was one of the worst judges that ever disgraced the English bench. While the national madness of the Popish Plot lasted, he made a point of accepting all the evidence of the most infamous informers without question.

To be brought before him in 1679 and 1680 was equivalent to being convicted. His inhuman conduct towards the supposed conspirators in the Popish Plot was only equalled by his gross partiality and brutality towards the other party when he discovered that the tide was turning against Shaftesbury and his associates. In 1680 he was impeached by the Commons. The lords refused to commit him, but the king, perceiving how unpopular the chief justice had become, removed him from his office in 1681, though allowing him a pension of £1,600 a year.

State Trials.

Scrope, RICHARD, Archbishop of York (d. 1405), was the brother of Richard II.'s minister, the Earl of Wiltshire. He was made Archbishop of York in 1398. He was strongly opposed to Henry's accession, and advocated the claims of the Earl of March. In 1405 he joined Northumberland and others in a conspiracy against the king. He was entrapped into a conference with the Earl of Westmoreland, when he was seized and beheaded at York. He was regarded by the people as a martyr, and pilgrimages were made to his tomb. The execution of Scrope was the first instance in England of a prelate being put to death by the civil power.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., vol. iii.

Scrope, RICHARD LE (d. 1403), after distinguishing himself for his gallantry in the French and Scotch wars of Edward III.'s reign, was, on the accession of Richard II., appointed Steward of the Household, and in 1378 he held the chancellorship for a brief period, and again in 1381-2. He conducted himself with great moderation during the troubles of Richard's reign, and though he took part in the trial of Tresilian and the other royal ministers in 1387, he was declared innocent in 1397.

Scrope of Bolton, LORD (d. 1592), Warden of the West Marches under Queen Elizabeth, and Governor of Carlisle, was entrusted for a short time with the charge of Mary Queen of Scots. He aided in crushing the rebellion of 1569, and in the following year was one of the commanders in the raid on Scotland.

Scrope of Masham, LORD (d. 1415), was a nephew of Archbishop Scrope, and one of Henry V.'s most intimate friends. He was employed by the king on many diplomatic errands, but in 1415 was apparently implicated in the conspiracy of Cambridge to place the Earl of March on the throne. His guilt is somewhat doubtful, but he was convicted by his peers and executed.

Scullabogue, THE MASSACRE AT, took place on the 5th of June, 1798, during the Irish Rebellion, while Bagenal Harvey and Father Roche were attacking New Ross. All the Protestants taken prisoners by insurgent bands were here confined in a barn, some 300 men being left there to guard them. At nine in the morning, thirty or forty of the men were murdered, but those in the barn were as yet spared. When, however, the rebels had been finally repulsed at New Ross, the rabble set fire to the barn, and 184 old men, women, and children (sixteen Catholics amongst them) were either burnt to death or piked as they tried to escape.

Macgrath, Hist. of the Rebellion.

Scutage first appears in 1156 as a tax of twenty shillings on the knight's fee or scutum, imposed, in spite of the protest of Archbishop Theobald, upon knights holding estates from churches. In 1159 two marks were taken from every knight's fee in lieu of personal service in the war of Toulouse; and henceforth the term scutage bore the meaning of a payment in commutation of service. To the majority of the knights it would be more convenient to pay the tax than to go upon a distant expedition, and the money was welcome to the king as enabling him to hire more trustworthy troops. It was indeed one of the most important of Henry II.'s anti-feudal measures, and may be compared in its general policy with Edward I.'s distraint of knight-hood. It was again levied under Henry II. in 1171 and 1186, each time at twenty shillings on the knight's fee, and three times under Richard I., once at ten, and twice at twenty shillings. Like all other taxes it was used as a means of extortion by John: two marks on the fee were demanded as often as ten times; and therefore the Great Charter declared that no scutage should henceforth be imposed save by the common counsel of the nation. But this restriction was apparently irksome to the advisers of the young Henry III., and therefore in the second re-issue of the Charter in 1217 an article was inserted to the effect that scutage should be taken as in King Henry's time, i.e. (probably) without needing the consent of the commune concilium. Scutage was exacted nine times between 1218 and 1233, but after that more rarely. By Edward I. it was resorted to only as an afterthought, and often appears several years after the war for which it is demanded. In the following reigns it was seldom collected, and then only when the king himself went to war. After 1385, when it was remitted after the Scotch expedition, it disappears.

[W. J. A.]

Seal, THE GREAT, is the emblem of sovereignty, and is used on all solemn occasions when the will of the sovereign is to be expressed. A new Great Seal is provided by the king in council at the beginning of a new reign, or whenever a change is made in the royal arms or style, and the old one is publicly broken. It was introduced into England by Edward the Confessor, who, following the example of the Carolingian kings, placed it in the keeping of a chancellor. From the time of Becket and onwards the office was one of varied importance, and accordingly we find that the personal custody of the seal was not unfrequently placed in the hands of a vice-chancellor. Richard I. violently took possession of the seal, ordered a new one to be made, and proclaimed that all charters which had been sealed with the old one were null and void. In order to prevent this practice, a statute was passed on the 28th of Henry III., proclaiming the nullity of any document sealed by the Great Seal during its absence from the hands of the chancellor. This law was, however, often broken, and it was not unusual for the chancellor to entrust the seal to one or more vice-chancellors when he was engaged on the business of his diocese, or absent from England. Also during the interval between the death or resignation of one chancellor, the Great Seal, instead of reverting to the sovereign, passed into the hands of a temporary keeper. Gradually this official acquired the right of discharging all the duties connected with the Great Seal, and in the case of Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper during the earlier part of Elizabeth's reign, a statute was passed declaring him to have "the same place, pre-eminence, and jurisdiction as the Lord Chancellor of England." During the following reigns the Great Seal continued in the custody of the Lord Keeper in the first instance, but this official was generally raised to the title of Lord Chancellor and kept the seal; since the accession of George III., however, the office of Lord Keeper has been discontinued. The Great Seal was also occasionally placed in commission. Under the Tudors and Stuarts the earlier ordinance passed in 1443, requiring that the chancellor should not fix the Great Seal without authority under the Privy Seal, was seldom observed. When Lord Keeper Littleton fled to Charles I. at York in 1642, taking with him the Great Seal, the Long Parliament illegally ordered a new Great Seal to be made, to which after some delay the Lords gave their consent, in spite of a proclamation by the king, charging those concerned in making it with high treason. In 1648 a new Great Seal was ordered with Republican insignia, and soon afterwards it was declared high treason to counterfeit it. A rival Great Seal was, however, used by Charles II. immediately after the death of his father, which was lost after the battle of Worcester. James II. on his flight from London threw the Great Seal into the Thames, but it was fished up again near Lambeth. Since the Revolution the use of the Great Seal has been strictly confined to the Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper, and Lords Commissioners, and the regulations for its employment have been carefully observed. By the Act of Union with Scotland one Great Seal for the United Kingdom is used for writs to summon Parliament, for foreign treaties and all public acts of state, while a seal in Scotland is used for private grants. The Act of Union with Ireland, however, made no express provision for establishing one Great Seal for the United Kingdom. By the Great Seal (Offices) Act of 1874, various offices connected with the Great Seal were abolished, and further changes are in contemplation (1884).

Seal, THE PRIVY, is affixed to all letters-patent for the grant of charters, pardons, &c., before they come to the Great Seal, and to some things of minor importance which do not pass the Great Seal at all. The office of Clerk or Keeper of the Privy Seal, now called Lord Privy Seal, is of Norman origin. By the reign of Edward III. he had become one of the chief officers of state and a member of the king's council. The dignity was frequently conferred on an ecclesiastic; for instance, in the reign of Edward IV. John Russell, Bishop of Lincoln, united the offices of Keeper of the Privy Seal and President of the Council. The keeper was a member of the Court of Star Chamber as organised by Henry VII. In the reign of Henry VIII. the Privy Seal was made the warrant of the legality of letters patent from the crown, and authorised the Lord Chancellor to affix the Great Seal. Letters patent formerly passed from the Signet Office to the Privy Seal Office in the form of Signet Bills, and were then sealed and sent to the Lord Chancellor; but on the abolition of the Signet Office in 1848, it was enacted that warrants under the royal sign-manual, prepared by the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, setting forth the tenor and effect of the letters-patent to be granted, addressed to the Lord Chancellor, and counter-signed by one of the principal Secretaries of State, would be a sufficient authority for the Privy Seal being affixed. At the same time the appointments of Clerks of the Signet and Clerks of the Privy Seal were abolished. The Lord Privy Seal is the fifth great officer of state, a Privy Councillor in virtue of his office, and takes precedence after the Lord President of the Council. The office of Lord Privy Seal of Scotland was established by James I. after his return from imprisonment in England. It was directly modelled on the parallel dignity in the English court. The seal had been previously kept by the Lord Chancellor.

Search Warrants are issued by justices of the peace to the officers to whom they are addressed, requiring them to search a house or other specified place for property suspected to have been stolen. The conditions of their issue are regulated by the Larceny Act of 1861 and the Pawnbrokers' Act of 1872.

Seaton, JOHN COLBORNE, LORD (b. 1779, d. 1863), one of the most famous generals of his age, distinguished himself in his first campaign in Holland (1799). In 1801 he was present at the battle of Maida, and served throughout the Peninsular War with great distinction. It is said that his handling of the 52nd Regiment at Waterloo contributed in no small degree to the English victory. In 1828 he was made Lieutenant-Governor of Canada, and Governor-General of the same province in 1837. He was also commander of the forces at the same time, and to his energetic action the easy suppression of the Canadian Rebellion of 1838 was mainly due. In the following year his services were rewarded by a peerage, and in 1860 Lord Seaton became a field-marshal. In 1843 he was made Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Isles, an office which he held for six years.

Sebastopol was a strongly fortified city in the Crimea, which the Emperor Nicholas made the head-quarters of the Russian fleet. When the Crimean War broke out its siege was resolved upon. About the end of the war, when the southern side of it was evacuated by the Russians, and the town was occupied by the allies, the Crimean War practically ended (Sept. 9, 1856). [CRIMEAN WAR.]

Secker, THOMAS, Archbishop of Canterbury (b. 1693, d. 1768), was born of Dissenting parents at Sibthorpe, in Nottinghamshire. Abandoning the Dissenting ministry for medicine, and ultimately persuaded by his school friend, Butler, to join the ministry of the Established Church, he entered Exeter College, Oxford, was ordained in 1723, and was made in 1735 Bishop of Bristol; was translated in 1737 to Oxford, and in 1758 made archbishop. He was an energetic and respectable archbishop.

Porteus, Life of Secker prefixed to his Works.

Secretary of State, THE OFFICE OF, is supposed to be first mentioned in the reign of Henry III., when we find a secretarius noster in existence, who carried out the duties which had been previously fulfilled by the king's clerk. There continued to be one principal secretary of state until towards the end of the reign of Henry VIII., when two were appointed of equal powers (1539). In the same reign secretaries of state, who had previously been mere clerks who prepared business for the Privy Council, but were not admitted to its debates, became members of that body. Sir Robert Cecil had the recognised title of "Our Principal Secretary of State," and the office of secretary attained its present importance when after the Revolution the Cabinet began to displace the Privy Council. On the union with Scotland a Secretary of State for Scotch affairs was created, among those who held the office being the Earl of Mar, but it expired in 1746. In 1768 a secretary was appointed for American and Colonial affairs, which from 1660 had been managed by the Council of Trade, but this office was abolished in 1782. In the same year an important change took place. Hitherto the two secretariats had been known as those of the northern and the southern department, of whom the former, in addition to the superintendence of the foreign affairs of Northern Europe, was supposed to manage those of Ireland. This clumsy arrangement was now abolished, and their duties devolved upon Home and Foreign Secretaries. In 1794 a Secretary at War was appointed, and he received in addition the business of the colonies in 1801, but the two functions of colonial and military administration were finally separated in 1854. The secretaryship for India was created in 1858 on the abolition of the double system of government. The Chief Secretary for Ireland does not as a rule have a seat in the Cabinet, and is not reckoned as one of the principal secretaries of state. His official title is the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. There are also Parliamentary under-secretaries, and permanent secretaries, who are the heads of the working staffs of the government departments.

Security, THE BILL OF (SCOTLAND), was passed in 1703 by the Scottish Parliament during the agitation that preceded and necessitated the union of the two kingdoms. It provided that Parliament should fix a successor to the Scottish crown on the death of Anne from among the Protestant members of the royal family, provided that he should under no circumstances be the same person as the successor to the English crown, unless full security was given for the religious and commercial independence of Scotland, and its equality in trade with England. The royal assent was naturally refused to such a measure; but this step proved so unpopular that Parliament had to be immediately dismissed without hope of subsidy.

Sedgemoor, THE BATTLE OF (July 5, 1685), was fought between the Duke of Monmouth and the royal troops under the Earl of Feversham. After marching through the West country and failing to capture Bath, Monmouth determined to risk all in a general engagement with the royal troops, who were encamped on Sedgemoor, about three miles south of Bridgewater, while Monmouth was then in Bridgewater. Sedgemoor is a swampy plain, crossed by wide ditches called "rhines." In front of Lord Feversham's camp was one of these called the Bussex Rhine. It was Monmouth's intention to attack the royal army in its camp at night. His army was in motion by midnight, and his guides brought him to the brink of the "rhine," fronting Feversham's encampment. This was too deep to be crossed. The insurgents halted in doubt, and by accident shots were fired across the "rhine," and these roused Feversham's troops. Making a detour, they fell on Monmouth's army. Lord Grey and his horse were the first of the insurgents to give way. The peasants and miners of the West country, however, fought with more courage. But the flight of the cavalry, under Grey, had made the cause of Monmouth hopeless. The duke himself, at dawn, rode away towards Hampshire. Deserted by their leaders, the insurgents endeavoured to fly; but Colonel Kirke, at the head of his Tangier troops, followed them in close pursuit. A great and barbarous slaughter of the fugitives by the royal troops ensued. The battle, of course, put an immediate end to Monmouth's rebellion.

Seditious Meetings Bill (1795) was provoked by the same state of popular excitement which caused the Treasonable Practices Bill. The measure was introduced by Pitt. It prohibited the meeting of more than fifty persons (except county and borough meetings duly called) for the consideration of petitions or addresses for reform in Church or State, or for the discussion of any grievance, without the sanction of a magistrate. It vested large discretionary powers in the magistrates, both as to sanctioning such meetings and dispersing them. Pitt even proposed to restrict the liberty of discussion by only permitting debating societies to meet in duly licensed rooms. The bill was professedly a measure of coercion, and was as such opposed by Fox and all his party with even more than their wonted vigour. Only forty-two members followed him in opposing the introduction of the bill; and on its last reading only fifty-one could be found to oppose it, as against 266 who supported it.

Sedley, Sir Charles (b. 1639, d. 1701), was a witty but profligate play-writer of the Restoration period; he was the father of Catherine Sedley, James II.'s mistress, and took some part in politics as member for Romney. Ultimately he became a strong partisan of the Revolution, though his speech in 1690 against placemen showed that he retained his independence under the new government.

Seedasseer, The Battle of (March 6, 1799), was an English victory in the Mysore War against Tippoo Sultan. General Stuart, with the Bombay division [WELLESLEY, LOR], had ascended the Ghauts, and posted himself at Seedasseer. On the morning of March 5 it was discovered that Tippoo was approaching. Preparations were instantly made to receive him by General Hartley, second in command. On the morning of the 6th the advanced brigade was assailed vigorously by the Sultan's entire force, and three battalions under the gallant Colonel Montresor sustained the assault for six hours with such determination that Tippoo's officers could do nothing. General Stuart, who was ten miles in the rear, hastening up, found them exhausted and reduced to their last cartridge. In half an hour Tippoo's army retreated through the wood with a loss of 2,000 men.

Seetabuldee, The Battle of (Nov. 24, 1817). The result of the intrigues of Appa Sahib with Bajee Rao was an attack on the British Residency. This lay to the west of Nagpore, from which it was separated by a small ridge running north and south, with two hills at the extremity called the Seetabuldee Hills. It was garrisoned by two battalions of Madras infantry, two companies of the Resident's escort, three troops of Bengal cavalry, and a detachment of Madras artillery with four six-pounders. The rajah had 18,000 men and thirty-six guns. The guns were brought to bear on the English position, and a vigorous assault, which was repelled with great gallantry, was made all through the night to the next morning. At last the Nagpore troops captured the lower hill, and the English ammunition was running short, when a gallant charge of the Bengal cavalry, under Captain Fitzgerald, resulted in capturing two guns and cutting up the infantry. At this moment one of the enemy's tumbrils exploded, and amid the confusion they broke and fled. The conflict, which had lasted eighteen hours, thus terminated in the triumph of the British.

Segrave, Stephen (d. circa 1241), was a partisan of King John during his struggles with the barons, and on Henry III.'s accession he allied himself with the party of Peter des Roches. On the dismissal of Hubert de Burgh in 1232, the office of Justiciar was given to Segrave. His administration was unsuccessful; he failed to ingratiate himself with the king, and at the same time incurred the hatred of the barons and the people. He fell in 1234, with his patron Des Roches, and was called upon to give an account of his stewardship. Subsequently he made his peace with the king by the payment of a thousand marks, returned to court, and became one of the royal advisers, but was not reinstated in his office. He retired at the end of his life to the abbey of Leicester, where he died. Segrave was one of the first of the merely lawyer Justiciars. Though so bad a politician, he was a good lawyer. He marks the transition to the chief justices of later times.

Seguise, The Battle of (635), was fought at Dalguise, near Dunkeld, between the descendants of Nectan, the Pictish king, who had been driven from the throne in 612, and Garnaid, son of Firth, king of the Picts, who, together with Lochene, son of Nectan, was killed.

Selborne, ROUNDELL PALMER, LORD (b. 1812), was the son of the Rev. William Palmer, of Mixbury, Oxfordshire, and was educated at Rugby and Winchester Schools, and Trinity College, Oxford. He was elected to a fellowship at Magdalen, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn (1837). In 1847 he was first returned to Parliament for Plymouth as a Peelite. He represented Plymouth till 1852, when he was defeated; but regained his seat (1853), and held it till 1857. In 1861 he was appointed Solicitor-General in Lord Palmerston's government, though he had not a seat in the House. He was then knighted, and shortly afterwards elected for Richmond, which he continued to represent till his elevation to the peerage. In 1863 he became Attorney-General under Lord John Russell. In 1868 he was offered the Chancellorship, but refused, as he could not agree with the administration on the Irish Church question. He continued, however, to be an independent supporter of the government on most questions, and represented it at Geneva (1871). [GENEVA CONVENTION.] He was appointed Lord Chancellor on the retirement of Lord Hatherley, on which occasion he was raised to the peerage as Lord Selborne. He retired with the Liberal party in 1874. He again became Chancellor when the Liberals returned to power in 1880.

Selby, THE BATTLE OF (April 11, 1644), was fought during the Great Rebellion. Col. John Bellasis, the Governor of York, during the absence of the Marquis of Newcastle, who was facing the Scots in Durham, occupied with 1,500 horse and 1,800 foot the town of Selby, with the object of preventing the junction of Sir Thomas Fairfax with the Scots. He was attacked on April 11 by Fairfax, with rather superior forces, and his position stormed. Bellasis himself was taken prisoner, and he lost his baggage, artillery, and 1,600 men. Clarendon says:—"This was the first action for which Sir Thomas Fairfax was taken notice of, who in a short time grew the supreme general under the Parliament."

Selden, JOHN (b. 1684, d. 1654), was educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, and became a member of Clifford's Inn in 1602. After he had continued there a sedulous student for some time, he "did by help of a strong body and vast memory, not only run through the whole body of the law, but became a prodigy in most parts of learning . . . so that in few years his name was wonderfully advanced, not only at home, but in foreign countries, and he was usually styled 'the great dictator of learning of the English nation'" (Wood). In 1618 he published a History of Tithe, strongly Erastian in its tendency, and basing the claim of the clergy to them on the grant of the civil power. The book was suppressed by the Court of High Commission, and the author was obliged to make a public acknowledgment of his error. Selden sat in the Parliaments of 1624, 1626, and 1628. He took part in the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham, and had the 4th and 5th articles entrusted to him (1626). He also helped to prepare the Petition of Right. In 1629 he was summoned before the Council for his share in the disturbances of the last day of that Parliament, and was imprisoned until 1633. Two years later he published Mare Clausum, asserting the English sovereignty of the seas, which had originally been written in answer to the Mare Liberum of Grotius. When the Long Parliament assembled Selden was chosen member for Oxford. He brought forward the bill for the abolition of Ship-money, and other measures limiting the prerogative; but he opposed the bill for the attainder of Strafford, and the Root and Branch Bill. In 1643 he was appointed one of the representatives of the House of Commons in the Westminster Assembly, where he played a distinguished part, and two years later was selected as a member of the Joint Commission to administer the Admiralty. He died on Nov. 30, 1654, leaving his library to his executors, who gave it to the Bodleian Library at Oxford.

Self-denying Ordinance, THE, was a measure proposed in the Long Parliament on Dec. 9, 1644, by Mr. Zouch Tate, member for Northampton. The words of the resolution were "that no member of either House of Parliament shall during the war enjoy or execute any office or command, military or civil, and that an ordinance be brought in to that effect." An ordinance was brought in and passed the Commons on Dec. 19, by the small majority of seven votes. After some discussion and hesitation the Lords rejected it, giving as a reason that they did not know what shape the army would take. The Commons at once produced a scheme "for new modelling of the army" [NEW MODEL], which passed the Commons on Jan. 28, 1645, and the Lords on Feb. 15. A second Self-denying Ordinance was now introduced, which passed the Lords on April 3, 1645. It provided that all members of either House, who had since the beginning of the present Parliament been appointed to any offices, military or civil, should vacate those offices within forty days. But it differed from the first ordinance in that it did not prevent members from taking office on any future occasion. The name given to this ordinance is perhaps derived from a phrase used by Cromwell, who was one of its strongest supporters. "I hope," he said, "we have such English hearts and zealous affections towards the general weal of our mother country, as no members of either house will scruple to deny themselves, and their own private interests for the public good."

Selgove, THE, were an ancient British tribe occupying Annandale, Nithsdale, and Eskdale, in Dumfriesshire, with the east of Galloway.

Selvach (d. 730), King of the Picts, son of Fearchan Fada, succeeded his brother Aincellach, whom he expelled, as head of the Cinel Loarn (698). In 701 he destroyed the rival tribe of Cinel Cathboth, and in 711 defeated the Britons at Loch Arklet, in Stirlingshire. The following year we find him fighting against the Cinel Gabran in Kintyre, and in 717 again defeating the Strathclyde Britons. In 719 he was defeated in the naval battle of Ardanesbi. In 723 Selvach resigned the crown to his son Dungal, and entered a monastery, from which, however, he emerged in 727 to fight the battle of Ross Forichen on his son's behalf.

Sepoy Mutinies. (1) 1764. There is no instinct of obedience in native armies in India, and the British army of Sepoys was in its earlier days no exception to the rule. Having been instrumental in deposing two Nabobs of Bengal, the Company's Bengal Sepoys became inflated with a sense of their own importance, and demanded a large donation and increased pay. It was refused; whereupon a whole battalion marched off to the enemy. Major Munro pursued them and brought them back. Twenty-four ring-leaders were selected, tried by court-martial, and condemned to be blown from guns. Four were executed in this way; whereupon the Sepoys announced that no more executions would be allowed. Munro loaded his guns with grape, placed his European soldiers in the intervals, and commanded the native battalions to ground arms, threatening to discharge the guns on them if a single man was seen to move. The Sepoys were awed by his resolution: sixteen more were blown away; the mutiny was quenched in their blood; and discipline was restored. [For second and third mutinies see articles VELLORE MUTINY and BARRACKPORE MUTINY.] (4) The fourth mutiny broke out in 1844. Scinde became a British province, and the Sepoys thus lost the extra allowances which had been granted them while on active service in an enemy's country. The weakness of the commanders, who tried to induce the revolted Sepoys to return to their duty by promising extra allowances, only aggravated the mutiny.

The men on arriving in Scinde complained that they had been allured there by false pretences, which was indeed true. It was determined to bring up regiments from Madras; and the Madras governor induced them to undertake the voyage by promising them extra pay. On their arrival they found that the regulations of the Bengal army did not permit of this; and, thus disappointed of their expectations, they broke out into open mutiny on parade. The leaders were confined, and a small advance of money was made. The Madras regiments were returned; the mutinies were hushed up; and Scinde was made over to Bombay to be garrisoned from thence. (5) The Punjaub was the scene of the fifth. As in Scinde in 1844, the 13th and 22nd Native Infantry broke into mutiny on the withdrawal of extra allowances when the Punjaub became a British province. The 41st at Delhi, after the order of reduction had been read, refused to march, and only consented on threat of dismissal. At Wuzerabad the Sepoys of the 32nd hesitated to receive their pay, but were brought to order by the seizure and ironing of the first four. The 66th at Govindgur mutinied, Feb. 1, 1850. One Sepoy endeavoured to close the gate, but Lieutenant Macdonald cut him down, and a small squadron of cavalry under Colonel Bradford restored order. (6) 1857. In this year took place the great Indian Mutiny (q.v.).

Sepoys are the troops, natives of India, in the English pay. At an early date the Company found out that the natives, properly disciplined according to European methods, formed excellent soldiers, and largely used them as cheaper and more efficient than the produce of the crimp-houses and ale-shops of London. By their arms, rather than by European troops, India was conquered by the English; but their religious caste prejudices and dislike of innovation, and sometimes the want of consideration shown to them, have produced mutinies, of which the chief are mentioned above.

The importance of the native troops in English employ is clearly shown in Seeley's Expansion of England.

Septennial Act, THE (1716), which increased the length of Parliament to seven years, was passed, partly because the Triennial Act of 1694 had not worked well in practice, but still more because the very excited state of popular feeling in consequence of the Jacobite revolt, made it unsafe for the Whig ministry to run the risk of a general election. The right of a sitting Parliament thus to lengthen its own existence was violently contested at the time; and, indeed, could only be justified by the critical condition of the nation, and the bad state of the representation, which made an appeal to the people almost a farce. Often violently attacked as fixing to the life of Parliament a limit too long for popular freedom, the Septennial Act has nevertheless continued law up to the present day, although recent usage has practically reduced the length of Parliament to a maximum of six years.

Sergeanty was a peculiar tenure, the essence of which was a "peculiar service of special duty to the person of the lord." There were two sorts of sergeanty—(1) grand sergeanty (per magnum servitium), such as holding an estate on condition of acting as butler or chamberlain at the royal coronation, a tenure analogous to knight service, but esteemed more honourable, and not, so far as the form goes, abolished in 1660; and (2) petit sergeanty, which consisted in holding lands of the king by the service of rendering some small implement of war such as a bow or sword, and which was very similar to free socage.

Seringapatam, THE SIEGE OF. (1) On Feb. 5, 1762, the army of Lord Cornwallis, consisting of 22,000 men, forty-four field-pieces, and forty-two siege guns, and reinforced by Mahratta and Mogul contingents from Poonah and Hyderabad, reached an elevated ground commanding a view of Seringapatam, the capital of Tippoo's State of Mysore. Its defences were three lines protected by 300 pieces of cannon, the earthwork being covered by a bound hedge of thorny plants so as to be absolutely impenetrable. Tippoo's force was encamped on the northern side of the stream in a position admirably fortified. Lord Cornwallis reconnoitred on the 6th, and that same night moved his army to the assault in three main divisions. The centre moved straight into Tippoo's camp; part forced its way through the river, and seized a village and the guns on the island; part attacked the redoubts within the camp; while the reserve, gathering up the other divisions, advanced under Lord Cornwallis, fighting its way through Tippoo's army, across the river to the island. Thus in the morning the English had gained all the redoubts, and established themselves in the island with a loss of 530 men; Tippoo's loss killed, wounded, and deserters being estimated at 20,000. Tippoo now began to treat insincerely. On Feb. 16 General Abercromby and the Malabar army joined Lord Cornwallis; the operations of the siege were pushed with vigour, and fifty pieces of cannon were brought to bear on the fortifications. Tippoo, alarmed, consented to treat, and even sent his sons to Lord Cornwallis as hostages. After a fresh dispute over the cession of Coorg, the treaty of peace was signed (1792). (2) April 6, 1799, this took place during Lord Wellesley's campaign against Mysore. The advanced post of General Harris's army established itself within 1,600 yards of the fort of Seringapatam on the south-west side of the river and fort. The works south of the river were gradually taken, and batteries established on the north and south banks, and on an island in the Cavery commanding the western angle of the fort. On May 3 the breach was practicable. The troops destined for the assault, 4,376 in number, took up their stations in the trenches next morning, and General Baird was selected to lead them. At one o'clock the word was given, and, in spite of a desperate resistance, within seven minutes the British ensign was floating over the breach. The column now wheeled in two divisions, to the left and right along the outer ramparts, exposed to a raking fire from the inner circle. The right column reached the east or Mysore gate, and storming the inner ramparts, directed a flanking fire on the defenders of the outer north rampart. A general stampede followed, and in the flight Tippoo was slain. General Baird succeeded in securing the family of Tippoo, and proceeded to search for the dead body of the Sultan, of whose death he was informed. Thus in the space of a few hours fell the capital of Mysore, though garrisoned by 20,000 troops, defended by 287 pieces of ordnance, and provided with well-stored arsenals, and every munition of war. "On the 4th of May," says Sir John Malcolm, "all our labours were crowned by the completest victory that ever crowned the British annals in India. A State that had been the rival of the Company for nearly thirty years, was on that day wholly annihilated."

Seringapatam, THE TREATY OF (Mar. 8, 1792), was concluded between the parties to the triple alliance of 1790 and Tippoo. Its stipulations were the cession of the old Mahratta provinces north of the Tungabuddra to the Peishwa; the cession to the Nizam of Tippoo's provinces north of that river, the cession to the English of the districts of Malabar, Coorg, Dindigul, Baramahal, and Salem; and the restoration of the English prisoners.

Session, THE COURT OF, the highest civil judicial tribunal in Scotland, was instituted by statute of James V. in 1532. Its functions had previously been discharged by the Council and a committee of Parliament. Its original composition included fourteen judges, called Lords of Session, and a president. Besides this the crown could appoint three or four peers as assessors. In 1808 the court was divided into two courts with separate jurisdiction, called the first and second divisions; the former presided over by the President, the latter by the Lord Justice Clerk. In 1810 the junior judges were appointed to sit as Lords Ordinary in the Outer House. In 1830 the number of judges was reduced to thirteen, and the quorum was also reduced. An appeal lies to the House of Lords.

Seton, Lord, was one of the leaders of the Catholic party in Scotland against the teaching of Knox. He was a staunch supporter of Queen Mary, whom he entertained in his castle in Haddingtonshire immediately after Darnley's murder. He was one of the first to come to her assistance on her escape from Lochleven Castle (1568).

Settlement, THE ACT OF, or, as its proper title is, the "Act for the further limitation of the crown and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject," was passed in the year 1700. It was necessitated by the untimely death of the young Duke of Gloucester, son of the Princess Anne, in this year. "There was no question," says Hallam, "that the Princess Sophia was the fittest object of the nation's preference. She was indeed very far removed from any hereditary title. Besides the pretended Prince of Wales and his sister, whose legitimacy no one disputed, there stood in her way the Duchess of Savoy, daughter of Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans, and several members of the Palatine family. . . . According to the tenor and intention of this statute, all prior claims of inheritance, save that of the issue of King William and the Princess Anne, being set aside and annulled, the Princess Sophia became the source of a new royal line. The throne of England and Ireland stands entailed upon the heirs of her body, being Protestants. . . . It was determined to accompany this settlement with additional securities of the subject's liberty. Eight articles were therefore inserted in the Act of Settlement, to take effect only from the commencement of the new limitation of the house of Hanover." These eight articles were, however, an unreasonable vote of censure of the Tory Parliament which passed the Act on many of the Acts of the reign of William III. They are: (1) That whosoever shall hereafter come to the possession of this crown shall join in communion with the Church of England as by law established; (2) That in case the crown and imperial dignity of this realm shall hereafter come to any person not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, without the consent of Parliament; (3) That no person who shall hereafter come to the possession of the crown shall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland without the consent of Parliament; (4) That from and after the time that further limitation of this Act shall take effect, all matters and things relating to the well-governing of this kingdom which are properly cognisable in the Privy Council by the laws and customs of this realm shall be transacted there, and all resolutions taken thereupon shall be signed by such of the Privy Council as shall advise and consent to the same; (5) That . . . no person born out of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging (though he be naturalised or made a denizen, except such as are born of English parents) shall be capable to be of the Privy Council, or a member of either House of Parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of trust, either civil or military, or to have any grants of lands . . . from the crown . . . ; (6) That no person who has an office or place of profit under the king, or receives a pension from the crown, shall be capable of serving as a member of the House of Commons; (7) That . . . judges' commissions shall be made quandiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries established and ascertained; but upon the address of both Houses of Parliament it may be lawful to remove them; (8) That no pardon under the Great Seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament. The first of these provisions needs no comment. The second was frequently called in question during the reign of George II., in regard to subsidiary treaties for the defence of Hanover. Certainly if a power at war with England chose to consider that Electorate as part of the king's dominions it ought to be defended from attack. The real remedy—the separation of Hanover from England—was effected on the accession of Victoria. The third was repealed shortly after the accession of George I., who frequently abused it by his journeys to Hanover. The next articles are extremely important. The fourth is a reactionary measure, being an attempt to suppress the growth of the cabinet as distinct from the Privy Council, which became more fully established in the reign of William III. The signature of the privy councillor was devised as a method of obviating the irresponsibility of the cabinet minister. [CABINET.] The article is also a protest against William's Partition Treaty [SPANISH SUCCESSION], which was concluded by the instrumentality of Portland and Somers, without his consulting even the cabinet. It was repealed in 1705. The fifth article is a protest against William's partiality for Portland and Albermarle. It was too sweeping in its application, although it had a beneficial effect in the reign of George I. It was afterwards modified, especially with regard to admission to Parliament, and was finally repealed by 7 & 8 Vict., c. 66, Mr. Hutt's Naturalisation Act. The next article was a most short-sighted measure. Had it continued in force, the ministry would have been excluded from Parliament: that is, there would have been a complete separation between the executive and legislative. Hence the Commons, who alone can grant supplies, would either have roused the people to subvert the monarchy, or they would have sunk to the condition of the Estates-General of France. The evil of the influence of the crown was partially remedied by Place Bills, but more effectively by limiting the royal revenue. The article was revised in 1705, when, however, the following provisions were inserted: That any member of the Commons accepting an office of the crown, except a higher commission in the army, shall vacate his seat, and a new writ shall be issued; secondly, that no person holding an office created since Oct. 25, 1705, shall be capable of election or re-election. Parliament excluded at the same time all such as held pensions during the pleasure of the crown; and, to check the multitude of placemen, enacted that the numbers of commissioners appointed to execute any office should not be increased. The efficacy of the seventh clause was increased by the exclusion of judges from Parliament.

Settlement, THE ACT OF (1652), was the Cromwellian measure for the Settlement of Ireland. The following were its chief provisions:—(1) A free pardon was granted to all whose estates did not exceed £10 in annual value. (2) All the land in Ulster, Munster, Leinster was declared confiscated. (3) The Irish proprietors in these three provinces were divided into three classes: (a) All rebels before Nov. 10th, 1642, all who sat in the Kilkenny Council before May, 1643, all the leaders mentioned by name, and all concerned in the massacre of 1641, to lose their lives and estates; (b) All other persons, who fought against the Parliament, to lose two-thirds of their estates; (c) All persons who had resided in Ireland between 1641 and 1650, and who had not served with the Parliamentary forces since 1649, to lose one-third of their estates. An Act of the Little Parliament in 1653, however, declared that those proprietors who were to get part of their estates restored to them, must accept equivalents in Connaught and Clare. (4) The greater part of the forfeited lands was then set apart in equal shares to satisfy the claims of the adventurers and of the Puritan soldiery, the counties of Dublin, Cork, Kildare, and Carlow being reserved for the future disposal of Parliament. The soldiers were to be kept together in regiments; but the designs of the Protector in this direction were frustrated by the soldiers themselves, who sold their lands to speculators like Sir W. Petty, before the allotment. Mr. Lecky says of the Cromwellian Settlement, "It is the foundation of that deep and lasting aversion between the proprietary and the tenants, which is the chief cause of the political and social evils of Ireland."

Settlement, THE ACT OF (14 & 15 Charles II.—1662), was passed in the second session of Charles II.'s first Irish Parliament, and was substantially based on the Declaration of 1660. It declared that innocent Irish were to regain their estates while the Cromwellian and other settlers also had their land confirmed to them. It was found that there was not enough land in Ireland to satisfy all. Everything depended on the construction of the word "innocent" by the Court of Claims. The term innocent was not to include anyone who had been on the rebel side, or even resided within their lines before the cessation, nor any one who had sided with Rinuccini against Ormonde. Yet, despite this not very liberal construction, too much land was restored by that court to the natives, and it was found necessary in 1665 to pass a second Act, the Act of Settlement and Explanation.

Froude, English in Ireland; Carte, Ormonde; Statutes.

Settlement and Explanation, THE ACT OF (17 & 18 Charles II.—1665), became necessary, owing to the action of the Court of Claims and its construction of the Act of Settlement in favour of the natives. In accordance with the new Act, adventurers and soldiers were to content themselves with two-thirds of what belonged to them; Catholics were to make good their claims as innocent within the year. All doubtful cases were to be construed in favour of Protestants, and some twenty persons were to be restored to their estates by special favour, and at once. The result of this Act, thus avowedly designed to protect the Protestant interest, and especially of the second clause, was to deprive 3,000 Catholics of all their rights without a trial. The result of the Act, when carried out, was to leave but one-third instead of two-thirds of the good land in Ireland in Catholic hands. An attempt at inquiry into the working of this Act in 1670 had to be given up in deference to the English Parliament.

Settlement of India, THE ACT FOR THE (or, as it is more correctly called, "The Act for the better Government of India"), became law in 1858 after vigorous debates on Lord John Russell's resolutions, upon which it was based, and a strong protest from the directors of the East India Company. It provided that all the territories previously under the government of the Company were to be vested in the Queen, who was to govern through one of the principal secretaries of state, assisted by a council of fifteen, of whom seven were to be elected by the court of directors and eight nominated by the crown. After a certain time the right of the directors to appoint members was to be transferred to the secretary of state. The Governor-General received the new title of Viceroy. The civil service was made competitive, the military forces were amalgamated with the royal service, and the navy abolished. It was also provided that Indian revenues should not be applied towards defraying the cost of an extra-frontier military expedition without the consent of Parliament. [INDIA.]

Act 21 & 22 Vict., c. 106.

Seven Bishops, THE, were Archbishop Sancroft of Canterbury, Bishops Ken of Bath and Wells, White of Peterborough, Lloyd of St. Asaph, Trelawney of Bristol, Lake of Chichester, and Turner of Ely. They drew up at Lambeth a petition against James II.'s requiring the clergy to read his Declaration of Indulgence during divine service in their churches (May, 1687). Arrested and accused of publishing a seditious libel, they were tried before venal judges and a packed jury. But on June 30, they were acquitted in the midst of great popular rejoicings. The very same day an invitation to invade England was sent to the Prince of Orange. It is remarkable that the Seven Bishops were such strong Tories and High Churchmen, that the majority of them, including Sancroft and Ken, became Non-jurors.

Seven Earls, THE, were dignitaries of early mediæval Scotland. The appearance of the term earl as a title, and of the Seven Earls as representing various parts of the country in the council of the kingdom, begins with the reign of Alexander I. The same officials had, if Celts, been previously styled mormaers; if Norsemen, jarls. The appearance of the Seven Earls is an important step in the feudalisation of Scotland, and in the Anglicisation of the northern districts. Under Alexander II. the Seven Earls appear as a recognised constitutional body, and then included the Earls of Fife, Strathearn, Athole, Angus, Menteith, Buchan, and Lothian, but the lists vary at different times. The Seven Earls claimed of Edward I. the right of constituting and appointing the king. But at least as early as this their functions were extended to the Estates, and the creation of additional earldoms put an end to the Seven Earls.

Seven Years' War, THE (1756—1763), was caused by the alarm entertained by the Continental powers of Europe at the aggressive designs of Frederick the Great, and by the desire of Maria Theresa to recover the province of Silesia from the King of Prussia. Austria was readily joined by Louis XV. of France, the Czarina Elizabeth, and the King of Poland, who was also Elector of Saxony; while Frederick obtained promises of assistance from England—which was nervously afraid of isolation, and was already at war with France in the colonies—besides some money, and an army in Hanover. Throughout the Continental war, however, the British troops played a secondary part. The first campaign was a great triumph for Frederick. Assuming the offensive, he overran Saxony, defeated the Austrians, who were advancing to its relief at Lobositz, and compelled the Saxon army to surrender. In 1757 the attention of Frederick was at first confined to Bohemia, which he invaded; he invested the Imperialists in Prague, until Marshal Daun defeated him decisively at Kolin in June, and compelled him to evacuate the country. Meanwhile, in Hanover, the English-Hanoverian army, under the Duke of Cumberland, was opposed to the French under Marshal d'Estrées. After allowing the French to cross the Weser, he was utterly defeated at Hastenbeck (July 26), and compelled to capitulate under the Convention of Kloster-Seven. This arrangement, however, was repudiated by the British government, and the defeated army placed under Ferdinand of Brunswick, who drove back the French on that side. Aided by this timely diversion, Frederick succeeded in making head against the coalition, the Imperialists being routed at Rossbach in November, and Silesia reoccupied after the victory of Leuthen. The sudden withdrawal of the Russians from the campaign, owing to the illness of the Czarina, set the Prussians who had been employed against them free to chastise the Swedes, who had joined the allies in this year. At the same time Clive in India had won the great victory of Plassey over the French. The next campaign (1758) was one of considerable changes of fortune. Ferdinand of Brunswick, after defeating the French at Crefeld in June, retired before Marshal Contades, only to advance again and drive the enemy behind the Rhine. On his side Frederick was driven out of Moravia, but won a brilliant victory over the Russians at Zorndorf; and though defeated by Daun with loss, at Hofkirchen, he managed before the end of the year to free Saxony and Silesia from the enemy. Meanwhile the English had taken Louisburg and Fort Duquesne in America, and made successful descents upon Cherbourg and St. Malo. In 1759 the efforts of Frederick were on the whole unfortunate. The battle of Kunersdorf, at first a victory, was converted into a crushing defeat by the approach of Marshal Loudon; his general, Fink, surrendered in November, and at the end of the year Saxony and Lusatia were occupied by the Austrians. Ferdinand of Brunswick, however, though frustrated in an attempt to recover Frankfurt, won a great victory at Minden on Aug. 1, over Contades and Broglie, and aided by the victory of his relative the hereditary Prince of Brunswick, on the same day, succeeded in clearing Westphalia of the enemy. At the same time the resources of the French were being weakened by the English successes in the East and West, by the capture of Quebec in September, by the victories of Boscawen at Lagos, and of Hawke at Quiberon, and by the successes of Coote in India, which terminated with the battle of Wandewash. In 1760 the English subsidy alone enabled Frederick to resist his encircling enemies. Berlin was occupied by the Russians in October, and though by the brilliant victory of Liegnitz in August, Silesia had been partially recovered, they came up again in November, and the fearful battle of Torgau only just saved Prussia from destruction. It was followed by the retirement of the allies on all sides. Soon after the death of George II. all subsidies from England ceased, and so exhausted were both sides, that no operations of particular moment were undertaken. On the Rhine, Ferdinand of Brunswick and the French alternately advanced and retreated, and the Russians and Austrians were unable to crush Frederick's remnant of an army, owing to the desolation of the country. A double series of negotiations had already begun, those between England and France, and those between Russia and Austria on the one side, and Prussia on the other. The former, in spite of the opposition of Pitt and the outbreak of the war with Spain, ripened into the Treaty of Paris (q.v.) of 1763. The latter were broken off by Austria, and the war was resumed. The death of the Czarina Elizabeth, in Jan., 1762, however, totally changed the balance of affairs, and Maria Theresa, thus left alone, was compelled to conclude the Peace of Hubertsburg in 1763, by which Frederick retained Silesia. The war, therefore, had effected but little change in Europe; but it had settled the question of the rivalry of England and France in America and India, decisively in favour of this country.

Severus, L. SEPTIMIUS, Roman Emperor (193—211), is famous in British history for his expedition to Britain in 208, his subdivision of the island into two provinces, his building the wall which goes by his name between the Solway Firth and the Tyne, following the line of the vallum of Hadrian. Soon after he died at York (211).

Seville, THE TREATY OF (Nov. 9, 1729), settled for awhile the difficulties which had been raised in Europe by the intrigues of the Spanish minister, Don Ripperda, in opposition to the Quadruple Alliance. The question most difficult to arrange was that of the cession of Gibraltar. This possession the ministry were not unwilling to surrender, provided an equivalent was given, but feared opposition from the nation, which was violently agitated on the subject, owing to the publication of a letter of George I., in which it had been vaguely promised. The government therefore sent William Stanhope to Spain, who succeeded in concluding the treaty. He was aided by French mediation. It was a defensive alliance between England, Spain, and France, and subsequently Holland. Spain revoked all the privileges granted to Austrian subjects by the treaties of Vienna, re-established English trade in America on its former footing, and restored all captures. The Assiento was confirmed to the South Sea Company, and arrangements were made for securing the succession of Parma and Tuscany to the infant Don Carlos, by substituting Spanish troops for the neutral forces, which since the preliminaries had been occupying those countries. Gibraltar was not mentioned in the treaty, and this silence was regarded as a renunciation of the claims of Spain. "The Treaty of Seville," says Mr. Lecky, "has been justly regarded as one of the great triumphs of French diplomacy. It closed the breach which had long divided the courts of France and of Spain, and, at the same time, it detached both England and Spain from the Emperor, and left him isolated in Europe. He resented it bitterly, protesting against the introduction of Spanish troops into Italy as a violation of the Quadruple Alliance, threatened to resist it by force, and delayed the execution of this part of the treaty during the whole of 1730."

Saxburgh, Queen of Wessex (672), succeeded, on the death of her husband Cenwealh, and reigned one year. She is remarkable as affording the sole instance of a woman obtaining the crown in Anglo-Saxon times. William of Malmesbury says of her, "She ruled her subjects with moderation, and overawed her enemies; in short, she conducted all things in such a manner that no difference was discernible, except that of her sex." Seychelles, THE, are a group of islands in the Indian Ocean, which were formerly in the possession of the Portuguese and French. On the acquisition of Mauritius by the English in 1810, the Seychelles were made a dependency of that colony, together with the island of Rodriguez.

Seymour, SIR EDWARD (b. 1633, d. 1708), a descendant in the elder line of the Lord Protector Somerset, was a strong Tory. He was made Speaker of the House of Commons in 1673; he was subsequently created Privy Councillor and Treasurer of the Navy. He opposed the Exclusion Bill, but soon after the accession of James II. spoke against the abrogation of the charters of towns, and also against the maintenance of a standing army. He joined the Prince of Orange, and was left in command at Exeter. In the Convention he would have been chosen Speaker had he not voted for a regency. However, he took the oath of allegiance, and in 1692 he was placed on the Treasury Commission, when he soon quarrelled with his colleagues on questions of precedence, and in 1694 was dismissed from office. He was now accused of having received bribes from the East India Company for the renewal of their charter. In 1697, exasperated at not being appointed Speaker, he made a violent speech on the election of Littleton, and went beyond the bounds of moderation in his persecution of an officer named Kirke, who had slain his eldest son in a duel. In Queen Anne's reign he was made Comptroller of the Palace. He was dismissed from office in 1704 for his opposition to the war with France. Seymour was a man of great influence, wealth, and debating power, but he was a shifty politician, and his private character was bad.

Macaulay, Hist. of Eng.; Burnet, Hist. of His Own Time.

Seymour, OF SUDELEY, THOMAS LORD (d. 1549), brother of Protector Somerset, was a man of great ambition, unprincipled in the attainment of his ends. Made a peer and Lord High Admiral of England by his brother, he shortly afterwards married Catherine Parr, the queen dowager, and utilised his improved position to set the young king against his brother, of whose power he was envious. He sought allies even among the debasers of the coinage and the pirates in the channel. He formed a plot to carry off Edward, and to drive his brother from the protectorship, but his plan was betrayed and Seymour was bribed to remain quiet. On the death of Catherine the admiral endeavoured without success to obtain the hand of the Princess Elizabeth, and formed fresh plans of violence against his brother. At the end of 1548 Seymour's proceedings became so threatening that he was arrested and sent to the Tower, attainted of high treason, and executed, March 27, 1549. "He was," says Mr. Hallam, "a dangerous and unprincipled man; he had courted the favour of the young king by small presents of money, and appears beyond question to have entertained a hope of marrying the Princess Elizabeth, who had lived much in his house during his short union with the queen dowager. It was surmised that this lady had been poisoned to make room for a still nobler consort." Latimer said of him that "the admiral was a man furthest from the fear of God that ever he knew or heard of in England."

Shaftesbury, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, EARL OF (b. 1621, d. 1683), was the son of Sir John Cooper and Anne, daughter of Sir Anthony Ashley. He was educated at Oxford, and in 1640 entered Parliament. At first he espoused the cause of the king, and on the outbreak of the Civil War he was placed in command of Weymouth, but being superseded in this office he went over to the Parliament, by whom he was placed in command of the forces in Dorsetshire. He sat in the Barebones and the first Protectorate Parliaments, but subsequently had some quarrel with Cromwell, and was excluded from the Parliament of 1656. He was a member of Richard Cromwell's Parliament, and on the restoration of the Long Parliament he was made one of the Council of State. He was one of the deputation sent over to the Hague to invite Charles II. to return, and was elected to the Convention Parliament. In 1660 he was made Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in the next year was made Lord Ashley. In 1667 the Cabal ministry, of which he was a prominent member, was formed, and in 1672 he was made Earl of Shaftesbury and Lord Chancellor. All the wrong-doings of the Cabal ministry have been attributed to him, but it is now proved that he had no share in advising the closing of the Exchequer, and that in foreign policy his wish seems to have been to have preserved the Triple Alliance. The last lay lord chancellor, as a judge, atoned for want of knowledge of law by great impartiality and acumen. The passing of the Test Act occasioned the downfall of the Cabal administration in 1673, and Shaftesbury at once joined the opposition and commenced intrigues with Monmouth. In 1677 he brought himself into collision with the crown on the question of the prorogation of Parliament. He was in consequence sent to the Tower, and remained there for twelve months. The year 1678 is memorable for the pretended Popish Plot, of which Shaftesbury has been accused of being the inventor, and whether this be so or no, he was certainly one of the chief supporters of the violent attack upon the Catholics, and especially upon the Duke of York. In 1679 he was made President of the Council, devised by Temple for carrying on the government, but only held office for six months, his strong support of the Exclusion Bill rendering him objectionable to the king. It was during this brief tenure of office that he got the Habeas Corpus Act (q.v.) passed, which was generally known at the time as Lord Shaftesbury's Act. In 1680 he made an attempt to impeach the Duke of York as a Popish recusant, but he was foiled by the judges suddenly dismissing the grand jury. In 1681 he attended the Oxford Parliament with a large body of followers, many of whom were armed; and this violence, together with the palpable lies disseminated by Oates and other informers, did much to destroy his influence, and Charles committed him to the Tower. He was indicted for high treason, but the grand jury ignored the bill, and he was released. He now plotted with Sydney, Russell, and others to effect a change of government, probably desiring to place Monmouth on the throne; but the conspiracy being discovered, he fled to Holland in November, 1682, where he died two months after. Shaftesbury is the Achitophel of Dryden's satire, where he is thus described—

"For close designs and crooked counsels fit,
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;
Restless, unfix'd in principles and place,
In power displeas'd, impatient of disgrace."

Macaulay practically accepts Dryden's character, but Ranke regards Shaftesbury with greater respect, and considers that he logically followed the principle of toleration all through his life.

Christie's Life of Shaftesbury, which puts his conduct in the best light. Ranke, Hist. of Eng.; Macaulay, Hist. of Eng.

Shah Soojah was the brother of Zemaun Shah, King of Cabul, whom he succeeded in 1802. In 1808 Mr. Elphinstone was sent by Lord Minto to negotiate a treaty of defence with Shah Soojah. During the negotiations an expedition which he had sent to recover Cashmere was defeated, and his brother Mahmood took advantage of this to seize Cabul and Candahar, and threaten Peshawur, Shah Soojah's capital. Shah Soojah thereupon solicited help from the English. In 1810, however, he was totally defeated by his rival, and fled across the Indus. After remaining some time in captivity in Cashmere, he sought refuge with Runjeet Singh, who subjected him to cruelties in order to obtain the Koh-i-noor from him. He succeeded at length in escaping in disguise to Loodiana, where the British government allowed him a pension of 50,000 rupees a year. In 1833 he was encouraged by the treachery of Dost Mahomed's brothers to make an effort to recover his throne. He in vain asked help of the English. He thereupon concluded a treaty with Runjeet Singh, guaranteeing him all his conquests beyond the Indus on condition of his support. He marched successfully through Scinde to Candahar, where he was attacked and utterly beaten by Dost Mahomed. In July, 1834, he fled to Beloochistan, and in March, 1835, he returned to Loodiana. In 1838, on the failure of the mission to Cabul, a triple alliance was concluded between the English, Runjeet and Shah Soojah, for the deposition of Dost Mahomed, and the re-establishment of the Shah, on the condition that the possessions of Runjeet across the Indus were guaranteed. The Shah, however, had no desire to be carried into Cabul by British bayonets. All he wanted was British gold. Therefore he did not contemplate the Afghan expedition (q.v.). On April 25, 1839, he entered Cabul unopposed. In 1840 he established the order of the Dooranee empire to decorate his English supporters with. During his residence at Cabul he insisted that the Bala Hissar, the citadel, in which he had placed his zenana, should not be profaned by English troops, and thus it was left defenceless. He was thoroughly unpopular, owing to the cessions to Runjeet Singh, and was merely supported by British bayonets. In 1842 the last survivor of the English garrison at Cabul reached Jellalabad. Shah Soojah still remained ostensibly head of the Afghan government, continuing to occupy the Bala Hissar. He endeavoured to keep friendly both with the English by professing unaltered attachment, and with the chiefs by professing devotion to the national cause. The latter distrusted him, and desired him to prove his sincerity by heading the army destined to expel General Sale from Jellalabad. On April 5, 1842, after an oath of safe-conduct from Zemaun Khan, he descended from the citadel decked out in all the insignia of royalty, and was shot dead by a body of matchlock men whom Zemaun Khan's son had placed in ambush without his father's knowledge.

Shannon, HENRY BOYLE, EARL OF, was for twenty-five years Speaker of the Irish House of Commons (from 1733 to 1756). He was the chief leader of the Irish patriot party, and practically commanded a majority in the House. He at first took the lead against the government in the inquiry into the pension list, but was bought off by being elevated to the peerage, and by the grant of a pension of £2,000 per year. He died in 1764, and was succeeded by his son Richard as second earl.

Shannon, RICHARD BOYLE, 2ND EARL, married the daughter of Speaker Ponsonby, and in close union with him endeavoured to control the Castle. In 1770 he lost his office at the head of the ordnance department, but in 1772 the Castle again made terms with him. He was enormously rich and an excellent landlord. He died in 1807. The Earls of Shannon, together with the Ponsonbys, Beresfords, and the Duke of Leinster, were the real rulers of the Irish Parliament during the greater part of George III.'s reign.

Sharlington, SIR WILLIAM, was master of the Mint at Bristol, and one of the party of Lord Seymour of Sudeley (q.v.), for whose service he coined £100,000 of base money. He was arrested in Feb., 1549, and attainted the same time as Seymour, though he subsequently obtained a pardon.

Sharp, JACK (d. 1431), was the real or assumed name of a Lollard leader who, in 1431, formed a plot which had for its ostensible object the disendowment of the Church. He was captured and put to death at Oxford.

Sharpe, JAMES, Archbishop of St. Andrew's (b. 1618, d. 1679), was the agent of the Resolutions to Cromwell in 1656, and was one of the leading Presbyterian ministers in Scotland. He was in favour of the restoration of Charles II., who appointed him in 1660 one of the royal chaplains. In 1661 he was sent to London by the Presbyterians to beg for the establishment of Presbyterianism in Scotland, but he was bribed to betray his cause, and returned to Scotland as Archbishop of St. Andrews, with the full determination to do everything in his power to further episcopacy. He was one of the chief persecutors of the Covenanters, and in 1668 he was shot at, but escaped without injury. His oppressions and cruelties were so great that in 1679 he was murdered by a band of Covenanters under Hackston of Rathillet on Magus Muir, near St. Andrews.

Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

Sharpe, SAMUEL, was one of the leaders and chief instigators of the slaves in the Jamaican rebellion of 1831—32. [JAMAICA.] It was owing to his ability that the rebels were enabled to gain the few temporary successes they did. He was executed at the close of the insurrection.

Shaw, Doctor, was brother to Sir Edward Shaw, Lord Mayor in 1483. He had high repute for learning and sagacity, and was employed by Richard, Duke of Gloucester, to preach a sermon at Paul's Cross, to advocate the latter's claim to the crown. Accordingly, on June 22, he delivered a sermon, taking his text from the fourth chapter of the Book of Wisdom, in which he impugned the validity of Edward IV.'s marriage with Elizabeth Woodville on the ground of a precontract with Lady Elizabeth Butler, daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury. From this he adduced the inference that Edward V. and his brother were illegitimate, and therefore, as Clarence's family were attainted and incapable of succeeding, Richard was the rightful sovereign.

Shaxton, Bishop of Salisbury (d. circa 1556), was a prelate who was for some time associated with Latimer. Bishop of Worcester, in a determined opposition to the merciless statute of the Six Articles (q.v.). On his resignation of his see rather than subscribe to the articles, Shaxton was thrown into prison as an obstinate sacramentarian heretic; he subsequently, however, found it advisable to conform to the new opinions, and signalised his conversion by preaching at the burning of several more determined heretics than he had proved to be, his most notable appearance in this way being at the burning of Anne Askew. From the fact that he was in receipt up to 1556 of a crown pension of £66 13s. 4d., he must have survived till that date at least, but the exact year of his death is unknown.

Sheffield, EDMUND, 1st LORD (d. 1549), was second in command to the Marquis of Northampton when he was engaged in suppressing the Norfolk rebellion of 1549: he was killed by the insurgents whilst attempting to hold Norwich against them. Lord Sheffield was created a peer by Edward VI. (1547).

Sheffield, EDMUND, LORD (d. 1646), one of the commanders of the English fleet which defeated the Spanish Armada, was knighted for his services, and subsequently became Governor of Brille in the Low Countries. He was created Earl of Mulgrave by James I.

Sheffield was the seat of a castle which was built probably by the family of De Lovelot during the twelfth century, and which passed from the Furnivals and Talbots into the possession of the Earl of Arundel at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The castle was burnt by John d'Eyville during the Barons' War (1266). It served as the prison of Mary Queen of Scots from November, 1570, to September, 1584. It was occupied for the Parliament at the beginning of the Civil War, but abandoned in 1643, and held for the king by Sir William Saville. In August, 1644, it was captured by Major-General Crawford, and in 1646 demolished by order of Parliament. The town was famous for its cutlery as early as the fifteenth century, and its Cutlers' Company was incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1624. In 1685 its population was estimated to be about 4,000, in 1760 it had increased to something between 20,000 and 30,000, and in 1881 to 284,000. By the Reform Bill of 1832 it was enfranchised and given two members, while in 1843 it received a charter of incorporation as a municipal borough. It was the scene of some serious trades-union outrages in 1867. [SHEFFIELD OUTRAGES.]

Sheffield Outrages. In 1867 a Commission was appointed to inquire into the trades-union outrages, and the organisation and rules of these societies. Sheffield had long been conspicuous as a centre of trades-union tyranny of the worst kind. When a workman had made himself obnoxious to the leaders of a local trades union, some sudden misfortune was sure to befall him. His house was set on fire; gunpowder was exploded under his windows; an infernal machine was flung into his bedroom at night. The man himself, supposing him to have escaped with his life, felt convinced that in the attempt to destroy him he saw the hand of the union; his neighbours were of his opinion; but want of evidence, and fear of the consequences, made it impossible to punish or even find out the offenders. The secretaries of the trades unions indignantly denied all these statements, alleged the beneficial nature of their societies, and demanded an inquiry into their rules and organisation. In consequence the demand was granted. Three examiners were sent down with Mr. Overend, Q.C., at their head. A searching inquiry, and the offer of a free pardon to any one, even the actual offenders, who would reveal full particulars of the crimes, elicited full evidence that most of these outrages were perpetrated at the command of some union, that of the unions the saw-grinders deserving the most infamous notoriety. It was remarkable that the secretary of this union, a person named Broadhead, had the most indignantly protested the innocence of his union, while it was proved by the evidence of a man named Hallam that the murder of Linley, an obnoxious workman, was done by Broadhead's especial instructions. The crimes were in most cases regularly ordered, arranged, and paid for by the unions. The actual men who committed them were merely agents of the union, and wholly uninfluenced by personal feeling against the victim. Broadhead at last had the effrontery to come before the examiners himself, and explain the whole system of villany of which he had been the mainspring.

Shelburne, LORD. [LANSDOWNE.]

Sheldon, GILBERT (b. 1598, d. 1677), was a native of Staffordshire, and became Warden of all Souls' College, Oxford, in 1635. He was one of the royal commissioners at the Treaty of Uxbridge, and in 1647 was deprived of his wardenship. On the Restoration he was made Bishop of London, and on the death of Juxon in 1663 was advanced to the Archbishopric of Canterbury. He was a strong High Churchman, and rigorous in carrying out the Act of Uniformity, a patron of learning, and the builder of the theatre of the University of Oxford.

Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury.

Shere Ali was the son of Dost Mahomed, Ameer of Afghanistan. On Dost Mahomed's death (1863) a series of struggles ensued for the succession between Shere Ali and his brothers, Afzool and Azim. In one of these Shere Ali was deposed, and Afzool Khan became ruler. He did not live long afterwards, and his son, Abdool Rahman, waived his claim in favour of his uncle, Azim Khan, who had been for some time a fugitive in English territory. Ultimately, however, Shere Ali regained his throne, and the opposing faction was overcome. In 1870 Shere Ali visited India, and met the Viceroy, Lord Mayo, at Umballa, where the latter's generous conduct went a long way to ensure friendly relations with the Ameer. In 1876, however, began a series of events which produced the Afghan mission of Sir Lewis Pelly, and gradually led up to the second Afghan War (q.v.).

Shere Singh, one of the most influential chiefs of the Punjab, joined the insurrection of Moolraj, Sept., 1848. This was followed by a general insurrection known as the second Sikh War. Successful at the actions of Ramnagar and Sadoolapore, owing to the bad generalship of Lord Gough, he was beaten at Chillianwalla, but the defeat was a practical victory, so much did it elevate the character of the Sikhs for prowess. The rout at Guzerat, however, destroyed all his hopes, and he surrendered to the English, March 12, 1849. [Sikhs.]

Shere Singh was the reputed son of Runjeet Singh, on whose death, 1839, followed by that of his son, Khurruk Singh, and grandson, Nao Nihal Singh, in 1840, Shere Singh became regent of the Punjab in conjunction with Chand Kowur, the widow of Khurruk Singh. In 1841 Shere Singh, with the help of the army, attained supreme power. In 1843, during the anarchy which followed, he was assassinated by a discontented chief. [Sikhs.]

Sheridan, RICHARD BRINSLEY (b. 1751, d. 1816), was born in Dublin. His parents having come over to England, the boy was sent to Harrow. After leaving school he spent several years in idleness, till stimulated by the straits to which a runaway match had reduced him, he applied himself vigorously to the composition of plays, the result being the production of three of the best comedies in our language. But in 1780, having reached the height of his ambition in the region of the drama, he aspired to politics, and was elected member for Stafford. His first attempt in the House was a failure, but on the subject of the employment of the military in civil disturbances Sheridan gave some signs of his great oratorical powers. His abilities were so far recognised by the Whig party that on North's fall he was appointed one of the under-secretaries in Rockingham's ministry, and was subsequently Secretary to the Treasury in the Coalition. On Pitt coming into power Sheridan went into opposition, and very soon rose to the first eminence as a debater and speaker. But the occasion of his greatest oratorical triumph took place in 1787, when he presented his charge "relative to the Begum Princesses of Oude" against Warren Hastings. Even Pitt allowed his speech to have "surpassed all the eloquence of ancient and modern times." In the rupture which occurred between Fox and Burke on the subject of the French Revolution, Sheridan adhered to his earlier friend, Fox, and himself too incurred the hostility of Burke. In 1794, as conductor of the impeachment of Hastings, he made his reply on the Begum charge, and again astonished his hearers by a marvellous display of the most brilliant eloquence, sustained before the Lords through four whole days. When Fox retired from Parliamentary life, carrying off several of his devoted followers, Sheridan still maintained his post in the opposition, and, perhaps, never spoke with more vigour and power than in the debates on the Irish rebellion and the Union. In 1804 he was appointed by his boon companion, the Prince Regent, to be receiver of the Duchy of Cornwall. When on Pitt's death Fox and Lord Grenville formed a government, Sheridan was rewarded for his long fidelity to his party by the treasurership of the navy, a lucrative but subordinate post. On Fox's death Sheridan succeeded him in the representation of Westminster, but was next year driven to a less conspicuous constituency. On the passing of the Regency Bill he was admitted to extraordinary intimacy and confidence by the regent, and his own party seem to have been not without suspicions as to integrity. In the next year he unfortunately confirmed their fears by acting in an indefensible manner towards the chiefs of that party when negotiations were proceeding with them after the death of Perceval. Always a very bad manager of his own affairs, an expensive election in 1812 brought them into hopeless confusion. The last four years of his life were spent in miserable attempts to evade the pursuits of his creditors. He died on the 7th of July, 1816. The charge of being a mere political adventurer, which has been brought against Sheridan, is sufficiently refuted by the consistent fidelity which he displayed towards his party, more than once from a mere sense of honour towards it refusing to accept a place under others. This was especially the case in 1804, when he was offered a place by Addington, with whom he agreed in his general policy, but would not accept it on scrupulous grounds of obligation to stand by the Whigs. As a statesman he has no claim to permanent fame, but his name will live in history as one of the most brilliant of a group of orators whom the world has never seen surpassed at any one period.

Sheriff. This officer, the scir-gerefa, or shire-reeve, appears before the Conquest as nominated by the crown, though in very early times he may have been chosen by the people in the folk-moot. He acted as the king's steward, collecting and administering the royal dues in his shire, and presiding over the shire-moot, or assembly of freeholders, which met twice a year to transact fiscal and judicial business. By the Normans the sheriff was identified with the viscount (vicecomes), and the shire was called a county. In order to counteract feudal tendencies, the Norman kings increased the power of the sheriffs, sometimes giving the sheriffdom of several counties to one man, or granting the office as an inheritance. Under their rule the sheriff was the representative of the crown in judicial, fiscal, and military affairs. Besides presiding in the county court, he, or his substitute, held a court in each hundred twice a year for view of frank-pledge, called the sheriff's tourn and leet. He collected the king's dues from his shire, and twice in each year, at Easter and at Michaelmas, accounted at the exchequer for the form or rent at which he farmed the ancient profits of the county from the crown, and for the sums arising from taxation, feudal rights, jurisdiction, and the sale of offices. In his military capacity he led the posse comitatus, and the lesser tenants of the crown. The vast power exercised by men holding the sheriffdom of several counties was injurious to the interests both of the crown and of the people, and when, as was sometimes the case, the king's justices, to whom the sheriffs had to render their accounts, were themselves made sheriffs, they had ample opportunities for fraud. The administrative vigour of Henry II. was displayed by the Inquest of Sheriffs (q.v.), a strict scrutiny into the conduct of these officers, made by his orders in 1170. After this inquest all the sheriffs in England were removed from their offices, though several of them were afterwards restored. By this time most of the hereditary sheriffdoms had been done away, and the office of sheriff was held over one or two counties by local magnates. In place of those sheriffs who were not restored Henry appointed men whom he could trust. Even after this date hereditary sheriffdoms were occasionally granted by the crown. Robert of Vieuxpont, for example, was made hereditary sheriff of Westmoreland by John, and his descendants continued to hold the office until the death of the Earl of Thanet without issue in 1849, when hereditary sheriffdoms were abolished by statute, 13 & 14 Vict., c. 30. By a charter of Henry I. the citizens of London obtained the privilege of electing their own sheriff, and other boroughs gained by fine or charter the right to collect their own form without the sheriff's interference.

The importance of the sheriff's office was curtailed during the administration of Hubert Walter, for in 1194 sheriffs were forbidden to act as justices in their own shires, and the office of coroners to hold pleas of the crown was instituted. A further step in the same direction was taken by art. 24 of Magna Charta, which forbade sheriffs to hold pleas of the crown. By the provisions made at Oxford in 1258 sheriffdoms were to be subject to an audit, and were to be held for one year only. An attempt was made the next year to gain a share in the election of these officers for the freeholders. This privilege was granted by Edward in 1300, where the office was not of fee or hereditary, but was withdrawn in the next reign. The limitation of the tenure of office to one year, enforced by statutes of Edward III. and Richard II., made the right of appointment a matter of small consequence. The nomination was made in the Exchequer on the morrow of All Souls' Day, changed by 24 Geo. II., c. 48, to the morrow of St. Martin's. Complaints having been made of the high rent at which the sheriffs let the hundreds, they were ordered by 4 Ed. III., c. 15, to adhere to the ancient forms, and their power in this respect was abolished by 23 Hen. VI., c. 9. The remains of their criminal jurisdiction were swept away by 1 Ed. IV., c. 15. Their military functions were taken away by the institution of lords lieutenant in the reign of Mary, and some acts of extortion were met by 29 Eliz., c. 4, limiting the amount they might take on levying an execution. A person assigned for sheriff must by 13 & 14 Car. II., c. 21, have sufficient lands within the county to answer to the king and the people. In his judicial capacity the sheriff still holds a county court for the election of members of Parliament, and for a few other purposes. As keeper of the king's peace, he is the first man in the county, and takes precedence of any nobleman, and in his ministerial capacity he is charged with the execution of all civil and criminal processes and sentences. Nearly all the duties of his office, however, are fulfilled by an under-sheriff, an officer whom he is compelled by 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 99, to appoint. The inferior officers of the county, such as gaolers, are reckoned as his servants, and until 40 & 41 Vict., c. 21, he was to some extent liable for the escape of a prisoner.

The office of sheriff existed in Scotland as early as the reign of David I., and is mentioned in the laws of that king. It appears to have been an office of inheritance until 20 Geo. II., c. 43, and has long been purely nominal, the title being generally borne by the lord lieutenant. The sheriff depute, on the other hand, holds an office of great importance. He is appointed by the crown for life or good behaviour (ad vitam aut ad culpam), and is the chief judge of the county. His jurisdiction extends to all personal actions on contract and obligation, to actions relating to heritable rights up to £1,000 value, to all matters not belonging to any other court, and to suits about small debts. He has also a criminal jurisdiction, and hears serious cases under the direction of a crown council. The last capital sentence passed by a sheriff was at Glasgow in 1788. By 40 & 41 Vict., c. 50, the appointment of the sheriff substitute was taken from the sheriff depute, and vested in the crown.

Sheriffmuir, THE BATTLE OF (Nov. 13, 1715), was fought between the Royalist army commanded by the Duke of Argyle, and the clans which had risen in favour of the Pretender under Mar. The former included about 3,500 regulars, the latter 9,000 Highlanders. The Macdonalds, who formed the centre of the Jacobite army, defeated the left wing of their enemies and drove them to Stirling; but Argyle and the dragoons had simultaneously defeated the left wing of Mar's army. But unable to withstand a rear attack from the Highland right and centre, he also contrived a dexterous retreat to Stirling. The victory of the Highlanders was, however, in no respect decisive. Sheriffmuir is in Perthshire, on the north slope of the Ochils, two miles from Dunblane.

Sheriffs, THE GREAT INQUEST OF (1170). On Henry II.'s return from France in this year he was met with loud complaints of the exactions of the sheriffs. This afforded him a good opportunity for curtailing the power of these functionaries, and he proceeded to issue a commission to inquire into the truth of these grievances, the accused sheriffs being meanwhile suspended from their offices. The Commissioners were to inquire whether the sheriffs had administered justice fairly, whether they had taken bribes, whether the Assize of Clarendon had been properly carried out, and whether the aids and other taxes had been equitably levied. They were also to inquire into the condition of the crown lands, and to make a list of those persons who had not as yet done homage to the king and his son. The result of the inquiry was the acquittal of the sheriffs, but they were not restored to their offices, and their places were filled by officers of the Exchequer.

Stubbs, Select Charters.

Sherstone, THE BATTLE OF (1016), fought between Edmund Ironside and Canute, after two days' hard fighting, resulted in a drawn engagement. Sherstone is five and a half miles west of Malmesbury.

Sherwin (d. 1581), a Catholic priest, was indicted before Sir Christopher Wray at the same time as Edmund Campian and Bryant for compassing and imagining the queen's death. He was executed in their company at Tyburn.

Ship-money. Before the Conquest the navy was furnished by the levy of ships on the counties in proportion to the number of hundreds contained in each shire. Under the Plantagenets the port towns and the coast counties were called on to furnish ships and men. To this was added the royal navy, a mercenary force paid by the king, which was the beginning of the permanent navy. As late as 1626 the fleet collected for the expedition to Cadiz was got together by contingents from the sea-ports. In 1634 the position of foreign affairs suggested to Charles I. the necessity of raising a fleet in order to maintain the sovereignty of the seas, assert the ownership of the North Sea fisheries, prevent the French from capturing Dunkirk, and secure the co-operation of Spain for the restoration of the Palatinate. Noy, the Attorney-General, suggested that money for the equipment of ships should be levied from the coast towns. The first writ was issued in Oct., 1634, and after some remonstrance from the Lord Mayor of London, generally submitted to. Next year a second writ was issued by which the inland towns and counties were also required to contribute. There was considerable opposition, and Charles obtained from ten of the judges a general opinion that the levy of ship-money from all was lawful (Dec., 1635). A third writ was issued in Oct., 1636, and called forth still stronger opposition, which even a second opinion from the judges in the king's favour (Feb., 1637) could not still. A fourth writ was issued in the autumn of 1637, but none in 1638, and in Jan., 1639, the sum demanded in the fifth writ was only about a third of the amount asked in previous years, but in the next year the government, for the second Scotch war, returned to the full amount of the earlier assessment, i.e., about £200,000. It was by the second of these writs that a ship of 450 tons, manned and equipped for six months, or the sum of £4,500, was demanded from Buckinghamshire. Hampden's trial took place with respect to the twenty shillings due from lands in the parish of Stoke Mandeville. The argument on the point of law began in Nov., 1637, and judgment was finally given in June, 1638. [HAMPDEN.] Ship-money was vigorously attacked in the Short Parliament by Pym and Glanville; and Charles, by the advice of Strafford, was willing to allow the judgment to be carried before the House of Lords upon a writ of error, and there reversed. But the question of the abolition of the illegal military charges, and other things, prevented an agreement. When the Long Parliament met, the House of Commons on Dec. 7, 1640, the House of Lords on Jan. 20, 1641, agreed to resolutions pronouncing the levy of ship-money illegal. A bill declaring this was brought in by Selden on June 8, 1641, and received the king's assent on Aug. 7.

Gardiner, Hist. of Eng., 1603-1642; Hallam, Const. Hist. [C. H. F.]

Shippen, WILLIAM (b. 1672), who first sat in Parliament in 1707, was distinguished throughout his life for his uncompromising Jacobitism. In 1715 he attacked Lord Townshend's ministry on the ground that government was conducted by means of a standing army. In 1718 he was sent to the Tower for remarking that the only infelicity in his majesty's (George I.) reign was that he was ignorant of our language and constitution. He vigorously opposed Walpole's measures for the restoration of public credit in 1720 [SOUTH SEA COMPANY] on the ground that they were too lenient. During these years he had led a small body of about fifty Jacobites, who together with the High Tories and discontented Whigs formed the opposition to Walpole's ministry. [WALPOLE.] During the wild intrigues of 1740 he was not consulted by the Jacobite emissary, Lord Barrymore, as he was generally considered a weak conspirator. In 1741, when the motion for the dismissal of Walpole was brought forward, he left the House with thirty-four of his friends, saying that he did not care what minister was in and what out. He indirectly aided Walpole by proposing that his majesty might be entreated not to involve the country in war for the sake of his foreign dominions. On the fall of Walpole, Shippen continued in opposition. He has been well called "downright" Shippen. "His reputation," says Stanhope, "grew much more from his courage, his incorruptibility, his good humour and frankness of purpose, than from any superior eloquence or talent." He always had a personal regard for Walpole, and was accustomed to say "Robin and I are two honest men."

Shirley v. Fagg, THE CASE OF (1675-7). This was an appeal to the Lords from the Court of Chancery, the legality of which the Commons denied, resisting it principally because one of the parties in this particular case was a member of their House. A quarrel ensued between the two Houses, which was only terminated by their dissolution. The case was not proceeded with, but the appellate jurisdiction of the Lords in Equity cases was never again denied.

Shoojah-ood Dowlah (d. 1775) succeeded to the vice-royalty of Oude (1754). He joined Ali Gohur, the Prince Royal of Delhi, in his invasion of Bengal (1758), and besieged Allahabad. The advance of Clive, however, easily drove back the invasion. In 1759 he became Vizier to the Great Mogul, while his great power and wealth made him practically independent. In 1760 he joined Shah Allum in his invasion of Bengal, but was defeated by the English at Patna. He assisted Meer Cossim (1763) after the massacre at Patna, but was utterly beaten at Buxar by Munro. His dominions were restored to him by Clive, except Corah and Allahabad (1765).

Shore, JANE (d. circa 1509), is said to have been the wife of a London goldsmith, and to have become one of Edward IV.'s mistresses, about 1470. After the king's death she lived with Lord Hastings, and in 1483 was accused by Richard, Duke of Gloucester, of conspiring to injure him by sorcery, but the real reason of his attack upon her seems to have been that she was used as a political agent and go-between by the Hastings and Woodville party. Richard caused her to be brought before the ecclesiastical courts, where she was sentenced to do open penance in the streets of London for her incontinent life. After the death of Hastings she found a new protector in the Marquis of Dorset, but after his banishment she was imprisoned at Ludgate, where her beauty seems to have captivated the king's solicitor, one Thomas Lyons, who apparently married her.

Shore, Sir John (b. 1751, d. 1834), was a distinguished member of the Indian Civil Service, and for some time one of the Council at Calcutta, in which capacity he originated the idea of the revenue settlement of 1793. [LAND SETTLEMENT.] He succeeded Lord Cornwallis (1793), and was created a baronet. He determined on non-intervention in the affairs of the native princes, and especially of the Mahrattas. The latter prepared for war with the Nizam to settle old grievances. Shore, regarding the defection of one ally as productive of the dissolution of the Triple Alliance of 1790, refused to assist the Nizam, and allowed him to be crushed by the Mahrattas in the Kurdah campaign. The result of this defection of the English was greatly to increase the power of the Mahrattas, the audacity of Tippoo, and the dependence of the Nizam, who now fell entirely into the hands of a French officer (Raymond). The disputed succession at Poonah in 1795, and the events which followed, neutralised for some time the power of the Mahrattas, at a time when the Bengal mutiny rendered the English powerless. With regard to Oude, his conduct was equally injudicious. On the death of Hyder Bey Khan (1795), the government became utterly effete, the Vizier merely living for sensual gratification. On his death (1797) Sir John Shore, without due consideration, first installed his reputed son Vizier Ali, and then on more mature consideration and evidence, at the expense of a revolution, deposed him in favour of Saadut Ali, the brother of the last Vizier. [Oude.] Sir John was created Lord Teignmouth, and embarked for England March 25, 1798. He devoted his later years largely to philanthropic work.

Shovel, Sir Cloudesley (b. 1650, d. 1707), born of humble parents in Suffolk, gradually raised himself from the position of a cabin boy to be one of the leading seamen of his time. He distinguished himself in Bantry Bay in 1689, and was knighted by William III. In 1690 he conveyed the king and his army to Ireland, and was made a rear-admiral. Shovel was present at the battle of La Hogue. In 1693 he was placed on the Admiralty Commission. On the accession of Anne, Shovel served under Sir George Rooke in the Mediterranean, and made a resultless descent on Valencia. He brought home the treasure from Vigo Bay, and fought at the battle of Malaga, "with a courage closely bordering on rashness." The Whig party procured his appointment as commander-in-chief of the fleet in place of Rooke. He accompanied Peterborough on his expedition to Spain. In 1707 he co-operated with Prince Eugene and the Duke of Savoy in the siege of Toulon; the attempt was, however, a failure. During his return home Shovel was caught by a storm off the Scilly Islands, and his ship, the Association, struck on the Gilstone Rock. His body was washed on shore, rescued from the wreckers who had plundered it and hidden it in the sand, and was honoured with a public funeral in Westminster Abbey.

Shrewsbury, The Battle of (July 23, 1403), was fought between Henry IV. and the insurgents under Henry Percy. Percy's object was to join his forces with those of Glendower, but the king intercepted him about three miles from Shrewsbury. The royal troops were completely victorious, Henry Percy was slain, and his uncle, the Earl of Worcester, taken prisoner.

Shrewsbury, Charles Talbot, Earl of, afterwards Duke of (b. 1660, d. 1718), was of a Roman Catholic family, but adopted the Reformed faith as early as 1679. He was one of the seven who signed the invitation to William of Orange. He became Secretary of State in William III.'s first ministry; but he early quarrelled with Nottingham, and finding himself powerless against the superior powers of Carmarthen [Lords], he began to intrigue with the Jacobite court at St. Germain. In 1690 William was obliged to dismiss him. But at length, in 1694, the personal request of William overcame his reluctance to resume office, and he was rewarded with a dukedom and the garter. In 1696 he was gravely implicated in the confession of Sir John Fenwick. He at once wrote to the king declaring that Fenwick's charges were exaggerated. William forgave him; but Shrewsbury, overwhelmed with remorse, retired from London. Again, a spy named Matthew Smith accused him of having been privy to the Assassination Plot. William himself offered to prove his innocence, and he was declared guiltless by the Peers. But unable to endure his recollections, he left England. For five years he lived at Rome. On his return he deserted the Whig party, being angry because he could not get office. As member of the Opposition he defended Sacheverell (q.v.) in the House of Lords. In 1710 the queen, wishing to drive Godolphin from office, made Shrewsbury Lord Chamberlain without consulting that minister. In 1711 he deserted the ministry, and joined his old colleague, Nottingham, in an attack on the proposed peace. But in 1713, on the death of the Duke of Hamilton, he went to Paris as ambassador, with instructions to inform M. de Torcy that peace must be concluded. During the last year of Anne's life his views on the succession question seemed doubtful. In Oct., 1713, Bolingbroke probably imagining that he was in favour of a

Stuart restoration, sent him to Ireland as Lord-Lieutenant. He himself declared he accepted the office, "because it was a place where a man had business enough to prevent him falling asleep, but not enough to keep him awake." But finding the elections going against government, and a contest impending between the two Houses of the Irish Parliament, he returned to England to watch the course of events. At Queen Anne's death he was introduced by a deputation and the white staff of Treasurer put into his hands. "Use it," she said, "for the good of my people." This coup d'état was the result of a consultation between himself and the Dukes of Argyll and Somerset. By this stroke on the part of the Whig leaders Bolingbroke's schemes were overthrown. [BOLINGBROKE.] Until George arrived in England several great offices were united in Shrewsbury's hands. But henceforth he ceased to take an active part in politics.

Shrewsbury, FRANCIS TALBOT, 5TH EARL OF (d. 1560), a distinguished soldier, did good service in suppressing the rebellions of 1536. In 1544 he was associated with Lord Hertford in an expedition to Scotland, and again led an army thither four years later. During the reign of Mary he was much favoured by the queen, though he opposed her marriage with Philip. In spite of his religion he was admitted by Elizabeth to her Privy Council, but his unqualified opposition to the Supremacy Bill lost him her favour.

Shrewsbury, GEORGE TALBOT, 6TH EARL OF (d. 1590), was appointed guardian of Mary Queen of Scots (1569), whom he treated so well as to incur the suspicion of disloyalty towards Elizabeth. In 1571 he was privy to the Ridolfi conspiracy, but subsequently returned to his allegiance. He presided at the trial of the Duke of Norfolk in the capacity of Lord High Steward, and afterwards was present as Earl Marshal at the execution of Mary. "He was to the last," says Miss Aikin, "unable so to establish himself in the confidence of his sovereign as to be exempt from such starts of suspicion and fits of displeasure as kept him in a state of continual apprehension."

Aikin, Court of Queen Elizabeth.

Shrewsbury, JOHN TALBOT, EARL OF (b. 1373, d. 1463), was a younger son of Sir Gilbert Talbot, a knight on the Welsh border. He married the daughter and heiress of Lord Furnivall. For some unknown reason he was imprisoned in the Tower early in Henry V.'s reign, but was soon afterwards released and appointed Lieutenant of Ireland, a post which he held for some years, though frequently serving in France, where he was one of the strongest supports of the English rule. In 1429 he was defeated and taken prisoner in the battle of Patay, but three years later was exchanged. In 1442 he was created Earl of Shrewsbury, and in 1447 Earl of Waterford and Wexford. In 1452 he was sent out with troops to France, and captured Bordeaux; but in the next year he was defeated and slain at Castillon. His bravery gained for him the title of "the English Achilles," and with his death the loss of the English conquests in France was assured.

Sick Man, THE, was a term applied by the Emperor Nicholas of Russia to the Ottoman Empire in a conversation with Sir Hamilton Seymour, the English ambassador (1853). "We have on our hands," said the Emperor, "a sick man—a very sick man; it will be a great misfortune if one of these days he should slip away from us before the necessary arrangements have been made."

Sidney, ALGERNON (d. 1683), son of Robert, second Earl of Leicester, born probably in 1622, served under his brother in the suppression of the Irish rebellion (1642), afterwards entered the Parliamentary army, and was wounded at Marston Moor. He was given the command of a regiment in the New Model, elected M.P. for Cardiff in 1646, and held for a few months the post of Lieutenant-General of the Horse in Ireland. He opposed the king's trial, but continued to sit in the House of Commons, and became in 1652 a member of the Council of State. During the Protectorate he took no part in public affairs, but on the fall of Richard Cromwell became again a member of the Council, and was sent as ambassador to Denmark to mediate between that power and Sweden (1659). The Restoration prevented his return to England, and he remained in exile until 1677. In 1679 and 1680 he twice unsuccessfully attempted to obtain a seat in Parliament. His name appears about this time in the accounts of the French ambassador Barillon as the recipient of the sum of 1,000 guineas from him. After Shaftesbury's flight Sidney became one of the council of six which managed the affairs of the Whig party, organised its adherents, and considered the question of armed resistance. In 1683 he was accused of complicity in the Rye House Plot, tried by Chief Justice Jeffreys, condemned, and beheaded. The evidence against him was insufficient, and the manuscript of his work on government, in which doctrines inclining to republicanism were laid down, was used to supply the absence of the second witness necessary in cases of high treason. His attainder was reversed in 1689.

[C. H. F.]

Sidney, HENRY, afterwards Earl of Romney, was a brother of Algernon Sidney. In 1680 he went as envoy to Holland, and there succeeded in gaining the friendship of William of Orange. He was recalled in 1681. In 1688 we find him aiding Admiral Russell in persuading the Whig leaders to invite William to England. He was one of the seven who signed the invitation to William. In 1690 Henry Sidney, now Viscount Sidney, was appointed one of the justices for the government of Ireland. Shortly afterwards he was appointed Secretary of State. In 1692 he was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, but was soon recalled, and became Master of the Ordnance and Earl of Romney. The grants of Irish land made to him were among those attacked in the Resumption Bill.

Sidney, SIR HENRY (d. 1586), the son-in-law of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, a great favourite of Edward VI., was slightly implicated in the scheme to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne, but was pardoned by Mary. He subsequently became one of Elizabeth's most valued servants, and is described by De Quadra, the Spanish ambassador, as "a high-spirited, noble sort of person, and one of the best men that the queen has about the court." In 1562 he was sent on a special embassy to Mary of Guise, the Scottish Regent, and in 1565 was transferred from the Presidency of Wales to the post of Lord Deputy of Ireland, where he discharged his duties with great administrative ability, and, in spite of the enmity of the queen and Lord Sussex, who endeavoured to thwart all his plans, achieved considerable successes against the rebels, defeating Shane O'Neil with great slaughter at Loch Foyle. In 1571 Sidney obtained his recall from a position which had become extremely unpleasant to him, but four years later was prevailed upon to return to Ireland, though he only retained his office little more than a year. "Sir Henry Sidney," says Mr. Froude, "was a high-natured, noble kind of man, fierce and overbearing, yet incapable of deliberate unfairness."

Froude, Hist. of Eng.; Birchall, Tudors.

Sidney, SIR PHILIP (b. 1554, d. 1586), who was "regarded both at home and abroad as the type of what a chivalrous gentleman should be," was the son of Sir Henry Sidney, the nephew of the Earl of Leicester, and the son-in-law of Sir Francis Walsingham (q.v.). After passing some years abroad, he returned to England in 1575, and at once obtained the favour of Elizabeth, by whom he was in the following year sent on a special mission to Vienna, to endeavour to form a Protestant league against Spain. In 1579 he penned his Remonstrance against the Alençon marriage, and shortly afterwards wrote his Arcadia, which was not, however, published until four years after his death. In 1585 he proposed to offer himself as a candidate for the throne of Poland, but was forbidden to do so by the queen, who in the same year sent him to the Netherlands as Governor of Flushing. Whilst in the Low Countries, Sidney distinguished himself as greatly as a soldier as he had previously done as a courtier. He received a wound at the battle of Zutphen (having stripped off some of his own armour to lend it to another officer), from which he died. The universally-known story of his refusing a draught of water when fainting on the field of battle, in order that it might be given to a wounded soldier, well illustrates his character.

Sierra Leone, on the West Coast of Africa, was discovered by the Portuguese in 1483, and was visited in 1562 by Sir John Hawkins. In subsequent years several slave factories were established in the vicinity. In 1787 the territory was ceded to Great Britain by the native chiefs, and certain philanthropists, foremost amongst whom were Granville Sharp and Dr. Smeathman, established a colony there for the reception of slaves who had obtained their liberty by coming to England in the service of their masters. In 1789 an attack was made upon the new colony by a neighbouring chief, and the settlement was for a few months broken up. In 1791 the Sierra Leone Company was formed under the direction of Granville Sharp and Wilberforce, and the colony was reorganised. In 1794 it was again nearly destroyed by an attack of the French, and for many years frequent attacks were also made upon it by the natives. In 1808 the Sierra Leone Company had become so much embarrassed as to be glad to hand over the colony to the British government. From this time great additions were made to the population by the introduction of slaves who had been liberated. The government of Sierra Leone at first extended to Gambia and the Gold Coast; in 1821 these separate governments were united, only to be divided again in 1842. In 1866 the government of Gambia was again made subordinate to that of Sierra Leone. The affairs are at present administered by a governor, assisted by an executive council and a legislative council, consisting of five official and four unofficial members. "There are civil and criminal courts, according to the provisions of the charter of justice of 1821; and courts of chancery, vice-admiralty, ecclesiastical or ordinary, and quarter sessions, and also one for the recovery of small debts." The climate is exceedingly unhealthy, especially to Europeans, and no European settlement on anything like a large scale can therefore be looked for.

Sigebert, King of East Anglia (631—634), was the son of Redwald, and brother of Eorpwald, whom he succeeded. Having been banished by his father, he went to France, where, under the instruction of Bishop Felix, the Burgundian, he "was polished from all barbarianism," and on his return to England encouraged learning by instituting schools in many places. He eventually became a monk in one of the monasteries he had himself founded. Some while after, in order to encourage his soldiers, he was led out to battle against Penda, and was slain.

Sigebert (d. 755), King of Wessex, succeeded his kinsman Cuthred. He is said to have "evil-intreated his people in every way," and to have "perverted the laws to his own ends," the result being that before he had been king more than one year we read that "Cynewulf and the West Saxon Witan deprived him of his kingdom except Hampshire, and that he held till he slew his faithful follower Cumbra, when they drove him to the Andredes-weald, where a swine-herd stabbed him to avenge Cumbra."

Sigeric, Archbishop of Canterbury (990—994), has justly obtained an evil reputation in our history as having been one of those who advised King Ethelred to adopt the fatal policy of buying off the Danes. This was first done in the year 991. Nothing else that can be considered worthy of record is known of Sigeric.

Sihtric, King of Northumberland (d. 927), grandson of Ingwar, the son of Regnar Lodbrok. About the year 920 Sihtric seems to have left Dublin (where his brother Godfrith reigned, 918—933) and to have established himself in Northumberland. He slew his brother Nial 921, and in 923 succeeded another brother, Reginald, as head-king over the English and Danish earls and captains. He appears as a suitor for Elfwyn, Ethelfleda's daughter, which alliance Edward refused, but after the accession of Athelstan he went to meet him at Tamworth in Feb., 925, and was married there to the English king's sister. A year later he died. Athelstan now wished to rule over Northumberland immediately. But Godfrith, Sihtric's brother, came over from Ireland and tried to establish himself on his brother's throne. After a brief rule he was forced to leave England, by Athelstan, the same year.

Sikh Wars. (1) In 1845 the Sikh army, 60,000 strong, with a large and admirably served artillery, crossed the Sutlej, and by Dec. 16 were encamped within a short distance of Ferozepore. On Dec. 12 Sir Hugh Gough, the commander-in-chief, left Umbeyla with the British and native army, and after a march of 150 miles, accomplished in six days, reached the front. On the 13th the Governor-General published a declaration of war, and confiscated all the Sikh districts south of the Sutlej. The Sikh army (Dec. 17) divided; Lall Singh pushed on to Ferozeshar; Tej Singh remained before Ferozepore. On Dec. 18 Lall Singh took Sir Hugh Gough by surprise at Moodkee, but lost the advantage by cowardice and incapacity. This was followed by the terrible two days' struggle at Ferozeshar, at which the two divisions of the Sikh army were beaten in detail, and driven beyond the Sutlej. Towards the end of Jan., 1846, however, Runjoor Singh, attributing the inactivity of the British to fear, crossed the Sutlej, defeated Sir Harry Smith (Jan. 20) at Buddowal, and took up a position at Aliwal, where he received heavy reinforcements. On Jan. 28, he suffered here a complete defeat at the hands of Sir Harry Smith. This was followed by the total rout of the grand Khalsa army at Sohraon (Feb. 10), and that same night the English army entered the Punjab. Negotiations were opened on the 11th; on the 17th Dhuleep Singh himself came and made his submission; on the 20th the English encamped outside Lahore and occupied the citadel. On Mar. 9 a treaty was concluded by which the cis-Sutlej districts, and the Jullunder Doab were annexed to the English territory; the province of Cashmere, the highlands of Jummoo, and half a crore of rupees, were to be given up for the expenses of the war; the Sikh army was to be limited for the future to 20,000 infantry and 12,000 horse; and all the guns which had been pointed against the English were to be surrendered.

(2) The intrigues of the Maharanee Jhindnu developed a spirit of sedition at Lahore which her removal to Benares only intensified. Chutter Singh and Shere Singh, two influential chiefs of the Punjab, were both strongly disaffected (1848), and only waited for a favourable opportunity. In Sept., 1848, General Whish sat down before Mooltan [MOOLTAH] and summoned it in the name of the Queen, thus alarming the national feelings of the Sikhs. Shere Singh immediately passed over to the enemy and proclaimed a religious war, and the whole Punjab broke out in revolt. On Oct. 10 Lord Dalhousie proceeded to the front. On the 9th Shere Singh marched up the Chenab, gathering men as he advanced till he had collected an army of 15,000 troops. Chutter Singh opened negotiations with Dost Mahomed, for whose alliance he consented to cede the province of Peshawar. In October the English grand army assembled at Ferozepore under Lord Gough, and on the 16th crossed the Ravee. The English had to act on two lines, against Mooltan in the south, and the insurrection in the superior delta of the five rivers in the north, and for this they had not enough infantry. The superior position and artillery of Shere Singh enabled him to win the battles of Ramnuggur and Sadoolapore, in which he was aided by the rashness of Lord Gough. After a considerable delay, Lord Gough moved forward again (Jan. 11, 1849) to Dingee; attacked the Sikhs in a very strongly entrenched position at Chillianwallah, and after a long and sanguinary struggle succeeded in compelling them to retreat. The Court of Directors now determined on a change. Sir Charles Napier was requested to proceed to India to supersede Lord Gough. Before he arrived, General Whish had captured Mooltan and the war had ended at Guzerat. All through January the two armies remained watching each other. On Feb. 6 it was found that the Sikhs had marched round the British camp, and were strongly entrenched at Guzerat. In the battle that ensued the persistent withholding of the troops till the Sikh line was broken by the constant fire of eighty-four heavy guns, caused a total victory with little loss to the English. The rebellion was over. On Mar. 6 the Sikh chiefs restored all their prisoners; on the 12th Shere Singh and Chutter Singh surrendered, and the Khalsa soldiers laid down their arms; and Sir Walter Gilbert completed the matter by chasing the Afghans across the Indus to the very portals of their mountain range. On Mar. 29, 1849, the Punjab was annexed to the British territories.

Silistria, THE DEFENCE OF (1854). Besieged by the Russians, Silistria was defended by earthworks, and garrisoned by a Turkish force. Fortunately there were present two young English officers, Captain Buller and Lieutenant Nasmyth, who took the command, and conducted the defence with remarkable skill and ability. The whole efforts of the Russian generals were concentrated on this siege, and just when the tidings of its fall were looked forward for as a matter of certainty, came the news of repulse after repulse inflicted upon immense masses of the besiegers. It was felt that the loss of Silistria after this gallant defence would not only be intolerable, but would produce a bad effect at the seat of war, and in Europe. The allied governments of England and France, especially the former, were urgent that some assistance should be sent to relieve the town. Lord Raglan, however, found it impossible, owing to lack of land transport, to effect anything, and Silistria was left to its fate. On June 22, however, worn out by the gallantry of the garrison, and their own unavailing attempts, the Russians raised the siege, and retreated, having lost upwards of 12,000 men in their unsuccessful assaults on the works.

Silk Riots, THE (1765). In 1764 a commission had been appointed to inquire into the grievances of the silk-weavers. It recommended the common remedy of those days, namely, the exclusion of foreign silks. A bill to that effect was accordingly brought into the Commons, and passed by them without discussion. But in the Lords it was so vigorously opposed by the Duke of Bedford, on the ground that it was wrong in principle, and could only increase the evil which it was meant to lessen, that it was thrown out. The disappointment of the Spitalfields weavers took the form of a riot. They first made their way into the king's presence, and, meeting with a kind reception from him, directed all their wrath against the peers, especially against the Duke of Bedford. A riotous meeting in Palace Yard was dispersed, only to reassemble in the front of Bedford House, which was threatened with destruction. The discontent of the weavers, which was encouraged by the masters, was only at length pacified by the promise of the redress of their grievances, and Lord Halifax in the following year fulfilled the promise by adopting the remedy which had been rejected in 1765, and bringing in a bill prohibiting the importation of foreign silks.

Silures, THE, were a British tribe who inhabited the modern counties of Hereford, Radnor, Brecknock, Monmouth, and Glamorgan. They belonged to the earlier Celtic stock, and probably included a considerable pre-Celtic element. The Silures were amongst the most warlike of the British tribes, and held out against the Romans till subdued by Frontinus shortly before 78 A.D.

Simoon of Durham (d. circa 1130), was an early English historian, precentor of the church of Durham. His history, largely based for the earlier portion on the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, is especially valuable for the light it throws on Northern affairs. It goes down to 1130, and was continued till 1156 by John of Hexham. It has been several times printed.

Simmel, LAMBERT, was the son of a baker, and is only famous historically as having been the puppet leader of one of the earlier revolts against Henry VII. In this revolt he figured as Edward Plantagenet, Earl of Warwick, son of the murdered Duke of Clarence, and he is commonly reported to have been trained to play his part by a priest named Richard Simon, perhaps at the instigation of the queen-dowager. Ireland was fixed upon for the scene of the revolt, in consequence of the support of Thomas Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, the Lord Deputy, and the popularity of the House of York there. In England John de la Pole, Earl of Lincoln, the son of Edward IV.'s eldest sister, Elizabeth, the acknowledged heir of Richard III, was his chief supporter. In Flanders he had a powerful friend in Margaret, Duchesse of Burgundy, another sister of Edward IV. Under her auspices the Burgundian court was made the general rendezvous of the conspirators. Henry meanwhile imprisoned the queen-dowager in the nunnery of Bermondsey, and had furnished an unmistakable proof of the baseless nature of the conspiracy by parading the real Earl of Warwick through all the principal streets of London. He inflicted summary punishment on those noblemen whom his spies had detected in correspondence with Simnel's friends, and sent troops to repel any rebel landing. But when after a brief stay in Ireland, where Simnel was crowned at Dublin, the rebels—under the command of the Earl of Lincoln, the Earl of Kildare, and Lord Lovel, accompanied by 2,000 "Almains," under Martin Schwarz, a German general—landed at Fouldry in Lancashire, they found no assistance. With the exception of a small company of English, under Sir Thomas Broughton, the rebels marched all the way to York without gaining a single adherent. A determined attack on Newark was resolved upon. Henry decided upon an immediate battle, and with that object took up a position between the enemy's camp and Newark. Thereupon the Earl of Lincoln advanced to a little village called Stoke, where on the following day, June 16, 1487, the battle was fought. Three hours elapsed before victory appeared to incline either way. Finally the rebels were utterly defeated, and nearly all their leaders perished, the slaughter being especially great among the German and Irish mercenaries. Among the few survivors of the carnage were Simnel and Simon. Their lives were spared as a matter of policy. Simon was imprisoned for life, but Simnel was contemptuously taken into the royal service as a scullion. Later he was promoted to be a falconer. We have no record of the date of his death.

Singapore, an island off the southern extremity of the Malay Peninsula, was bought by Sir Stamford Raffles on behalf of the East India Company in 1819; in 1825 its possession was confirmed to the British government. In 1867 Singapore was transferred from the control of the Indian government to that of the Colonial Office, and was made the seat of government for all the Straits Settlements. The area of the island is 206 square miles. The city at its southern extremity is a place of great trade, as the entrepôt of the Malay Peninsula, with a population of 100,000.

Sinking Fund, THE, is a fund collected with the object of paying off some part of the national debt. Perhaps the most celebrated scheme for a sinking fund in English history was that of the younger Pitt. In 1784 that minister found that peace, financial reform, and commercial prosperity had brought the revenues into a very flourishing condition. He had a surplus of one million, and, alarmed at the immense development of the debt, he proposed that the surplus should be put aside at compound interest, and the proceeds ultimately devoted to the diminution of the debt. He directed that a million should be laid aside every year, apparently under the belief that every year would produce a similar surplus. For the first few years the plan was very successful, but the long wars against revolutionary France soon made it necessary for the nation to spend far more than its income. Yet until 1807 the million a year was solemnly set aside for the sinking fund, although the nation borrowed many millions at a higher rate of interest than it could get for the fund. A belief in the mysterious wisdom of the step, and of the magical power of compound interest, blinded men to the obvious absurdity of borrowing at a higher interest to lend out at a lower one. But in 1807 the transparent delusion of borrowing for the government from the sinking fund practically ended the system. In 1828 the whole plan was considered fallacious, and abandoned. Later sinking funds, with less ambitious objects, have proved fairly successful, despite the temptation to shift the nation's burden upon posterity. At present the debt is being steadily reduced, among other methods, by the creation of terminable annuities.

Sinope, THE BATTLE OF. In 1853 a squadron of Turkish ships was stationed at Sinope. The Russians, hearing that the Turks had begun the war on the Armenian frontier, proceeded to attack them. The Sebastopol fleet advanced in order of battle into the harbour of Sinope. The Turks struggled gallantly, and maintained the defence for a long time. In the end they were overpowered, destroyed, and it was reported that 4,000 men had been killed. The tidings of this massacre produced the greatest excitement in England. It brought the war fever, already great, to its height, and by throwing public opinion strongly in favour of Lord Palmerston's war policy, practically forced the hands of the ministry, and dragged the country into war.

Six Acts, THE, were six coercive measures passed in rapid succession at a special autumnal session of Parliament in 1819, with the object of suppressing the seditious spirit which commercial depression and reactionary government had excited. They were respectively aimed at preventing delay in punishing riot and sedition, at preventing the training of persons in the use of arms and military evolutions, at preventing and punishing seditious libels, at preventing seditious assemblies, at empowering justices to search for and seize arms, and at extending the stamp duty, and imposing further restrictions on the press.

Owing to their severity and coercive character the Six Acts were violently opposed by some of the Whigs and the Radicals; but were supported by the whole strength of the government and the Tories.

S. Walpole, Hist. of Eng. since 1815; Martineau, Hist. of the Peace.

Six Articles, THE STATUTE OF, passed in 1539, marks the beginning of the reactionary period that continued until the close of Henry VIII's reign. It enumerated precisely and clearly six points of mediæval doctrine and practice which the Protestants had begun to assail, and imposed severe penalties on all who would not accept them. The first article expressed the doctrine of transubstantiation. Those denying this were to be burnt. If the other five articles were impeached the penalties were, for first offence, confiscation of property, for the second, execution as a felon. The five articles declared (2) that communion in both kinds was unnecessary; (3) that priests ought not to marry; (4) that the vows of chastity ought to be observed in both sexes; (5) that private masses were allowable; (6) that auricular confession was necessary. This sanguinary Act, called by the Protestants, "the whip with six strings," continued in force for the rest of Henry's reign.

Skinner v. The East India Company, CASE OF. Skinner was a private merchant in the reign of Charles II., who finding that the India Company, at a time when the Indian trade was open, molested him in his business, and took away from him an island bought from a native prince, petitioned the king to give him that redress which he could not get in the ordinary courts. Charles handed the affair over to the House of Lords, but the Company when called upon to defend itself pleaded its jurisdiction. This, however, was overruled, and £5,000 damages were awarded Skinner. The Company then petitioned the Commons, who had already some disputes with the Upper House. They resolved that the Lords had acted illegally in depriving the Company of the benefit of the law courts. The Lords, in return, voted the Commons' reception of a "scandalous petition" against them a breach of privilege. A furious quarrel ensued. Two conferences of the Houses only added fuel to the flame. At last the Commons voted Skinner into custody for violating their privileges, and the Lords in return imprisoned and fined Sir S. Barnardiston, the chairman of the India Company. The king, by successive adjournments for fifteen months, attempted in vain to appease the quarrel. When the Houses again met they took it up at once, but as the Lords had let out Barnardiston, the Commons were slightly appeased. Both Houses passed bills censuring the other side, which were promptly rejected by the other Houses. At last the king's advice to both Houses to end the dispute, and erase all reference to it in their journals, ended one of the most important disputes in English history between the Upper and Lower Houses. As the Lords never again claimed an original jurisdiction in civil suits, the victory may be said to have rested with the Commons.

Skippon, PHILIP (d. 1660), served in the wars in Holland, and rose from the ranks by his services. Clarendon describes him as "a man of order and sobriety, and untainted with any of those vices which the officers of that army were exercised in." In 1641 he was Captain of the Artillery Garden, and was on Jan. 10, 1642, appointed, with the title of sergeant-major-general, to command the city train-bands, and the guard to be raised for the protection of Parliament. He served as sergeant-major-general under Essex as long as that general retained his command. In Sept., 1644, he was left by Essex in command of the army which was cooped up in Cornwall, and proposed that they should cut their way out at all costs, as the horse had done, but he was overruled by the council of war, and forced to capitulate. In 1645 he was appointed major-general of the New Model, and was present at the battle of Naseby, where he was severely wounded. In April, 1647, he was voted the command of the army destined for Ireland, and in the summer of the same year he was actively engaged in trying to reconcile the army and the Parliament. Skippon disapproved of the king's execution, and refused to sit in the High Court of Justice, but became a member of the first Council of State, sat in the Parliaments of 1654 and 1656, acted as one of Cromwell's major-generals, entered his Privy Council, and accepted a seat in his House of Lords. He died either just before, or immediately after, the Restoration.

Slavery, ABOLITION OF. Slavery in England is of very ancient standing. It existed as an institution among the Saxons as well as the Celts. Among the former the slaves consisted chiefly of captives taken in war, or of members of the subject race. [THEOW.] After the Conquest, the distinct slave class ceased to exist, and was merged with the lower class of serfs into the general body of villeins. [VILLENAGE.] Though the Church had early succeeded in putting an end to the traffic in English slaves (e.g., by the canons of the Council of 1102), slavery itself in England was never abolished by any positive enactment. The decision, therefore, of Lord Mansfield, in the case of the negro Somerset (1772), that slavery could not exist in England, had no legal foundation, and merely reflected the public opinion of the time. Negro slavery in English colonies was not, however, touched by this decision. It was of comparatively recent growth; the first importation of negroes to America is said to have been made by the Portuguese in 1503, and the other nations of Western Europe took part in the trade as soon as they had gained any share in the New World. Among Englishmen, the name of the adventurer John Hawkins, who made his first voyage in 1562, is especially associated with the beginning of the trade. The merchants of Bristol long had an evil fame in this matter. One of the most substantial advantages which England gained at the Peace of Utrecht was the Asiento, which gave it a monopoly of the supply of slaves to the Spanish possessions in America.

The movement for the abolition of the slave trade was started by Thomas Clarkson, some ten years after the Somerset decision. His efforts were assisted by the Society of Friends and by individual philanthropists such as Zachary Macaulay, father of the historian, and, above all, Wilberforce. In 1792 Wilberforce gained the support of Pitt, and a motion was carried in the House of Commons for the gradual abolition of the trade. But, though something was done to lessen the atrocities of "the middle passage," bills prohibiting the trade itself were repeatedly defeated by the West Indian interest. In 1805 the first step was gained by the issue of an order in council prohibiting the traffic with colonies acquired during the war, and in 1806 a bill was passed against the trading in slaves by British subjects either with these colonies or with foreign possessions. Thus the traffic with the older British possessions was still allowed; but this also was at last abolished by the General Abolition Bill in 1807. For a few years offenders against the Act were liable only to fine, but in 1811 slave trading was created a felony punishable with fourteen years' imprisonment; in 1824 it was declared piracy and punishable with death, but in 1837 this was altered to transportation for life.

The success of this movement encouraged its supporters to go on to demand the total abolition of slavery in the British dominions. For some years they made no progress; but in 1823 Canning, though he refused to consider the matter one of pressing importance, gave his support to resolutions declaring that it was expedient to improve the condition of the slaves in order to fit them for freedom. In consequence, a government circular was issued to the West Indian Islands directing that women should no longer be flogged, nor the whip used in the fields. It was greeted with sullen discontent, and some of the planters began to talk of declaring themselves independent. In Demerara the negroes, believing that the English government had set them free, and being prohibited to attend church, rose in rebellion, but without violence.

The rising was put down; and a missionary, John Smith, who had taken no part in the insurrection, but who had done much to civilise the slaves, was tried by court-martial and died in prison. The real meaning of his prosecution was shown by the complaint in the planters' paper that, "to address a promiscuous audience of black or coloured people, bond and free, by the endearing appellation of 'my brethren and sisters' is what can nowhere be heard except in Providence Chapel." The news of Smith's martyrdom gave a great impulse to the abolitionist movement in England. In 1825—26 Protectors of Slaves were appointed by orders in council to watch over their interests, and in 1827 one of these protectors gained the recognition of the right of a slave to purchase his liberty. Finally, in 1833, the great Emancipation Act was passed. After Aug. 1, 1834, all children under six years of age became free at once; field slaves were to serve their present masters as "apprenticed labourers" for seven years, and house slaves for five, and after that were to become free; these terms were shortened by subsequent enactment. Twenty million pounds were to be paid to the planters as compensation. It may be added that from 1815 onward, English influence caused the other European nations and Brazil to prohibit the slave trade, and to recognise a mutual right of search.

Slingsby, Sir Henry, of Scriven, in the county of York, represented Knaresborough in the Long Parliament, and followed the king to York. He fought at Wetherly, Marston Moor, Naseby, and other battles, in the Royalist ranks. In 1656 he entered into negotiations with officers of the garrison of Hull for surrendering it to the Royalists. For this he was tried by a high court of justice in 1658, and sentenced to be beheaded. His execution took place June 8, 1658.

Smalley, John, was the servant of a member of Parliament who, in 1576, was arrested for debt. The Commons sent their sergeant to deliver him, "after sundry reasons, arguments, and disputations." But discovering that Smalley had fraudulently contrived his arrest to get the debt cancelled, he was committed and fined. His case is interesting as showing privilege of Parliament in its fullest extent, and able even to protect the servants of members. A statute of George III., however, took away this unnecessary and invidious immunity.

Smith, ADMIRAL SIR SIDNEY (b. 1765, d. 1841), entered the navy at an early age, towards the end of the American War. During the long peace which followed, he served in the Swedish navy against Russia. He afterwards served at Toulon, was for two years imprisoned in France, and subsequently made his greatest mark in history by his defence of Acre in 1798 against Bonaparte. He concluded the Treaty of El Arish with Kleber, but the government refused to ratify the treaty. He was constantly employed on various services till the end of the war.

Smith, SIR THOMAS (b. 1514, d. 1577), an eminent statesman of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. At Cambridge he was in early life the associate of Cheke in promoting the study of Greek, and also of civil law, which he studied at Padua. A zealous friend of the Reformation, he took deacon's orders, became Dean of Carlisle, and was made by Somerset Provost of Eton, and in 1548 Secretary of State. Disgraced under Mary, he was restored by Elizabeth to his deanery, sent on various important missions, and employed as a sort of assistant secretary to Cecil, with whose policy he sympathised. He wrote besides other works, a book on the English Commonwealth, which is interesting as keeping up the constitutional tradition even at a time of the greatest depression of English liberty.

Smollett, TOBIAS (b. 1721, d. 1771), the eminent novelist, published in 1758 a History of England from the time of Julius Cæsar to the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. Written within fourteen months, this history has naturally no pretensions to permanent value, and the old custom of printing the latter part as a continuation of Hume, has, perhaps unduly raised its literary reputation. Still, with all its faults, vigorous writing and clear delineation of character give Smollett's history some small place in literature. Smollett was a strong Tory, edited a Tory review called the Critical Review, and defended Bute against Wilkes.

Sobraon, THE BATTLE OF (Feb. 10, 1846), was fought during the first Sikh War. The Sikhs had entrenched themselves in semi-circular fortifications with the Sutlej as their base, and their outer line surrounded by a deep ditch. The ramparts were defended by sixty-seven pieces of heavy ordnance and 25,000 soldiers of the Khalsa. A bridge of boats united this encampment with another across the river where heavy guns had also been planted which completely swept the left bank. On the 10th Sir Hugh Gough moved his army in three divisions, the main attack being led against the western corner, which was weakest. The plan was to draw the Sikhs to the sham attacks of the centre and right, and effect an entrance at the west, thus turning the whole entrenchment and rendering the guns useless. After an ineffective though terrific fire on both sides, the main division advanced at a run, leaped the ditch, and mounted the rampart. The guns were instantly turned on the Sikhs, who now concentrated their attack on this part and turned their guns in the interior on the assailants. A furious hand-to-hand struggle ensued; but the gallant charges of the English centre and right drew off many of the Sikhs; the entrenchment was pierced in three places, and the Sikhs were driven headlong to the river, where, finding the bridge broken, they plunged in and perished by hundreds. Horse artillery was brought up along the river, and its cannonade completed the destruction of the enemy. The loss of the Sikhs was estimated at 8,000, our own at 2,383; but the victory was complete.

Soc, or Soke, is a word of very different meanings. Originally it seems to have meant, in Anglo-Saxon law, a sanctuary or place of refuge; but it came to be applied to any privilege or exemption granted by the king to a subject, and eventually the territory or precinct within which these privileges could be exercised. From "soc" in the sense of privilege or franchise is derived the term "socage" (q.v.), because land held by that tenure was exempt from all services except those specified and enumerated. The word is also used in the technical phrase, "soc and soc" (q.v.).

Thorpe, Anglo-Saxon Laws; Kemble, Saxons.

Socage was a tenure of lands characterised by the fixedness of the service due from it. There were three kinds of socage—free and common socage, socage in ancient tenure, and socage in base tenure. The latter sorts can only, however, be improperly called socage. The latter is the same as copyhold, the former as tenure in ancient demesne. The Act 12 Car. II., c. 24, which abolished knight service, made free socage, except in the case of portions of the Church lands still held in frank-almoign, the universal land tenure in England. The socager was bound to fealty, and to attendance at the lord's courts. [LAND TENURE.]

Socman (SOCHEMANNUS) was a tenant in socage. Originally it meant a man who is bound to pay suit to a soken.

Solebay, THE BATTLE OF (1665), was fought by the English fleet under the command of the Duke of York, and the Dutch under Admiral Opdam. The English were completely victorious, only losing one ship and about 700 men, while on the Dutch side eighteen ships and 7,000 men were lost, among the latter being Opdam himself. Solebay is on the Suffolk coast near Lowestoft.

Solicitor - General. The Solicitor-General is an assistant to the Attorney-General (q.v.). The earliest evidence of the existence of the office of solicitor to the king occurs in the first year of Edward IV., and there seems little doubt that before that reign there was no such officer. In the reign of Mary, Rokeby, and in the reign of Elizabeth, T. Fleming, and in the reign of James I., Doderidge, were severally discharged from the office of Serjeant, in order that they might be capable of serving the crown in the capacity of Solicitor-General.

Solmes, Count of (d. 1693), was one of the Dutch favourites of William III. He occupied Whitehall in favour of the Prince of Orange, the guards of James II. retiring before him. He commanded the Dutch troops during William's campaign in Ireland, and led the charge across the stream at the battle of the Boyne. On William's departure for England he was left for a short while in command. He commanded the English troops at the battle of Steinkirk, and his failure to support Mackay's division was in a great measure the cause of that defeat. The outcry against him was great, and Parliament commented severely on his conduct. He was mortally wounded at Landen, and fell alive into the hands of the enemy. "Solmes," says Macaulay, "though he was said by those who knew him well to have some valuable qualities, was not a man likely to conciliate soldiers who were prejudiced against him as a foreigner. His demeanour was arrogant, his temper ungovernable."

Solway Moss is just on the English side of the Eak.

Somerled, Lord of Argyll, married the daughter of Olaf, King of Man, and espoused the cause of Malcolm MacHeth, invading Scotland in conjunction with the sons of Malcolm (Nov., 1153). In 1156 he was at war with Godred, the Norwegian King of the Isles, and in 1164 again attacked Scotland; he was, however, defeated and killed at Renfrew. He represents the Celtic reaction which succeeded on the Norse conquest of the Hebrides. The Lords of the Isles traced their descent from him.

Somers, John, Lord (b. 1649, d. 1746), was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and became a barrister. At the trial of the Seven Bishops he pleaded as their junior counsel, and made a short but weighty speech in their favour. Together with Montague he took his seat for the first time in the Convention Parliament. At the conference between the Lords and Commons he maintained that James had "abdicated" the throne. He framed the Declaration of Right. Shortly afterwards he was appointed Solicitor-General. In 1690 he was made chairman of the committee for considering the rights of those corporations who had forfeited their charters in the last two reigns. He conducted the prosecution of the Jacobite conspirators Preston and Ashton with great moderation. In 1692 he became Attorney-General, and subsequently Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal. Meanwhile William was gradually discarding Tories and forming a united Whig ministry. It was led by the Junto consisting of Somers, Halifax, Russell, and Wharton. In 1695 the arrangements for the restoration of the currency were placed in his hands. Next year the Whig ministry was triumphantly established, and he was made Lord Chancellor. In 1697, when Parliament wished to reduce the standing army, Somers wrote a treatise, known as the Balancing Letter, in which, while he condemned a standing army, he approved of a temporary army annually fixed by Parliament. By Somers' advice William agreed to the Bill for the disbanding of the army. But the country was rapidly becoming discontented. In 1697 Somers was assailed for complicity in the piracies of Kidd, because he had subscribed to the expedition Kidd proposed to start against piracy. Again attacked on the question of grants of crown lands, he and his colleagues were compelled to retire in 1700. In 1701 he was impeached for his share in the Partition Treaties and in Kidd's misdeeds; but the Commons declined to appear before the Whig majority of the Lords, who thereupon declared him acquitted. The accession of Anne deprived him for some years of any hope of a return to power; but in 1707 he joined, with other members of the Junto, the Godolphin ministry as President of the Council. He fell with the ministry, and soon after was attacked by paralysis, which put an end to his political activity. Yet, on the accession of George, Somers was sworn of the Privy Council, and given a seat in the Cabinet. "In his public capacity," says Archdeacon Coxe, "Lord Somers was a true patriot. Of the real Whigs he was the only one who possessed the favour of William. Though constitutionally impetuous and irritable, he had so far conquered nature as to master the movements of his ardent spirit at the time when his mind was agitated by contending passions. His elocution was powerful, perspicuous, and manly; his reasoning clear and powerful. As a lawyer he attentively studied the principles of the constitution. Nor were his acquirements confined to internal relations; he attentively studied foreign affairs, and was profoundly versed in diplomatic business, as well as in the political interests of Europe." This character, though from a Whig source, is only a little too strong praise of one of the greatest statesmen of the Revolution epoch.

Somerset, EDMUND BEAUFORT, DUKE OF (d. 1455), was the son of Thomas, Earl of Dorset, and grandson of John of Gaunt. He fought in the French wars, and was taken prisoner in the battle of Beaujé. In 1447 he was made Lieutenant of France, but acted very feebly in this capacity. Under his rule the whole of Normandy was lost. He returned to England in 1450, and was at once made High Constable, and succeeded Suffolk as chief minister and opponent of the Duke of York. In 1452 the Duke of York brought forward a series of charges against Somerset, accusing him of the loss of Normandy, of embezzlement of public money, and other offences. Things seemed on the verge of civil war when a compromise was effected, and for a time the charges against Somerset were dropped. At the end of 1453 the Duke of Norfolk made a fresh attack upon him, and he was arrested and imprisoned. He remained in prison for more than a year, during which the Yorkists were in the ascendant, but in the beginning of 1455 he was released and restored to office. York protested against this, and raised an army, with which he marched towards London; he was met by the royalists at St. Albans, where he was completely victorious, and Somerset was among those who were slain.

Somerset, EDMUND BEAUFORT, DUKE OF (d. 1471), was the son of Henry Beaufort, Duke of Somerset. On the restoration of Henry VI. he was restored to his dukedom, and commanded the archers at the battle of Barnet. He was subsequently in command at Tewkesbury, where he was taken prisoner and beheaded. With him expired the male line of the Beauforts.

Somerset, HENRY BEAUFORT, DUKE OF (d. 1463), fought in the French wars, and on the Lancastrian side at the battle of Towton. After the defeat, he escaped to Scotland, but was subsequently pardoned by Edward IV.

Henry having once more joined the Lancastrians, he was taken prisoner in the battle of Hexham and beheaded.

Somerset, EDWARD SEYMOUR, DUKE OF (d. 1552), Lord Protector of England, rose into importance with the marriage of his sister, Jane Seymour; to Henry VIII., in 1536. Henceforward he became one of the leaders of the Reformed party at the court, and was constantly employed in military and administrative services, in which he displayed considerable capacity. He was created Earl of Hertford (1537). In 1544 he was sent into Scotland at the head of 10,000 men, and captured and sacked Edinburgh and Leith (May, 1544). Immediately afterwards Hertford and the greater part of his army were transported to Calais to prosecute the war against France, and met with some successes near Boulogne. In the closing year of Henry's reign Seymour was actively employed in counteracting the intrigues of the Howards, and succeeded so well that Surrey, his great rival, was put to death, and Norfolk narrowly escaped with his life. By Henry VIII.'s will Hertford was appointed one of the council of sixteen executors. But the will was immediately set aside, and Hertford (now created Duke of Somerset) was appointed President of the Council and Protector of the Kingdom. A fleet and army having been collected to assist the Protestants in Scotland, and force on the marriage between Edward VI. and the young Queen Mary, Somerset at the head of a great army invaded Scotland, and won the battle of Pinkie (Sept. 10, 1547), with the result, however, of completely alienating the Scots, and hastening the marriage contract between Mary and the Dauphin of France. In France the Protector was obliged to reopen the war, and his forces were worsted in several actions near Boulogne. In home affairs it was the aim of Somerset and his followers in the council to push on the Reformation as speedily as possible. A complete English service book was drawn up [PRAYER BOOK], and the first Act of Uniformity was passed (1549). At the same time an attempt was made to reverse the arbitrary government of Henry VIII.'s reign. But Somerset's own conduct was in some respects more arbitrary than that of the late king. In 1549 the Protector's brother, Lord Seymour of Sudeley, was engaged in designs for overturning Somerset's government, and getting the guardianship of the king and kingdom himself. A Bill of Attainder was brought against him, and he was condemned of treason and executed without being allowed the opportunity of speaking in his own defence (1549). Somerset also made some attempts to relieve the social distresses of the kingdom, and issued a commission to inquire into them. The result, however, was only that of increasing popular excitement, and of rousing the enmity of the whole body of the new nobility who had profited by the recent changes. In 1549 a rebellion of an agrarian character broke out in Norfolk, while another in Devonshire was caused by the advance of the Reformation. Somerset displayed no vigour in suppressing the insurrections, while his rivals in the council acted with energy. John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, his principal opponent, put down the Norfolk rising with much severity, and at once gained great influence in the council. Somerset attempted to bring matters to a crisis, by declaring the council treasonable; but he was compelled to submit to the majority, and to resign the Protectorship (1549). He was sent to the Tower, but released in February, 1550. In the following year he was gradually regaining influence, with the failure of the council's administration. Northumberland (Warwick), afraid of his designs, had him seized and tried for treason and felony. He was found guilty on the latter indictment and executed (Jan. 22, 1552). A man of patriotic feeling, and much ability, Somerset's failure was chiefly due to want of judgment and foresight.

Somerset, CHARLES SEYMOUR, DUKE OF (b. 1662, d. 1748), succeeded to the titles of his brother Francis in 1678. As Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to James II., he refused to introduce the papal nuncio at Windsor, and was in consequence dismissed from his office. In 1688 he joined the Prince of Orange, was appointed President of the Council, and on the departure of William to Ireland was one of the Lords Justices who administered the kingdom. On the accession of Queen Anne, he was created Master of the Horse. He was one of the commissioners for treating of the Union with Scotland (1708). Through the influence of his wife, he became a favourite with Anne. After being connected with Harley and the Tories for some years (1708—1711), he began to intrigue with the Whigs (1711), and was in consequence dismissed from his office in the following year. As Queen Anne lay on her death-bed, he repaired to the council, and, in conjunction with Argyle, proposed that the Lord Treasurer's staff should be entrusted to Shrewsbury. Thus, by taking power out of Bolingbroke's hand, he did a great service to the house of Hanover. Before George arrived in England, Somerset acted as one of the guardians of the realm. He again became Master of the Horse, but resigned in the following year, and took no important part in politics subsequently.

Somerset, ROBERT CARR, EARL OF, was descended from the great border family of the Kers of Ferniehurst. As a boy he had served James VI. as a page, and a short time after that monarch became King of England, Carr succeeded in attracting his notice and winning his favour. In 1611 his creation as Viscount Rochester made him the first Scotsman who took a seat in the House of Lords. He was made a Privy Councillor, and though without office and ignorant of business, he soon became the confidential minister of James. About 1613 he formed that connection with Frances Howard, Countess of Essex, which resulted in her divorce from her husband, the imprisonment and murder of Sir Thomas Overbury (q.v.), her husband's confidant, and ultimately in her marriage with Carr (Dec. 26), who was made Earl of Somerset that the lady might not lose in rank. Somerset became the tool of the Howards, his wife's relations, and squandered the immense sums of money which flowed to him on every side. At last, a courtiers' intrigue against him endangered a power precarious in its very nature. The circumstances attending Overbury's death were brought to light. The complicity of Somerset (never really proved) was thought to be involved in the ascertained guilt of his wife. In May, 1616, the countess was convicted; a week later her husband shared her fate. After a long imprisonment, Somerset was pardoned. He ended his life in an obscurity once only broken by a Star Chamber prosecution.

South African Colonies. The Cape Colony was founded in 1662 by the Dutch East India Company, and remained under the rule of Holland for a considerable period, which was marked by the cruel oppression of the Hottentot tribes, and the vexatious restrictions imposed on the Boers. The latter, in consequence, revolted in 1795, but the Prince of Orange gained the support of the English fleet, and the country was ruled by British governors until 1802, when it was restored to Holland by the Treaty of Amiens. Cape Colony was, however, again occupied by the English in 1806, and was finally given up by the Dutch government in 1815. The first half of the century was marked by the five bloody Kaffir wars (1811—1853), terminated by the erection of British Kaffraria into a crown colony, which was absorbed into the Cape Colony in 1866, by the foundation of the settlements about Algoa Bay (circa 1820), by the abolition of slavery in 1834, and by the commencement of the Dutch exodus. The first party of rebellious Boers crossed the Orange River in 1836, and a portion of them penetrated to Natal, where they founded a republic. The land occupied by the remainder was annexed to the English government in 1848, under the title of the Orange River Sovereignty. But a number of malcontents, under Pretorius, having been defeated by the British troops, retreated still further north, and founded the third Boer settlement in the Transvaal. These last were granted independence in 1852, and the Orange River Sovereignty was abandoned by the British two years later, and became the Orange Free State. In the Cape Colony the Dutch landroest and his assessors had been abolished in 1827, and their places had been taken by a governor, assisted by a general and an executive council composed of government officials. An agitation, begun in 1850, in consequence of an unwise attempt on the part of the British government to land convicts at Cape Town, speedily developed into a movement in favour of free institutions. A constitution was accordingly granted to the Cape Colony in 1853, and this has since been modified by Act 28 Vict. cap. 5, and the Colonial Act, III. of 1865, and by the "Constitution Ordinance Amendment Act" of the Colonial Parliament of 1872. In its final form, the government is vested in an executive council, composed of the governor and office-holders appointed by the crown but holding office at the pleasure of the Colonial Parliament, while the legislative power rests with a legislative council of twenty-two members elected for ten years, and a House of Assembly of seventy-two members for the districts and towns elected for five years. The division of the colony for administrative purposes into western and eastern provinces was abolished in 1873, and seven provinces substituted. Between 1853 and 1877 there was continued peace with the native races, and the Cape government was occupied in works of public utility, such as the harbour breakwater of Table Bay, and the making of various railways, of which that from Cape Town to Beaufort West is the most important. These works caused the public debt to increase with startling rapidity from less than a million in 1872 to over fifteen millions in 1883, an increase that was partly due also to wars with the native tribes of the Galekas and Gaikas in 1877 and 1878, and the Basutos in 1880 and 1881. The territory of the latter was annexed in 1868 in consequence of their border warfare with the Boers, and in 1874 and 1875 Griqualand East and the Transkei lands of the Fingos and their neighbours came under British rule. Griqualand West, with its diamond-fields, had become part of our colonial empire in 1872. The idea of the federation of the South African colonies, projected while Lord Kimberley was Secretary of State (1870—74), was adopted by his successor, Lord Carnarvon, and Sir Bartle Frere was sent out in 1877 to arrange the settlement. He found, however, that his representations were coldly received, and they were definitely rejected by the Cape Parliament in 1880.

Natal, which was settled, as has been said above, by Boers who "trekked" from the Cape Colony, was annexed by the British government in 1842, and erected into a separate colony in 1856. By its charter of constitution, as modified in 1875, 1879, and 1883, the governor is assisted by an executive council of officials and two members nominated by the governor from the legislative council, and a legislative council of thirty, of whom seven are nominated by the crown, and the rest elected by persons having property of the annual value of £50 or rents of £10. Owing to the vast superiority in numbers of the native over the white population (the proportions being about 330,000 to 28,000), Natal has never been in a progressive condition. In 1879 the English government thought it expedient to break the power of the strong Zulu tribe, but the victory of Ulundi was not gained until our troops had suffered a disastrous surprise at Isandlwana. The attempted settlement of their country by Sir Garnet Wolseley was not a success, and a state of anarchy has since obtained on the north-east frontier of Natal. That colony was only indirectly affected by the Transvaal war, caused by the attempt of the Boers in 1880 to shake off the yoke which had been imposed upon them in 1877; indeed, since it brought with it a considerable increase of trade, that unfortunate campaign was on the whole popular. By the Convention of Pretoria, agreed upon after the close of the war, the Transvaal Boers, while retaining self-government, acknowledged the suzerainty of Britain. Practically the Transvaal since the war has been an independent state.

Southampton, from its geographical position, has played an important part in English history. The English who settled in Wessex founded the town, called Hamtune and Suth-Hamtun in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, near the site of the Roman town of Clausentum. It was frequently attacked by the Danes (in 837, 980, and 994), and Canute used it as his chief point of embarkation. In 1338 it was sacked by a fleet of French and Genoese, and was afterwards fortified with care. Southampton was frequently used as a port of embarkation during the Hundred Years' War; it was there that Henry V. in 1415, just before setting out for France, executed the Earl of Cambridge, Lord Scrope, and Sir Thomas Grey for treason. Southampton espoused the Yorkist cause during the Wars of the Roses, after the Lancastrians had made an attempt to take it. Henry VIII. used the town as a basis of operations by sea in his attacks on France. Philip of Spain landed there in 1564. Since then Southampton has been important chiefly as the principal commercial port of the south coast.

Southampton, HENRY WRIOTHESLEY, 3rd EARL OF (d. 1624), a favourite of Queen Elizabeth, and a bosom friend of Essex, was the grandson of Lord Chancellor Wriothesley. In 1597 he took part in the disastrous expedition to the Azores, and two years later followed Essex to Ireland, where he was appointed General of the Horse, to the anger of Elizabeth, whose good-will he had forfeited on his marriage. In 1601 his impetuosity and generous support of his friend led him to take an active part in Essex's rebellion, and he was put on his trial for high treason. He was condemned, but, owing to the intercession of Sir Robert Cecil, was not executed; he was, however, confined in the Tower until the death of the queen. He is described as a man of "high courage, great honour, and integrity." His literary relations invest his career with particular interest.

Southampton, THOMAS WRIOTHESLEY, EARL OF (d. 1549), was appointed Lord Chancellor in the place of Lord Audley in 1544. He was a zealous Catholic, and is said to have tortured Anne Ascue with his own hands. Named one of the council of regency in the will of Henry VIII., he was created Earl of Southampton, but failed to obtain the confidence of Somerset, to whom he had long been in opposition. In 1547 Wriothesley of his own authority put the great seal in commission, and appointed four individuals to discharge the duties of chancellor. This act, which was declared by the judges to amount to a misdemeanour, enabled the council to demand his resignation. Shortly after this Lord Seymour of Sudeley tried to draw him into a plot against the Protector, but, probably from caution, he refused his overtures, and gave information of the intrigue. In 1549 he entered into negotiations with Warwick, and took a prominent part in the deposition of Somerset, but soon afterwards retired from the council in disgust at the treatment he received, and died, it is said, of disappointment.

South Sea Scheme, THE. In 1711 a company was formed for trading to the "South Seas," which was induced to lend ten millions to the government during Harley's treasurership, and to allow the debt to be funded, in return for a monopoly of the trade with the Spanish colonies. In 1717 Walpole persuaded the South Sea creditors to make a further advance of five millions to the government. In 1720 the South Sea Company, desirous of further government credit, agreed to take up thirty-two millions of the government annuities, and to persuade the holders to take in exchange South Sea stock. The government annuities had borne seven or eight per cent. interest; the company was to receive five per cent. till 1727, and four per cent. afterwards. In order to outbid the offers of the Bank of England and other associations, the South Sea Company agreed to pay to government a heavy premium of more than seven millions. The company had thus weighted itself heavily, and it was doomed to failure if the public did not subscribe for its shares readily. At first there seemed no danger of this. The public rushed in to subscribe, and the company's stock was taken with the utmost eagerness. But the success of the South Sea scheme had developed a spirit of speculation in the nation. Companies of all kinds were formed, and the public hastened to subscribe, to sell their shares at a premium, and to buy others. A frenzy of gambling and stock-jobbing took possession of the nation. Many of the schemes formed were fraudulent or visionary. The South Sea Company, whose own shares were at 900 per cent. premium, took action against some of the bubble companies and exposed them. This produced an instantaneous effect. A panic set in. Everybody was now anxious to sell. All shares fell at once, and the South Sea Company's own stock fell in a month (Sept., 1720) from 1,000 to 175. The ruin was widespread, and extended to all classes of the nation. Popular feeling cried out for vengeance on the South Sea directors, though in reality the calamity had not been caused by them, but by the reckless speculation which had been indulged in. A retrospective Act of Parliament was passed, remitting the seven millions due to the government, appropriating the private property of the directors for the relief of those who had suffered, and dividing the capital of the company, after discharging its liabilities, among the proprietors. Aislabie, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Charles Stanhope, and Secretary Craggs and his son, were tried and implicated in the matter; and an inquiry, ordered by the Commons, resulted in the expulsion of Aislabie, and the acquittal of Stanhope by three votes. The younger Craggs died before the inquiry was over, and the elder committed suicide.

Southwold Bay, THE BATTLE OF (1672), was fought between the English fleet under the Duke of York, and the Dutch under De Ruyter. After a desperate struggle the English gained the day, though with the loss of some vessels, and one of their commanders, the Earl of Sandwich. Southwold Bay is on the coast of Suffolk.

Spa Fields Riots, THE (Dec. 2, 1816), were the result of the extreme depression of trade, the severity of the government, and the intrigues of the Spencean philanthropists. A great meeting was convened in Spa Fields, Bermondsey, which was to be addressed by "Orator" Hunt, but before he came there the mob had started on a career of riot, which, however, was easily suppressed by the Lord Mayor with only seven men to help him.

Spain, RELATIONS WITH. Serious relations between England and the Spanish kingdom began with the reign of Henry II. The marriage of his second daughter, Eleanor, to Alfonso VIII. of Castile; his arbitration between Alfonso and King Sancho of Navarre; even the younger Henry's pilgrimage to Compostella—always a favourite shrine with Englishmen—Richard I.'s marriage with Berengaria of Navarre, all contributed to form a close friendship between the two countries that became traditional all through the Middle Ages. The marriage of Blanche of Castile to Louis, son of Philip Augustus, was regarded as a safe means of insuring peace between John, her uncle, and the French king. The continued possession of Gascony by the English kings made them almost neighbours of some of the Spanish monarchs. The appointment by Henry III. of his son, Edward, as regent of Guienne in 1250 was quickly followed by the marriage of Edward with Eleanor, sister of Alfonso X., whose claims through the elder Eleanor to that duchy made it necessary to conciliate him, but whose legislative instinct may well have established sympathy between him and his brother-in-law. Edward I. had constant dealings with Spain. He sought earnestly to mediate between France and Castile in 1276. In 1288 he visited Catalonia in order to reconcile the French and Aragonese claimants to Naples; but Alfonso's X.'s death, and the want of success of a policy which rested entirely on mediation, caused Edward's relations to Spain to become less cordial towards the end of his reign, despite the political necessity of seeking in the south a counterpoise to French influence. Again under Edward III. the relations were renewed. The Black Prince marched with a great army into Castile to protect Peter the Cruel against Henry of Trastamare, and his victory at Navarrete (April 3, 1367) for a time kept the tyrant on his throne. Peter's final discomfiture led to fierce hostility between England and the house of Trastamare, which thus gained possession of the Castilian throne. John of Gaunt and Edmund of Cambridge both married daughters of Peter. Through his wife, Constance de Padilla, John claimed to be King of Castile, but the brilliant naval victory of the Spaniards over the Earl of Pembroke, which restored La Rochelle to the French (1375), the practical failure of Edmund in Portugal [PORTUGAL, RELATIONS WITH], the equally unlucky expedition of John to Spain (1385) as pretender and crusader, showed that his chances were hopeless. At last he concluded a treaty with John II. of Castile, in which by marrying Catherine, his daughter by Constance, to the heir of Castile, he practically resigned his claims. This marriage renewed the old friendliness. The kings of Castile sympathised with the misfortunes of the house of Lancaster as with those of their own kin. Edward IV. in 1467 concluded a treaty with Castile that gave equal trading rights to Castilians and English. The Libel of English Policy shows how important Spanish trade was. Yet Edward would not marry his daughter to a Spanish prince, and not until the final Lancastrian triumph under Henry VII. was the alliance of the two countries really renewed, and then on conditions that made England almost a satellite of Spain. The marriage of Catharine, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, with Prince Arthur and Henry in succession was the most important result of the restoration of intimate relations. Although Ferdinand hardly treated Henry well, and although his League of Cambrai isolated England from foreign politics, Henry VIII., after breaking up the Cambrai confederation by the Holy League, fully renewed the Spanish connection. During the war of the Holy League, and the war which broke out in 1521, Henry was the decided supporter of Ferdinand and Charles his successor. At last fear for the balance of power led Henry to a neutral attitude after the battle of Pavia (1525). The divorce of Catharine involved personal and religious differences, which for a time dissolved the Spanish alliance. For some years England feared a Spanish invasion, but so strong were the ties which bound the two states that in 1541 the English and Spaniards were again fighting side by side against the French. Charles's desertion of Henry at Cr  py, and the strongly Protestant policy of Edward VI., again produced coolness, until Mary's marriage with Philip, and her subsequent participation in the last of Charles's great wars against France, brought the nations more together than ever. But the catastrophe of Mary's reign was the death-blow of the traditional connection with Spain. Though it was Elizabeth's policy to keep on fair terms with Spain, the prevalence of religious over political considerations during the crisis of the Catholic counter-Reformation, the alliance of England and the revolted Netherlands, that of Spain with the pretender to the English throne, and the rise of an English naval power that saw in the Spanish colonies an easy and rich prey, and whose piratical forays soon more than counteracted the friendliness which long and settled trade between the two nations had produced, all produced a state of chronic irritation worse than war, and a series of acts of hostility, which in any other period both parties would have regarded as casus belli. At last, on the very eve of the Armada, the long-threatened war broke out. Henceforth hatred of Spain became a mark of the patriotic and Protestant Englishman. James I.'s Spanish policy and Spanish marriage scheme made him intensely unpopular, and Charles I., though less decided than his father, and actually at war with Spain in the beginning of his reign, and often rather opposed to it, was regarded with some suspicion for the same reason. Cromwell revived Elisabeth's policy of uncompromising hostility to Spain, as the centre of Catholicism in Europe. Though successful in execution, his policy was quite obsolete in idea, and tended to promote the ambitious schemes of Louis XIV. Clarendon, who also pursued the Elizabethan tradition, incurred disgrace and exile for what had brought glory to the Protector. Still, the hostility to France, which began with the Triple Alliance, and the marriage of William and Mary, and culminated in the Revolution, did not involve any very cordial alliance with the Spaniards, though the effect of the anti-French policy was to help them. So little did William regard Spain as his ally that he joined with Louis XIV. in the Partition Treaties. The mismanagement of the allies in the Spanish Succession War made the French King of Spain the representative of Spanish national feeling, and consequently renewed an active hostility between the two countries, which the retention of Minorca and Gibraltar, as the spoils of the English triumph, did much to increase. After the Treaty of Utrecht, Alberoni plotted to restore the pretender, though the collapse of Cape Passaro (1720) showed that the Spaniards were unable to cope directly with the English. Ripperda's Austrian alliance was equally hostile to England, and involved a short war that, but for Walpole's peace policy, would have proved serious (1727). The commercial clauses of the Utrecht treaty gave the English a limited permission to trade in South America, which involved constant disputes with Spanish revenue officers, and resulted in the war of 1739, the prelude of the more general Austrian Succession War. The family compact of the Bourbon Kings of France and Spain involved England in a new hostility to the Spaniards at the close of the Seven Years' War. Spain took advantage of the American Revolution to try to regain what her former ill success had caused her to lose. But the long siege of Gibraltar proved a failure. The affairs of the Falkland islands (1770), and of Nootka Sound (1789), again almost involved a conflict. During the French Revolution the weakness of Spain soon compelled her to lend her still imposing fleet to the Republican and Napoleonic governments, and thus to enter into a naval war with England, which lost many of her colonies. At last Napoleon's reckless imposition of his brother on the Spanish throne involved 'a national insurrection in Spain, which led to the establishment of a new alliance with England. During the whole of the Peninsular War, Spanish troops assisted the armies of Wellington, but the relations between Englishmen and Spaniards were always very doubtful, and the pride, inefficiency, and prostration of his allies were one of Wellington's greatest difficulties. The Spanish popular movement, however, showed how Napoleon could be beaten, and without their irregular forces the Peninsular campaigns would hardly have turned out as they did. Subsequent political relations between England and Spain have been of inferior importance. Canning recognised the independence of the revolted South American colonies. The English gave considerable help to Queen Christina against the Carlists.

Spanish Blanks, THIRTY, was the name given to eight papers seized on the person of a man named Kerr, who was about to convey them to Spain. These papers were blank sheets, signed by the Earls of Huntly, Errol, Angus, and by Gordon of Auchendoun. It was proved by the confession of Kerr that the sheets were to have been filled up by two Jesuits, named William Crichton and James Tyrie, and were to have contained assurances that the persons who signed them would not fail to render material aid to the Spanish armies on their landing in Scotland. The result of this discovery was immediate action on the part of the government against the Popish lords, who were compelled to fly, and were finally defeated at Glenlivet.

Spanish Marriages. From 1840 the marriage of Queen Isabella of Spain had become a question of interest to Europe, and especially to England and France. The French plan was that Isabella should marry the Duke of Cadiz, and her sister the Duc de Montpensier, having in view the eventual succession to the Spanish throne of the children of the latter couple. The English, who strongly disliked this scheme, contended that Isabella should marry the man whom she and the Spanish people selected, and that the welfare of Spain, and not the interest of the Orleans house, should be chiefly consulted. The English government therefore declined to actively recommend any candidate, even Leopold of Coburg, who was desirable in every way, and who would have been the English candidate had there been one. In 1841 Prince Albert and Lord Aberdeen both declared that England would not interfere. In 1845, during the Queen Victoria's visit to the King of the French, the latter declared "that he would never hear of Montpensier's marriage with the Infanta of Spain." This pledge was kept as long as Aberdeen remained in office, but the accession of Palmerston in 1846 changed the views of the French. The defeat of their Eastern policy by that statesman still rankled in their minds, and he was an object of their settled distrust. Use was therefore made of an indiscretion committed by Lord Dalling, the British ambassador at Madrid, and also of a somewhat violent despatch of Palmerston, and on Aug. 29, 1846, the double marriage between the Dukes of Cadiz and Montpensier, and the Spanish Queen and Infanta, was announced. This statement, communicated shortly by M. Guizot to Lord Normanby, British ambassador at Paris, was received in England with a great deal of indignation. An official protest was made by the English government, and an unofficial one by the Queen; but they were disregarded, and the double marriage was celebrated simultaneously at Madrid (Oct. 10). The conduct of Louis Philippe gave an immense shock to his reputation in Europe, and did a great deal to break off the hitherto friendly intercourse with England. Indignation at his perfidy was increased by sympathy for the young queen thus heartlessly sacrificed to his policy, and a coolness in consequence arose.

Spanish Succession, THE WAR OF THE, was caused by the refusal of Louis XIV. to abide by the settlement of the succession question agreed on by him and William III. in the Partition Treaties (q.v.). Besides accepting the will of Charles V., which made his grandson, Philip of Anjou, King of Spain, Louis had reserved his grandson's right to succeed to the French crown, had put French garrisons into the towns of the Spanish Netherlands, and had acknowledged the Pretender as successor to the English throne at the death-bed of James II. This last proceeding had roused the English. William III. in 1701 had laid the foundation of a grand alliance between England, Holland, and the empire. It was now concluded. But on March 8, 1702, William died. War was at once declared on the accession of Anne. The emperor, with the Electors of Brandenburg, Hanover, and the Elector Palatine, Denmark, Holland, and in 1703, Savoy and Portugal, were the allies of England. France had only the electors of Cologne and Bavaria, and the Duke of Mantua in Italy. Marlborough, commander of the English and Dutch armies, at once went to Holland with the object of capturing the Netherlands fortresses occupied by the French. Venloo, Liège, and other towns on the Meuse, were taken, and the French cut off from the Lower Rhine. On the Upper Rhine, Louis of Baden had taken Landau, but was defeated by Villars at Friedlingen. In Italy, Eugene had defeated Villeroy at Cremona, but the French still held the Milanese. [For the war in Spain see below.] In France the Protestants of the Cevennes had broken into open rebellion under Cavalier. In 1703 but little was done. Villars wished to march on Vienna, but was thwarted by the Elector of Bavaria. Marshal Tallard re-captured Landau. Marlborough, who had formed a great plan to reconquer Antwerp and Ostend, was foiled by the Dutch, and had to content himself with the capture of Bonn on the Rhine, and Huy and Limburg on the Meuse. In 1704 Louis set on foot no less than eight different armies. His chief effort was to be in the direction of Vienna in concert with the Elector of Bavaria. The Hungarians had been incited to revolt. The position of the emperor seemed desperate. Marlborough, however, in a famous march from the Lower Rhine to the Danube, joined Eugene in Bavaria, and marched upon the French commanders Marsin and Tallard. In August the battle of Blenheim was fought. After that disastrous defeat the French withdrew beyond the Rhine. Landau was taken, and Marlborough, marching into the Moselle valley, conquered Treves and Trarbach. In this year Gibraltar was captured by Sir George Rooke; while the merciful policy of Villeroy put an end to the rebellion of the peasantry in the Cevennes. In Italy, Vendôme had nearly reduced the Duke of Savoy to despair. Eugene was sent thither with Prussian troops (1705). Marlborough wished to invade France by the Moselle valley, but was thwarted by the weak co-operation of Louis of Baden. Villeroy suddenly invested Liège, but on Marlborough's return to Flanders affairs were re-established there. Towards the end of the year Louis of Baden won a great battle at Hagenau. In 1706 Marlborough determined by a vigorous effort in Flanders to make a diversion to Eugene in Italy. In Brabant he encountered Marshal Villeroy at Ramillies. By that victory the allies gained the whole of the Netherlands. Marlborough wished to besiege Mons, but was deterred by the slowness with which the Dutch forwarded supplies. In Italy, Eugene by his brilliant relief of the siege of Turin accomplished a work hardly inferior to that of Ramillies. Italy was lost to France, and compelled to join the Grand Alliance. Louis offered terms of peace, but they were, somewhat unreasonably, rejected by Marlborough. The campaign of the next year (1707) was unsuccessful. Marlborough in vain attempted to bring on a pitched battle. On the Rhine, Villars took and destroyed the lines of Stollhofen. Eugene attempted to attack Toulon by invading France from the south-east; but he had no supplies, and withdrew before Marshal Tessé. In 1708 Marlborough resolved to complete the conquest of the Netherlands in conjunction with Eugene. But the latter experienced great difficulty in raising an army. Vendome suddenly assumed the offensive, deceived Marlborough by a feint on Louvain, captured Ghent and Bruges, and sat down before Oudenarde. In July the battle of Oudenarde was fought. The results, though it was a victory for the English, were not decisive. Eugene's troops at length joined Marlborough; Berwick reinforced the French. The allies determined to besiege Lille. It fell in October, Marshal Boufflers having made a gallant resistance. Ghent and Bruges were reconquered. General Stanhope had captured Port Mahon in Minorca. France was now absolutely exhausted. Louis once more proposed terms. Once more the demands of the allies were intolerable, consisting of the surrender of the Dutch frontier towns, and all claims to the Spanish succession. Louis appealed to the French people. Villars was sent against Marlborough. He allowed Tournay to fall, but when the allies invested Mons he was obliged to risk a battle. By the advice of Eugene the attack was deferred until troops could be brought up from Tournay. The result was that Villars had time to entrench himself, and that the victory of Malplaquet was almost as disastrous for the allies as for the French. Mons fell, but the campaign was closed. A conference was opened at Gertruydenberg; the English and Dutch consented to treat, but were opposed by Austria and Savoy, and the war was resumed. Douay was captured. The next year Marlborough fought his last campaign. He was hampered by the withdrawal of Eugene to superintend and guard the Diet summoned to Frankfurt to elect a successor to the Emperor Joseph. By skilful manoeuvres he passed Villars' lines at Arras, which the French commander called the non plus ultra, and besieged and took Bouchain. But the Tory ministry had already proposed terms of peace. Marlborough was dismissed on his return to England, and Ormond appointed in his place. He received orders to undertake no offensive operations against the French, but he could not refuse to join Eugene in an attack on Quesnoy. In June, 1712, an armistice was declared, and the English troops ordered to separate from Eugene. The imperial general continued the campaign alone. But he was defeated at Denain, and compelled to raise the siege of Landrécies. In March, 1713, the Peace of Utrecht was signed. The Germans fought on. But they lost Landau again, and soon after Speyer, Worms, and Kaiserslautern. Villars stormed the lines at Freiburg, and took the town in spite of Eugene's efforts. In the course of 1714 the Treaty of Rastadt was concluded between France and Austria, that of Baden between France and the princes of the empire. Such was the war in Continental Europe. In Spain meanwhile, in 1702, after hostilities had been proclaimed, an armament, under the command of the Duke of Ormond, appeared off Cadiz. It was ill-conducted, and after plundering the town the English sailed off. On his way back Ormond destroyed a fleet of treasure ships in Vigo Bay. Some millions of dollars were captured, some millions more were sunk. Next year it was determined to attack Spain from the east and west. The army from the west consisted of Portuguese and English troops commanded by the Earl of Galway. The Archduke Charles, whose claims to the Spanish throne were supported by the coalition, appeared in the camp. But Berwick, the commander of the French, held Galway in check throughout the year 1704. On Aug. 3 Admiral Rooke succeeded in taking Gibraltar. In 1705 Peterborough was sent to Spain with 5,000 Dutch and English soldiers. He was joined by the Archduke Charles. He wished to march at once on Madrid, but was compelled by his instructions to attack Barcelona. The town was almost impregnable; supplies were wanting; he quarrelled with his fellow-commander, the Prince of Hesse. He determined to raise the siege, but suddenly resolved to attack the fortress of Montjuich; it fell. On Oct. 23 Barcelona was captured. Catalonia and Valencia at once declared for the Archduke. Peterborough, with 1,200 men, advanced to raise the siege of San Mattheo, where a force of 500 men was surrounded by 7,000 Spaniards. Peterborough deceived the Spanish general as to his numbers, relieved the town, and entered Valencia in pursuit of the Spanish army. Meanwhile an army under the command of Anjou, who was advised by Marshal Tessé, and a fleet under the Count of Toulouse, were blockading Barcelona. Peterborough attempted to raise the siege but failed. A new commission was sent him placing him in command of the fleet as well as of the army. He failed to entice the French to battle, but they sailed away, and were followed by the army. In this year Berwick fell back before Galway, and that general occupied Madrid (1706). Philip, Duke of Anjou, fled, and Arragon declared for the Archduke Charles. This was the highest point of the success of the allies. But the hostility of the natives, and the cowardice of Charles, made it impossible to hold the town. Galway fell back and effected a junction with Peterborough at Guadalaxara. Berwick immediately occupied Madrid. Peterborough soon quarrelled with Charles, and left the army. The allies retreated on Valencia. In 1707 Galway was rash enough to attack Berwick in a disadvantageous position on the plain of Almanza, and was utterly defeated. Valencia and Arragon surrendered to the French, and the Archduke Charles was reduced to the province of Catalonia. "The battle of Almanza decided the fate of Spain." Stanhope was sent to command in Spain with Staremberg, a methodical tactician, as his colleague. For two years nothing was done. At length, in 1710, Stanhope and Staremberg advanced on Madrid. Philip's troops were defeated at Almenara, and again at Saragossa. Madrid was occupied, and Philip was once more a fugitive. Again it was found impossible to hold the town. The allies retreated to Toledo, and thence to Catalonia. Vendome, the new French commander, followed hard after them. Stanhope, who had separated from Staremberg, was surrounded at Brihuega, and had to capitulate; Staremberg, who marched to his rescue, was defeated after an obstinate resistance in Villaviciosa. He fled through Catalonia to Barcelona. Philip was now safe on the throne of Madrid. The war was practically over; for, although Argyle was sent to Catalonia in 1711, he could effect nothing with a demoralised army and no supplies. Perhaps, in view of the impending negotiations, it was not intended that he should affect anything. The Peace of Utrecht was signed on March 31, 1713. The Catalans, faithful to a hopeless cause, deserted by their allies, still fought on. But in Sept., 1714, Barcelona fell, and the war in Spain was at an end.

Speaker, THE, is the name given to the officers who preside over the House of Lords and the House of Commons. The Speaker of the House of Lords is the Lord Chancellor or the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; his office is not nearly so important as that of the Speaker of the Lower House. He is allowed to take part in debates, and to vote as an ordinary member; his official duties being chiefly confined to putting the question to the House. The Speaker of the House of Commons, on the contrary, is an official of the highest importance; his duties are not only to preside over the debates and to put the question, but to maintain order, to enforce the decrees of the House, and to act generally as its representative or "mouth": through their Speaker the Commons have the privilege of access to the sovereign. Unlike the Speaker of the Lords the Speaker of the Lower House, who holds rank as the first commoner of the realm, can take no part in debates, and has no vote unless the numbers are equal, when he has a casting vote. The office, which is filled by vote of the Commons subject to royal approbation, is of very ancient origin. That some spokesman was necessary from the first institution of Parliament is sufficiently obvious, but the position and title of Speaker were only settled in 1377. But Henry of Keighley, who in 1301 bore the petition of the Lincoln Parliament to the royal presence; Sir William Trussell, who answered for the Commons in 1343, though not a member of the House itself; Sir Peter de la Mare, the famous leader of the Good Parliament in 1376, who discharged the functions without the title, must all practically have been in much the same position as the later speaker. But in 1376 the title is definitely given to Sir Thomas Hungerford, and from that date the list is complete.

Speed, JOHN (b. 1552, d. 1629), a laborious antiquarian, was a native of Cheshire, who became a tailor in London, until Sir Fulk Greville gave him an allowance to enable him to pursue his favourite researches. His Theatre of the Empire of Great Britain (1606), was a well-executed series of maps of counties and towns. His chief work, The History of Great Britain (1614), was a laborious and voluminous compilation from preceding authors. Though in no sense an authoritative work, Speed's compilation is of some use owing to the amount of matter drawn from previous authors which it incorporates.

Speights Bay, THE BATTLE OF (1651), was fought in Barbadoes between the colonists (who were Royalists) under Lord Willoughby of Parham, and a Parliamentary force (which had been sent out from England by Cromwell for the reduction of the island) under Admiral Ayscue and Colonel Alleyne. The victory lay with the Royalists.

Spelman, SIR HENRY (b. 1562, d. 1641), a Norfolk squire, was an eminent antiquary, whose learned works are still useful. Such are his Glossarium Archaeologicum, his treatise on Knight's Tenures, his History of English Councils, etc. A very strong Anglican, Spelman, wrote a History of Sacrilege to show the fate which holders of church lands were likely to incur, a Treatise concerning Tithes, and a book De non temerandis Ecclesiis. The Reliquie Spelmannianæ contain a large number of his posthumous works. Spelman's intimate knowledge of the works of earlier writers, and his acquaintance with the intricacies of English law and legal custom in the period at which he lived, make his works of considerable value to the student and antiquarian.

Spencean Philanthropists was the eccentric name given to a body of men who followed the teaching of a revolutionary and communistic teacher named Spence, who early in the eighteenth century formed an organised society. They arranged the Spa Fields meeting of Dec. 2, 1816. Thistlewood and other notorious demagogues were members of the society, whose members were largely connected with the subsequent Cato Street Conspiracy.

Spenser, EDMUND (b. 1553, d. 1599), the author of the Fairie Queen, and one of the greatest of English poets, was a friend of Sir Philip Sidney (q.v.), by whom he was introduced to the notice of the Earl of Leicester. In 1580 he was appointed secretary to the Lord Deputy of Ireland, Lord Grey de Wilton, and obtained large estates in that country, where he composed the Fairie Queen. In 1598 his property was plundered and destroyed by the insurgents in Tyrone's rebellion, and Spenser was obliged to return to England, where he died shortly afterwards. His View of the State of Ireland, written in 1596, is a valuable source of information for the condition of the country at that period, and illustrates the stern measures by which the English colonists were prepared to maintain their position.

Spithead Mutiny, THE, took place in 1797, and was the result of the legitimate grievance of the seamen at a naval system honeycombed with corruption and abuses, which subjected the sailors to barbarous treatment, while keeping their pay at the rate fixed under Charles II., and leaving their commissariat to the control of venal and greedy pursers. In conjunction with the still more famous Mutiny at the Nore, it was a formidable danger in the midst of the war. Every ship refused to obey the order to sail. At a council on board the Queen Charlotte, the meeting was organised, and petitions addressed to the Admiralty. Lord Howe succeeded by great tact in winning the mutineers back to their duty, and even persuaded them to express full sorrow, a confession which resulted in an Act that removed their worst grievances.

Sports, THE BOOK OF, is the name generally given to James I.'s Declaration, issued in 1618, which permitted the use of "lawful" recreations on Sunday after Church time. Dancing, the setting up of maypoles, archery, leaping, Whitsunales were among the list of lawful sports. Bear baiting, bowling, and interludes were declared unlawful. Those not attending church were not allowed to join in the sports. In 1633 Charles I. re-issued his Declaration, and enforced what his father had hesitated to do, the reading of it in all churches. Bitterly opposed by the Puritans, the Long Parliament ordered all copies of the Declaration to be burnt.

Spottiswood, JOHN (b. 1565, d. 1639), Archbishop of St. Andrews, accompanied James VI. to England (1603), receiving the Archbishopric of Glasgow in the same year, and that of St. Andrews in 1615. In 1633 he crowned Charles I. at Holyrood, and two years later was made Chancellor of Scotland.

Spottiswoode Gang, THE (1837), was the name given to an association in London which was formed to collect subscriptions to test the legality of Irish elections. Mr. Spottiswoode, one of the Queen's printers, presided over it, and from this circumstance the name arose. Sir F. Burdett (q.v.) was a zealous supporter of the association. It was attacked in the House by Mr. Blewitt, member for Monmouth, but he met with little support.

Spragge, SIR EDWARD (d. 1673), was a distinguished naval commander during the reign of Charles II. He took a prominent share in many battles against the Dutch, and, in particular, gallantly, though unsuccessfully, defended Sheerness in 1667. In 1671 he took part in an expedition against the Algerine pirates. In 1673 he was killed in action against Van Tromp.

Sprat, THOMAS, BISHOP OF ROCHESTER (b. 1636, d. 1713), was educated at Wadham College, Oxford, and took deacon's orders in 1660. He became a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1662. He was created by rapid promotion Prebendary of Westminster (1668), Canon of Windsor (1680), Dean of Westminster (1683), and Bishop of Rochester (1684). He was weak enough to accept a seat in James's ecclesiastical commission board in hopes of obtaining the Archbishopric of York. With trembling voice he read the Declaration of Indulgence in Westminster Abbey. Soon afterwards he resigned his place on the commission. When William of Orange landed he declined to sign a declaration of fidelity to James. He voted for a regency, but took the oaths of fidelity without hesitation, and assisted at the coronation of William and Mary. In 1692 he was involved in a supposed Jacobite conspiracy, designed by one Robert Young, and for a while imprisoned; but his innocence was clearly proved. His chief works are A History of the Royal Society (1667), and An Account of the Rye-House Plot (1685). Macaulay thinks that his prose writings prove him to have been "a great master of our language, and possessed at once of the eloquence of the preacher, of the controversialist, and of the historian. His moral character might have passed with little censure had he belonged to a less sacred profession; for the worst that can be said of him is that he was indolent, luxurious, and worldly: but such failings, though not commonly regarded as very heinous in men of secular callings, are scandalous in a prelate."

Sprigge, JOSHUA (b. 1618, d. 1676), was born at Banbury, entered at New Town Hall, Oxford, in 1634, became a preacher in London, afterwards chaplain in the New Model, and Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. He was author of Anglia Rediviva, a history of the successes of the New Model, of which book, according to Clement Walker, Nathaniel Piennes was chief compiler.

Wood, Athena Oxonienses.

Sprot, GEORGE, a notary of Eyemouth, was legal adviser to Logan of Restalrig, from whom he acquired information concerning the Gowrie conspiracy. Having incautiously revealed his knowledge, he was tortured, and, having confessed all he knew, was executed.

Spurs, BATTLE OF THE, is the name usually given to the action fought at Guinegate, near Terouenne, Aug. 16, 1513, during the campaign of the English under Henry VIII. and the Imperialists under Maximilian in Flanders. The allies had formed the siege of Terouenne and a body of French cavalry came up to relieve the town. The allies advanced in order of battle, and the French on seeing them were seized with panic, put spurs to their horses, and fled without a blow.

Stafford, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1452) was a member of one of the most illustrious families in England in the fifteenth century. After holding several minor preferments, he was made Bishop of Bath and Wells in 1425, and in 1443 was translated to Canterbury. He held many important civil offices, being appointed Treasurer in 1422, Keeper of the Privy Seal in 1428, and Lord Chancellor in 1432. He held the great seal till 1450. Stafford was a strong supporter of Beaufort and the peace party, and was zealous in promoting the marriage of Henry VI. with Margaret of Anjou. In Jack Cade's rebellion he showed great intrepidity, and did much to restore tranquillity to the country by a judicious admixture of firmness and leniency. His conduct as a statesman and judge is worthy of considerable praise, and while he lived he was able to keep the rivalry between the Yorkists and Lancastrians within bounds. He would seem to deserve higher praise than is bestowed upon him by Fuller, who says—"No prelate hath either less good or less evil recorded of him."

Hook, Archbishops of Canterbury.

Stafford, Sir Humphrey (d. 1460) was cousin to the first Duke of Buckingham, and nephew of John Stafford, Archbishop of Canterbury. On the outbreak of Jack Cade's rebellion he was sent with a detachment against the insurgents, whom he met at Sevenoaks, and an encounter took place, in which Stafford was defeated and slain.

Stafford, Sir Thomas (d. 1557), was the son of Lord Stafford, and the nephew of Cardinal Pole. He was for a long time an exile at the Court of France during the reign of Mary, but in April, 1557, headed an expedition to the Yorkshire coast, and took the castle of Scarborough, with the object "of delivering his country from foreign tyranny," though "not to work his own advancement touching possession of the crown." The castle was retaken at once by the Earl of Westmoreland, and Stafford was put to death.

Stafford, William Howard, Viscount (b. 1612; d. 1680), was a Roman Catholic peer of high personal character, who in 1678 was accused by Oates and Bedloe of complicity in the Popish Plot. He was committed to the Tower with four other Catholic peers, and in 1680 was the one chosen to be tried. He was impeached of high treason by the Commons, and tried by the House of Lords, and, although the only witnesses against him were Oates, and other perjured wretches, he was found guilty by 55 votes to 31. His execution, which took place in Dec., 1680, marks the turn of the tide against Shaftesbury, and the other upholders of the Popish Plot. Stafford protested his innocence on the scaffold, and the populace avowed their belief in his assertion.

Stair, James Dalrymple, Viscount (b. 1619, d. 1695), had borne arms in his youth, and was subsequently a professor of philosophy at Glasgow University. He was a member of Cromwell's commission of justice, which in 1651 superseded the Court of Session. After the Restoration he sat in the Privy Council, and became President of the Court of Session, and was knighted by Charles II. On refusing to make a declaration against the covenant, he was condemned to forfeiture. On passing through London, however, he had an interview with Charles II., and his office and estates were restored to him. In 1676 he became Lord President, and boldly opposed the severities which preceded the fall of the Stuarts. He was deprived of office, and felt it advisable to retire to Holland. There he composed his Institutes, a legal work of great value. He assisted with his counsel and purse the unfortunate enterprise of Argyle. His estates would probably have been confiscated had not his eldest son taken the Stuart side on political affairs. At the revolution Stair assisted William with his advice. He became President of the Court of Session, and William's trusted agent in Scotland. An attempt was made by the opposition to rid themselves of him and his son by passing a law to the effect that all who had shared in the proceedings under the Stuarts were to be excluded from office, but the royal assent was refused to the bill. William wished to make him Lord President of the judicial bench, but the estates claimed the appointment. Next year, however, the opposition was overcome. Dalrymple's attempts to reform the bench do not seem to have been particularly successful. On the fall of Melville the government of Scotland passed entirely into the hands of the Dalrymples. Sir James was raised to the peerage, with the title of Viscount Stair (1691). It is not generally asserted that he took any active part in organising the massacre of Glencoe. In 1695 he died. Stair, as well as his son, were thoroughly unpopular in Scotland. "He was," says Mr. Burton, "the unapproached head of the Scotch law . . . To the field of Scotch jurisprudence, such as it was, Stair brought so entire an intellectual command, both in knowledge and genius, that he made his labours within it illustrious."

Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

Stair, John Dalrymple, Viscount, afterwards Earl (b. 1648, d. 1707), is known in history by the title of the Master of Stair. He took office under James II., and became Lord Advocate of Scotland. By this means he saved the estates of his father from confiscation. The coldness that ensued between father and son was merely affected. At the revolution he early changed sides. He was one of the Scotch commissioners who were sent to offer the crown to William. On his return he was falsely accused by the opposition of having betrayed the liberties of his country. Shortly afterwards he became Lord Advocate, and on the fall of his rival, Melville, Secretary of State for Scotland (1696). In conjunction with Argyle and Breadalbane, he planned the infamous massacre of Glencoe. An inquiry in 1695 clearly traced the design to him, but the Scotch Estates simply censured him in vague terms, and left his treatment to the wisdom of the king. William contented himself with dismissing the master from office. On the death of his father (1695) he became viscount, and was created Earl Stair in 1703. As one of the commissioners of the Scotch Union he displayed his great legal talents. In 1707, during the debate on article 22 he spoke with success, and with considerable earnestness. But the strain on his nerves was too great; he returned home, and died. "The Master of Stair," says Macaulay, "was one of the first men of his time—a jurist, a statesman, a fine scholar, an eloquent orator. His polished manners and lively conversation were the delight of aristocratical societies, and none who met him in such societies would have thought it possible that he could bear the chief part in an atrocious crime." The defence that is offered for his complicity in the massacre of Glencoe may be given in the words of Mr. Burton:—"If it is to be called malignity, it was no more personal than the desire of a chief of police to bring a band of robbers to justice."

Macaulay, Hist. of Eng.; Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

Stair, THOMAS DALRYMPLE, EARL OF (son of the foregoing) (b. 1673, d. 1747), served under William III. in Ireland and the Netherlands, and was one of Marlborough's officers, becoming a lieutenant-colonel in 1701. He shared his general's disgrace. In 1707 he succeeded to his father's earldom. In 1715 he was sent as ambassador to France. There his friendship with the regent stood the English government in good stead. The fortifications at Mardyck were discontinued owing to his representations. Hearing that ships were being fitted out for the Pretender by the French government, he requested that they might be given up, and the regent went so far as to unload them. It is said that he tried to bring about the assassination of the Pretender before he started for the expedition of 1716. On his return from that fruitless attempt he was dismissed from France on Stair's demand. In 1718 Stair successfully negotiated the quadruple alliance between England, France, Austria, and Holland. In 1720 he was recalled owing a dispute with his fellow-countryman, Law, the financier. For twenty years he was kept out of employment. At length (1741) he was sent as ambassador to Holland, in order to induce the States General to take part in the war of the Austrian succession. As commander of the English army in Flanders (1743) he displayed great incapacity. It was only by extreme good fortune that the English army escaped destruction at Dettingen. After the battle jealousy sprang up between him and the German commanders. Disgusted at the rejection of his advice he sent in his resignation. In 1745 he was reappointed commander-in-chief on the occasion of Prince Charles Edward's invasion, but took no active part in the campaign.

Stanhope, Hist. of Eng.; Arnoeth, Maria Theresia.

Stamford Bridge, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 25, 1066), was fought between the English, under King Harold II., and the Norwegians, led by Harold Hardrada and Tostig. The early success of the invaders at Fulford, and the submission of York had not prepared them for the sudden advance of Harold, and they seem to have been taken unawares, as they were encamped on the banks of the Derwent, east of York. The party on the right bank were completely surprised, and could make but little resistance, and, having defeated these, the English proceeded to press across the bridge, which was for awhile gallantly defended by a single Norwegian champion. The main fight took place on the left bank, and, after a hard struggle, the English gained a complete victory. Harold Hardrada and Tostig lay dead on the field, and of the Norwegian host very few escaped to their ships.

Freeman, Norman Conquest.

Stamp Act, THE (1764, 1765, 1766), was one of the chief causes of the war with the American colonies. In it George Grenville, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1764, asserted for the first time the right of the imperial legislature to impose taxation on the colonies; and by it customs duties were charged upon the importation into the colonies of various foreign products. The proceeds of these duties were, on a totally new principle, to be paid into the imperial exchequer, and to be applied, under the direction of Parliament, towards defraying "the necessary expenses of defending, protecting, and securing the British colonies and plantations." This Act was also accompanied by a resolution, passed by the Commons, that "it may be proper to charge certain stamp duties" in America, as the foundation of future legislation. A year's delay was allowed by Grenville before passing the threatened bill, but in the following year, in spite of the unanimous protests of the American colonies, and their assertion of their constitutional right to be taxed only through their representatives, the fatal bill passed almost without opposition. The colonists, however, resisted its execution, and their discontent became so marked that Parliament was reluctantly obliged to take notice of it. Pitt, who had been prevented by illness from being present at the discussions on the bill, now came forward, and, insisting that taxation without representation was illegal, urged the immediate repeal of the tax, while he proposed to uphold the dignity of the mother country by asserting the general legislative authority of Parliament over the colonies. From this Act he expressly excepted the right of taxation, but the crown lawyers were against him, and, in spite of the fact that Lord Rockingham was now at the head of the government, the exception was eliminated, and the bill was passed maintaining the absolute right of England to make laws for the colonies. Though defeated in this particular, Pitt carried his original proposal, and in 1766 the Stamp Act was repealed, while at the same time several of the obnoxious duties, which had been imposed in 1764, were withdrawn, and others were modified.

Standard, THE BATTLE OF THE (1137), was fought near Northallerton in Yorkshire. David of Scotland invaded England on the pretext of assisting Maud against Stephen; but the hatred and dread of the Scots united all the English of the North against him. Under the authority of Thurstan, Archbishop of York and the leadership of Raoul, Bishop of Durham, an army was collected, while to inspire courage, the consecrated banners of St. Cuthbert of Durham, St. Peter of York, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfred of Ripon were entrusted to the army. "These were all suspended from one pole, like the mast of a vessel, surmounted by a cross, in the centre of which was fixed a silver casket, containing the consecrated water of the Holy Sacrament. The pole was fixed into a four-wheeled car, on which the Bishop stood." The Scots were completely routed, and fled in disorder.

Standing Orders are orders drawn up by the Houses of Parliament for the reputation of its conduct and proceedings. They continue in force from one Parliament to another, until they are repealed or suspended.

Stanhope, CHARLES, 3RD EARL (b. 1753, d. 1816), took a prominent position in politics, until his extreme partisanship of the French Revolution lost him all influence. His advocacy of Republicanism often left him single in a minority in the House of Lords.

Stanhope, JAMES, GENERAL, EARL (b. 1673, d. 1720), in 1695 served as a volunteer in Flanders, and was given a colonel's commission by William III. In Anne's first Parliament he sat as member for Cockermouth. He was made Brigadier-General in 1705. At the siege of Barcelona, he was second in command to Peterborough, and afterwards returned to England. In 1708 he brought forward a Bill for the dissolution of the Highland clans; but as the danger of a Jacobite invasion passed away, the Bill was dropped. In the same year he was appointed Commander in Catalonia [SPANISH SUCCESSION, WAR OF]. Unsuccessful on the mainland, he took Port Mahon in Minorca, and in 1710 advanced on Arragon. The Spanish were utterly defeated at Almenara, and again at Saragossa. Madrid was occupied. But Stanhope was caught, defeated, and taken prisoner by Vendome at Brihuega. He was ransomed in 1712, and became on his return leader of the Whig opposition. Owing to his firmness, no attempt at rebellion was made by the Jacobites on the death of Anne. He was prepared, if necessary, to seize the Tower. On the accession of George I. he became Secretary of State, and was despatched to Vienna to persuade the Emperor to agree to the Barrier Treaty. His vigorous measures checked a serious outbreak in England during the rebellion of 1715. He went with George to Hanover (1716), and began negotiations with the Abbé Dubois for the establishment of friendly relations with the Regent of France. The result was the triple alliance between England, France, and Holland (1717). On the retirement of Walpole and Townshend from the ministry in April, Stanhope became First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was thought that a Jacobite invasion was impending. Stanhope was removed from the Treasury, and became Secretary of State for the Southern Department. At home he succeeded in repealing the Schism Act, but his Peerage Bill was thrown out by large majorities in the Lower House. In 1720 came the downfall of the South Sea scheme. Stanhope had no share in the speculation; and even proposed that ministers who had received bribes from the company should be accounted guilty of "notorious and dangerous corruption." During the examination of the directors, the young Duke of Wharton directed a violent attack against the administration, especially against Stanhope himself. He rose to reply; but his passion brought a rush of blood to his head, which next day proved fatal.

Stanhope, HENRY, EARL (b. 1805, d. 1875), was returned in 1830, as Lord Mahon, to Parliament as member for Wootton Bassett, and afterwards for the Borough of Hertford. In the first Peel ministry he was Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and during the last year of Peel's second administration he was Secretary to the Board of Control, and supported the repeal of the Corn Laws. Lord Stanhope was the author of numerous important historical works. His War of the Succession in Spain is full and accurate. His History of the Reign of Queen Anne is a useful general history. His more lengthy and elaborate History of England in the Eighteenth Century has taken its place as a standard work, and though corrected and supplemented has not been superseded by the more recent work of Mr. Lecky.

Stanley, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1495), was the brother of Henry VII.'s step-father, Justice of North Wales, and constable under Richard III., and the nobleman to whose treacherous conduct the king's victory at Bosworth Field was chiefly due. In consideration of his important services on this occasion, Henry made him Lord Chamberlain, and one of his counsellors. Stanley, however, was not satisfied. His continued demands alienated the king, for whom Stanley conceived a growing dislike. He became involved in some way with the affair of Perkin Warbeck. On the evidence of the king's spy, Sir Robert Clifford, he was suddenly arrested on a charge of treason, and after the merest semblance of a trial, was condemned and executed on that charge (Feb. 16, 1495).

Bacon, Life of Henry VII.

Stanley, Sir William, who had been employed for some time in Ireland, was in 1586 recalled, and sent to the Low Countries, when he became Governor of Deventer. He was a traitor to Elizabeth, and a friend of the Jesuits, and is supposed to have been privy to the Babington Conspiracy. After the discovery of the plot, Sir William accomplished a long-meditated piece of treachery, and surrendered Deventer to the Spaniards, himself entering Philip's service with 1,300 men (June, 1587).

Stannary Courts, THE, were the courts for the administration of justice among the tanners of Cornwall and Devonshire, held before the Lord Warden and his steward. The privilege of the tin-workers to be subject to the jurisdiction of these courts only was confirmed by a charter 33 Edw. I., and by a statute 50 Edw. III., pleas of life, land, and member excepted. There was no appeal to Westminster, but to the council of the Duke of Cornwall after reference to the Warden in person. These courts became the engines of an arbitrary prerogative which robbed the mining districts of the west of the benefit of the common law. The Stuarts largely availed themselves of them; and in consequence of the complaints made, the Long Parliament (16 Car. I., c. 15) passed an explanatory and regulating Act concerning them, at the same time it abolished some other analogous special jurisdictions. Since that date the proceedings of the Stannaries Courts have ceased to possess any great historical importance.

Stapledon, WALTER DE (d. 1326), was made Bishop of Exeter in 1308, and in 1319 Lord High Treasurer. He sided with the king against Queen Isabella and Mortimer, and soon after the landing of the latter in England he was seized by the citizens of London, whom he seems to have offended during his tenure of the treasurership, and barbarously murdered.

Staples, or Marts, for the sale of the chief commodities of England, viz., wool, woofels (skins), leather, lead, and tin, were established in certain places by Edward I. and Edward II. The foreign staple was fixed first at Antwerp and then at St. Omer. When we took Calais a staple was set up there which, on the loss of Calais in 1558 was moved to Bruges. Within England there were staples at several of the principal towns, at London, York, Bristol, Newcastle, &c. After some changes the staple system was established by statute (27 Edw. III., c. 9.) In this statute the staple towns are enumerated, Dublin, Waterford, Cork, and Drogheda being fixed on for Ireland, and Caernarthen for Wales; the ancient customs payable on staple goods are recited; all merchants, save merchants of the staple, are forbidden to buy or export these goods, and arrangements are made for the government of each staple by its own mayor and constables. The appointment of staple towns was a measure of considerable importance. As a matter of administration it facilitated the collection of the customs. Constitutionally, it bore on the relative rights of the crown and the parliament as regards taxation. Possessing exclusive privileges, and under the special protection of the crown, the merchants formed a body apart from the estates of the realm, and the king negotiated with them separately. The various changes in the policy relating to the staples Dr. Stubbs considers to be evidence that parliament looked on the dealings of the crown with these merchants as infringements of its rights. Regarded in this light, the authority given by statute to the ordinances of the staple previously made by the council, and the recitation of the ancient customs, may be regarded as assertions of the rights of the estates. Commercially, the staples were of importance as insuring the quality of our exports, for at the staple ports the officers viewed and marked the goods of the merchants. From the jurisdiction of the courts of the staples arose a species of estate defeasible on condition subsequent, called statute staple of the same nature as that founded on the statute, De Mercatoribus, 13 Edw. I., being a security for debt whereby not only the person and goods of the debtor might be taken, but his lands might be delivered to the creditor until out of the profits the debt should be satisfied. "So much more readily did the feudal restraints on alienation yield to considerations of a commercial kind than to any others" (Stephen's Blackstone, i. 317). This security, originally granted only to traders, was extended as a recognisance in the nature of a statute staple to all subjects by 23 Hen. VIII., c. 6. Such securities have been superseded by the law of bankruptcy, and the system of staple trading itself has yielded to the modern arrangement of consolidated customs.

Star Chamber. One of the main objects of Henry VII. was to secure good "governance" for the country and to keep the nobles in order. For this purpose he caused an Act (3 Henry VII., c. 1) to be passed, which, after reciting the evils caused by maintenance, and the giving of liveries, by the abuse of the power of the sheriffs, by the bribery of jurors, and by the riots and unlawful assemblies which prevented the administration of justice, empowers the Chancellor, Treasurer, and Keeper of the Privy Seal, or any two of them, with a bishop and a temporal lord of the Council, and the Chief Justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas, or two other justices in their absence, to call before them persons offending in the above-mentioned respects, and to inflict such punishment, not extending to death, as might be imposed were they convicted in the ordinary course of law. This seems to have been not so much the creation of an entirely new court, as a Parliamentary recognition of certain powers of criminal jurisdiction long claimed by the Privy Council, and the limitation of their exercise to what may be regarded as practically a committee of that body. The Privy Council had long been accustomed to meet in the Star Chamber, but now this term Star Chamber began to be definitely applied to the new court which had sprung out of the Council. The words do not occur in the bill itself, only in the heading, but in the Act 20 Henry VII., which extended the jurisdiction of the court, the title is actually employed.

Subsequently, however, the jurisdiction of the court was extended beyond the Act 3 Henry VII., so that in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. it included most "misdemeanours of an aggravated nature, such as disturbances of the public peace, assaults accompanied with a good deal of violence, conspiracies, and libels. Besides these, every misdemeanour came within the proper scope of its inquiry; those especially of public importance, and for which the law, as then understood, had provided no sufficient punishment." (Hallam.) At the same time the limitation as to the judges came to be disregarded, and any member of the Privy Council was allowed to sit. Thus the Star Chamber became, as has been aptly said, a sort of scratch tribunal consisting of privy councillors, a change which, according to Hallam, probably took place during the reign of Edward VI. It can scarcely be doubted that during a great part at any rate of the Tudor period, the power of the court was beneficially exercised. "It is the effect of this court," says Sir Thomas Smith in his Treatise on the Commonwealth of England, written early in the reign of Elizabeth, "to bridle such stout noblemen or gentlemen who would offer wrong by force to any manner of men, and cannot be content to demand or defend the right by order of the law." He goes on to ascribe much of the praise to Wolsey: "It began long before, but took augmentation and authority at that time that Cardinal Wolsey was Chancellor of England, who of some was thought to have first devised that court because that he, after some intermission by negligence of time, augmented the authority of it, which was at that time marvellous necessary to do to repress the insolency of the noblemen and gentlemen in the north parts of England who . . . made almost an ordinary war among themselves." Moreover, it was able to provide equitable remedies for cases which could not be fairly dealt with by the ordinary law courts. But its power had very early been abused; juries were summoned before it for verdicts disagreeable to the government, and were fined or imprisoned, so that although the Star Chamber could not itself condemn to death, the fear of its displeasure made juries sufficiently pliant. Persons accused before the court were forced to incriminate themselves by examination upon oath, and, it is scarcely necessary to add, no jury was employed to determine the question of guilt. It imposed ruinous fines (though in many cases they were remitted), and began in Elizabeth's reign to sentence to the pillory, whipping, and cutting off the ears. Under James I. and Charles I., the Star Chamber became the chief weapon of defence used by the government against its assailants; the punishments inflicted by it in such cases as those of Prynne, Burton, and Bastwick, excited general indignation; and it was abolished by Act of Parliament (July, 1641). A committee of the Lords in 1661 reported "that it was fit for the good of the nation that there be a court of like nature to the Star Chamber;" but the government did not venture to submit a bill to this effect to the Commons.

State Trials. THE. Collections of trials for treason and others of political interest have been made and published under the designation of State Trials. They are often invaluable sources of historical information, especially in the seventeenth century. The earliest collection was in six volumes folio, published early in the eighteenth century. Howell's edition in thirty-four volumes with index includes all up to 1820. A useful series of selections from the State Trials is issued from the Cambridge Press under the editorship of Mr. Willis Bund (1880).

Statutes may be defined as written laws, established by the sovereign, with the advice and assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and of the Commons in Parliament assembled. Our legislation, however, did not take this form for a long time. The edicts, or assizes of Henry II., are declarations of methods of procedure rather than enactments, and most of the legislative work of Edward I. was done without the co-operation of the Commons. The declaration of Edward II. in 1322, that matters touching the state of the king, the kingdom, and people should be established in Parliament by the king with the assent of the prelates, earls, barons, and the commonalty, forms an era in the history of our legislation. Nevertheless, the author of the Mirror, writing in this reign, declares that ordinances made by the king and his clerks, by aliens and others, took the place of laws established by Parliament, and for a long time our kings constantly neglected to gain the full concurrence of the three estates, legislating by ordinances or temporary regulations put forth by the Council rather than by statute. So long also as statutes were founded simply on petition, it sometimes happened that one estate only gained a statute, and more often that the statutes which were drawn after the Parliament had broken up, and which purported to be answers to the petitions presented, were more or less contrary to them. To obviate this, the Commons in the reign of Henry V. demanded and obtained that the judges should frame the statutes before the end of each Parliament. In the next reign the present system of making statutes by Act of Parliament was introduced. Statutes are written laws; yet such laws as were made before legal memory—i.e., the beginning of the reign of Richard I.—though written, form part of our lex non scripta. Some written statutes also are extant that are not of record, being contained only in chronicles and memorials, yet even though a statute be not of record, it is still part of the written law if it is within legal memory. The earliest statute of record is 6 Edward I., called the Statute of Gloucester. The first statute in the printed collection is the Great Charter, 9 Hen. III., as confirmed and entered on the statute roll of 25 Edward I. The statutes from the Great Charter to the end of Edward II. are said to be incerti temporis, and are called antiqua, while all those that follow are called nova statuta. A statute takes effect from the moment that it has received the royal assent, unless some special time is expressed in the statute itself. Among the rules to be observed in interpreting statutes, it may be noted that a statute is to be interpreted not by the letter, but according to the spirit and intention with which it was made: and so judges, whose business it is to interpret statutes, sometimes depart from the mere words; that remedial statutes are to be interpreted in a wider, penal in a narrower fashion; and that though it was formerly held that if a statute repealing an earlier one was itself repealed, the earlier statute was thereby revived; since 13 & 14 Vict., c. 21, this is no longer the rule. Statutes have been named in different ways at different times, being called sometimes by the name of the place where they were made, as the Statute of Merton, sometimes by their subject, as De Donis Conditionalibus; and sometimes by their first words, as Quia Emptores. They are now described by the year of the king's reign in which they were made, with the chapter, and when two sessions have been held in one year, with the statute denoting the session in which it was enacted, as 1 William & Mary, st. 2, c. 2 (the Bill of Rights). Statutes are now divided into Public General Acts; Local and Personal Acts, declared Public; Private Acts printed and Private Acts not printed. Up to the time of Edward I. our statutes are in Latin; in his reign French was also used, and became the constant language of legislation until Henry VI. Some of the statutes of Henry VI. and Edward IV. are in English; but Henry VII. was the first king whose statutes are all expressed in our own tongue.

Steele, SIR RICHARD (b. 1671, d. 1729) was born in Dublin. At Oxford he became acquainted with Addison, and when after failing there and in the army, he aspired to a literary career, Addison got him introductions to the Whig leaders, on whose behalf he soon distinguished himself. In 1709 he entered Parliament, but his pamphlets, The Crisis and The Englishman, led to his expulsion by the irate Tory majority. After the accession of George I. he was knighted, elected a member of Parliament, and wrote numerous political pamphlets. He quarrelled with his party about the Peerage Bill, and not succeeding in his literary and stock-jobbing projects, retired to Carmarthen, his wife's home, where he died. Of his literary eminence there is no need to speak here. As a political writer Steele was one of the boldest and most sagacious of the Whigs, and at the same time he was, in a great degree, free from the narrowness which came over some of the "old Whigs," in George I.'s reign. His political pamphlets are among the most important contributions to the controversial literature of the period.

Steenie was the pet name given by James I. to his favourite, George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

Steinkirk, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 4, 1692), fought between William III. and the French soon after the naval victory of La Hogue. The enemy had taken Namur. On the frontier of Brabant, Luxembourg was left to oppose the English king. William's headquarters were at Lambek, Luxembourg's about six miles off at Steinkirk, while still farther off lay a large force under Marshal Boufflers. The country between the armies was exceedingly difficult. A traitor in the English army had habitually informed Marshal Luxemburg of the movements of the allies. His correspondence was discovered, and with pistol at his breast he was forced to write false information dictated by William. The French commander was thrown off his guard. The whole of the allied army marched down upon him in the night. His outposts were driven back. But the progress of William's forces was obstructed by several fences and ditches, and Luxemburg was able to get his troops into order. Meanwhile, Boufflers was coming up. Mackay's division was the first to engage. The enemy were attacked and routed. It was determined to send Louis' household troops against the English. After a bloody struggle our men were borne down. Count Solmes refused to bring up his infantry to their support, and the division was nearly destroyed. The French loss was about 7,000, and that of the allies was not much greater. The English army and the English nation loudly expressed their resentment against Solmes.

Stephen, KING (b. circa 1094, r. 1136—1154), was the third son of Stephen, Count of Blois, and Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror. He was brought up at the court of his uncle Henry I., from whom he received in marriage Matilda or Maud of Boulogne, niece of the queen. He took the oath of fealty to his cousin the Empress Maud, but immediately on the death of Henry I. he caused himself to be proclaimed king. The dislike of Maud's husband, Geoffrey of Anjou, contributed in great measure to Stephen's success, and at first he met with no opposition. But his misgovernment, and his conduct towards the Church and the officials of the administration rapidly alienated his friends, and in 1138 the Empress invaded England in company with her brother, Robert of Gloucester. From 1138 to 1145 was a period of complete anarchy, sometimes one, sometimes the other party gaining the upper hand. Every lord of a castle acted as king in his own domain. The fearful effects of feudal government were for the first and last time fully exemplified in England. In 1145 Robert of Gloucester died, and the Empress retired to Normandy leaving Stephen master of England. But in 1152 her son Henry landed in England, and the war was renewed. In 1153 a treaty was made at Wallingford by which Stephen was to retain the crown during his lifetime, when it was to pass to Henry. In the next year Stephen died at Dover Priory on Oct. 25. By his marriage with Matilda, Stephen had three sons and two daughters—Eustace, his intended heir, who died in 1153; William, who received the patrimonial estate and the earldom of Surrey, and died in the service of Henry II. at the siege of Toulouse in 1160;

Mary, who became a nun, but leaving her convent married Matthew of Flanders; Baldwin and Maud who died young. Stephen possessed bravery, generosity, and the other simple virtues of a soldier; but his position required him to be false, and no man trusted him, knowing that he could trust no one. He was quite commonplace, and might have been more successful if more unscrupulous or less honest. A terrible picture of the anarchy of Stephen's reign is drawn by the English Chronicler. "When the traitors [i.e., the barons] perceived that he was a mild man, and soft and good, and did no justice, then did they all wonder . . . every powerful man made his castles, and held them against him. They cruelly oppressed the wretched men of the land with castle-works. When the castles were made, they filled them with devils and evil men. Then they took those men that they thought had any property, both by night and by day, peasant men and women, and put them in prison for their gold and silver, and tortured them with unutterable tortures . . . Many thousand they killed with hunger; I cannot and may not tell all the wounds or all the tortures which they inflicted on wretched men in this land, and that lasted the nineteen years while Stephen was king; and ever it was worse and worse. They laid imposts on the towns continually, and when the wretched men had no more to give they robbed and burned all the towns, so that thou mightest well go all a day's journey, and thou shouldst never find a man sitting in a town, or the land tilled . . . Never yet had more wretchedness been in the land, nor did heathen men ever do worse than they did. . . . The bishops and the clergy constantly cursed them, but nothing came of it; for they were all accursed and forsworn, and forlorn. However a man tilled, the earth bare no corn, for the land was all fordone by such deeds; and they said openly that Christ and his saints slept."

Steward, THE LORD HIGH, was a great officer in the court of the Norman kings, but all his important functions were very early assigned to the Justiciar, and the office soon became little more than honorary. It was hereditary in the house of Leicester, and was inherited by Henry IV., and so absorbed into the royal dignity. Since that date it has only been conferred for some occasion, and the office ceases when the business which required it is ended; and this occasion has usually been when a person was to be tried before the House of Lords. The Steward had his own court, the jurisdiction of which was defined in the Articuli super Cartas, but despite this there are many complaints in subsequent reigns of the encroachment of the Steward's court, and in 1390 the powers of the court were once more limited.

Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury (1052—1070), is first heard of as a chaplain, adviser, and minister of Queen Emma, and in 1043 was made Bishop of Elmham, but almost immediately afterwards deposed on the occasion of a quarrel between his patroness and the king. But in the next year he made his peace with Edward, and was restored to his see. During the whole of the reign of Edward the Confessor we find Stigand heading the English party in the Church, and strongly opposing the Normanising tendencies of the king. The bishopric of Winchester was given to him in 1047, and on the flight of Robert of Jumièges in 1062 Stigand obtained the archbishopric. He still continued to hold the bishopric of Winchester, and seems to have been energetic and conciliatory in the performance of his ecclesiastical duties. On the death of Edward, Stigand summoned the Witenagemot which elected Harold, but the archbishop did not actually crown the king. After Harold's death it was Stigand who anointed Edgar Atheling as king, and who when the cause of the young prince was proved to be hopeless, made peace between him and the Conqueror. Stigand was present at William's coronation, and did homage to him, and was one of the Englishmen whom the king took over with him to Normandy in 1067. But the oppression of the Norman nobles drove the English to revolt, and Stigand fled with Edgar to the Scotch court. Subsequently we find the archbishop among the small band of patriots who held out against the Normans among the fens of Ely. Taken prisoner with the others in 1072 he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment at Winchester, where he died. He had previously (in 1070) been deposed from his archbishopric, three charges being brought against him. (1) That he held the bishopric of Winchester together with his archbishopric, this being uncanonical; (2) that he had assumed the archbishopric during the lifetime of Robert, who had been unlawfully deposed, and (3) that he had received the pallium from the anti-Pope Benedict. Of his character, Dr. Hook says, "Stigand was neither a hero nor a saint. He did not possess the moral force or the intellectual power which enables a great mind to make adverse circumstances a stepping stone to usefulness and honour; and he did not possess the meaner ambition of those who, failing in the arena of manly contest, are satisfied with the effeminate applause which is elicited by sentimentalism and romance. But Stigand was a sturdy patriot, in whose breast beat an honest English heart."

Stile, JOHN, a servant of Henry VII., and his messenger on several important occasions. From the mention of his name in the instructions given to Wolsey with regard to the treaty of marriage between Henry and Margaret of Savoy, he seems to have taken some part in the more private arrangements on the subject, and he was also one of Henry's confidential messengers with reference to the king's matrimonial plans in Naples. In 1502, for some unknown reason, John Stile seems to have fallen temporarily into disgrace, as there is a mention of a pardon being granted him on June 16 of that year.

Stillington, ROBERT (d. 1491), after holding minor preferments, was in 1466 made Bishop of Bath and Wells. He was a strong Yorkist, and in 1467 was entrusted with the Great Seal. He held it till 1470, and again from 1472 to 1475. After Edward's death Stillington became an adherent of Richard, and drew up the Act by which Edward's children were bastardised. On the accession of Henry VII. he was imprisoned for a short while, but soon obtained pardon. In 1487, however, he was implicated in the attempt of Lambert Simnel, for which he was kept in prison till his death.

Stirling, a town of Scotland, situated on the Forth, was one of the four burghs given up to the English (1174) as security for the fulfilment of the conditions of the Treaty of Falaise, but was restored to Scotland by Richard I. (1186). In 1297 it was the scene of the battle between Wallace and the Earl of Surrey, and in 1304 was taken by Edward I., after being defended for three months by Sir William Oliphant. In 1313—14 it was besieged by Edward Bruce, and after the battle of Bannockburn, which was fought in the endeavour to relieve it, was surrendered by the governor, Mowbray. In 1339 it again fell into the hands of the Scotch, being given up by its governor, Thomas Rokeby. In 1571 an attempt was made on it by the party of Queen Mary, and in 1583 it was taken by the Ruthven conspirators. During the disturbances of 1639 it was in the hands of the Covenanters, and in 1715 was occupied by Argyle against the Jacobites. In 1746 it was unsuccessfully besieged by the Pretender.

Stirling, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 11, 1297), resulted in a complete victory for Sir William Wallace and the Scotch over the English, who were led by Warenne, Earl of Surrey, and by Cressingham. Wallace fell on the English, who numbered about 50,000 men, as they were in process of crossing a narrow bridge over the Forth, and cut them to pieces, killing Cressingham.

Stockdale v. Hansard, CASES OF (1837—40), arose from the publication by Hansard, by order of the Commons, of a report, which described a book published by Stockdale as indecent. Stockdale suing Hansard for libel, the Queen's Bench decided that the order of the House was no justification. After five suits had been brought, and Stockdale and the sheriffs committed by the Commons, an Act was passed preventing any suit in future concerning papers printed by order of either House.

Stoke, THE BATTLE OF (June 16, 1487), the last battle between the rival houses of York and Lancaster, was fought between the Yorkist adherents of Lambert Simnel and Henry VII. at a small village near Newark. John de la Pole, Earl of Lincoln, Lords Lovel and Fitzgerald led the revolt, assisted by an experienced German general, Martin Schwarz, at the head of 2,000 mercenaries. After an obstinate conflict of three hours' duration, on account of their numerical superiority the royal forces, commanded by Henry VII. in person, prevailed. Not one of the rebel leaders escaped. Simnel was taken prisoner. The revolt was thoroughly suppressed.

Stone, GEORGE, Archbishop of Dublin (b. 1707, d. 1764), was the son of a banker. Through the influence of the Duke of Newcastle, he became in early life Dean of Derry, and then successively Bishop of Kildare and Derry, and in 1747 was made primate. During Lord Dorset's viceroyalty he was virtually governor of Ireland, and he ruled it by means of the pension list. In 1755 he was dismissed from the Privy Council, but in 1759 again joined the ministerial party. He was called the "Beauty of Holiness," and was very unpopular. He was, however, a liberal man, and in favour of the removal of Catholic disabilities.

Storie, DR. JOHN (d. 1571), was in Jan., 1548, whilst a member of the House of Commons, committed to the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms, "probably," says Hallam, "for some ebullition of virulence against the changes of religion." Under Mary, Storie became one of the most violent enemies of the Reformation, and a leading persecutor. He was queen's proctor at the trial of Archbishop Cranmer, and in 1559 made a violent speech in the House against the Supremacy Bill. He was subsequently imprisoned for refusing to take the oath of allegiance, and on his release went abroad, where he occupied himself in plotting against Elizabeth's government. He is said to have been plotting the death of James VI. of Scotland, in order to smooth the way "for his mother's marriage with some Catholic prince," when he was inveigled on board a vessel at Antwerp by a man named Parker, one of Burleigh's spies, and carried to Yarmouth. He was tortured to extort his secrets, and shortly afterwards was hanged.

Stowe, JOHN (b. circa 1525, d. 1605), was a London citizen and most industrious antiquarian. Besides minor works, such as his Summarie of English Chronicles (1561), his Flores Historiarum, his contributions to Holinshed, and to editions of Chaucer, he is chiefly known for his Survey of London, published in 1598, which has been the basis of all subsequent attempts at a history of London. He suffered from great poverty in his old age.

An enlarged edition of Stowe's Survey was published by Strype in 1730, and re-issued with further enlargements in 2 vols. folio (1754).

Stowell, WILLIAM SCOTT, LORD (b. 1745, d. 1836), was the elder brother of Lord Eldon. From the Grammar School of Newcastle-on-Tyne, he went up to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, as a scholar, and obtained a fellowship. In 1774 he was appointed Camden Reader in ancient history, while in the meantime he was studying for the bar. For eighteen years he remained at Oxford. He then practised in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts. Practice flowed in to him at once. In four years he was appointed Registrar of the Court of Faculties, and five years later Judge of the Consistory Court and Advocate-General, with the honour of knighthood, and, ten years later, he became Judge of the High Court of Admiralty. In 1790 he had been returned to Parliament for Downton, but during a long career in Parliament he scarcely ever made a long speech. In 1821 he was raised to the peerage. As a judge he cannot be too highly praised. He ranks even higher than his distinguished brother. He was painstaking, clear, and logical in his decisions, and displayed a breadth of learning and research which has done much to form our international law. "He formed," says a contemporary writer, "a system of rational law from the ill-fashioned labours of his predecessors, erecting a temple of jurisprudence, and laying its foundations not on fleeting policy, or in occasional interests, but in universal and immutable justice."

Haggard, Reports; Annual Obituary, 1837.

Strafford, THOMAS WENTWORTH, EARL OF (b. April, 1593, d. May 12, 1641), the son of Sir William Wentworth, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, represented Yorkshire in Parliament from 1613 to 1628, with the exception of the assembly of 1626, when he was incapacitated by being appointed sheriff. In Parliament Wentworth maintained an independent position, inclining rather to the popular party than to the court. In 1621 he opposed the attempt of James to limit the rights of Parliament, and proposed a protestation. In 1627 he opposed the forced loan levied by Charles, and was for a short time in confinement. In the Parliament of 1628 he for a time exercised great influence in the Commons, and attempted to embody the liberties of the subject in a bill, and thereby to lay a secure foundation for the future, and reconcile king and Commons. But he did not share in the general passion for war with Spain in 1624, nor did he sympathise with the objections of the Puritans to the king's religious policy. What he desired was a government intelligent enough to perceive the real needs of the nation, and strong enough to carry out practical reforms, in spite of the opposition of local and class interests. It was in accordance with these ideas that Wentworth entered the king's service. He was created a peer in July, 1628, and became in December of the same year President of the Council of the North. He entered the Privy Council in November, 1629, and became Lord Deputy of Ireland in the summer of 1636. Measures for the better carrying out of the poor law, for the relief of commerce, and for the general improvement of the condition of the people were probably the results of his presence in the Council. In the North his vigorous enforcements of the law without respect of persons, was the chief characteristic of his administration. In Ireland his abilities had freer scope. He protected trade, founded the flax manufacture, organised a respectable army, and introduced many reforms into the Church and the administration. But his harshness to individuals, and his intolerance of opposition gained him numerous enemies amongst the English colonists, whilst his disregard of the king's promises to the native Irish, and the threatened Plantation of Connaught, created feelings of distrust and dread, which bore fruit in the rebellion of 1641. In Sept., 1639, he was summoned to England, and became at once the leading spirit in the committee of eight, to whom Scotch affairs were entrusted, and the king's chief adviser. In Jan., 1640, he was created Earl of Strafford. By his advice the king summoned the Short Parliament, and dissolved it when it became unruly. In order to carry on the war with Scotland, he suggested expedients of every kind—a loan from Spain, the debasement of the coinage, and the employment of the Irish army to subdue Scotland, or if necessary to keep down England. The king appointed him Lieutenant-General of the English army (Aug. 20, 1640), but his energy could not avert defeat, and when the council of peers advised the king to summon a Parliament, his fate was assured. In spite of illness Strafford hurried up to London to impeach the popular leaders for treasonable correspondence. Pym moved Strafford's impeachment on Nov. 11, and he was arrested the same day. His trial began in Westminster Hall on March 22, 1641. The extreme party in the Commons, dissatisfied with the slow and doubtful course of impeachment, brought in a bill of attainder (April 10), which passed its third reading in the Commons on April 21, and in the Lords on May 8. The king's attempts to save Strafford, and above all the discovery of the first Army Plot, sealed his fate, and prevented the acceptance of a suggested compromise, which would have saved his life, but incapacitated him from all office. The king postponed his answer as long as he could, and consulted the bishops and judges, but the danger of a popular rising induced him to yield, and give his assent to the bill (May 10). Strafford was executed on May 12. His attainder was reversed in 1662.

Straffordians. The bill of attainder against Strafford passed the third reading (April 2, 1641) by a majority of 204 against 59. Mr. William Wheeler, M.P. for Westbury, took down the names of the minority, copies of the list got abroad, and one was posted up in the Old Palace Yard, Westminster, with the addition "these are the Straffordians, betrayers of their country." The list included the names of Selden, Lord Digby, Orlando Bridgeman, and Holborne. It did not contain those of Falkland and Hyde, who voted for the bill. The publication of the division lists was at this time a breach of privilege. The House itself first published the names of members voting in the year 1836.

Straits Settlements, THIR, situated in the Straits of Malacca, comprise Penang, Singapore, Malacca, and Wellesley Province. These settlements originally formed under the Indian government, were transferred to the charge of the Colonial Office, 1867. The government of the collective colony at Singapore is vested in a governor and executive council of nine members, and a legislative council of ten official and six unofficial members nominated by the crown. Penang has a lieutenant-governor, and Malacca a resident, both under the Governor of Singapore. The population is very mixed, and includes Malays, Chinese, Bengalese, Arabs, Burmese, Siamese, and numerous other races.

Stratford, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1348), first appears as sitting in Parliament in 1317. He was frequently employed on embassies by Edward II., and in 1323 was made Bishop of Winchester by the Pope, contrary to the wishes of the king, who, however, eventually recognised him. He took an active part in the deposition of Edward II., but though he saw the necessity of getting rid of the infatuated king, he did not wish to put the power into the hands of Isabella and Mortimer. His opposition to the guilty pair led to his persecution, and he was compelled to take refuge in a forest in Hampshire, where he remained till the fall of Mortimer. Edward III. made him Chancellor in 1330, and he was translated to the see of Canterbury in 1333. He held the Great Seal twice again, from 1336 to 1337 and for a short period in 1340. In this latter year occurred the great quarrel between the king and the archbishop. There is no doubt that Stratford was a faithful minister to Edward, but it was impossible for him to find money sufficient to defray the expense of the costly French wars. Edward, angered by his want of money and the ill-success of his expedition, turned round on the archbishop and accused him of malversation. A lengthy dispute followed, in the course of which the king being desirous of bringing Stratford before the Council, the peers declared that a peer could only be tried by the House of Lords, thus incidentally establishing an important privilege. The archbishop having got Parliament on his side, the king was compelled to give in, and a reconciliation followed. Stratford was often employed by the king on important affairs, but he never again received the chancellorship. Though they can hardly rank as statesmen, the archbishop and his brother were able and faithful ministers, anxious to check the extravagance of the king, and to preserve the liberties of the people.

Stratton, THE BATTLE OF (May 16, 1643), took place during the Great Rebellion. The Parliamentary forces under General Chudleigh, Sir Richard Buller, Sir Alexander Carew, and the Earl of Stamford, were defeated by the Cornish army under Sir Ralph Hopton and Sir Bevil Grenville. The Parliamentary forces were weakened by the detachment of Sir George Chudleigh with all their cavalry. They were posted on the top of Stratton Hill, which the Cornish army after several hours' hard fighting succeeded in storming. General Chudleigh and 1,700 prisoners were taken, together with thirteen guns, and all the baggage and stores of the defeated army.

Strickland, AGNES (b. 1806, d. 1874), the daughter of Mr. Thomas Strickland, of Reydon Hall, Suffolk, was the author of numerous works of fiction and poetry. She published Lives of the Queens of England from the Norman Conquest, 12 vols., 1840—48 (new ed., 8 vols., 1861—62), which attained great popularity. The work is interesting, and written in a lively style, but the author's judgment was not sufficiently critical, nor her acquaintance with general English history wide enough, for it to be of much value as an authority. In 1850—59 she wrote Lives of the Queens of Scotland, which includes an elaborate, but not conclusive, vindication of Mary Queen of Scots. In 1866 she published Lives of the Seven Bishops.

Strode, WILLIAM (d. 1645), was returned to the House of Commons in the last Parliament of James I., and the five Parliaments of his son. In the third Parliament of Charles he took part in the tumult caused in the House of Commons by the Speaker's refusal to put Eliot's resolutions, for which he was called before the Council and imprisoned until January, 1640. In the Long Parliament he is mentioned by Clarendon as "one of those ephori who most avowed the curbing and suppressing of majesty," and "one of the fiercest men of the party, and of the party only for his fierceness." On Dec. 24, 1640, he introduced the bill for annual Parliaments, and on Nov. 28, in 1641, moved that the kingdom should be put in a posture of defence. He did not scruple to avow that the safety of the Parliament depended on the Scottish army, and the necessity of keeping it in England. "The sons of Zeruiah," he said (referring to the court party), "are too strong for us." He was one of the five members impeached by the king (Jan., 1642). After the Civil War began he took an active part against the king in Somerset, and in his place in the Commons opposed all proposals to treat.

Strongbow was the surname of Richard de Clare, Earl of Pembroke, a nobleman of ruined fortunes and adventurous spirit. It was this doubtless that made him eager to accept the hand of Eva, daughter of the King of Leinster, and to attempt the conquest of Ireland. He applied to Henry for leave, and got a dubious answer, which became finally an absolute prohibition, but in spite of it he sailed from Milford Haven in 1169. In 1170 he married Eva, and was probably elected tanist, and succeeded to the kingdom of Leinster in 1171. In 1172 he joined Henry in Normandy, and returned to Ireland as governor in 1173. A mutiny of the soldiery compelled him to supersede his friend Hervey Mount-Maurice by Raymond le Gros, but he refused him the hand of his sister. Being defeated by the O'Briens in 1174 he found it necessary to accept Raymond as a brother-in-law. Though Henry himself had recalled that leader, the voice of the soldiery again compelled Strongbow to make Raymond their commander. In 1176 he died at Dublin of a cancer in the leg, and was buried in the cathedral. He left but one daughter, Isabel, who brought his vast lands to William Marshal of Pembroke, her husband. According to Giraldus he never originated an enterprise, but allowed himself to be guided by others; he, however, allows him to have been just and even generous, and brave in battle. He was a munificent patron of the Church, and was the founder of the priory of Kilmainham.

Strype, JOHN (b. 1643, d. 1737), an industrious compiler of materials for the history of the English Reformation, was vicar of Leyton in Essex. His chief works are Ecclesiastical Memorials, a Church history under Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary, with invaluable original papers in appendices; The Annals of the Reformation; the Lives of Cranmer, Parker, Grindal, Whitgift, Cheke, Smith, and Aylmer; and an enlarged edition of Stowe's Survey of London (1720). A man of little ability and some prejudice, Strype's solid work has made his collections quite indispensable for the history of the change of religion in England. The best edition is that of the Oxford Press in octavo.

Stuart Family. The Stuarts were descended from a certain Walter Fitz-Alan, lord of Oswestry, who entered the service of David I., by whom he was created High Steward of Scotland. The office became hereditary in the family. Alexander, the fourth Steward of the Fitz-Alan stock, commanded at the battle of Largs in 1263; the fifth, James, was one of the regents appointed on the death of Alexander III.; the sixth, Walter, supported Robert Bruce, commanded a division at Bannockburn, and was rewarded in 1315 by the hand of Bruce's daughter, Marjory. Marjory's son, Robert, ruled Scotland as regent during the minority of David II. and his captivity in England, and upon David's death, in 1371, succeeded to the Scottish throne. [For the history of the Stuart sovereigns of Scotland, see ROBERT II. and III., JAMES I., II., III., IV., V., and MARY.]

With the accession of James VI. of Scotland to the English throne (1603) as James I., the history of the Stuart rule in England begins; it is that of the transition from the personal government of the Yorkist and Tudor periods to the Parliamentary system of Hanoverian times. Such a transition was, in England, inevitable; but to the character and policy of the Stuart kings it was due that the change had to be effected by means of a rebellion and a revolution. Parliament had already in the later years of Elizabeth begun to assume a more independent attitude; but that queen had tact enough to keep it in good temper, and, as in the question of the monopolies, knew when to yield. But James I. was utterly devoid of tact, and never succeeded in making himself respected. More than this, he continually forced upon men's attention a doctrine of prerogative which cut at the root of English liberties. Moreover, his Scotch experience had rendered him singularly unfit to deal with English ecclesiastical difficulties. The time had come for concessions to, or at any rate considerate treatment of, the Puritans. But James, though he did not, as Charles I., regard episcopacy as a sacred institution, valued it highly as a means of keeping the clergy in order; any concession to the Puritans would, he thought, weaken episcopal authority, and so prepare the way for that independence of the clergy which in Scotland had proved so dangerous to the state; therefore he refused all change, and so brought about the union against himself of the political and religious oppositions. His domestic difficulties were increased by his ill-advised foreign policy. James knew far better than his subjects the true position of affairs on the Continent; and, although his policy of mediation could never have succeeded, a frank statement of reasons would have done much to lessen the opposition of the Commons; but as he took no pains to make his people understand him, it was inevitable that the Protestant feeling of the country should be offended by the marriage negotiations with Spain, and by the king's refusal to interfere energetically to save the Palatinate. So firm was the distrust which his action inspired, that even when, under pressure from Buckingham, James declared war against Spain, Parliament would not believe that a great continental war was seriously intended, and refused supplies. The question more and more clearly defined itself: could the king persist in a certain policy, or retain a certain minister, against the will of Parliament? The actual Parliamentary gains of James's reign were but few; more important was it that the impositions had raised the question of unparliamentary taxation, and that the revival of impeachment had given Parliament a weapon against the king. But it is clear that if the king determined to carry out a certain policy against the wish of his subjects, and to raise the necessary funds by unparliamentary means, and if Parliament in vain attacked ministers, the ultimate issue would depend on the preponderance of power, and this could be decided only by war. This is what came to pass under Charles I.

But while the victory of Parliament was inevitable, it was well that it should not be premature. Had Charles yielded to all the demands of the Commons in 1629, had he given them complete control of taxation, and recognised the responsibility of ministers, he would have handed over his sovereignty to them. But the Commons were not yet fit to exercise such a power. Their supremacy would have established a gross tyranny in ecclesiastical matters, for all opinions disliked by the majority of average Englishmen would have been proscribed in the National Church. Nor were the Commons as yet fit to govern. Nothing existed comparable to the modern system of cabinet and party government; the rule of the House of Commons would have been the rule of an unorganised mob.

Then followed eleven years without a Parliament. At first the country was quiet; but Laud's action upon becoming archbishop, and the attempt to raise Ship-money, strengthened and bound more closely together the Puritan and the constitutionalist opposition; and when the Scotch attack forced Charles to put himself into the hands of Parliament, the opposition saw their own strength, and Charles had to surrender one by one the powers and prerogatives by which he had attempted to govern.

But the redress of political grievances left the religious difficulties still unsolved. It became clear during the struggles of 1641—42 that the main question left was that of the existence of episcopacy; from the episcopalian party arose the Cavalier party; and though the attempt to seize the Five Members, and the consequent introduction of the Militia Bill was the immediate cause of the war, the religious element was far more important than the constitutional in the early years of the war.

The constitutional questions of the second Stuart period differ from those of the first. No longer was there a direct assertion of "absolute power;" no unparliamentary taxation was attempted; there was no exercise of judicial power by Council or Star Chamber. Charles II. ruled not against, but through a Parliament which he tried to make subservient. Yet the judges were still under court influence; prerogative lingered in the "dispensing power;" and divine right reappeared under the doctrine of "non-resistance." The fall of the Whigs after the dissolution of 1681 showed how strong the Royalist feeling of the country remained, in spite of eighteen years' misgovernment; and even after the lessons of the Great Rebellion, the Stuarts might at the eleventh hour have succeeded in creating a despotism, had not James II. attacked the English Church, and so united all classes against him.

The reigns of William and Mary, and of Anne, though the sisters were of the Stuart house, are more closely connected with later than with earlier history. In them begins the development of party cabinet government; and instead of a shifting policy of neutrality or a trucking to France, the great struggle commences between France and England which was to last till the present century. [PETITION OF RIGHT; GREAT REBELLION, &c.]

Stuart, ARABELLA. [ARABELLA STUART.]

Stuart, CHARLES EDWARD, known as the YOUNG PRETENDER (b. 1720, d. 1788), was the son of James Edward Stuart, and Clementina, granddaughter of John Sobieski, King of Poland. He was born at Rome. His education was very much neglected. He became of political importance on the renewal of the hostility between England and France after the fall of Walpole. Cardinal Tencin, the French minister, was in favour of an invasion of England, and in 1743 Charles came to Paris. Louis XV., although he refused to see him, was not unfriendly to his cause; 15,000 veterans under Marshal Saxe were stationed at Dunkirk, while fleets were collected at Brest and Toulon. But the French admiral, Roquefeuille, feared to attack the English under Sir John Norris; his ships were dispersed by a storm, and the French ministry abandoning the design, appointed Saxe to command in Flanders. The Pretender retired to Paris, whence he communicated with his Scotch adherents through Murray of Broughton. The results of the battle of Fontenoy (1745) caused him to hasten his plans. He embarked at Nantes (1745) in a privateer, attended by a French man-of-war, but the latter vessel was attacked and disabled by an English ship, so that Charles arrived in Scotland stripped of supplies, and with only seven companions. [JACOBITES.] After the battle of Culloden Charles fled, and succeeded, after five months' wanderings in the Hebrides, in escaping to France. He owed his life to Flora Macdonald. On his return to Paris he found that no more help was to be expected from the French court. On one occasion Tencin proposed that he should be supplied with French troops on condition that in the event of his success, Ireland should be given to Louis. Charles replied, "Non, M. le Cardinal, tout ou rien, point de partage." In 1747 he went to Spain, and in 1748 to Prussia, to try and get assistance, but without success. He quarrelled with his father and brother when the latter became a cardinal. He was compelled to leave France by the conditions of the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, but he obstinately refused to go, and was imprisoned. He resided chiefly after this with his friend, the Duc de Bouillon, in the forest of Ardennes. In 1750, and perhaps in 1753, he paid mysterious visits to England. On the death of his father he repaired to Rome. His character had become degraded; his former chivalrous promise had quite vanished, he was a confirmed drunkard, and his friends were alienated by his refusal to dismiss his mistress, Miss Walkinshaw, who it was said betrayed his plans. In 1772 he married Princess Louisa of Stolberg, a girl of twenty, but the union was unhappy, and she eloped with Alfieri. His adherents had sent him proposals that year of setting up his standard in America. "The abilities of Prince Charles," says Lord Stanhope, "I may observe, stood in direct contrast to his father's. No man could express himself with more clearness and elegance than James . . .

but on the other hand his conduct was always deficient in energy and enterprise. Charles was no penman; while in action, he was superior. His quick intelligence, his promptness of decision, his contempt of danger, are recorded on unquestionable testimony. Another quality of Charles's mind was great firmness of resolution, which pride and sorrow afterwards hardened into sullen obstinacy."

Stuart, James Edward, known as the OLD PRETENDER (b. 1688, d. 1765), was the son of King James II. and Mary of Modena. It was generally believed at the time that he was a supposititious child; but without just cause. When James II. contemplated flight he was conveyed to France by Lausun. In 1701, at his father's deathbed, he was acknowledged by Louis XIV., and the king undertook to uphold his claims. In 1708 Louis fitted out an expedition against this country. But James, who was to have accompanied it, was taken ill of the measles, and the expedition failed completely. He then joined the French army, and was present at the battle of Oudenarde. On the fall of the Whigs his prospects considerably improved. In 1711 Harley opened negotiations for peace with the French court through the Abbé Gautier, who was also a Jacobite agent. In 1712 James ventured to write to his sister Anne. On the conclusion of the Peace of Utrecht, he was compelled to leave France, and removed to Bar in Lorraine. During this period it was constantly urged upon him that he should change his religion, but he distinctly refused to do so. In June 23, 1714, proclamations against him were issued by both Houses of Parliament. On receiving the news of the death of Anne, he went from Bar-le-Duc to Plombières, where he issued a proclamation claiming the crown, and from thence to Commercy. With Bolingbroke as Secretary of State, the Pretender's schemes seemed to have a chance of success. It was hoped that Louis might be induced to break the peace; the Jacobites in England were supposed to be eager to rise. But the flight of Ormonde from England was followed by the death of Louis XIV. Despite Bolingbroke's advice Mar rose in Scotland. [JACOBITES.] It was not until Mar's expedition was doomed to failure that James arrived in Scotland. He went to Scoone, where he assumed the style of royalty. But it was evident that he lacked all energy. Argyle advanced on Perth, James and Mar withdrew before him, and, deserting their followers, secretly fled to France. On his return James most unjustly laid the blame of the failure on Bolingbroke, and dismissed him. His place was taken by Mar. In 1717 Charles XII. of Sweden, and the Spanish minister Alberoni, resolved to bring about a Stuart restoration. But their plans failed. Soon afterwards the Regent of France was compelled by the English government to expel James from the French dominions. He went to Rome (1717). He was betrothed to Clementina, granddaughter of John Sobieski, King of Poland; but on her way to Rome, she was arrested by the Emperor, and detained prisoner. In 1719 Alberoni fitted out an expedition against England. The Pretender was invited to Spain, and there publicly received. The expedition under Ormonde was scattered in the Bay of Biscay. This year Princess Sobieski escaped from Austria, and went to Italy, where she married the Pretender. In 1721 Charles Edward was born. In 1722 Atterbury's plot for a short period seemed likely to succeed. James sent an extraordinary declaration from Lucca, offering to allow George II. the succession to the throne, and the title of King of Hanover, if he would quietly surrender the English crown. In 1728 an unsuccessful attempt to incite a rebellion in the Highlands was made by Allan Cameron. James had quarrelled with Mar, and now had as a favourite Colonel Hay, who was made Secretary of State and Earl of Inverness. Clementina, jealous of Inverness, left him, whereat the Emperor and Spain were alienated from him. On the death of George I. he repaired to Lorraine full of hopes. They were soon dashed to the ground, and the French government were compelled to send him from France. He returned to Italy and was reconciled to his wife. She died in 1735. He now took as his adviser James Murray, Inverness's brother-in-law, whom he created Earl of Dunbar. On the breaking out of war between England and France (1746) the Jacobite hopes revived. An association of seven was formed in Scotland; the English Jacobites were roused; the French minister was friendly to his cause. The ultimate result of these intrigues was the Young Pretender's expedition in 1745. James Edward now ceased to exercise any real influence. He quarrelled with his son in 1747. James had fair abilities, but was thoroughly selfish, faithless, and licentious.

Stubbs, Thomas, a Puritan lawyer, and brother-in-law of Cartwright, wrote in 1679 a pamphlet against the proposed marriage of Elizabeth with the Duke of Anjou. For this he was sentenced to have his right hand cut off; and on the infliction of the penalty is said to have waved his hat in his left hand, crying, "Long live Queen Elizabeth!" This story is, however, doubtful. Stubbs was in 1587 employed by Burleigh to answer the libels of Cardinal Allen. In 1588 he was elected M.P. for Yarmouth.

Stubbs, Thomas (d. 1373), a Dominican, wrote a chronicle of the Archbishops of York, which contains much valuable historical matter. It has been printed by Twysden.

Stukeley, SIR THOMAS (d. 1578), an adherent of the Protector Somerset, was implicated in the rebellion of Sir Thomas Wyatt (1554), and was compelled to leave England, subsequently becoming a noted pirate or privateer. He afterwards went to Ireland and acquired considerable possessions there. In 1570 he betook himself to Spain, and entered into negotiations with Philip, declaring that his influence was sufficient to procure an easy conquest of Ireland; but the contemplated invasion came to nothing. A few years later Stukeley again projected an attack on Ireland, but this time with papal aid; he was killed, however, on his way at Alcazar in battle with the Moors.

Subinfundation was the process of creating inferior feudal obligations by the lord of a fief. For example, a lord who held an estate of the crown, would grant part of it to a sub-tenant of his own, who would henceforward stand in an analogous relation to him to that in which he stood to his lord. Very often the process of subinfundation went so far that the nominal holder of a fief had not enough left in his own hands to perform the services required of him. Fraudulent acts of this type were not uncommon. At last the statute Quia Emptores (July, 1290) practically abolished future cases of subinfundation by enacting that in future transfers of land, the purchaser should not enter into feudal relations of dependence with the alienor, but should stand to the lord of the fief in the same relation in which the alienor had himself stood. [FEUDALISM.]

Submission of the Clergy, THE, was an agreement forced upon the Convocation of Canterbury by Henry VIII. in 1532, that no new canons should be enacted 'without the king's sanction, and that a review of the existing canons should be made, and all disapproved of struck out. In 1534 this submission was embodied in an Act of Parliament called the Statute of the Submission of the Clergy (25 Hen. VIII., c. 19), which moreover gave the king power to summon Convocation by his own writ, annul all done without his licence, and to appoint commissioners to review the canon law. The exact significance of these Acts was fiercely debated during the stormy period that preceded the virtual suspension of Convocation in 1717.

Subsidy, a Parliamentary grant to the crown, acquired during the sixteenth century a fixed and technical sense. The custom of granting a round sum of money which had grown up since the days of Edward IV., became in the reign of Mary stereotyped. Henceforth a subsidy meant a tax of 4s. in the pound for lands, and 2s. 8d. for goods from Englishmen, and of double that sum from aliens; in all amounting to £70,000. Besides this a special subsidy of £20,000 was levied on the clergy. From this date, a Parliament granted one or two or more subsidies. The Subsidy Rolls give an account of how the taxes were raised.

Sudbury, SIMON OF, Archbishop of Canterbury (1375—1381), was born at Sudbury, studied canon law at Paris, and became attached to the Papal Curia. He also attached himself to John of Gaunt. In 1360 he was made Chancellor of Salisbury, and in 1362 Bishop of London. He took part in several embassies. He incurred unpopularity by his enlightened aversion to pilgrimages. In 1376 he was made Archbishop of Canterbury. He was murdered in 1381 by the insurgent peasantry when they took possession of the Tower.

Sudoosain, THE BATTLE OF (July 1, 1848), was fought during the second Sikh War. After Kineyree Lieutenant Edwards was reinforced by 4,000 men from Cashmere. Moolraj, alarmed at the growing power of his opponents, drew together his whole force, which had been augmented by 11,000 deserters, and attacked them near Sudoosain. The battle began with a furious cannonade, which lasted several hours, but at last a brilliant charge by one of Colonel Cortland's regiments broke the ranks of the Sikhs. Moolraj fled, and was followed by his whole army to Mooltan.

Sudreys, THE (Sudreyjar), was a name given by the Norwegians to the Hebrides, or Western Islands, in contradistinction to the Orkneys or Norderies. Some authorities say that the Western Islands themselves were divided into the Norderies and Suderies, the point of division being Ardnamurchan. Peopled by a Gaelic race, the Western Isles were early ravaged by the Danes, and in the ninth century colonised by Norwegians, who made themselves the lords of the original inhabitants, though the islands preserved more Celtic than Norse characteristics. There were frequent contests for the possession of the Western Isles between the Norwegian jarls of Orkney and the Danish kings of Dublin about 1070. A new Norwegian dynasty was founded in these isles by the Viking, Godred Crovan. In 1154 a division of the islands was made, those south of Ardnamurchan Point becoming the territory of Somerlaed of Argyll. In 1222 Argyll was absorbed into Scotland proper, and in July, 1266, the rest of the Western Isles were ceded to Alexander III. on consideration of the payment of a sum of money. The name is still preserved in the designation of the Manx bishop, as Bishop of Sodor and Man, though none of the Southern Islands have for many centuries been included in his diocese.

Suetonius Paulinus was Roman commander in Britain from 59 to 62. His first action was the reduction of the island of Mona (Anglesey), the chief seat of Druidism. From this he was recalled by the news of the revolt of the Iceni, under Boadicea, the capture of Verulamium, Camulodunum, and other ports, and the slaughter of the Romans and their allies. After a tedious campaign, Suetonius gained a decisive victory over the Britons near London; but his harshness having greatly conduced to the rebellion, despite his ultimate success he was recalled in the year 62.

Suffolk, CHARLES BRANDON, DUKE OF (d. 1545), a general and courtier of the reign of Henry VIII. As a commander his success in an expedition against France was but indifferent, but as an exponent of chivalry he was without rival. His marriage to Mary, Henry's sister, very soon after the death of her first husband, Louis XII., was with Henry's consent, and their issue were preferred in the king's will to those of his elder sister, Margaret of Scotland.

Suffolk, EDMUND DE LA POLE, DUKE OF (d. 1513), was the son of John de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, by Elizabeth, eldest sister of Edward IV. For consenting to take service under Henry VII. he was created Earl of Suffolk, and allowed to redeem a portion of the estates of his father. A few years later he was guilty of homicide, and resenting the notion of being tried for the crime as a deadly insult, he fled to Flanders, and entered into active relations with the Dowager Duchess of Burgundy. Henry, however, persuaded him to return, but in the following year he again fled to Flanders, this time with a view of restoring his broken fortunes by some private enterprise. On the shipwreck of the Archduke Philip in Jan., 1506, Henry did not hesitate to insist upon his surrender as a main article of the treaty he then extorted from Philip. He was at once committed to the Tower, from which he did not emerge again till the day of his execution in 1513. It is supposed that his execution at this date was chiefly due to Henry VIII.'s anger at his brother, Richard de la Pole, entering the service of France.

Suffolk, HENRIETTA, COUNTESS OF (b. circa 1688, d. 1767), was the supposed mistress of George II. She was the daughter of Sir Henry Hobart, and married a Mr. Howard, who afterwards succeeded to the earldom of Suffolk. When her husband tried to remove her from the household of Caroline, then Princess of Wales, the latter protected her. "Queen Caroline," says Stanhope, "used to call her in banter her sister Howard, and was pleased to employ her at her toilet, or in menial offices about her person. Lady Suffolk was placid, good-natured, and kind-hearted, but very deaf, and not remarkable for wit. Though the king passed half his time in her company, her influence was quite subordinate to that of the queen." She entertained a strong regard for Swift and Pope, and was courted by the Opposition partly in the mistaken expectation of gaining the royal ear, partly from real regard for her amiable character. After her withdrawal from court in 1734, she married the Hon. George Berkeley.

Suffolk, MICHAEL DE LA POLE, EARL OF (d. 1389), was the son of William de la Pole, a Hull merchant, who had risen to be a baron of the Exchequer. He early succeeded in ingratiating himself with Richard II., and in 1383 was created Chancellor. He was extremely unpopular with the barons, and the misgovernment of the kingdom was in great measure attributed to him. He was made Earl of Suffolk in 1385, and this still further increased his unpopularity, so that in 1386 the king was obliged to remove him from the chancellorship, and the Commons drew up articles of impeachment against him. The charges preferred were for the most part frivolous, but his condemnation was determined on, and he was sentenced to imprisonment till he should ransom himself according to the king's pleasure. After the dissolution of Parliament an attempt was made by the king and his friends to annul their decisions, but the barons were too powerful for them, and finding resistance of no avail, De la Pole fled in 1388 to France, where he died in the following year.

Suffolk, THOMAS HOWARD, EARL OF (d. 1626), son of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, was one of the volunteers who assisted in attacking the Spanish Armada off Calais. In 1591 he was in command of the fleet which attacked the Spanish treasure ships off the Azores, when Sir Richard Grenville was killed, and in 1596 was second in command of the fleet during the expedition to Cadiz. In the following year he accompanied Essex in his disastrous attempt on the Azores. On his return home he was created Lord Howard de Walden, and in 1603 Earl of Suffolk. In 1604 he was appointed one of the commissioners for executing the office of Earl Marshal, and was mainly instrumental in the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot. In 1614 Lord Suffolk was created Lord High Treasurer of England, but was deprived of his office four years later.

Suffolk, WILLIAM DE LA POLE, EARL and DUKE OF (b. 1396, d. 1450), grandson of Michael de la Pole, served with distinction in the French wars, and took part in the battle of Verneuil, and the siege of Orleans. He was one of the ambassadors at the Congress of Arras in 1435, and was the chief promoter of the marriage of Henry VI. with Margaret of Anjou, for arranging which he received a marquise in 1445, and four years later he was made a duke. From 1445 he was practically prime minister of England, and was strongly inclined towards a peace policy, which brought great odium upon him, while the terms of the marriage treaty which he had negotiated were greatly in favour of France, Anjou and Maine being ceded to King René, the father of Margaret. Suffolk's great rival was the Duke of Gloucester, whom he accused to the king of treachery. Gloucester was arrested, and his suspicious death shortly afterwards was popularly attributed to Suffolk. Suffolk's administration was extremely unfortunate; abroad disaster followed disaster, while at home taxation was heavy, and misery and desolation prevailed. The popular anger against Suffolk culminated in 1449. The Commons brought grave charges against him. He was accused of gross mismanagement and treachery in France, of wishing to marry his son to Margaret Beaufort, and thereby of getting the crown for his descendants, and of appropriating and misusing the royal revenue. Suffolk, while denying the charges, placed himself at the king's disposal, who, without declaring his guilt or innocence, banished him from the realm for five years. It would seem that Suffolk assented to this rather than inculcate the king and the Council by awaiting his trial at the hands of the Lords. On his way to Flanders he was seized by the crew of a ship sent in pursuit of him, and put to death by them as a traitor. He married Alice, daughter and heiress of Thomas Chaucer.

Sunderland, CHARLES SPENCER, 3RD EARL OF (b. 1674, d. 1722), in 1698 married Anne, daughter of the Duke of Marlborough. He quarrelled with his father-in-law (1702). In 1705 he was sent as envoy extraordinary to Vienna. The Whigs were anxious that he should be admitted to office, as they hoped thereby to draw Marlborough over to their side. The queen disliked him for his impetuosity of temper. However, Godolphin's threats of resignation, and the prayers of Marlborough, induced her to create him Secretary of State (1708). In 1710 he foolishly advised Sacheverell's impeachment, and was therefore to a great extent the cause of his party's overthrow. On the accession of George I. he was much disgusted at being appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, a post he imagined to be inferior to his merits. He began to cabal with the seceders from the Whigs against Townshend and Walpole. In 1716 he went to Hanover, where he gained the ear of George I. and Stanhope. He accused Walpole and Townshend of questionable dealings with the Duke of Argyle. George was opposed to Townshend for his opposition to his German plans, and dismissed him; Walpole followed his brother-in-law out of office. Sunderland became Secretary of State, and subsequently exchanged offices with Stanhope. The ministry was strong; and in 1719 Walpole and Townshend finding opposition useless formed a coalition with him. The defeat of the government on the Peerage Bill, suggested by Sunderland in order to thwart the future king, had done them but little harm. In 1720 came universal distress owing to the bursting of the South Sea Bubble. The original scheme had been laid before Sunderland, and therefore it was chiefly on him that odium fell. He was accused of having received £50,000 stock as a present. He was most probably guiltless; indeed it is said that he had lost heavily by the transactions of the company. He was declared innocent by the Lords; but the popular indignation was so great that he was forced to resign. During the last year of his life he is said to have intrigued with the Pretender. "Lord Spencer," says Coxe, "in person was highly favoured by nature, and no less liberally gifted with intellectual endowments. In him a bold and impetuous spirit was concealed under a cold and reserved exterior. He was a zealous champion of the Whig doctrines in the most enlarged sense. Associating with the remnant of the Republicans who had survived the Commonwealth, he caught their spirit. His political idol was Lord Somers, although he wanted both the prudence and temper of so distinguished a leader."

Sunderland, ROBERT SPENCER, 2ND EARL OF (b. 1641, d. 1702), was in his earlier career a supporter of the Exclusion Bill, and of the Prince of Orange. But a singularly ambitious and self-seeking disposition made him never hesitate to change his side when it was likely to be unprosperous. He became a strong Tory, the leading minister of James II., and ultimately, though quite destitute of religious convictions, professed his conversion to Catholicism. James found in him a subtle and accommodating minister of very great ability, and quite without scruples. The Revolution of 1688 drove him into exile; but in a few years he returned, and managed to insinuate himself into William III.'s favour. He was William's adviser in forming a Whig ministry, and was made one of the Lords Justices in 1697.

Supplicants, THOMAS, was the name assumed (1637) by those persons in Scotland who petitioned or "supplicated" against the introduction of Laud's Service Book, and the Book of Canons. The Supplicants were so numerous and strong that on the presentation of the Great Supplication (which embraced charges against the Service Book, the Book of Canons, the bishops, and the government), the Privy Council found it necessary to authorise the election of delegates from the Supplicants to confer with the executive: these delegates were called "The Tables." In 1638 the Supplicants signed the Covenant, and thenceforward became known by the name of Covenanters.

Supremacy, Acts of. (1) 26 Hen. VIII., c. 1, embodied the recognition of Convocation, and enacted "that the king shall be taken, accepted, and reputed the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England," and that he shall have "full power to visit, repress, redress, reform, restrain, and amend all heresies, errors, and enormities, which by any manner of spiritual jurisdiction ought lawfully to be reformed." (2) 26 Hen. VIII., c. 13, or the Treason Act, made it high treason "to imagine or practise any harm to the king, or deprive him of any of his dignities and titles." Under this Act More and Fisher suffered. (3) Elizabeth's first Act "restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical," and empowering her to visit, reform, and amend errors, heresies, and schisms as in Henry VIII.'s Act. But some limitations were secured in the clause that nothing was to be judged as heresy but what was proved so out of the Bible, the canons of the four general councils, or what Convocation and Parliament should judge to be so. Elizabeth was also declared no longer "supreme head," but "supreme governor" of the Church. (4) In 1563 a more stringent Act of Supremacy was passed, with sterner penalties, and further obligations in new classes to take the oath of supremacy. By all the above Acts the oath of supremacy was enforced.

Supremacy, THE ROYAL, was in its earlier forms merely the necessary result of the imperial rights of the English crown. Even as against the Church, which in mediæval times was in a sense a state within the state, there are many mediæval examples of the exercise of the royal supremacy. The Customs of William I., preserved by Eadmer, the Constitutions of Clarendon, the Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire all embodied the principle. But Henry VIII. brought out the principle with a new clearness in his definite claim to be "in all causes and over all persons as well ecclesiastical as civil supreme." Admitted with reservation by Convocation, and enforced by Acts of Parliament, this newly-formulated doctrine soon proved incompatible with the power of the papacy, and even with the independence of the English Church. Henry VIII.'s interpretation of the supremacy hardly put him in an inferior position to German princes whom the Reformation made summi episcopi of their dominions. Under it Cromwell received his extraordinary commission. Through it Somerset and Northumberland revolutionised the Church. Never abandoned even by Mary, it was reclaimed in a new and less insidious form by Elizabeth, and has ever since been part of the prerogatives of the English crown.

Surajah Dowlah was grandson of Ali-verdy Khan, and succeeded him in 1756. He perpetrated the abominable crime of the Black Hole; was beaten by Clive at Plassey, whence he fled, but was recaptured, brought back, and put ignominiously to death by Meer Jaffier's son (1767).

Surat is a town in the Konkan, in India, situated near the mouth of the Tapti. It was the port to Persia, and one of the largest cities in India. It was originally the chief English factory on the west coast. The Guicowar and the Peishwa both had claims on it, but in 1800, in consequence of the misgovernment of the Nabob, Lord Wellesley ordered it to be annexed. The Guicowar was easily persuaded to surrender his claim, and in 1802 by the Treaty of Bassein the Peishwa consented also.

Surat, THE TREATY OF (March 6, 1775), was concluded between the Bombay Presidency, without the authority of Calcutta, and Ragoba, a deposed Peishwa. Its stipulations were that the Bombay government should furnish Ragoba with 3,000 British troops; and that in return Ragoba should pay eighteen lacs of rupees a year, should make an assignment to the value of nineteen lacs, and should cede Salsette and Bassein.

Surgee Anjengaoon, THE TREATY OF (1) (Dec. 4, 1803), concluded between the Company and Dowlut Rao Scindia. Its stipulations were, the cession of all his territories lying between the Jumna and the Ganges, and north of the Rajpoot kingdoms of Jeypoor and Joudhpoor, the fortress and territory of Ahmednugger in the Deccan, and Baroach, with its dependencies in Guzerat; the relinquishment of all claims on the Nimam, Peishwa, Guicowar, and British government; the recognition of the independence of all the British allies in Hindostan. (2) (Nov. 23, 1805), concluded between the Company and Dowlut Rao Scindia. Its stipulations were that all the provisions of the first treaty which were not modified by the new arrangement were to remain in force; that Golind and Gwalior were to be restored to him as a matter of friendship, on his engaging to assign three lacs of rupees from the revenues to the Rana. Pensions which had been granted to different officers of his court were relinquished, and annuities were settled on himself, his wife, his daughter. The Chumbul was to form the boundary of the two states, but the British government engaged to enter into no treaties with the Rajahs of Oodypore, Joudhpoor, and other chiefs, the tributaries of Scindia in Mewar, Marwar, or Malwa, and Scindia agreed never to admit Shirgees Rao Ghatkay into his counsels.

Surrey, HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF (b. 1516, d. 1547), was the son of Thomas Howard, third Duke of Norfolk. A promising scholar and soldier, and a poet of considerable power, his career was brought to a premature close through Henry's jealous interpretation of some indiscreet assumptions of royal arms and titles and references to his family relationship to royalty, at a time when the king began to reject again the counsels of the conservative Anglicans, of whom Norfolk and Surrey were the chief. Though barely thirty years of age at his death, the young earl had distinguished himself in some of the Scotch and French campaigns, besides winning fame as a poet of real if limited powers. For a short period he was entrusted with the governorship of Henry's French conquest, Boulogne, but his defeat before the city in 1546 led to his being superseded in his command, and to his engaging in a quarrel with his successor at Boulogne, Lord Hertford, which was one main cause of his incurring the king's displeasure. Accused, at the instance of Hertford, of treason, he was condemned, and executed (Jan. 21, 1547). The Earl of Surrey was the brother-in-law and frequent companion of Henry's natural son, the Duke of Richmond.

Susa, THE PEACE OF (April 14, 1629), was made between England and France, through the mediation of the Venetian ambassador, Contarini, and largely through the good offices of Queen Henrietta Maria. It tacitly recognised the principle that each king was free to settle his dealings with his own subjects as he thought fit.

Suspending Power, THE, was the royal claim to suspend altogether the operation of any statute which was found contrary to the well-being of the state. Like the analogous Dispensing Power (q.v.) it arose from the necessity in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries of combining with friendship with the Pope the maintenance of the Acts of Provisors and Præmunire. Abused by the Stuarts, especially by Charles II.'s and James II.'s Declarations of Toleration, which suspended many statutes, and stretched to the uttermost by James II.'s suspensions of the Test Act and others, this power was finally declared illegal in the Bill of Rights.

Sussex, KINGDOM OF. The first Saxon attack upon Britain after the conquest of Kent by the Jutes, was that under Ælla, and his three sons (one of whom, Cissa, has given his name to Chichester). Landing with a small force at Selsey in 477, the South Saxons slowly fought their way eastward, conquering the strip of land between the Andredes-weald and the Channel, until in 491 they reached Anderida. After a desperate struggle the fortress was taken, and "all that were therein slain." But they were unable to advance further, for immediately to the east of Anderida a dense forest belt came down to the sea and barred further progress. The kingdom of Sussex was always one of the least important of the English powers. It fell under the overlordship of Ethelbert of Kent, and after a period of independence, under the rule of Wulfhere of Mercia. Hitherto it had remained heathen, but in 661 its king, Æthelwalch, was baptised in Wulfhere's presence, and at the same time the overlord added to his dominions the Isle of Wight, and the lands of the Meonwara along Southampton Water. But the mass of the people were still heathen, and in 678-83 Wilfred occupied his enforced leisure among them in bringing about their conversion. In 685 Ceadwalla brought Sussex under West Saxon supremacy, and from this time it ceases to have any separate history.

Sussex, KINGS OF. Besides Ælla who, after founding the kingdom of Sussex, probably assisted the Gewissas, and is therefore mentioned by Bede as the first English prince who held an imperium or ducatu, i.e., war-leadership (v. Green, Making of England, 308), few of the South Saxon princes were of importance. Æthelwalch, the first Christian king, and his successor, Eadric, fell in battle against Ceadwalla of Wessex. Lappenberg (England under Anglo-Saxon Kings, ed. 1881, i., p. 313) mentions also the names of Huna, Numa or Nunna, Nothelm and Wattus, as ruling under Æne, and of Osmund, Æthelberht, and Sigebert as later princes.

Sussex, THOMAS RADCLIFFE, 3RD EARL OF (d. 1583), though inclined to Catholicism, was the faithful and honourable counsellor and affectionate kinsman of Elizabeth. He was made, on his father's death in 1557, Lord Deputy of Ireland, where he distinguished himself by his energetic government. He became an active servant of Elizabeth, and on his recall from Ireland (1567), where he had quarrelled with Sir Henry Sidney, was sent to Vienna to try to arrange the conditions of the queen's marriage with the archduke. On his return to England he became President of the Council of the North, and was one of the commissioners at York for the inquiry into the Darnley murder. Sussex afterwards advocated the marriage of the Scottish queen with the Duke of Norfolk, and on that account was supposed by the confederate earls to be favourable to their cause. He remained loyal, however, and as President of the North took part in suppressing the rebellion of 1569, though he incurred the charge of lack of energy. He was one of the few peers who were in favour of the Alençon marriage, and in his capacity as Lord Chamberlain seems to have exercised a good deal of influence at court. Sussex was a man of blunt and straightforward character, a good soldier, but not much of a courtier.

Suttee was the Hindoo custom of burning the live widow with the dead husband. It was practised for twenty centuries, and is supposed to be of religious origin, but was really grafted on the original Hindoo law, owing to the unwillingness among the Brahmins that the widow should acquire her settled property, and celebrate the funeral rites of her husband. The English were at first afraid to interfere, fearing that it would create a religious excitement against the English rule. Lord William Bentinck, however, determined to abolish this custom, and in 1830 passed a regulation which declared the practice of suttee illegal, and punishable by the criminal courts as culpable homicide. Not the slightest feeling of alarm or resentment was exhibited. A few attempts at suttee were prevented by the police, and now the practice is a matter of history.

Sveaborg, THE BOMBARDMENT OF (1855), took place during the war with Russia. The second Baltic expedition, under Admiral Dundas, addressed itself to the bombardment of Sveaborg. On the morning of Aug. 9 the bombardment was opened. Shot, shell, and rockets rained into the fortress from our gun and mortar boats, and the batteries which the French had established on one of the many neighbouring islands. The bombardment was continued with little intermission till four o'clock on the morning of the 11th, by which time it was computed that no less than one thousand tons of shot and shell had been thrown into the place by the English alone. Finding the destruction of the stores and arsenals, and every building of importance to be complete, the admiral resolved to make no further attempt on the fortifications themselves, as this must have cost many lives.

Swainmote was the court of the freemen of the forest. As the forest jurisdictions were arranged on the model of the ordinary shire jurisdictions, its organisation was analogous to that of the shire or hundred court. Swain is an equivalent of freeholder (libere tenens).

Sweating Sickness, THE, was the name given to a most destructive malady which ravaged Europe, and more particularly England, during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Beginning in the form of a violent fever, accompanied by a profuse fetid perspiration, it speedily reduced its victims to a state of utter helplessness and prostration, a few hours only sufficing, as a general rule, to transform a healthy, vigorous man into a loathsome corpse. The mortality caused by a plague of this mysterious and deadly character was enormously great, and in England, where its effects were more severely felt than in any other part of Europe, it resulted, according to Stow, in a marked depopulation of the kingdom. The first appearance of the "sweating sickness" in England was in Aug., 1485, when, breaking out seemingly among Henry VII.'s troops at Milford Haven, it spread with fatal rapidity to London. Here, and generally, the plague raged furiously till about the end of October, when its force began to abate, till eventually on New Year's Day, 1486, all traces of it disappeared. In July, 1517, it again broke out among the people, and ran a violent course of six months. In May, 1528, its ravages brought about an almost total suspension of business. On this occasion the plague lasted on till July, 1529. Its next appearance was in April, 1551, when it destroyed in the space of a few days nine hundred and sixty of the inhabitants of Shrewsbury, from which town it was speedily carried over the surrounding country. It once again took its departure in September, and with the exception of a short interval in 1575, when the "sickness" caused a vast number of deaths, principally in Oxford, we have no record of any subsequent renewal of the visitation. A remarkable circumstance connected with the "sweating sickness" was the comparative freedom which foreign residents in England enjoyed from its effects; upon the native-born population alone, for the most part, did the sickness exercise its deadly influence. Hence it is supposed that the malady was largely due to the immoderate indulgence in beer so common among all classes of English people in the days of the Tudors.

Sweden, RELATIONS WITH. There were practically no dealings between England and Sweden during the Middle Ages. Gustavus Vasa at last freed the merchants of Sweden from the commercial yoke of the Lübeckers, as he had previously freed the country from the political yoke of Denmark. And in 1551 a commercial treaty between England and Sweden marks the beginning of a trade that ultimately became important. The general leaning of Sweden to France, however, made really cordial political intercourse impossible. Half-mad King Eric's proposal to marry Queen Elizabeth (1560) must not be taken too seriously. Charles IX. sought in 1599 the alliance of Elizabeth and her mediation between Sweden and Denmark. Gustavus Adolphus welcomed Scottish settlers into his new commercial town of Gothenburg. But the weak and uncertain policy of James I. and Charles I. determined Gustavus not to embroil himself in the Thirty Years' War until he had found in Richelieu a stronger ally than the English kings. Though many English subsidies and troops were slowly doled out to him he found no substantial help from England, and both his opposition to an unconditional restoration of the Elector Palatine and Charles I.'s desire that Germany should be freed from foreign conquerors, prevented any close relations between the two parties. Towards the end of Christina's reign, England and Sweden drew nearer together, as is shown by Whitlocke's famous embassy in 1654, the treaty of amity concluded by him, and Christina's acceptance of Cromwell's portrait. Though Charles X. was generally supported by England in his Danish war, his unexampled success necessitated the union of England and Holland to force on him a peace which would prevent his obtaining the exclusive possession of the Sound. A common corruption and dependence on France united England and Sweden under the minority of Charles XI. In 1667 both countries reversed their policy and united with Holland to check France by the Triple Alliance. This wise policy was, however, not pursued again until after 1680, when Charles XI. became master of his kingdom, and declared against France, an act which secured his friendship with the England of the Revolution. His last act was to mediate at the Congress of Ryswick (1697). But Sweden and England really belonged to very different political systems—a fact strongly illustrated by the very slight connection of Charles XII. and his northern wars with the War of the Spanish Succession raging just at the same time. Charles, however, found on his return from Bender that the Elector of Hanover had seized on his German duchies of Bremen and Verden; and his anxiety to recover these was one strong motive for his union with Peter of Russia and Alberoni against George I., and of his schemes to restore the Pretender. Hence England welcomed the oligarchical revolution, which, on his death, rendered Sweden powerless for nearly two generations. During these "Times of Freedom" the English and Russian ambassadors jointly bribed and intrigued to obtain the supremacy of the "Caps" over the "Hats," though events showed that the Swedish alliance was hardly worth its cost. Twice the ascendancy of the French party involved Sweden in war, first against England and Russia in 1741—43, next against Prussia, the English ally during the Seven Years' War. The failure of each war restored the Caps to power. At last, in 1772, Gustavus III., with French help, got rid of the corrupt oligarchy of placemen that was almost a parody of the English Whig connection. His action was very much resented in England, and his share in the Armed Neutrality showed that he had become anti-English in policy.

But the abandonment by the younger Pitt of the old English policy of alliance with Russia, led to a change in our relations with Sweden, and Gustavus's vain attack on Russia (1788—90) was a welcome though ineffectual help to Pitt's plans. At the end of his reign Gustavus's fury against the French Revolution brought him into the coalition against France. But he was assassinated in 1792, and Gustavus IV., though in 1806 he joined the Armed Neutrality, in 1806 united with Pitt in the coalition against France. But after the Treaty of Tilsit, the Russians deprived him of Finland, and, having offended the English general of the forces sent to his assistance, he was compelled to resign his throne to his uncle Charles XIII., who sought by adopting a French marshal as his heir to appease the fury of Napoleon. Nevertheless the Crown Prince—as Bernadotte was now called—joined in the alliance which dethroned his old master in 1815. Since that period Sweden has had no very striking direct political dealings with England. Her commercial relations have for the last two centuries been of importance.

Sweyn, King of Denmark (d. 1014), during the lifetime of his father, Harold Blaatand, threw off the Christianity which had been forced upon him, and distinguished himself as a Viking chief. In 982 he made a great expedition to England and destroyed Chester, Southampton, and London. Again, in 994, the hopes of a fresh Danegeld brought him anew to England. In 1002 the murder of his sister in the massacre of St. Brice's Day, gave him a new motive of hostility. At last he succeeded to the Danish throne, and led a great national invasion of England with the object of effecting a permanent conquest. All the Danelagh submitted at once, and the flight of Ethelred to Normandy, and the submission of the West Saxons made him practically ruler of England (1013). But as he was never crowned, the chroniclers call him Sweyn the Tyrant. His death in the next year left the throne open to his greater son, Canute.

Freeman, Norman Conquest.

Sweyn was the eldest son of Godwin, and in 1043 was appointed to an earldom, which included the shires of Hereford, Gloucester, Oxford, Berks, and Somerset. We read of his wars with the Welsh, and in 1046, on his return from one of these expeditions, he abducted Eadgifu, Abbess of Leominster. Being forbidden to marry her, he threw up his earldom and retired to Denmark. In 1048 he made overtures to Edward for the restoration of his earldom, which had been divided between Harold and Beorn, but his chances of pardon were destroyed by his treacherous murder of Beorn. Declared a nothing by the army, he escaped to Flanders, but in the next year he was restored to his possessions by Edward. In 1051 he was outlawed with his father, and once more retired to Flanders, but did not return with Godwin. "The blood of Beorn, the wrongs of Eadgifu lay heavy on his spirit," a pilgrimage to the Holy Land could alone expiate him for his crimes. Thither he went barefooted, and on his return "breathed his last in some unknown spot of the distant land of Lykia."

Freeman, Norman Conquest.

Swift, JONATHAN (b. 1667, d. 1745), was born at Dublin, and educated at Trinity College. In 1688 he was received into the family of Sir William Temple, to whom he was related. In 1695 he was ordained, but soon resigned a small Irish living, and returned to reside with Temple. During his residence with Temple began his mysterious connection with Hester Johnson, the "Stella" of his Journal. In 1699, failing of promotion to an English living, Swift went to Ireland as chaplain to Lord Berkeley, and was scantily rewarded by receiving, not the deanery which he had expected, but the living of Laracor, in the county of Meath. Swift began his political career as a Whig. In 1704 he published the Tale of a Tub, a satire on the corruptions of early Christianity, and the results of the Reformation. The Battle of the Books (1704), on the literary dispute about the letters of Phalaris, added to his reputation. During Anne's reign he paid frequent and protracted visits to England, and became closely connected with the leading Tories. During the last five years of Queen Anne's reign he played a very prominent part in English politics as the leading political writer of the Tories, and the friend and confidant of their leaders. He was on terms of the closest intimacy both with Harley and Bolingbroke, and attempted to allay the quarrel between the rival statesmen. His pamphlet, The Conduct of the Allies, was of immense service to the Tory party; and in a paper called the Examiner, he upheld their course with zeal, and supplied the ministry with arguments. In 1713 he received the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin. There he is thought to have been secretly married to Stella. She died in 1728. On the death of Anne, the dean retired to Dublin a disappointed man. In 1724 he wrote the Drapier Letters, an attack on the monopoly to coin halfpence which had been granted to a man named Wood; and this was followed by several other tracts on Irish affairs in which the treatment of Ireland by the English government was satirised with unsurpassed power. In writing of Ireland Swift thought chiefly of the English colony in Ireland; but his writings made him the idol of the whole Irish people. In 1726 appeared his greatest work, Gulliver's Travels. It is a satire on mankind with contemporary allusions. Swift outlived his genius, and sank into illotcy; the last years of his life were spent in almost complete mental darkness. Apart from his literary renown, Swift owes his position in history to the fact that in his writings we have the Tory view of politics in Queen Anne's reign set forth with the greatest literary skill. In Irish politics he is the typical representative of the Protestant ascendancy in Ireland, whose attack on the English government prepared the way for Grattan and the Volunteers of 1779.

Swing, CAPTAIN. During the agricultural outrages of the year 1830, which had their origin in the increased use of machinery for agricultural purposes, threatening letters were frequently sent to those proprietors who made use of machinery, ordering them to refrain from doing so, and threatening notices were affixed to gates and barns. These letters and notices were usually signed "Captain Swing," much as Irish threatening letters are signed "Rory of the Hills." This nickname was used in order to identify the various documents with the same movement.

Swinton, SIR JOHN, was a Scottish knight who fought with great gallantry at the battle of Homildon Hill. He crossed over to the aid of France with the Earl of Buchan, and was present at the battle of Beaugé (1421), where he unhorsed the Duke of Clarence. In 1424 he was killed at Verneuil.

Swithun (SWITHUN), ST. (d. 862), was a monk of Winchester, of which see he became bishop in 852. He was one of the chief ministers of Egbert and Ethelwulf, and one of the instructors of Alfred, whom he accompanied on his journey to Rome. It is said to have been at his suggestion that Ethelwulf bestowed on the Church the tenth part of his lands.

Swordsmen was the name given to the able-bodied Irish who, in 1652 were allowed to leave their country and enlist abroad. Some 30,000 or 40,000 are said to have availed themselves of this permission. At first this was only a private arrangement between the Irish leaders and the Puritan generals to whom they surrendered. But Parliament legalised their capitulations by a special Act; at the same time banishing all officers, while allowing them to enlist more recruits. Spain, France, Austria, and Venice took advantage of this opportunity for strengthening their forces.

Swynford, CATHERINE (d. 1403), successively governess, mistress, and third wife to John of Gaunt, was the daughter of Sir Paon de Rolt, and widow of Sir Hugh Swynford. From her are descended the Beauforts, and consequently Henry VII. Her marriage with John of Gaunt took place in 1396, but all her children were born previously.

Sydenham, CHARLES WILLIAM POULETT THOMSON, LORD (b. 1793, d. 1841), was a merchant, who first represented Dover (1826 to 1830), and then Manchester, in the House of Commons. In 1830 he entered Earl Grey's Reform administration as Vice-President of the Board of Trade and Treasurer of the Navy. In July, 1834, he became President of the Board of Trade and resigned with Lord Melbourne's ministry in November following. In April, 1835, he resumed that office until he was selected to replace Lord Durham in Canada. As a cabinet minister his efforts were directed to amendment of the Custom Laws and extension of our foreign trade by a more liberal policy. On Lord Seaton's recall from Canada, Mr. Thomson was appointed to the supreme government of British North America. In 1840 he was raised to the peerage as Baron Sydenham of Toronto.

Tables, THE, was the name given to a national council in Scotland, formed in 1637 to represent all those who objected to the New Service Book, and other changes which the Scottish Council, under orders from Charles I., was attempting to introduce. It was virtually an extraordinary Parliament, its sixteen members being elected equally from the four classes of nobles, barons, clergy, and burgesses. The creation of the Tables was sanctioned by the Privy Council in 1637, as a means of intercourse between the supplicants (or opposition, which included the whole nation almost) and the crown. The following account of them is given in Gordon, Scots Affairs :—"These sixteen thus chosen were constitute as delegates for the rest, who were to treat with the Council thereafter in name of the rest, and to reside constantly where the Council sat. These delegates thus constitute were appointed to give intelligence to all quarters of the kingdom to their associates of all that passed betwixt the king, the Council, and them; to correspond with the rest, and to receive intelligence from them, and to call such of them with the mind of the rest as they thought expedient." The Council soon discovered that in authorising the creation of the "Tables" they had called into being a representative body of an extremely troublesome and dangerous nature. In 1638, on the publication of a proclamation of the king exonerating the bishops, the Tables summoned their adherents to meet at Stirling, and issued the famous Protestation, declaring the "king to be deceived by the prelates, and to be personally guiltless of the whole." Shortly afterwards they issued the Covenant, compelling persons to sign allegiance to it all over Scotland. To the Tables is due the organisation of the Glasgow Assembly of 1638, and the indictment of the bishops in the same year. It was the Tables, moreover, which made preparations for the war that broke out the following year.

Tackers, THE (1704), was the name given to a party of zealous Tories, headed by Nottingham, who proposed, in imitation of a plan which had been resorted to in the previous reign in the case of the Irish Consumption Bill, to tack the Occasional Conformity Bill to the New Land Tax Bill, "so that the peers could not fling out the proposal of intolerance without losing the proposal of supply." The moderate Tories, however, headed by Harley and St. John, voted against them, and they were routed by 251 against 134 votes.

Tahiti Question, 1842—44. In Sept., 1842, the French Admiral Du Petit Thouars extorted a convention from Queen Pomare, by which the French assumed possession of the island of Tahiti. The question was taken up by England with great vigour. The French government professed that they did not desire the annexation, but merely the protectorate of the island. The French people were, however, most indignant. Popular feeling ran high in both countries, and it was only the moderation of the governments which preserved peace. In 1844 the two governments were once more embroiled by the indiscretion of the French officials in Tahiti. They had made themselves most unpopular in Tahiti, and on the night of the 2nd March one of their sentinels was seized and disarmed by the natives. This was made the pretext for seizing and imprisoning Mr. Pritchard, British consul, and a prominent missionary, who was peculiarly obnoxious to the Roman Catholics. He was only released on the condition of his instantly leaving the Pacific. This outrage created a profound indignation in England, and Sir R. Peel denounced it in Parliament as a gross indignity. After some months of negotiation, Sir R. Peel was able to announce that the question had been satisfactorily settled, and an indemnity given to Mr. Pritchard.

Tailbois, LADY ELIZABETH BLOUNT, was the daughter of Sir John Blount, and the wife of Sir Gilbert Tailbois, at one time Governor of Calais. She was one of Henry VIII.'s favourite mistresses, and the son whom she bore him was specially distinguished by the marks of his father's regard, being created successively Earl of Nottingham, and Duke of Richmond and Somerset.

Talavera, THE BATTLE OF (July 27 and 28, 1809), was perhaps the most important, as it certainly was one of the most hard-fought, of the earlier battles of the Peninsular War. The town of Talavera de la Reyna stands on the left bank of the Tagus, forty-two miles west of Toledo, in a small plain, which is bounded on the north and west by a range of low hills. Wellington extended his line along these hills and occupied an old ruined building, the Casa des Salinas, in the plain, while Cuesta with the Spaniards, who composed two-thirds of the allied army, was posted in front of the town on his right. Early on the 27th the British division in the Casa des Salinas was surprised by French skirmishers, but was quickly rallied by Wellington in person, and withdrawn to the hills, where they formed up behind the troops already posted there. Victor followed up his advantage, and opened a heavy fire on the position, which towards evening was suddenly attacked. The Germans, who were in advance, were completely surprised; but Donkin in the rear repulsed the attack. The French, however, seized an unoccupied eminence on his left, from which they annoyed the English until Hill by hard fighting drove them from it, just as darkness put an end to the fight. At dawn on the 28th a violent onslaught was made on the English left, but the French were driven off with a loss of 1,500 men. Both sides rested under the scorching heat of a midsummer sun; but the English were very short of supplies and were almost starving. In the afternoon the French renewed the attack, and fell on the British right, where they were quickly repulsed in confusion. Meanwhile a threatened attack on the left had been checked by a reckless charge of the dragoons, while in the centre the French were completely defeated. The English, however, were too much exhausted to pursue, and the Spaniards could not be trusted, so that Wellington only achieved the opening up of a safe retreat. He had, however, gained a reputation which was of immense value to him. "This battle," says Jomini, "recovered the glory of the successes of Marlborough, which for a century had declined. It was felt that the English infantry could contend with the best in Europe."

Tallage. In the Pipe Roll 31 of Hen. I. appears a town aid, auxilium burgi, or civilitas, which seems to answer to the Danegeld in the counties. It is set down in the roll among the ordinary receipts, and it is probable, therefore, that it was an annual payment; but how long it had been exacted it is impossible to determine. After 1163 Danegeld disappeared, but its place was taken, as far as the towns and demesne lands of the crown were concerned, by a tax described loosely as donum or assisa, but to which the term tallage came later to be definitely attached. The amount to be paid by each county and town was assessed by officers of the Exchequer in special fiscal circuits, or by the justices in eyre; in the towns themselves the civic authorities, whoever they may have been, decided how much each citizen was to pay—a power the abuse of which led to the rising in London under William Fitz-Osbert. As the king had the right of tallaging his demesne, so the barons had the right of tallaging theirs; and towns frequently declared they were liable to the royal tallaging in order to escape the heavier exactions of their lords. The Exchequer, however, succeeded in gaining a general control over these seigniorial tallages; special permission became necessary before an imposition could be made, and when escheated baronies were re-granted, it was always with the condition that tallage should only be paid to the lord when the king taxed his own demesne. As late as 1305 the king, probably to prevent opposition to the tallage imposed the year before, granted leave to the barons to tallage their own ancient demesnes as he had tallaged his. The seigniorial right was gradually bought off by the communities, and early disappears. In the Confirmation of the Charters in 1297, Edward I. promised only to renounce "aids, tasks, and prises," words which might fairly be interpreted not to include tallage from demesne lands. The document known as De Tallagio non Concedendo, in which the king expressly renounces the right of tallage, and which has been accepted by Hallam as the basis of his argument on this point, was merely an unauthoritative abstract of the original articles. After 1297 tallage was demanded three times: in 1304, in 1312—when it was objected to by London, not on account of illegality, but on the ground that the metropolis was exempted from such payments by Magna Charta—and in 1332, when, upon the remonstrance of Parliament, the commissions were withdrawn, and a tenth accepted instead. Finally, by a statute of 1340, "the real Act 'De Tallagio,'" it was enacted that the nation should no more "make any common aid or sustain charge" but by consent of Parliament—words wide enough to include all unauthorised taxation. After this date it was never exacted, though until the end of the reign the Commons were uneasy, and occasionally petitioned that it might not be imposed.

Tallage was, as Gneist observes, a natural product of feudalism. As military service became the burden of a particular class, it seemed equitable that those who were exempt should contribute by taxation to the national defence. Two causes contributed to ensure for the tallaged class in England more considerate treatment than abroad. In the first place the fyrd, or national militia, had been maintained, though partly for other purposes, so that the tallaged had weapons in their hands, with which they did good service; and secondly, the kings frequently promised not to raise the amount of tallage in order to gain an increase of the firma burgi.

Talmash, THOMAS (d. 1694), first appears as in command of the Coldstream Guards at the skirmish at Walcourt, under the Duke of Marlborough. He served under Ginkell in Ireland, and distinguished himself greatly at the siege of Athlone, and at the battle of Aghrim. When the notice of Parliament was directed to Solmes's conduct at the battle of Steinkirk, it was requested that his place might be filled by Talmash, who, next to Marlborough, was universally allowed to be the best officer in the army. He fought under William at the battle of Landen. He was soon afterwards sent in command of an expedition against Brest. The design was betrayed probably by Marlborough to James, from motives of personal jealousy. Accordingly when Talmash attempted to land he was received by a terrible fire from the French troops, and received a mortal wound, "exclaiming with his last breath that he had been a victim of treachery."

Tandy, JAMES NAPPER, a Dublin tradesman, commanded in 1782 the Phoenix Park Artillery. He was an ardent Irish "patriot," and as early as 1784 began to correspond with France. He became a member of the Whig Club, and in Nov., 1790, was secretary to the United Irishmen. In the year 1792 he had the audacity to challenge the Solicitor-General; he was arrested, escaped, and re-arrested the day before the close of the session, so that he was only in prison for a day. In 1795 he went over to America, but was in France in 1797, where he represented himself as an officer. In 1798, he, together with some other Irish rebels, followed Humbert in a small vessel, but did not arrive in Ireland till after the defeat of the French at Ballinamuck, and at once fled and reached Hamburg in safety. On Nov. 24th, however, he was delivered up to the English. France afterwards declared war on Hamburg on his account. He was tried in Ireland, but was thought much too contemptible to be made a martyr of, and was liberated after the Peace of Amiens (1802).

Tangiers, a seaport of Morocco, was taken by the Portuguese from the Moors in 1471, and ceded by them to England in 1662

as the dowry of Catherine of Braganza on her marriage with Charles II. Colonel Kirke was placed in command of the garrison. It was evacuated by the English in 1683, on account of the badness of the climate and the expense of the wars with the Mussulmans, and the works were destroyed. Tangiers subsequently became a nest of pirates, who frequently enslaved British subjects, and whom our government was not ashamed to subsidise in order to keep them quiet. During the reign of Soliman, however (1794—1822), Christian slavery was abolished and piracy suppressed.

Tanistry. THE CUSTOM OF, was partly a system of landholding and partly a law of succession. Under the Brehon code the land was regarded as belonging, in the first instance, to the people or tribe from whom the chief held it in trust. He held a portion of it as private property in virtue of his rank as a noble, had a life interest in a second portion in virtue of his office, while he possessed jurisdiction over the land of the commune. This peculiar kind of tenure was called tandistact or tanistry, but the word was more generally applied to the form of succession by which the eldest and worthiest relative was preferred to the eldest son, "as commonly the next brother or next cousin, and so forth." The idea, of course, was that a man of mature years would be able to resist aggression and administer affairs better than a minor, but as in practice it produced endless civil quarrels, it became customary for the people of the tribe or sect to elect the successor (tanaiste minor or second) in the time of the ruling chief. This law of inheritance obtained among the noble class, all the property of the inferior orders being held under the law of gavelkind (q.v.). It was from the first ignored by the English invaders, who attempted to introduce primogeniture. Strongbow, for instance, claimed the kingdom of Leinster on the ground of his marriage with Dermot's only child, Eva, but the native Irish clung tenaciously to the custom, and their rights were acknowledged more than once by the English kings. Henry III. tried to abolish it, but without success, and thence the O'Neil troubles arose. Soon after the accession of James I., however, in 1603, after a commission had been held to inquire into defective titles, tanistry, together with gavelkind, was abolished by a decision of the King's Bench in Dublin as a "lewd and damnable custom." A variation of the law of tanistry may be seen in the curious system of alternate succession by which two branches of a race shared the kingship, e.g., the kingship of Munster by the McCarthys and O'Briens.

Tanjore, THE STATE OF, was founded in the middle of the seventeenth century by Shahjee, the father of Sivajee. In 1769 it became involved in hostilities with Madras in consequence of a quarrel with Mohammed Ali of the Carnatic. The country was quickly subdued and the rajah imprisoned and the sovereignty transferred to Mohammed Ali. The Court of Directors, however, disapproved of this, and ordered that the rajah should be restored. In 1780, therefore, Lord Pigot, Governor of Madras, was ordered to restore him, and establish a Resident at his court. In 1786, on the death of the Rajah Tulfojee (who left an adopted son, Serfojee), a dispute arose as to the succession. It was asserted that Tulfojee was in a state of mental incapacity at the time of adoption, and that Serfojee was an only son, and therefore the adoption was invalid. Ameer Singh, half brother of Tulfojee, was placed on the throne. Serfojee continued to press his claim, and the misgovernment of Ameer Singh induced Sir John Shore to submit the matter to the most renowned pundits, and they declared the adoption perfectly valid. The directors thereupon ordered Lord Wellesley to place him on the throne on condition that he should accept any arrangement the government might think fit. After an exhaustive report of the condition of Tanjore, Lord Wellesley assumed the entire administration of the country (1800), giving the rajah a liberal pension.

Tankerville, FORD GREY, EARL OF (d. 1701), better known as Lord Grey of Wark, took a prominent part in the debates of 1681 as a most zealous Exclusionist; and for his supposed share in the design for insurrection was committed to the Tower, but escaped by making his keepers drunk. He fled to the Continent (1682). There he employed his influence on his friend the Duke of Monmouth to urge him to invade England. He landed at Lyme with Monmouth, and was appointed commander of the cavalry. He was driven from Bridport by the militia. He dissuaded Monmouth from abandoning the enterprise at Frome. At the battle of Sedgemoor his cavalry was easily routed by the royal troops, chiefly it is said because of his pusillanimity. He fled with Monmouth, and was taken in the New Forest. In his interview with the king he displayed great firmness, and would not stoop to ask for pardon. He was suffered to ransom himself for £40,000 and went abroad. He returned to England with William of Orange, and attempted to redeem his character by taking an active share in politics. In 1695 he was created Earl of Tankerville. He supported the Association Bill in a brilliant speech, and also spoke in favour of the bill for Fenwick's attainer. He vigorously opposed the bill for disbanding the army (1699). His political services were rewarded by the office of Lord Privy Seal (1701). But his health was broken, and later in the year he died. "His life," says Macaulay, "was so miserable that all the indignation excited by his faults is overpowered by pity."

Tantallon Castle, in Haddingtonshire, the stronghold of the Douglasses, was successfully defended (1528) against James V. by the Earl of Angus, who had, however, soon afterwards to seek an asylum in England. It was destroyed by the Covenanters in 1639.

Tantia Topee, a Mahratta Brahmin of the revolted Gwalior force (1857). He took the command, and on Nov. 28 encountered General Windham at Cawnpore with some success. In 1858 he marched to the relief of Jhansi, but was routed at the Belwah by Sir Hugh Rose. Joined by the Ranees of Jhansi he concentrated his forces at Kooneh, but was beaten utterly. He then proceeded to Gwalior and excited an insurrection against Scindia. He was beaten again by Sir H. Rose outside Gwalior, but escaped, and waged a predatory war for some time. His hiding-place was, however, betrayed; he was seized when asleep (April 7, 1859) in the jungle in Malwa, and he was tried and executed.

Tara, THE HILL OF, situated in Meath, was in ancient days the residence of the Kings of Tara. Near here on May 26, 1798, Lord Fingal, with some 400 fencibles and mounted yeomen, routed several thousands of Irish rebels, killing 350. Here, too, on Aug. 15, 1843, Daniel O'Connell held a monster meeting in support of Repeal, said to have been attended by 250,000 people.

Tara, KING OF. Till the seventh century the Ard Ri Eriind, or high king of Erin, resided in the palace of Tara. The kingdom of Meath, in which it was situated, formed his appanage. After the overthrow of the Hui Niells by Brian Boru, the position of King of Tara was held by one or another of the provincial kings; it resembled that of the Anglo-Saxon Bretwaldas. Under this over-king there was a complete hierarchy of provincial kings, princes, and nobles. The nature of the relations of these classes to each other was in most cases of the same shadowy nature as the overlordship of the King of Tara.

Taunton was in all probability a Roman station. It was of considerable importance to the kingdom of Wessex; Ina built a castle there, and it was more than once attacked by the Welsh. After the Conquest, the castle was rebuilt by the Bishops of Winchester, to whom the town and manor were granted. It first returned a member to Parliament in 1295. Taunton was held for some time by the pretender Warbeck, and during the Great Rebellion sustained a long siege under Colonel Blake against the Royalists under Goring, until relieved by Fairfax. Jeffreys held his "Bloody Assize" at Taunton after the failure of Monmouth's rebellion, the duke having previously been proclaimed king there. The charter of the borough, which was granted to it by Charles I., was taken from it by Charles II., and it remained unincorporated until after the Municipal Reform Act of 1835.

Taxation. In Anglo-Saxon times the Witan alone had the power of imposing extraordinary taxation—a power which was, however, rarely used, as the public expenditure was amply defrayed by the rents of the public lands and by the obligation of trinoda necessitas. The only instance of extraordinary taxation before the Norman Conquest was the Danegeld, a tax of two shillings on every hide of land, levied to buy off the attacks of the Danes; this tax continued to be occasionally levied down to the reign of Henry II., and under Richard was revived under the name of carucage. After the Norman Conquest, the ordinary revenue proved far too small for the wants of the king, and as a consequence we find the finance of the country occupying much of the attention of the executive, whilst by degrees it was found necessary to increase extraordinary taxation to a very large extent. Up to the reign of Henry II. the indirect taxation of the country, such as customs, was unimportant, while the extraordinary taxes, such as the Danegeld and scutage, fell only on land. In 1188, however, an important innovation was introduced in the Saladin Tithe, or the first tax on movables. This tax became very popular with succeeding kings. Under Richard I., one-fourth of their goods was demanded from every one; John levied one-seventh; and subsequent kings usually one-fifteenth. The imposition of taxes under the Norman kings had been practically at the will of the king, though the consent of the barons was often asked as a matter of form, and the exaction grew so heavy that a clause in Magna Charta provided that no extraordinary scutage or aid should be imposed by the king without the consent of the national council. The growth of representation is closely connected with the history of taxation, and it early became a recognised principle that the votes of those who were present bound those who were absent; whilst the idea that taxation required the consent of the taxed, which grew up after it became customary to tax movables, made it necessary to summon to Parliament the burgesses and clergy as well as knights and barons. The fact that we often find the different classes in the kingdom making grants of different rates is the result of the "right of self-taxation" being recognised to the extent of each class of the community determining, independently of the rest, what amount it would contribute. The lords made a separate grant. The knights voted their own quota, and the burgesses theirs, while the clergy decided for themselves the amount of their taxation. The Confirmation of the Charters by Edward I. declared that henceforth no extraordinary tax should be levied without the consent of the whole kingdom, and a like promise was made in the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo (1297). From this time the exclusive right of Parliament to impose taxation, though often infringed by the illegal exercise of prerogative, became an axiom of the constitution." In spite of this, however, Edward III., in the face of repeated remonstrances from the Commons, frequently resorted to arbitrary taxation, whilst Richard II. raised forced loans; but under the Lancastrian kings we find but few cases of illegal imposts. From Richard II. the old taxes of hidage, scutage, and tallage were replaced by subsidies. A tax imposed upon persons in respect of the reputed value of their estates in 1379—80, the imposition of a graduated poll tax, ranging from £4 to 4d., proved the immediate cause of Tyler's rebellion. Soon after this time it became customary to make a grant to each king for life at the beginning of his reign. This grant, under the name of tonnage and poundage, continued to be made until the time of Charles I. The frequent demands for money by Henry VII. and Henry VIII. caused great dissatisfaction to the people. "Taxation," says Hallam, "in the eyes of their subjects was so far from being no tyranny that it seemed the only species worth a complaint," and in 1525 the arbitrary exactions of Wolsey paved the way for his downfall. Up to 1588 it had been usual for the Commons to vote one subsidy (£70,000) and two-fifteenths on goods; but in that year two subsidies and four-fifteenths were granted, owing to the expense occasioned by the Spanish Armada, and from that date a larger number of subsidies were granted. The financial difficulties of the Stuarts led them to resort frequently to illegal imposts. In 1608, under James I., Cecil caused a Book of Rates to be issued, which laid heavy duties on merchandise, while the extortions of Charles I. led to the first article in the Petition of Right, which provides that "no person from thenceforth shall be compelled to make any loans to the king against his will, as having inherited this freedom, that he should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge not set by common consent in Parliament." Taxation under the Commonwealth was heavy, and on the abolition of feudal incidents and aids, excise and customs duties and hearth-money were granted to the king as compensation. In this reign, too, the control of the Commons over taxation was much increased by the introduction of the custom of appropriation of supplies, while at the same time the Lower House established their right of initiating all money bills. In the reign of Charles II. the clergy ceased to tax themselves in Convocation. James II. once more resorted to illegal and arbitrary taxation, and as a consequence the Bill of Rights declared that the king, amongst other things, had endeavoured to subvert the liberties of the kingdom "by levying money for and to the use of the crown by pretence of prerogative, for other time and in other manner than the same was granted by Parliament," which was illegal. From the reign of William III. the customs and excise duties gradually increased, while in 1690 a land tax of 3s. in the pound was imposed, and renewed annually. Windows, dogs, horses, and other things were taxed. In 1796 the legacy duty on personal property was imposed by Mr. Pitt, the real property tax not being imposed till 1833, and two years later the same minister taxed all incomes over £200. This tax was discontinued in 1816, but renewed by Sir Robert Peel in 1842, since which time it has continued to be levied, the rates being varied by Parliament from time to time. In 1851 the window tax was replaced by a tax imposed on houses in proportion to their rental. The first permanent tax was hearth-money, imposed in 1663, up to which time taxes had been granted for a year, or other fixed term, as occasion demanded. After the Revolution, however, permanent duties increased. "These duties," says Sir Erskine May, "were generally granted as a security for loans, and the financial policy of permanent taxes increased with the national debt, and the extension of public credit." At the present day the power of taxation remains as it was in the days of Lord Chatham, who said—"Taxation is no part of the governing or legislative power. The taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone." [ASSESSMENT; CUSTOMS; EXCISE; RATES; REVENUE.]

Taylor, JEREMY, Bishop of Dromore, and of Down and Connor (b. 1613, d. 1667), after being educated at Oxford was made chaplain to Laud in 1637, and in 1638 was appointed rector of Uppingham. Deprived of his living by the rebellion, he retired to Wales and opened a school at Carmarthen, and afterwards became chaplain to the Earl of Carberry. During the Protectorate he was twice imprisoned, in Chepstow Castle and the Tower. In 1658 he went to Ireland, and in 1661 received the bishopric of Down and Connor. Taylor was the author of numerous works on theology and morals, some of which have enjoyed extraordinary popularity.

Jeremy Taylor's Works were edited by Bishop Heber, 15 vols., 1822.

Taylor, ROWLAND (d. Feb., 1555), was vicar of Hadleigh in Suffolk, to which living he was presented by Archbishop Cranmer in 1544. He was condemned by Bishop Gardiner and a tribunal composed of the Bishops of London, Norwich, Salisbury, and Durham for his Protestantism; and on refusing to recant was burnt at Hadleigh, Feb. 8, 1555. Foxe, who gives an affecting account of Taylor's martyrdom, says of him, that "he was a right perfect divine and parson."

Tea Duties, THE, were first imposed in 1660. In 1772 the East India Company, being in pecuniary difficulties, were allowed by Parliament to export their teas from London warehouses to America free from English duties, and liable only to a small duty to be levied in the colony. Although by this arrangement the colonists got their tea cheaper than they would otherwise have done, they looked upon it as a mere bribe to induce them to consent to the right of England to tax America. Accordingly it was resolved to resist the imposition of the duty, and when the tea-ships arrived at Boston on Dec., 1773, they were boarded by men disguised as Indians, and their cargoes thrown overboard. This was one of the incidents which ultimately led to the American War. In England the East India Company retained its monopoly until its extinction in 1834. In 1836 new duties were imposed; these were at first 2s. 1d. in the pound, but they were reduced to 1s. 6d. in 1857, and to 6d. in 1865.

Tea-room Party, THE (1867). On April the 8th a meeting was held in the tea-room of the House of Commons of between forty and fifty members of the Liberal party. At this meeting it was decided that the persons composing it should unite for the purpose of limiting the instructions, to be proposed by Mr. Coleridge with regard to the powers of the committee sitting on the Reform Bill, to the first clause of his resolution, which applied to the law of rating. This was notified to Mr. Gladstone, who consented to it. Mr. Disraeli accepted the altered resolution, and the House went into committee on the bill. Thereupon Mr. Gladstone gave notice of several important amendments, which Mr. Disraeli declared to be the relinquished instructions in another form, and distinctly announced that if they should be carried the government would not proceed with the bill. As most of the members of the tea-room party held together, the government triumphed by a majority of twenty-one on the first division.

Telegraphs, THE PURCHASE OF THE. In 1868 the government ventured on the bold step of acquiring possession of all the lines of electric telegraph in the United Kingdom, and making the control of communication by electricity a part of the general business of the Post Office.

Templars, THE, or the Order of Knights of the Temple of Jerusalem, was a military religious order of knighthood which had its origin in 1118 in an association of knights for the protection of pilgrims to the Holy Land. They did good service in the Crusades, for which they were rewarded with ample grants of land in different countries—England among the rest. After the final conquest of Palestine by the Mohammedans the Templars returned to Europe, where their pride and licentiousness excited considerable odium. Philip the Fair of France determined on their suppression, and obtained the co-operation of his son-in-law Edward II. In England the order was suppressed in 1308 without the great cruelties practised in France. The knights were allowed to enter monasteries, and their possessions given to the Hospitallers, or Knights of St. John.

Temple, RICHARD GRENVILLE, EARL (b. 1711, d. 1773), was the elder brother of George Grenville, and was elected, in 1734, by the help of family interest, to represent the town of Buckingham, but in all subsequent elections was returned for the county. In 1752 he succeeded to the earldom, and four years later Pitt, who had married his sister, gave him a place in his administration as First Lord of the Admiralty. In the following April he was summarily dismissed by the king, and Pitt's dismissal followed within a few days. Pitt, however, was recalled, and Lord Temple became Lord Privy Seal, which post he retained until Pitt's resignation in Oct., 1761, when he too withdrew. Lord Temple violently attacked Bute's government, and more especially made himself conspicuous by the very open support which he gave to Wilkes. Like many other peers, he incurred on this account the king's displeasure, and was dismissed from the Lord Lieutenancy of Bucks. In 1766 he broke with Pitt on the question of the Stamp Act, Lord Temple upholding his brother's policy while Pitt was bent on obtaining its repeal. And he went further, by refusing to accept office under Pitt in 1766, not wishing to be "stuck into a ministry as great cypher." Not content with his own refusal, he proceeded to direct a fierce paper war against the brother-in-law whom he dared not encounter in the House of Peers. A reconciliation, however, took place between "the three brothers" on Lord Chatham's retirement in 1768. But Lord Temple's cherished hopes of a family cabinet were doomed to disappointment. His brother George died in 1770; and in the same year Lord North began his long reign. Thenceforth Lord Temple took but an intermittent interest in political affairs, now and then actively opposing the ministry. On the subject of reconciliation with America he took the same view as Lord Chatham, deprecating any thought of admitting the independence of America. But his last gleam of ambition faded with Lord Chatham's death; Lord Temple retired to Stowe, and in the following year died by a fall from his horse. Lord Temple cannot boast a high reputation among the statesmen of George III., nor probably would he have occupied any niche in history at all, had it not been for his able brother, and still abler brother-in-law, to both of whom, at different times, for his own selfish ends, he acted as an evil genius. "It was his nature," says Macaulay, "to grub underground. Whenever a heap of dirt was flung up, it might well be suspected that he was at work in some foul crooked labyrinth below." Temple, however, was certainly a man of decided ability. He has been suspected, not without some reason, of being the author of the Letters of Junius.

Temple, SIR WILLIAM (b. 1628, d. 1699), was the son of Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls in Ireland, and after being educated at Cambridge, and having spent some years in foreign travel, he returned to Ireland, becoming in 1660 a member of the Irish Convention. In 1665 he was first employed on diplomatic business, being sent as an envoy to the Bishop of Munster, and the year following he was appointed ambassador to the Court of Brussels, and devoted himself to endeavouring to form an alliance between England and Holland. His exertions were crowned in 1668 by the formation of the Triple Alliance against France, and the consequent peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. But the policy he had inaugurated was short-lived, and the Treaty of Dover (q.v.) made it necessary for the ministers to dismiss the author of the Triple Alliance, and he was relieved of his office in 1671. On the fall of the Cabal ministry Temple was offered by Danby, who became Lord Treasurer, a Secretaryship of State, but he refused this, and was appointed ambassador at the Hague. In 1675 he took an important part in the Congress of Nimeguen. In 1679 Danby was impeached, and sent to the Tower, and Charles looked to Temple as the only man who could help him to weather the storm caused by the Popish Plot. Temple's proposal was that a means should be adopted for including all parties in the government, and for this purpose proposed that the existing Privy Council should be dissolved, and that a new Privy Council of thirty members should be appointed, half of whom to be great officers of state, and the other half independent noblemen and gentlemen of the greatest weight in the country: that the king should pledge himself to govern by the constant advice of this body, to suffer all his affairs of every kind to be freely dilated there, and not to reserve any part of the public business for a secret committee. An attempt was made to carry out this scheme, but it was soon found to be unworkable. The council was too large for practical purposes, and there was no party tie to bind the members together, and before long an interior cabinet was found, consisting of Temple, Halifax, Essex, and Sunderland. Temple himself, however, was gradually ousted from the debates of the secret committee. In 1681 he retired from public life, and devoted himself chiefly to literary work. His chief works were his well-known Essays, an Account of the United Provinces, and an Essay on Government. Lord Macaulay says—"He was no profound thinker. He was merely a man of lively parts and quick observation, a man of the world among men of letters, a man of letters among men of the world. But neither as a writer, nor as a statesman, can we allot to him any very high place." Other writers have formed a higher estimate of Temple, whose skill as a diplomatist was certainly very considerable.

Tenant-right, THE IRISH, is a custom by which the tenant is entitled not only to compensation for unexhausted improvements when he relinquishes his holding, but by which a sum is paid, sometimes amounting to as much as the fee-simple of the land, by the incoming to the outgoing tenant for the goodwill of the farm. This tenant-right, known as the Ulster custom, was legalised by the Land Act of 1870, and extended to the rest of Ireland by the Act of 1881. It is supposed to have arisen at the time of the plantation of Ulster (q.v.), the planters refusing to give definite leases of twenty-one years to their English and Scotch tenants, and they in disgust selling their interest in the holdings, and the value of their capital to the native Irish—a practice which was in direct contravention to the spirit of the settlement. Other systems of tenure which obtain in Ireland are: the cottier system, by which tenants bid against each other for a piece of land, no fixity of tenure being recognised until the Act of 1881; and conacre, a feudal survival, by which land is granted to the tenant rent-free in return for so much labour.

Tenchebrai, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 28, 1106), was fought between Henry I. and his brother Robert, and resulted in the complete victory of Henry, who captured and imprisoned Robert, and annexed Normandy to his dominions.

Tenterden, CHARLES ABBOTT, LORD (b. 1762, d. 1832), was the son of a hair-dresser. He was educated at King's School, Canterbury, and at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1795.

His treatise on the Law of Merchant Ships and Seamen (1802) was recognised as the standard work on its subject. Owing to the weakness of his health he refused a seat on the bench in 1808, but in 1816 he was made a puisne judge in the Common Pleas. In 1818, on the retirement of Lord Ellenborough, he became Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and though a vigorous Tory, he never allowed his political sympathies to colour his judgments. He was raised to the peerage in 1827.

Test Act, THE (1673), was a measure passed in the reign of Charles II., and was intended to exclude from office the Catholic councillors of the king. It was passed at the instance of Shaftesbury and the country party after the king had been compelled to abandon his attempt to dispense with the penal laws against Dissenters. It required all persons holding any office of profit or trust under the crown to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, receive the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England, and subscribe the declaration against transubstantiation. This Act was directed against the Catholics, but was equally operative against Dissenters. One consequence of it was that Arlington and Clifford had to retire from office, and the Duke of York was obliged to resign his post as Lord High Admiral. It was not repealed until 1828.

Ranke, Hist. of Eng.

Test Act, THE, for Scotland (1681) imposed an oath which was made compulsory on all government and municipal officials. It declares a belief in "the true Protestant religion contained in the Confession of Faith," and disowns "all practices, whether popish or fanatic, which are contrary to or inconsistent with the said Protestant religion and Confession of Faith."

Tewkesbury, THE BATTLE OF (May 4, 1471), was, strictly speaking, the last battle fought in the Wars of the Roses, for the Battle of Bosworth can hardly be included in those wars. Queen Margaret landed in England the very day that Warwick was defeated and slain at Barnet, but despite this severe blow to the Lancastrian cause, she was persuaded by Somerset and other lords of her party to continue her advance. She had landed at Weymouth, and at first marched westward to Exeter, where she was joined by reinforcements from Devon and Cornwall. She then moved eastward to Bath, but learning that Edward was marching against her, she determined to march to the north, where the chief strength of the Lancastrians lay. After a tedious march she reached Tewkesbury on May 3, and the next day Edward gave battle. The Lancastrians were utterly routed, owing in no small degree to the treachery or folly of Lord Wenlock, who neglected to bring up the reinforcements in time. Queen Margaret was taken prisoner, and her son, Prince Edward, either fell in the battle, or, more probably, was put to death immediately after. The Duke of Somerset and others, who had taken sanctuary, were beheaded two days after in the market-place at Tewkesbury. This decisive battle coming so soon after the victory of Barnet completely established Edward IV. on the throne.

Warkworth, Chronicle; Hall, Chronicles.

Tewkesbury Chronicle. THE, was compiled by more than one hand during the thirteenth century, and kept in the Abbey of Tewkesbury, whence it passed to the Cotton collection in the British Museum. It begins with the death of Edward the Confessor, and ends abruptly in 1263. The first part is very meagre, and it is not until after 1200 that it becomes adequate. These annals are chiefly concerned with monastic events, such as ecclesiastical suits, but the war between Henry III. and the Barons is treated very fully.

The Chronicle has been published, under the editorship of Mr. Luard, in vol. I. of the Annales Monastici, in the Rolls series.

Thanet. THE ISLE OF, in the north-east of Kent, is still partly surrounded by the sea and the river Stour, but the passage called the Wantsum, which formerly separated it from the mainland, has been closed since the fifteenth century. It was called by the Britons Ruin, or the headland. As might be expected from its position the island has frequently been the landing-place for invaders of England. It was there that the mythical heroes, Hengest and Horsa, are said to have disembarked in 449, and it was the starting-point of more than one Danish invasion. Indeed, those buccaners seem to have held part of the island from 853 to 865, and it was frequently subject to their raids. Several parishes in the isle of Thanet formed part of the Liberty of Dover.

Thegn was an Anglo-Saxon title bestowed on a class of persons who were inferior to the eorlas and athel, the original nobility of blood, though superior to the ordinary landowners or ceorls. The meaning seems to be originally equivalent to cir, miles; the word does not seem to be connected, as has been often supposed, with diener, to serve. But in the earlier times the thegns were, in fact, a nobility of service, and it is scarcely possible to distinguish them from the king's gesiths—that is, the members of his "comitatus," or personal following. Gradually, however, this characteristic of the thegn is lost sight of, and he is a landowner having a larger quantity of land than the ceorl—that is, five hides and upwards. From the end of the ninth century we scarcely hear of the gesith.

The word thegn comes to include, on the one hand, those who stand in ministerial relation to the king; and on the other, those who are simply landowners, having the necessary qualifications, whether they were connected with the king or not. In fact, any ceorl who acquired five hides of land became "thegn-worthy." Among the thegns themselves there were numerous gradations in rank. The "king's thegn" is superior to the ordinary territorial thegn; and it would seem that the possession of forty hides of land entitled a thegn to the wergild and status of an earl. The wergild of the ordinary thegn was six times that of the ceorl, namely, twelve hundred shillings instead of two hundred. The dignity of thegn was hereditary, and the "thegn-born" are a semi-noble class, contrasting with the "ceorl-born." "The name of thegn," says Bishop Stubbs, "covers the whole class which, after the Conquest, appears under the name of knights," and thus it was that many of the thegns passed easily and naturally into the knightly order under the Norman kings.

Thelusson's Case (decided in 1868), was of considerable importance, since it settled the question whether testators could dispose of their estates so that the income should accumulate and form a large fortune, which should be limited in favour of certain descendants. The litigation arising out of the will of Mr. Thelusson lasted for nearly fifty years, and eventually the House of Lords decided that trusts for accumulation were legal. However, by the Act 39 and 40 George III. c. 98 it was provided that incomes should not be allowed to accumulate in this way for more than twenty-one years.

Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury (1139—1161), was Abbot of Bec, in Normandy, and in 1138 came over to England at the invitation of King Stephen, by whose influence he was elected Archbishop of Canterbury. His authority was, however, weakened by the fact that there was a papal legate in England at the time, and that subsequently Henry of Blois, Bishop of Winchester, was invested with legatine authority. In 1148 Theobald, contrary to the command of Stephen, attended a papal council at Rheims, and joined in deposing William, the king's nephew, from the Archbishopric of York. In 1150 Theobald was appointed legate by the Pope. Throughout the troublous reign of Stephen, Theobald remained loyal to the king, and strongly advocated the compromise with Henry of Anjou as the best means of putting an end to anarchy and bloodshed. As a patron of learning Theobald occupies an interesting position, and still more important is it that it was as his secretary that Becket first came into prominence. Theobald was not a man of marked ability, but he was loyal, generous, and earnest in striving to do his duty.

Theodore of Tarsus (b. 603, d. 690), Archbishop of Canterbury (669—690), was Greek by birth, whom Pope Vitalian selected for the see of Canterbury on the death of the archbishop-elect, Wighard, at Rome. Theodore is an important personage in the history of the English Church, for he it was who organised the Church, developed the Episcopal system, and drew up the famous Penitential, which was the recognised text-book of confessors for many years. He did much to encourage learning, and was the first to introduce the study of Greek into England. His work is well summed up by Dean Hook in one sentence—"He converted what had been a missionary station into an established Church." He was the last of the Roman bishops; henceforth they were English.

Theological Controversy, THE, held in Westminster Abbey, March, 1559, was the name given to a discussion nominally intended to settle certain questions of doctrine and ritual; but it had been determined beforehand by the Protestant party that the discussion should be in their favour, and that no decision should be arrived at. The subjects of controversy were:—

1. The use of prayer in a tongue unknown to the people.

2. The right of local churches to change their ceremonies if the edification of the people required it.

3. The propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and dead said to be offered in the mass.

The champions of Catholicism were Bishops White, Baynes, Scot, and Watson, Archdeacon Langdale, Chedsey, the chaplain of Bishop Bonner, and Harpsfeld. The Protestants were Scory, Grindal, Coxe, Whitehead, Aylmer, Horne, Guest, and Jewel.

Theow was the Anglo-Saxon name for a slave. There were various kinds of slaves—the born slave, i.e., the child of slave parents; the captive, often a Briton; the voluntary slave, who sold himself to avoid starvation; the man who was sold into slavery because he could not pay his debts, or the fine for a breach of the peace. Nominally the slaves were the goods and chattels of their lords, who had power of life and death over them; they had no legal rights, and no wergild. But in practice the theow had recognised rights. He was entitled to regular food and holiday, and any ill-treatment of him by his lord was punished by the Church. In addition to this he might purchase his own freedom with his savings, or he might be manumitted by his lord. After the Conquest the slaveclass ceases to exist, and is merged with the lower ceorl into the general class of villeins.

Thirlby, THOMAS (d. 1570), Bishop of Westminster, Norwich, and Ely, one of the commissioners at Gravelines in 1545, was sent in 1553, in conjunction with Sir Philip Hoby, to Brussels on a mission to the Emperor Charles V. Under Mary he took an active part in the persecution of the Reformers in 1558; was sent, with two other commissioners, to settle the preliminaries of peace with France. He refused to take the oath of supremacy to Elizabeth, and was deposed, though he was treated with great kindness by Archbishop Parker.

Thirty, THE BATTLE OF THE (March 27, 1350), was the name given to an engagement between the English partisans of Montfort and the Breton followers of Charles of Blois. It was fought at Ploermel in Brittany, and by agreement the number of combatants was limited to thirty on either side. The English were defeated.

Thistlewood, ARTHUR (b. 1770, d. 1820), started in life originally with some fortune as a subaltern officer, first in the militia, and then in a regiment of the line, stationed in the West Indies. After having resigned his commission, and spent some time in America, he passed into France, where he arrived shortly after the fall of Robespierre. There he formed revolutionary opinions. He was deeply implicated in the scheme of Dr. Watson, but was, like him, acquitted. He then sent a challenge to Lord Sidmouth, for which he was punished by fine and imprisonment. Upon his liberation (Aug., 1819), he found himself excluded from respectable society, without resources or hopes. The natural violence of his disposition was stimulated by this, and aided by a number of individuals equally desperate, he planned the Cato Street Conspiracy (q.v.) for which he was executed, glorying in his attempt and regretting its failure.

Thom was a broken-down brewer who had gone mad. In 1837 he appeared in Canterbury and various parts of Kent, styling himself Sir William Courtenay, of Powderham Castle, Knight of Malta, King of Jerusalem, and various other titles. He was confined in a lunatic asylum, but was subsequently released. When he came out he announced himself as a second Messiah to the peasants, and succeeded in impressing himself on their excited imaginations by denouncing the new Poor Law, which was then intensely hated and feared. He asserted that he had come to regenerate the whole world and save his followers from the new Poor Law. He assembled a mob and led them against Canterbury. His followers proceeded to violence, and he himself shot a policeman. Two companies of soldiers came out from Canterbury to disperse the rioters. Thom shot the officer, and his followers charged with such fury that for a moment the troops gave way. Then they recovered, and poured in a volley which destroyed the insurrection and put an end to Thom's life, and those of many of his adherents. Several of his followers were tried and convicted of murder. But long after his fall people in many parts of Kent believed in Thom's pretensions, and looked to his future return on earth.

Thorough was a phrase used by Strafford and Laud in their correspondence, to describe the spirit of their policy. It signified "the resolute determination of going through with it, as it might nowadays be expressed, of disregarding and overriding the interested delays and evasions of those who made the public service an excuse for enriching themselves at the public expense, or the dry technical arguments of the lawyers, which would hinder them in their schemes for the public good" (Gardiner). "For the state, indeed," writes Laud, "I am for thorough; but I see that both thick and thin stays somebody, where I conceive it should not. . . . I am confident that the king being pleased to set himself in the business, is able by his wisdom and ministers, to carry any just and honourable action, thorough all imaginary opposition, for real there can be none." "Thorough" and "through" are the same word, and were, in the seventeenth century, both spelt in the same way.

Thorpe, THOMAS (d. 1461), was made a baron of the Exchequer about 1453, and in the same year was Speaker of the House of Commons. In the next year he was imprisoned at the instance of the Duke of York, who brought a suit against him. The Commons thereupon claimed their privilege, and appealed to the Lords, who referred the question to the judges. The judges declared that they were unable to decide on the privileges of Parliament, but that it was usual that persons should not be prevented by imprisonment from attending Parliament. But the Duke of York was now in the ascendant, and the Lords decided that Thorpe should stay in prison, the privilege of Parliament notwithstanding. On the king's recovery he was released, and restored to his office. In 1460 he was taken prisoner in the battle of Northampton, and was the next year beheaded by the Yorkists. Thorpe's case is reported in the history of Parliamentary privilege.

Hallam, Hist. of Eng.

Three-cornered Constituencies, are boroughs, counties, or county divisions, which are represented by three members. In these constituencies by an amendment proposed by Lord Cairns in the House of Lords, and eventually incorporated in the Reform Bill of 1867, no elector is allowed to vote for more than two candidates. This clause was intended to afford some representation to minorities. It has been frequently defeated by means of careful organisation which has enabled one party to carry all the three candidates.

Throgmorton, FRANCIS (d. 1583), the son of Sir John Throgmorton, and the nephew of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, was concerned in the Spanish plots for the release of Mary Queen of Scots. He was arrested (1583) on the evidence of an intercepted letter written to the Scottish Queen by Morgan, stating that the Duke of Guise was ready to invade England. He was racked three times without effect, but on the fourth occasion made a confession, implicating the Spanish ambassador, Mendoza. This confession he subsequently declared to be false, but he was nevertheless executed; and although the evidence at the trial was insufficient, it is probable that he was really guilty of treason.

Throgmorton, SIR NICHOLAS (b. 1513, d. 1571), the son of Sir George Throgmorton, who incurred the displeasure of Henry VIII. by refusing to take the oath of supremacy, first comes into notice during the Scotch campaign of Somerset (1547), in which he greatly distinguished himself. In 1554 he was implicated in the rebellion of Sir Thomas Wyatt, but was acquitted on his trial as there was barely sufficient evidence to convict him of having been an active accomplice. His trial is noticeable from the fact that the jurors were imprisoned and heavily fined for their verdict. After the accession of Elizabeth, Throgmorton was restored to favour at court, and in 1559 was sent to France as ambassador, where he took an active part in the conspiracy against the Guises. His alliance with the Huguenot party, and his advice to them to proceed to violent measures, caused his imprisonment by the Duke of Guise in the Castle of St. Germain as "the author of all our troubles." He was one of the strongest opponents of the proposed marriage of Elizabeth with the Earl of Leicester. In 1561, in his capacity of ambassador, he was employed to demand the ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh from Mary Stuart. In 1565 Throgmorton was sent to Scotland to protest against the marriage of the Queen of Scots with Lord Darnley, and gave Mary Stuart, whose cause he warmly espoused, much advice as to the most politic course of action to pursue. Two years later he was again sent to Edinburgh to negotiate with the rebel lords for the queen's release, and is said by his representations to have saved her life at Lochleven. In 1569 he was arrested and sent to the Tower for being implicated in the plot to bring about a marriage between Mary Stuart, whose partisan he always remained, and the Duke of Norfolk. He obtained his release in a short time, but never regained the queen's favour, and died, as some say, of poison administered by Leicester.

Thugs, THU, were an Indian fraternity of hereditary assassins who subsisted on the plunder of the victims they strangled. They generally attached themselves, as if by accident, to the travellers whom they met, and then at a convenient spot strangled them and buried the bodies in a pit hastily dug with a pickaxe which had been consecrated by religious ceremonies. They were bound to secrecy by oath, and had peculiar signs for recognising one another, and a slang language of their own. They considered themselves the especial favourites of Doorga the goddess of thieves and murderers, and celebrated her rites with the most scrupulous piety. The gang was recruited by children kidnapped for the purpose, and cautiously initiated into the arcana of their society. Their victims were counted by thousands annually, and no district was free from their ravages. Lord William Bentinck determined to suppress these ruffians, and, in 1830, organised a regular department presided over by Major Sleeman. An elaborate system was worked out. Every inducement was offered to informers; and in six years more than 2,000 Thugs were arrested and condemned to transportation or death. The confederacy was effectually broken up, and travelling in India ceased to be dangerous. These efforts were crowned by the establishment of a school at Jubbulpore for the Thugs who had turned informers and the children of convicted offenders.

Thurocytel, or THURKELL THE TALL, was one of the leaders of the Danish buccaneering community of Iona. Thurkell, when that community was broken up, came with fifty ships of his pirate followers to England at Lammas, 1009, in alliance with Sweyn, and lay at Greenwich. After plundering a great part of England in concert with the Danish king (1010 and 1011), and extorting large sums from the English, Canterbury was betrayed to them by Elfinar. They sacked the city and captured the Archbishop Alphege (Ælfheah), who was murdered by the drunken pirates at a moot on Easter Saturday, 1012, for refusing to pay ransom for himself. He now, with forty-five ships and their crews, having received the £8,000 agreed on with Ethelred, went over to the English service, and helped to defend London against Sweyn in 1013. When the English resolved to forsake Ethelred, it was in Thurkell's ships that the exiled king was carried to Normandy. In 1014 he seems to have been still in Ethelred's pay; but he joined Canute against Edmund Ironside before the battle of Assandun, where he is said to have slain Wulfcytel, the alderman of East England, thus revenging a brother whom Wulfcytel had killed in battle some years back. He was installed in Wulfcytel's aldermanship by Canute in 1017, was outlawed in 1021, reinstated in the king's favour in 1023, and sent to act as regent in Denmark, where he died not long afterwards.

Thurlow, EDWARD, BARON THURLOW (b. 1732, d. 1806), was born in Norfolk, the son of the Rev. Thomas Thurlow. He was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, from which he was sent down in 1751 without taking a degree. He at once entered at the Inner Temple. In 1758 he gained some reputation by his spirited conduct towards Sir Fletcher Norton, who was opposed to him in a case. In 1761 he was retained in the Douglas case, and thereby made the acquaintance of Lord Bute, who in 1761 gave him silk. From this time his practice increased, till in 1768 he was returned to Parliament in the Tory interest for Tamworth. He conducted the case of the plaintiff in the Douglas cause with great success; and the next year, after fiercely denying the legality of Wilkes's election for Middlesex, was appointed Solicitor-General. In 1771 he became Attorney-General, and urged the committal of Oliver and Crosby to the Tower in the matter of Junius's letters. In this affair he displayed a bitterness which was still more conspicuous throughout the debates on the American war. "Of all the orators on the government side he was the most violent and exasperating." In 1778 he was appointed Lord Chancellor. "In this office," says Lord Campbell, "he was above all taint or suspicion of corruption, and in his general rudeness he was very impartial; but he was not patient and painstaking, and he did little in settling controverted questions or establishing general principles." In the meantime he still warmly advocated the prosecution of the American war; and, being taunted by the Duke of Grafton on the humbleness of his origin, he made so crushing a retort that he at once became supreme in the House of Lords. The next year, perceiving that the ministry could not last much longer, he began to coquet with the opposition, and was rewarded by being continued in the chancellorship by the Marquis of Rockingham. Far, however, from assisting the new government, he acted as the leader of the "King's Friends," and opposed all the government measures, among others Burke's proposal for economical reform. In spite of his conduct, Lord Shelburne, on succeeding Rockingham, still retained him as chancellor; but on the formation of the Coalition the Great Seal was put into commission. His deposition notwithstanding, "he was still keeper of the king's conscience," and did the king's pleasure in bitterly opposing every government measure. He was again rewarded by being appointed Lord Chancellor by Pitt in 1784, and now appeared as an advocate of a commercial union with Ireland, which he had formerly opposed. In 1787 he presided at the trial of Warren Hastings. The next year he opposed the bill for mitigating the horrors of the Middle Passage. When the king became ill, Lord Thurlow entered into intrigues with Carlton House and the opposition, in order to make his position secure in case of a regency. But Pitt did not fail to discover the manœuvres of his chancellor, and withdrew his confidence. Already, in 1791, Lord Grenville had supplanted Thurlow as leader in the House of Lords, and Pitt decided to dismiss him from his office in May, 1792. For a few years he retired to indulge his chagrin in seclusion; but in 1795 he opened negotiations with the Whigs and the Prince of Wales, and posed as a champion of the rights of the people in his opposition to the Treason and Sedition Bills. Tired of this, he took up the cause of the Princess of Wales, and intrigued to obtain for her a separation from her husband. But all his efforts failed of success; and in 1798, seeing no chance of overthrowing Pitt, he quitted public life, and remained in retirement till the resignation of Pitt in 1801. Then his hopes brightened again, but they were doomed to be disappointed. His day was past, and on Sept. 12, 1806, he died. His appearance and manner in Parliament has been thus described: he was "blunt, coarse, and vigorous, hurled hard words and strong epithets at his opponents in a tremendous voice, with a look and tone of defiance." "Of statesmanship he himself declared that he knew very little;" and, says Lord Stanhope, "It must be owned that his private life by no means eminently qualified him to stand forth as the champion of any Church or creed."

Thurot, INVASION OF. Thurot, an Irishman, who had adopted a French name, and commanded in the French navy, became the terror of English merchant ships during the Seven Years' War. In 1760, with a small armament, he appeared before Carrickfergus, landed 1,000 men, and plundered the town. On Feb. 28, 1760, however, he was overtaken on his way back to France by Capt. Elliot with three frigates, his ships were taken, and he himself killed.

of Charles II.'s favourites. He at first attached himself to the Duke of York's party, but subsequently joined Monmouth. In 1667 he was employed to negotiate peace with the Dutch. In 1682 he was assassinated in the streets of London by three ruffians hired for the purpose by Count Königsmark.

Tichbourne, CHIDROCK, one of the conspirators in the Babington Plot, and one of the six specially told off to murder the queen. He was executed at Tyburn (Sept., 1516).

Tierney, GEORGE (b. 1761, d. 1830), was of Irish descent, but was born at Gibraltar, where his father was a wealthy prize-agent. He was sent to Eton and afterwards to Cambridge. He entered Parliament for Colchester in 1796, and joined the opposition, and very soon became one of Pitt's most formidable opponents. In May, 1798, he called Pitt out for using language of an insulting character about him; but nothing came of the meeting, which took place on Putney Heath. When Fox seceded from Parliament in 1798, Tierney became the leader of the opposition under Addington. Tierney became Treasurer of the Navy in 1803, and a member of the Privy Council, but withdrew on Pitt's resumption of office. In the Talents Administration he became Irish Secretary. He was the constant supporter of Whitbread on the subject of the Continental War, and forsook his party in 1814, when on the escape of Napoleon from Elba, the Whigs, as a body, sided with the ministry in thinking it necessary to renew the war. On all questions of finance he was a great authority, having studied the question with zealous industry. On Ponsonby's death, Tierney became the recognised leader of the Whigs in the House of Commons. He opposed, as was natural, the proceedings against Queen Caroline, though a just appreciation of both sides of the case prevented him from being carried away into any enthusiastic admiration of the queen. On Canning's becoming Prime Minister, Tierney was made Master of the Mint. He retired with Lord Goderich in Jan., 1828.

Tilbury, GERVASE OF (d. circa 1210), an Englishman by birth, was a favourite of the Emperor Otto IV., by whom he was made marshal of the kingdom of Arles. Probably at the request of the Emperor, he wrote a work entitled Otia Imperialia, in which, among much miscellaneous information, are some interesting particulars relating to the history of England, especially in the reign of John.

Tilney, CHARLES, one of the conspirators in the Babington Plot, was arrested in London. He was accused by Savage of having been one of the six selected to murder the queen, and was executed at Tyburn (Sept., 1586).

Tippoo Sultan (b. 1749, d. 1799), was the son of Hyder Ali, founder of the Mohammedan kingdom of Mysore. He acted under his father during the first Mysore war, and on the death of the latter carried it out successfully, finally concluding the treaty of Mangalore (1784) with the English. He devoted himself to converting his subjects to Mohammedanism, reformed his army, and established foundries for cannon and other arms at Seringapatam. In 1786-7 he was engaged in a war with the Mahrattas and the Nizam, which originated in an aggression of his on the district of Kurnool. In 1789, enraged by the agreement of Lord Cornwallis with the Nizam, and at the same time inspired with courage by the evident fear in which he was held, in spite of the threats of the English, he attacked the state of Travancore, an English ally. This conduct produced the second Mysore war, the defeat of Tippoo at Arikera (May, 1791), and his submission and the limitation of his power and territory by the treaty of Seringapatam. He now engaged in a vast series of intrigues through India and even Europe for the destruction of the English, in which Scindia, the Peishwa, Zemaun Shah of Afghanistan, the French troops of the Nizam, and France were included, and which was considerably facilitated by the policy of Sir John Shore, and the defeat of the Nizam in the Kurdlah campaign. The result of Tippoo's intrigues was the issue of a proclamation (1798) by M. Malartie, French governor of the Mauritius, which revealed the whole plot while it was as yet incomplete. Lord Wellesley was able therefore to complete his preparations, and begin the war while Tippoo was unprepared. The result was the capture of Seringapatam, the death of the Sultan, and the extinction of the Mohammedan kingdom of Mysore by the two treaties of Mysore (1799).

Tithes. Payment of tithes was first made compulsory in England by decrees of the legatine councils of 787, which were attended by kings and secular magnates, and so had the authority of witenagemots. The Danes who settled in England were rendered liable to tithe by the "laws of Edward and Guthrum;" and Athelstan issued a special ordinance to the sheriffs for the payment of tithe over the whole kingdom: the Donation of Ethelwulf, often regarded as the foundation of the tithe system, had nothing to do with it. Though the bishop was recognised as the proper receiver and distributor of tithes, landowners were able to pay them to whom they pleased; and it was not till the decretal of Innocent III. in 1200, that it became the rule to pay them to the parson of the parish. Tithes were chiefly praedial—on corn, grass, hops, wood, or mixed—on wool, milk, pigs. Archbishop Winchelsea and the provincial councils of the thirteenth century failed to bring about the general payment of personal tithes (on the profits of handicrafts, commerce, etc.), and these continued to be very exceptional. Another division of tithes is into greater on corn, hay, and wood, and small, which were usually handed over to the vicar when the benefice belonged to a monastery. Tithes appropriated by monasteries passed at the dissolution to lay impropriators. The Long Parliament ordered the continuance of tithes by ordinances of 1644 and 1647; and Cromwell thought them necessary for the maintenance of the ministry. By the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, tithes were commuted into rent-charges, annually adjusted to the average price of corn; and they may be redeemed at not less than twenty-five times their average amount.

Tithes in Ireland were not levied from grassland, thus leaving only the small Catholic tenants to bear the chief burden; in Munster especially great sums were extracted from the wretched peasantry by the tithe proctors, and the clergy itself received but little of it. The Whiteboys in part rose in opposition to tithes, and in 1787 two bills—the Insurrection Acts (q.v.), which enabled the clergy to secure tithes by a civil bill without a jury—had to be passed. In 1823 the question of tithes again became prominent. In 1824 an attempt was made to do away with the obvious injustice of tithes, and with some success; by this Act grasslands were no longer to be exempted. In 1830 great disorders amounting to what was called the "tithe war" arose from the collection of tithe, and in 1832 the Lord Lieutenant was authorised to advance £60,000 to the starving clergy. The government now, with the assistance of the military, tried to levy the tithe itself, but could only collect £12,000 out of £100,000 which were due. In 1833 the government gave up the attempt to enforce tithes, and Parliament again granted a million for the destitute clergy. An attempt was now made to substitute a land-tax for the tithe, but in 1833 and 1834 the government failed in their effort, O'Connell (q.v.) threatening the landlords with a crusade against rent if the land-tax, or, in other words, the tithes, formed part of it. The government then agreed to accept O'Connell's own plan, including a reduction of 40 per cent.; the rest was to be provided for by a redeemable land-tax. On the question, however, of what was to be done with the money thus accruing, a contest took place between the Whigs and the House of Lords, the former being in favour of the appropriation of the Church property to lay uses, the Lords energetically resisting this. It was in consequence of this struggle that tithe commutation bills failed to pass (1834, 1835, 1836). At last, in 1838, the Lords remaining firm, and it being impossible to collect the tithes in Ireland, Lord Melbourne's government gave way. Tithes were commuted for a permanent rent-charge upon the land reduced by one fourth. But the security of this new rent-charge was an ample compensation to the clergy for their loss; as further compensation the loan of a million adverted to above now became a gift.

Titles, ROYAL. Early royal titles in England as in the other kingdoms of the west were national and not territorial. Thus Egbert was "King of the West Saxons," and in one charter (of 828) "King of the English." Alfred often used the title "King of the Saxons." Edward the Elder commonly calls himself "King of the Anglo-Saxons," a term almost confined to this sovereign and to Edwy. From the time of Athelstan "King of the English," is the usual title; though in one charter he is described as "Ongol-Saxna cynyng and Brytaenwaldas ealles thyses iglandes," which is translated in the Latin version "Angul-Saxonum neonon et totius Britanniae rex." By succeeding kings up to the time of Canute, such titles as "Imperator," "Cæsar totius Britanniae," "Basileus," are frequently used, expressing supremacy within Britain, and independence of all other authority. "King of the English" is the official style of the Norman kings. Henry II. retains this, but also frequently calls himself "King of England, Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and Count of Anjou," to which was added upon the conquest of Ireland "Lord of Ireland," "following the syllables," as Selden says, of the bull of Adrian VI., which ordered the Irish to obey Henry "sicut dominum." Edward I. dropped the title derived from Normandy, which had been conquered by the King of France in 1204, and was crowned as "King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitaine;" and to this title Edward III., in 1339, added that of "King of France," which was retained far into the reign of George III. By a bull dated Oct. 11, 1521, the title "Defender of the Faith," was conferred upon Henry VIII., a title which has been retained until the present. Twenty-one years later Henry marked his rejection of the papal authority by assuming the title King of Ireland (for according to Mediæval jurists the regal title could only be conferred by emperor or pope; see Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, p. 260). James I. was proclaimed "King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland," and was wise enough to drop the title "King of Great Britain," which he had assumed by proclamation. After the union with Scotland (1707), Anne was styled "Queen of Great Britain, France, and Ireland," which was exchanged upon the Union with Ireland (1809), for the style since used "of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland King." By the Royal Titles Bill of 1876, Victoria was empowered to add to her style, and on Jan. 1, 1877, she was proclaimed "Empress of India," at Delhi, a title which is now adjoined to those previously used.

Tippermuir, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 1, 1644), was fought four miles west of Perth between the Cavaliers, under Montrose, and the Covenanters, led by Lord Elcho. Montrose gained a complete victory, and was enabled to occupy Perth.

Tobago (Assumption Island), the most southerly of the Windward Islands, was discovered by Columbus in 1498. In 1608 the island was claimed by England; and in 1625 some colonists from Barbadoes attempted to form a settlement there, but were prevented by the natives. In 1684 the neutrality of Tobago was recognised, but in 1749 it was taken by the French, from whom it was wrested by the English in 1762, and kept by them for twenty years. In 1770 a slave rebellion broke out, but was speedily suppressed; in 1781 the island was again occupied by the French for two years, and was surrendered to them by the treaty of Paris (1802). The next year it was captured by General Greenfield, and finally ceded to England in 1815. The government is vested in a lieutenant-governor, a legislative council, and a house of assembly, elected by the people.

Toleration Act, THE (May 24, 1689), was a measure due to the Earl of Nottingham. It passed both Houses with but little difficulty, and received the hearty consent of King William. In order to be properly appreciated it must be judged by the religious prejudices of a past age. It relaxed the stringent conditions of the Act of Uniformity, the Five Mile Act, and the Conventicle Act. "It exempts," says Hallam, "from the penalties of existing statutes against separate conventicles, or absence from the established worship, such as should take the oath of allegiance, and subscribe the declaration against popery, and such ministers of separate congregations as should subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England except three, and part of a fourth. It gives also an indulgence to Quakers without this condition. Meeting-houses are required to be registered, and are prevented from insult by a penalty. No part of this toleration extended to papists, or to such as deny the Trinity." The inconsistencies of the Act are that persecution continued to be the rule, toleration the exception; and that freedom of conscience was granted in a most capricious manner. "The provisions," remarks Macaulay, "removed a vast mass of evil without shocking a vast mass of prejudice; they put an end at once, and for ever, to a persecution which had raged during four generations."

Tooke, JOHN HORNE (b. 1736, d. 1812), was the son of John Horne, and assumed the title of Tooke after being adopted by William Tooke, of Purley. His family persuaded him, after taking his degree in 1768, to enter the Church, but his own inclination was for the law, and in 1779 he tried to obtain admission to the bar, but his clerical profession prevented him. Tooke had already become conspicuous as a democratic politician; at first as a friend of Wilkes, with whom, however, he speedily quarrelled, and was in consequence attacked by Junius. In 1775 he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine, for saying that the Americans who fell at Lexington had been "murdered" by the English soldiers. He plunged actively into the political agitation which followed the French Revolution, and in 1794 he was committed for trial on account of his connection with the supposed treason of the Corresponding Society, but after an able and witty defence he was acquitted. After contesting Westminster twice without success, he was returned for old Sarum in 1801, but a bill was passed in the next session rendering clerical persons ineligible. His last days were spent in easy retirement. Tooke had a great social reputation; his Diversions of Purley is an original, though somewhat primitive, work on philology.

There are Lives of Tooke by J. A. Graham, A. Stephen, and W. Hamilton.

Toolsye Bhye was the favourite concubine of Jeswunt Rao Holkar. During the insanity of the latter she carried on the government in conjunction with his chief minister, Baharam Sett. On his death, in 1811, she adopted a son of his by another concubine, and conducted the government as regent. The army, however, was too large and turbulent for the State, and the revenue was totally unable to support them. They were therefore generally in a mutinous state, and at last drove the Bhye to seek refuge in Kotah, by the threat of actual violence. Her amours and crimes embroiled her with Guffoor Khan, the leader of the Patan horse, and in the warfare which followed she in person led her Mahratta horse with the most undaunted courage to the assault. Between these various factions the government of the Holkar State fell into complete anarchy, the administration being vested in the Bhye nominally, and all real power being in the hands of the military leaders. On the outbreak of Bajee Rao, in 1817, the chiefs assembled their forces, and determined to support the Peishwa, but Toolsye Bhye opened negotiations with the British government, offering to place the young Holkar, and the Holkar State, under their protection. These proceedings of hers being suspected, the chiefs seized and imprisoned her ministers, and she herself was put to death.

Tories, THE. The name is derived from an Irish word, meaning to pursue for the sake of plunder. It was applied to those Irish who in 1664 preferred to remain as outlaws in their own lands to emigrating to Connaught. The government offered prizes for their heads, and a free pardon to any Tory who brought in the head of a confederate. In 1693, after the civil war had come to an end, they again appear; they are described by the law as "out of their keeping." A statute passed (7 William and Mary) put a reward of £20 on the head of any Tory, and assessed the Catholic inhabitants of a barony for any loss caused by them. This statute was not repealed till 1776. In English politics the word appears to have been first used contemptuously to designate the Court and Roman Catholic party in the disputes between the Abhorrrers (q.v.) and Petitioners in 1679. In the debates on the Exclusion Bill it was applied insultingly to the partisans of James II. In William III.'s reign the term was coming into current use without an opprobrious meaning, as the title of the party who opposed the Whig interest in Church and State; and in the reign of Anne it was the common designation of this party. On account, however, of its suspicious connection with Jacobitism, and the honourable and respectable traditions attaching to the name of Whig, because of the large share borne by the Whigs in the Revolution, Tory was not a title which any party was anxious to assume. To the younger Pitt was due the revival of a great party in the state, resting on popular support as well as on that of the crown, and opposed to the Whigs, who had become to some extent an aristocratic faction; and under his administration the name was generally acknowledged by the party which towards the closing period of his premiership probably included the majority of the middle and propertied classes, and was especially identified with the continuance of the war with France, and opposition to what were assumed to be revolutionary and radical changes in domestic affairs. Since that period the word has held its own as the designation of one of the two great parties in English politics; though in the present century that of Conservative has been often preferred to it. But this name has hardly supplanted the older designation as that of Liberal has done in the case of the rival party. A Tory perhaps is understood to be a person less indulgent towards the principles of his opponents than a Conservative. But the two terms are used almost indiscriminately in political phraseology.

Cooke, Hist. of Party.

Torres Vedras, THE LINES OF (1810—1811), were thrown up by Wellington, in order that he might protect Lisbon and the army during the winter, and thus baffle the superior forces of Massena, in their efforts to drive the British out of Portugal. "They consisted," says Napier, "of three distinct ranges of defence. The first, extending from Alhandra on the Tagus to the mouth of the Zizandre on the sea-coast, was, following the inflections of the hills, twenty-nine miles long. The second, traced at a distance varying from six to ten miles in the rear of the first, stretched from Quintella on the Tagus to the mouth of the St. Lorenza, being twenty-four miles in length." The third was intended to cover a forced embarkation, and extended from Passo d'Arcos on the Tagus to the coast. Massena soon perceived the impossibility of carrying the position at any point or of turning it, except from the Tagus, where a large flotilla of English gunboats was moored. Throughout October Massena, though harassed by sickness and increasing scarcity of supplies, persisted in his efforts to turn the position by the Tagus; but he was as persistently foiled by Wellington's manoeuvres. Towards the middle of the month, Massena fell back on Santarem, but there stood firm, and Wellington, who had thought him in full retreat, had to abandon the idea of attacking him, and drew back into his lines. In November Massena again resumed his plans on the Tagus, but without success. During December and January the armies remained quiet; but the difficulty of obtaining supplies and forage led the French into horrible excesses and marauding expeditions, which undermined the discipline of the army. Had Wellington been vigorously reinforced from England, he would have attacked Massena's weakened forces; but without them he was compelled to await Massena's retreat. On March 2, 1811, the latter began his retreat, which he executed with "infinite ability." But for the lines of Torres Vedras Wellington could have hardly held his ground against Massena's much larger force.

Torrington, ARTHUR HERBERT, EARL OF, LORD HIGH ADMIRAL (d. 1716), became Rear-Admiral in 1678. In 1682 he raised the siege of Tangier. In 1684 he was placed on the Admiralty commission, and subsequently returned for Dover. He became Vice-Admiral and Master of the Robes (1685), but on refusing to consent to the repeal of the Test Act was dismissed from his offices. He thereupon entered into communication with Dykvelt, the envoy of William of Orange, and was the bearer of the invitation to that prince. He commanded the fleet with which William sailed to England, with the title of Lieutenant Admiral General. After the revolution he was placed first on the Admiralty Commission. In 1689 he engaged in a skirmish with the French fleet in Bantry Bay, but without much result. He was created Baron Herbert and Viscount Torrington, and received the thanks of Parliament. In this year he commanded the English and Dutch ships against the French, but retreated before them up the Channel, and when he received an order to engage off Beachy Head, sent the Dutch ships alone into action, and when they were completely crushed, fled into the Thames. He was tried by court-martial, but acquitted and dismissed the service. "There seems," says Macaulay, "to be no sufficient grounds for charging Torrington with disaffection, still less can it be suspected that an officer, whose whole life had been passed in confronting danger, and who had always borne himself bravely, wanted that personal courage which hundreds of sailors on board every ship under his command possessed. But there is a higher courage of which Torrington was wholly destitute. He shrank from all responsibility, from the responsibility of fighting, and from the responsibility of not fighting."

Torrington, GEORGE BYNG, VISCOUNT (b. 1663, d. 1733), volunteered for naval service at the age of fifteen. In 1681 he left the sea at the request of General Kirke, Governor of Tangier, and became under him ensign, and then lieutenant. He was employed to carry assurances of friendship from the English malcontents to William of Orange, to whom he was privately introduced by Admiral Russell. In 1690 he was second in command to Sir George Rooke, at the battle of Beachy Head. During the next six years he served under Admiral Russell. He was present at the destruction of the Spanish treasure ships at Vigo Bay. Next year he was made rear-admiral, and served under Sir Cloudesley Shovel. He commanded the squadron who captured the citadel of Gibraltar, and was knighted for his bravery at the battle of Malaga. In 1705 he was elected member for Plymouth. In 1706 he helped to relieve Barcelona, and commanded the vessels detached for the reduction of Cartagena and Alicante. In 1707 he served under Shovel at the abortive siege of Toulon. He frustrated the Pretender's expedition to Scotland. He was placed in command of an expedition fitted out for a descent on the French coast, but owing to the fact that he was badly supplied with provisions and information, could effect little. In 1709 he was placed on the Admiralty Commission, but was removed shortly before the queen's death. In 1715 he was made a baronet for his vigilance in watching the French coast. In 1717, on the outbreak of hostilities with the northern powers, he shut the Swedish fleet up in the Baltic. In the following year he was made admiral and commander-in-chief. He was sent to counteract the designs of Alberoni against the Italians. In order to relieve Count Daun, who was besieged in Messina, he attacked and utterly destroyed the Spanish fleet off Cape Passaro, with the loss of only one ship. On his return he was sworn of the Privy Council, and made Rear-Admiral and Treasurer of the Navy. In 1721 he was raised to the peerage as Viscount Torrington. In 1727 he became First Lord of the Admiralty, a post which he held until his death.

Tory. [TORRES.]

Tostig (d. 1066) was the third son of Godwin. In 1051 he married Judith, sister of Baldwin of Flanders, and in the same year he shared his father's exile. In 1055 he was created Earl of Northumbria, and was seemingly a great personal favourite of King Edward. In 1061, in company with Girth and Archbishop Ealdred, he made a pilgrimage to Rome, and during his absence Northumbria was invaded and ravaged by the Scots. In 1063 he joined Harold in his Welsh campaign. In 1065 his earldom broke out into revolt, his harsh and tyrannical government being no longer bearable. The Northumbrians held a meeting at York, outlawed and deposed Tostig, and chose Morkere as their earl; a massacre of Tostig's followers ensued, and the insurgents marched southwards to support their claims. With the advice of Harold, the king yielded to the demands of the insurgents, and Tostig was deposed and banished. He took refuge at Bruges, where he heard of Harold's election to the throne; having failed to induce William to make an alliance with him, he got together a fleet and ravaged the Isle of Wight and the southern coast. Thence he went to Lincolnshire, probably with the hope of recovering Northumbria, and failing in this, he retired to Scotland, where in all probability he met Harold Hardrada, whom he induced to join him in an invasion of England. At first they were successful, and defeated Edwin and Morkere at the battle of Fulford; but King Harold, hearing of the invasion, marched northwards promptly, and met them at Stamford Bridge (Sept. 25, 1066) where the Norwegian force was totally defeated, and Tostig and Harold Hardrada slain. Tostig left two sons, Ketil and Skule, who settled in Norway.

Totness, GEORGE CAREW, EARL OF, (b. 1557, d. 1629), son of George Carew, Dean of Exeter, served with credit in Ireland during his youth, and was entrusted by Elizabeth with a high command in the expedition to Cadiz (1596). The following year he accompanied Raleigh in his disastrous attempt on the Azores, and on his return was made President of Munster. His government in Ireland was firm, and in 1601 he totally defeated a Spanish force, which had landed at Kinsale. Two years later Sir George became governor of Guernsey, and in 1605 was made a peer by James I., being subsequently appointed Master of the Ordnance. He was created Earl of Totness by Charles I. as a reward for his military services.

Toulouse, THE BATTLE OF (April 10, 1814), was the last of the battles of the Peninsular War. Soult had thrown himself into Toulouse, and was resolved to hold the place at all hazards. As Wellington approached he took up a strong position in front of the town, which was protected on the other side by the Garonne, and outside that by the St. Cyprian heights, strongly fortified. The battle began early on the morning of the 10th. From six o'clock till four in the afternoon it raged, and in that time 4,600 men had fallen of the allies, while the French lost 3,000. Finally the French were defeated, and slowly retired from all their position. The battle was—"a lamentable spilling of blood, and a useless, for before this period Napoleon had abdicated the throne of France, and a provisional government was constituted at Paris."

Toulouse, THE WAR OF (1159), is the name given to the campaign undertaken by Henry II. in order to enforce his wife's claim to the county of Toulouse. The expedition, which lasted for some months, was eventually unsuccessful, though Henry's troops performed some brilliant exploits. This little war is important in English constitutional history, since it may be taken as the point at which the payment of scutage was accepted as a commutation for personal service by feudal tenants. The English knights had no temptation to fight in a quarrel not their own in the south of France, and willingly paid a tax of two marks on the knight's fee, to enable Henry to equip a mercenary force, instead of following him to the war.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., chap. xii.

Towns, in England, were probably in their origin only a development of the rural township or vicus, which Bishop Stubbs calls "the unit of constitutional machinery, or local administration." The town means a quick-set hedge, and in the same way burh, or borough, "a more strictly organised form of township," was the fortified house and courtyard of the great noble. Both forms are in turn developments of, or at all events, of kindred origin, to the mark, or community of free cultivators. Before the Conquest the constitution of the towns was very simple. Each had its tun-gemôt, or assembly of freemen, and its tun-gerefa, or chief administrative officer, who, originally elective, was soon appointed by the lord, or in free towns chosen by the king. In its ecclesiastical form the township was a parish, or part of a parish, the boundaries of the two communities usually coinciding, and as such the free inhabitants assembled at vestry meetings. It also had exercised judicial powers, functions which were afterwards usurped to a considerable extent by the manor courts, and the larger boroughs, which had the constitution of the hundred rather than of the townships, were exempt from the jurisdiction of the hundred courts. The townships, on the other hand, were represented by the reeve and four men at the courts of the hundred and of the shire. As yet there is no approach to the modern idea of a corporation with its legal personality, its common seal, and its perpetual succession, and London under its port-reeve and bishops was only an aggregate of communities, townships, and parishes. It is impossible to describe with any minuteness the various steps by which the towns acquired their municipal privileges. From very early times, they had, as we have seen, tribunals of their own, from which by the time of Henry III. the sheriff was excluded. Soon after the Conquest they had in several instances gained the right to compound for taxation, the collection of which was by degrees taken out of the hands of the sheriffs and assessed by the citizens themselves. This was known as the Firma Burgi, or rent paid to the crown from the borough. As the growth of the town constitutions was never uniform, but varied in each individual case, we must be content with indicating their broad features. In most of the commercial towns the guilds or associations of merchants rapidly assumed importance, and were granted by charter the privileges of owning property, and of making bye-laws, so that they became practically the governing bodies of the towns: all the more as their members would also be the members of the township courts and courts leet. Their chiefs were the aldermen, and their chief functions were to regulate trade. At the same time the communa or corporation, probably of French origin, appears alongside of the guild, with the mayor as its representative officer. The first mayor of whom we have any historical knowledge was Fitz-Alwyn, the Mayor of London in the reign of Richard I., and in 1215 John granted the citizens the right of electing their mayor annually, which, after a severe struggle with the royal power, they succeeded in making good. The provincial towns, in most cases, lagged behind the capital, and we do not find a mayor in Leicester, for instance, until 1246. By an obscure process of amalgamation a municipality was evolved out of the three elements of the borough, the original township, representing the primitive landowning community, the guild, or voluntary association of merchants, with its alderman, and the communa, with its mayor, until by the fifteenth century we have a close corporation of mayor, aldermen, and council, whose numbers and organisation are defined by charter. These corporate officers acquired under Richard II. the right of exercising the functions of justices of the peace, and the right of each chartered borough or city to send members to Parliament, which had been practically acquired during or before the reign of Edward III., was definitely recognised by charter in the case of Wenlock in the reign of Edward IV. By this time, too, the internal struggle for municipal privileges, which had been going on in some cases for nearly three centuries between the aldermen, representing the old merchant guild, and the newer craft guilds, or trading companies which had sprung up in later times, was over. The companies had established their own right to form part of the municipal governing oligarchy. Under the Tudors began the policy of strengthening the power of the municipal corporations at the expense of the inhabitants. In the reign of Henry VII. a system of close election and irresponsible government was introduced, the mayor and councils being in the first instance nominated by the crown, and subsequently self-elected by co-optation. It often happened also that the power of electing the borough members of Parliament was made over to the corporation by charter, to the material injury of the power of the burgesses. Under Charles II. and James II. the last remnants of popular representation, by the exercise of which the towns still stoutly opposed the personal power of the crown, were vigorously attacked. In 1683 the corporation of London was remodelled in a way that made it the creature of the court, no mayor or sheriff being admitted until approved by the king, and quo warranto informations were soon afterwards brought against other towns by Judge Jeffreys, many of which hastened to meet the government by a voluntary surrender. The corporations were then remodelled on an oligarchical plan, by which the king was reserved the right of appointing the first members. The object of this aggression was, of course, to control the return of members of Parliament, a course of action which had already been inaugurated under the Tudors by the profuse creation of rotten boroughs. After the Restoration the old charters of the remodelled corporations were for the most part restored to them, and they continued to exercise their narrow independence. The Parliamentary side of the question now came exclusively to the front, and the incompetency of the close corporations for the purposes of local government were forgotten, while attention was turned to the system by which pocket boroughs flourished, and the franchise was limited to small bodies of freemen. After this abuse was remedied by the great Reform Act of 1832, reformers began to probe the corruption of municipal institutions. The report of the royal commission appointed in 1832 revealed an incredible amount of jobbery and corruption, municipal councils being for the most part self-elective, and holding office for life, while the freemen, who often formed a very small fraction of the population, alone had any share in the local administration. The result of this state of affairs was that finance was managed most negligently and dishonestly, and that justice became a matter of political partisanship. By the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, framed on the report of the commission, these abuses were swept away, and a uniform system of government established in the 183 boroughs to which it applied. The government was placed in the hands of the mayor, aldermen, and councillors, forming a council. They were to be elected by the burgesses, i.e., the resident rate-payers, freemen as such having no rights as burgesses, though they were entitled to Parliamentary franchise. The qualification for a vote at first, three years' payment of rates, was afterwards reduced to one. Twenty of the largest boroughs were to be divided by the king in council into wards, and a certain number of common councilmen were attached to each ward. Separate committees of burgesses were to manage the charity estates, and in case the borough thought fit to provide an adequate salary for a recorder, who was to be a barrister of five years' standing. There was also a provision by which new municipalities might be created by charter on the petition of a certain unspecified number of resident householders, but only sixty-three towns have since availed themselves of it, partly because of the cumbersome nature of the process, and partly because of the opposition of the local authorities. The Municipal Corporations Act has since been frequently amended, and the whole legislation bearing on the subject has been consolidated by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882. London was specially exempted from the Act of 1835, and was allowed to retain its old constitution. In Scotland, where the history of the boroughs is closely akin to that of England, the corporations were reformed in 1833. Those of Ireland were regulated, and many of them abolished, by the Irish Corporations Act of 1840.

Townshend, CHARLES, LORD (b. 1676, d. 1738), entered public life as a Tory, but soon joined the Whigs. He was one of the commissioners for the Union with Scotland. In 1709 he was sent with Marlborough as plenipotentiary to the Hague. There he concluded the Barrier Treaty, which Marlborough refused to sign. He completed his connection with the Whigs by marrying Walpole's sister. In 1712 he was severely censured by the Tories as the author of the Barrier Treaty. George I., before his arrival in England, appointed him Secretary of State and Prime Minister, passing over the old Whig Junto, but he soon became distasteful to the king. He was disliked by the Hanoverian courtiers. He opposed George's schemes with regard to Bremen and Verden. Perceiving that Charles XII. of Sweden was threatening England, he was anxious for peace with Russia. Urged on by Sunderland, the king dismissed him from office, offering in exchange the lord lieutenancy of Ireland, which he accepted. But he was soon dismissed also from that position when, on the schism between Walpole and Stanhope breaking out in the ministry, his followers voted against a supply for hostilities against Sweden. Finding opposition useless, he rejoined the ministry in 1719 as Lord President. On Walpole's becoming Premier, he was made Secretary of State. He soon quarrelled with the king's favourite, Carteret, with whose more ambitious views of foreign policy he could not agree. The contest came to an issue at the marriage of Madame de Platen, sister of the king's mistress, the Countess of Darlington, in Paris. There Townshend sent Horace Walpole as rival ambassador to Carteret; and the latter was forced by the king to withdraw to the lord lieutenancy of Ireland. In 1725 Townshend concluded the Treaty of Hanover between England, France, and Prussia. This was to check the designs of Austria, Spain, and the Duke of Bourbon, as formulated in the Treaty of Vienna (1725), namely, a Stewart restoration and the surrender of Gibraltar and Minorca. This treaty, which Walpole considered was too precipitate, was the cause of his quarrel with Townshend. "The firm," he said, "should be Walpole and Townshend, not Townshend and Walpole." After a violent quarrel with Walpole, Townshend retired from public life. He passed the remainder of his life at Reynham, refusing to take further part in politics. To him we owe the cultivation of the turnip, and hence a proper rotation of crops.

Townshend, CHARLES (b. 1725, d. 1767), was the second son of the third Viscount Townshend. In 1747 he was returned to Parliament for Yarmouth. On entering Parliament he joined the opposition, but without much warmth. In 1749 his large family influence obtained for him a place at the Board of Trade. The next year he was nominated one of the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral. In 1756 he became a member of the Privy Council. In March, 1761, he became Secretary at War. Here he fluctuated between Pitt and Bute, at one time supporting one, at another the other. In 1765 he accepted the office of Paymaster-General in the Rockingham government, although he had no faith in its strength, and called it "a mere lute-string administration, pretty summer wear." In the following year he became Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Chatham ministry. But, as usual, Townshend was not decided in his support of the cabinet, of which he was now a member. As Chancellor of the Exchequer he introduced a budget, in which he pledged himself to the reduction of the land-tax at the end of a year, but on a motion of the opposition that the reduction should take place at once, the government was defeated. With Chatham ill, the members of the ministry broke away from all control, and Charles Townshend in particular gave vent to the wildest frolics of his genius. In one of the most celebrated of his speeches he said that the government "had become, what he had often been called, a weather-cock." The revenue which he failed to obtain by the land-tax he now sought by taxing with import duties many small commodities sent to the American colonies. It was a most fatal measure, the evil results of which Townshend did not live to see, as he died of a fever on Sept. 4, 1767. Walpole, who was a friend of his, says that "Townshend had every great talent, and very little quality. His vanity exceeded even his abilities, and his suspicions seemed to make him doubt if he had any. With such a capacity he must have been the greatest man of his age, and, perhaps, inferior to no man of any age, had his faults been only in moderate proportion."

Townshend, GEORGE, 1st MARQUIS OF (b. 1724, d. 1807), served in the army, and concluded, after Wolfe's death, the capitulation which gave Quebec to England. In 1767 he became Viceroy of Ireland, and, in accordance with George III.'s instructions, tried to govern in defiance of the Pensonbys and Shannons; but, defeated on the Army Bill in 1768, had to abandon the attempt. A new Parliament was no more docile than the last, and corruption was now tried. By means of the new oligarchy of crown pensioners, the great families were defeated, and in 1771 Townshend secured a favourable Parliament. But by 1772 matters had so far changed that complete defeat could only be averted by making peace with Lord Shannon. Disgusted with his office, the Lord Lieutenant resigned and retired to England, leaving behind him £300,000 of arrears.

Towton, THE BATTLE OF (Mar. 29, 1461), was the most important engagement in the Wars of the Roses. After the second battle of St. Alban's, Queen Margaret and the Lancastrians had retired to the north, while Edward and Warwick entered London, and the former was proclaimed king. The Yorkists immediately determined on marching northwards and completing the defeat of the Lancastrians. On March 12 the Yorkists were at Pontefract, the Lancastrians at York. After a skirmish at Ferrybridge, the two armies met near the village of Towton, not far from Tadcaster. The battle was fought on Palm Sunday, March 29, and lasted ten hours, ending in the complete victory of the Yorkists, and the rout and dispersion of the Lancastrian army. The Earl of Northumberland fell in the battle, Devonshire and Wiltshire were beheaded after it, and it is said that from 28,000 to 30,000 men were left dead on the field. Henry and Margaret, with Somerset and Exeter, fled into Scotland, while Edward returned in triumph to London.

Trade, THE BOARD OF. Councils "of Trade and Plantation" were created by Charles II. after the Restoration, charged with the concerns of the colonies and merchant shipping. The two were united in 1672, and abolished in 1675. The council was re-appointed in 1695, and continued to exercise a certain control over colonial and mercantile matters for nearly a century afterwards. In 1782, having long been found inefficient, it was abolished. In 1786 the Board of Trade with substantially its present functions was established by order in Council. Its functions have been regulated by several Acts, notably those of 1846, 1850, and 1867, and it has been charged with the superintendence of Railways (1840) and Merchant Shipping (1864 and 1867).

Trade, FOREIGN, LEGISLATION ON. False notions about political economy, combined with frequent European wars and with the conditions of early society, caused constant legislation on the subject of our trade with other nations. Restrictions were held to be the best means of increasing our own wealth and diminishing the prosperity of our rivals; wealth was considered to consist exclusively of gold and silver; and, when this opinion was at last overthrown, it only gave place to the idea that the progress of a country depended on the excess in value of our exports over our imports. The extent to which these ideas prevailed and the change which has come over our policy will be best understood by noting some of the most remarkable instances of legislation on this subject. In 1261 the exportation of wool and the importation of cloth were alike forbidden. As the power of the crown to tax home merchandise was diminished, the king encouraged foreign merchants, whom he could tax without reference to Parliament, and in 1303 Edward I. gave them licence to trade on payment of special duties. The Statute of Staples [STAPLE] in 1353, though restrictive, was not on the whole injurious. By 28 Edward III. c. 5 the exportation of iron was forbidden. In 1402 all importers were ordered to invest their money in English goods, and the exportation of gold and silver was forbidden. Our craftsmen having in 1463 complained to Parliament of the injury done to them by the importation of goods of better quality than were produced in England, the importation of a large number of articles was forbidden. Among these were ribbands, silk, laces, saddlery, ironwork, and playing cards. This prohibition was extended both as regards time and the number of articles in 1484. In the same year (1 Rich. III. c. 9) restrictions were placed on the trade of Italian and Catalan merchants, and foreigners were forbidden to exercise any craft in England except as the servants of English masters, or to have any share in the clothing trade. The trade with the Netherlands was encouraged by a famous treaty called "Intercursus Magnus," made in 1496 between Henry VII. and the Archduke Philip. The next year Parliament virtually established the Society of Merchant Adventurers, by controlling the exaction of fees demanded by a fraternity of London merchants of all Englishmen not of their company trading in Netherland ports. By 3 Hen. VIII. c. 1 the exportation of coin, plate, &c., was forbidden under the penalty of forfeiture of double the value of the export.

By an Act regulating the Baltic trade in 1566, the Russia Company was forbidden to export any English commodity except in English ships. This principle of fostering our carrying trade by restriction was soon carried further. The charter granted to the East India Company in 1600 to trade with Asia, Africa, and America, "beyond the Cape of Good Hope to the Straits of Magellan," brought us into rivalry with the Dutch. In this rivalry we were at a disadvantage, because our high dues caused our merchants to freight Dutch ships for importation. To meet this the first Navigation Act was passed in 1651, and this was afterwards extended by 12 Car. II. c. 18. By these acts the importation of foreign commodities was restricted to English ships or to the ships of the country producing the import. The act of Charles II., once held to be "the carta maritima of England," had an injurious influence on our trade. The navigation laws, however, remained in force until they fell before the enlightened policy of Mr. Huskisson in 1825, the last remains of them being repealed by 17 Vic. c. 5. In 1663 more correct views having prepared the way for the downfall of the false notions about money, leave was given to export gold and silver. In 1698 the East India Company obtained a renewal of its exclusive privileges of trade.

Restrictions were laid on the importation of corn by 22 Car. II. c. 3. High prices in 1766 led to a suspension of high duties, and considerable liberty of importation was granted in 1773. The complaints of the landholders, however, caused the imposition of renewed restriction in 1791. The success of the policy of Mr. Huskisson, who in 1824, by lowering duties, enormously stimulated the silk, wool, and other trades, pointed to the wisdom of removing commercial restrictions, and by 9 Geo. IV. c. 60 a graduated scale of duties on corn was established. This system, however, was open to objection, because it introduced a new element of uncertainty into the trade. Carrying on the policy of Mr. Huskisson, Sir Robert Peel in 1845 abolished the duties on no less than 420 articles of trade. At last, after a long struggle, he succeeded in 1846 in carrying the bill for repealing the duties on the importation of corn. Since that date the pressure of taxation has been removed from many articles, and the work of Sir R. Peel has been consummated by Mr. Gladstone, who in 1860 succeeded in prevailing on Parliament to approve a treaty with France, by which a large number of duties and prohibitions on our trade with that country were swept away.

Trades' Unions. The Act of Apprentices (5 Eliz.) made the mediæval gild regulations with regard to apprentices binding upon all the trades in existence at the time, and in addition ordered an annual assessment of wages by the justices. But these enactments gradually ceased to be observed, and as early as 1725 temporary associations were formed among workmen to secure the carrying out of the Act. But these were declared illegal by Act of Parliament, although the attempts of the legislature to revive the practice of fixing wages by the justices proved resultless. In spite of evils in particular industries, the relations of the various classes engaged in manufacture were fairly good during the earlier part of the century. The introduction of machinery, however, and with it of the factory system, soon caused an industrial war; journeymen everywhere petitioned that the Act 5 Eliz. should be enforced, and began to form societies and raise funds for the prosecution of offending masters. But while Parliament suspended the Act for the benefit of employers year after year, and repealed it for the woollen manufacture in 1809, and generally in 1814, associations of workmen were rendered penal by Acts of 1799 and 1800. The unions either assumed the guise of friendly provident societies to evade the Acts, or else became secret associations, with the usual evil results. In 1824 Joseph Hume gained the appointment of a Parliamentary committee, which reported that the administration of the law had been one-sided, that it had only touched workmen, and not masters who had combined, adding also that the law had, "in the opinion of many of both parties, tended to produce mutual irritation and distrust, and to give a violent character to the combinations." In accordance with its advice, all the Acts against combination were repealed in 1824; but so numerous were the strikes that followed that a most unwise Amending Act was passed next year, according to which, though persons meeting to determine their own wages were exempted from punishment, "all meetings or agreements for the purpose of affecting the wages or hours of work of persons not present at the meeting, or parties to the agreement, were conspiracies. So were all agreements for controlling a master in the management of his business. So were all agreements not to work in the company of any given person, or to persuade other persons to leave their employment, or not to engage themselves. In fact, there was scarcely an act performed by any workman, as the member of a trade-union, which was not an act of conspiracy and a misdemeanour." Besides, the general Acts against conspiracy could still be employed against unionists, as in 1834, when six Dorchester labourers were sentenced to seven years' transportation for "administering unlawful oaths"—i.e., admitting members into a union. During the next thirty years, in spite of these Acts, the unionist movement spread with great rapidity; in 1861 a combination of several associations produced the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, which played a part in trade-union struggles comparable to that of the weavers among the mediæval gilds. Public attention was recalled to the unions by the Sheffield outrages (q.v.) of 1866, which led to the appointment of a Royal Commission in 1867 to examine the whole matter. But it was clearly proved that the large majority of unions had nothing illegal in their working, and in consequence the Trades Union Act of 1871 recognised their complete legality. Finally, the last vestiges of the Combination Acts were repealed in 1875; henceforward the offences of unionists must be tried under no special Acts, but under the ordinary criminal law. About the same time unionism was introduced into agricultural districts, and the Agricultural Labourers' Union, founded in 1872, now includes some 60,000 members. The English trades unions, numbering probably a million and a quarter members, are bound together in a loose confederation. In each town there is a Trades Council, upon which sit representatives of such unions as care to join. Trade-union congresses have met annually since 1868, and these have yearly, since 1871, appointed a permanent "Parliamentary Committee" to watch over the interests of workmen.

Trafalgar, THE BATTLE OF (Oct. 21, 1805), was the last and most fatal blow inflicted on the naval power of France. On the previous afternoon the combined French and Spanish fleets had been desecrated sailing out of the port of Cadiz, and during the night Nelson had kept his fleet under all sail to keep them in sight. At daybreak on the 21st they were seen in a close line about twelve miles ahead. As the English fleet came up with him, Villeneuve (the French admiral) formed his fleet in a double line in close order. Nelson had twenty-seven men-of-war and four frigates, against the combined fleets of thirty-three ships and seven frigates, and he adopted the plan of attacking in two lines, Collingwood leading the lee-line of thirteen ships, and Nelson the weather-line of fourteen. Villeneuve made the most skilful preparations to meet the attack, but seems to have perceived at once that Nelson's plan would succeed. As the Victory, Nelson's ship, neared the French fleet, she was raked by a galling fire from the enemy, so that she had lost fifty men before returning a gun. At noon she opened her fire, and ran on board the Redoubtable, with the intention of breaking the enemy's line. That ship fired one broadside, and then, through fear of being boarded, let down her lower ports, and contented herself for the rest of the battle with keeping up a fire of musketry from her tops. The Victory soon became busy with her, the Yéméraire, and the huge Santissima Trinidad, and at a quarter past one Nelson was mortally wounded by a ball from the marines in the tops. Within twenty minutes the Redoubtable struck. In the meantime the battle had been raging with almost equal fury on all sides; and everywhere the stubborn courage of the British seamen wore out the resistance of the enemy. Nelson lived just long enough to know that he had gained his last and greatest victory. Twenty of the enemy had struck: seven of their ships escaped from the battle, only to be all captured by Sir Richard Strachan off Rochefort. The next evening a gale came on from the south-west, which destroyed most of the prizes. The English loss amounted to 1,587 men: the loss of the allies was much greater, and included the Spanish admiral, while Villeneuve was taken prisoner. The Spaniards, disgusted with the conduct of the French, at once made peace, and treated our wounded with the utmost attention. With the loss of Villeneuve's fleet vanished all Napoleon's hopes of invading England.

Trailbaston. COMMISSIONS OF, were first issued by Edward I. in 1292, and were continued down to the middle of Richard II.'s reign. The object was to put down the numerous bands of swashbucklers, or "trailbastons" (i.e., staff or bludgeon carriers) as they were called. Commissions for the purpose of quelling the disturbances caused by these ruffians were sent throughout the country, inquiring, imprisoning, fining, and even hanging summarily.

Train Bands, or trained bands, instituted in the reign of James I., were bodies of urban militia, which combined with the principle of the "fyrd" a large volunteer element. They proved, however, exceedingly turbulent, especially in London, and, having espoused the side of the Parliament during the Great Rebellion, were abolished after the Restoration. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Traquair. JOHN STEWART, EARL OF (b. 1599, d. 1659), son of John Stewart of Gaverston, was a great favourite of Charles I., who created him an earl in 1633, and the following year made him Lord High Treasurer of Scotland, and in 1639 High Commissioner. In 1641 Traquair, who had made enemies, was found guilty on a charge of treason, but pardoned by Charles, who was convinced of his loyalty. In 1648 he fought at the battle of Preston, where he was taken prisoner, and confined in Warwick Castle for four years by command of the Parliament. His character is thus described: "He was a man of great learning, but of too much craft; he was considered the most capable man for business, and the best speaker, in the kingdom of Scotland."

Travancore was a little principality at the southern extremity of the Malabar coast. The treaty of Mangalore placed it under British protection. In consequence of this Lord Cornwallis began the second Mysore War (q.v.) to avenge on Tippoo the insult offered to the British government by his unprovoked attack (1790) on the lines of Travancore (a line of ramparts protected by a ditch and bound hedge, extending along the northern frontier from the Neigherry hills to the sea). In 1796 a subsidiary alliance was concluded between the Rajah and the Company, by which he agreed to assist them if necessary with troops to the best of his ability. And in 1806 a second treaty was concluded, by which this duty was commuted for an annual payment. Travancore was extremely badly governed, and retrenchment and reform were absolutely necessary. The last treaty with the English had stipulated this. In 1808 an attempt to enforce this led to an attack on the Residency, from which the Resident barely escaped. English troops were marched up, and order was after some trouble restored. Travancore is still one of the protected native States.

Treason. THE LAW OF. High treason, which means a transcendently dangerous kind of betrayal, is theoretically a murderous blow aimed at the State, but in fact is any mischievous action or design against the person of the sovereign, with whose particular life the general welfare is supposed to be bound. It is called "high" to distinguish it from simple or petty treason, which was an outrageous or unnatural betrayal of confidence, as that of a child who attempts or designs the slaughter of a parent. Feudalism is usually credited with having shifted the mark of treason from the State to the sovereign. Yet the idea of the king's supreme lordship and consequent importance in this connexion is first seen in Alfred's law of treason: "If any one plot against the king's life, of himself or by harbouring of exiles, or of his men, let him be liable in his life and in all that he has." For such "treachery against a lord" Alfred thought no reparation possible. After the Conquest, therefore, while the penalty of rebellion was, for a Norman, only forfeiture and imprisonment, for an Englishman it was death. In 1075 the Norman earl, Ralph Guader, met with no worse doom than loss of lands and perpetual captivity; the Englishman Waltheof perished on the scaffold. The crime did not assume its darker aspect, or draw after it the more awful punishment afterwards reserved for it, till many years later. The Norman and early Plantagenet kings seldom, if ever, had leaders of rebellion executed on legal process; their vengeance was satisfied with the ordinary feudal consequences. The idea of treason, however, was well known. Glanville speaks of it under the name of "lese majesty," thus showing the influence of the Roman law on its development. Edward I. gave expression, perhaps for the first time, to the sterner conception of the offence; the proceedings against David of Wales and William Wallace first exhibited its merciless characteristics. The constructive complexity of David's guilt set the precedent for the most appalling feature in our legal history. He was drawn to the gallows, hanged, had his bowels burnt, and his quarters dispersed over the kingdom, respectively for the treachery to his lord, the murder, the profanation of a holy season, and the repeated formation of designs against his king at various places, into which the judges divided his crime. This case practically ruled all that came after. The hurdle, the gallows, the axe, and the quartering knife, were for ages the instruments of the punishment of treason, varied only by the stake and the faggot if the convicted traitor were a woman. The legal sentiment was now fostered that there was a special heinousness in the offence. It was deemed politic, perhaps, to frighten the king's liegemen into a respect for their oaths and implied fealty. Any scheme that struck at the king, his crown and dignity, or tended to do mischief to his person or royal estate, was asserted by legal writers to be treason, not only in those who attempted it, but also in those who advised it. But the crown had the interest in keeping the offence indefinite that the consequent frequency of forfeitures gave; and the profitable vagueness was allowed to hang over it for a time. Mortimer, for instance, was in 1330 condemned for merely "accroaching" or drawing towards himself the royal power. In 1352, therefore, the puzzled and distressed Lords and Commons begged King Edward III. to declare authoritatively the law on the subject. Edward complied, and the historic Statute of Treasons was the result. Henceforward no man was to be held guilty of treason who had not compassed the death of the king, queen, or their eldest son; violated the queen, the king's eldest daughter, if unmarried, or the wife of his eldest son; levied war against the king in his kingdom, or adhered to his enemies; counterfeited the Great Seal, or brought false money into the land; or slain his chancellor, treasurer, or judges "being in their place doing their offices." And all the lands forfeited for any of these offences were to go to the king, whether holden of him or of others. The weightier clauses of this statute are law still. But it often fell short of the needs of an arbitrary king or an unusually critical condition of affairs; and such additions were made to it by the legislature, and constructions placed upon it by the judges, as the occasion seemed to demand. In Richard II.'s heyday of power, in Henry VI.'s growing weakness, new treasons were created, but only to be brushed away at the return of better or more settled times. The reign most prolific of artificial treasons was Henry VIII.'s; to deny the royal supremacy, or even decline to admit it, to deprive the king of any of his titles, to keep back from him the knowledge of an immorality committed by the lady he proposed to marry, and several other things of little seeming importance at other times, were exaggerated into treasons. These were all swept away when Edward VI. succeeded; but many of them were re-enacted the year before his death, while, as a feeble antidote to this renewed severity, it was provided that no treason should be established save on the testimony of two witnesses. The restored additions were cast out again in Mary's reign, but the mitigatory provision was left untouched. The safety of Elizabeth called for fresh accessions to the law—among other enactments it was made treason to say that the queen was a heretic, a schismatic, or a usurper—but these were limited to the queen's lifetime. After her death the law of Edward III. continued the sole statutory basis of the crime, and the law of Edward VI. its sole judicial corrective. The nimble wits of lawyers, however, had found in the former, by help of the doctrine of constructive treason, more than one implication of crime. Chief among these was conspiracy to levy war against the king, which though not asserted to be itself treason, was accepted as a convincing proof of treason. To this principle Parliament also three times gave a lease of the existing sovereign's life, in the reigns of Elizabeth, Charles II., and George III. The contemplated deposition of the sovereign, or even the devisal of a plan for putting him under restraint for any purpose whatever, such as Essex designed in 1601, was discovered in Edward III.'s statute. At last, in 1816, the whole subject was comprehensively treated in a statute of that year, which is now the accepted standard of treason. By this measure not only the overt act, but the mere entertainment of a design to slay, wound, coerce, or depose the king, or to deprive him of any part of his dominions, or to levy war against him with any view whatever, or to move an invasion from abroad, and the publication of an intention to do any of these things, were declared to be high treason. The law was thus definitively fixed. No legal process was more shamelessly perverted to tyrannical and unjust ends than that of treason, as a hundred cases, from Burdett's to Sidney's, testify. To remedy the monstrous unfairness of trials on this charge the notable law of 1696 was passed. This insures to the accused the assistance of counsel, the examination of his witnesses on oath, a copy of his indictment five (afterwards ten) days, a list of the jury panel two days, before his trial, and the certainty of having two direct witnesses produced against him; and limits prosecutions to the term of three years, save for an attempt to assassinate the king. The revolting horrors of the punishment have since been removed—the cutting down alive and disembowelling of men, and the burning of women, in 1790; the drawing, quartering, and beheading, in 1870. But they had ceased to be carried out much earlier.

Treasonable Practices Bill (1795) was introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Grenville in consequence of the excited state of popular opinion, which at length displayed itself in an attempt upon the life of the king (George III.). The chief point in the Bill was that it dispensed with proof of overt acts of treason, and altogether widened the definition of treason, so as to include any writing or speaking which should incite the people to hatred or contempt of the king's majesty, or the established government and constitution of the realm. It thus formed a statutory prohibition on the discussion of Parliamentary reform, and was a most flagrant encroachment upon freedom of opinion. The Bill was supported in a narrow spirit, worthy of its aims; but it also found seven opponents among the Peers. In the House of Commons it met with a vigorous resistance. Fox went so far as to say that if this and the Seditious Meetings Bill "should be put into force with all their rigorous provisions, if his opinion were asked by the people as to their obedience, he should tell them it was no longer a question of moral obligation and duty, but of prudence." He was supported by Sheridan, Grey, and Whitbread, and others of the extreme Liberals; but the ministers openly avowed their determination "to exert a rigour beyond the law as exercised in ordinary times and under ordinary circumstances." They could do what they liked; and in spite of this brilliant opposition in the House, and popular indignation outside, the Bill was passed, to remain in force during the life of the king, and till the end of the next session after his death.

Treasurer, THE LORD HIGH, the office of, was of Norman origin. It does not seem at first to have been considered of great importance, the duties of the king's treasurer consisting in keeping the royal treasure at Winchester, and, as a member of the exchequer at Westminster, in receiving the accounts of the sheriffs. The office was held by several ecclesiastics, among whom were Nigel of Ely and his son, Richard Fitz-Neal. Under the Norman kings it had no separate judicial powers, and it was not until after the extinction of the office of justiciar that the treasurer rapidly became one of the chief functionaries of the crown. From the middle of the reign of Henry III. we find the treasurer, in conjunction with the newly-created chancellor of the exchequer, taking part in the equitable jurisdiction of the exchequer. He was now the third great officer of the crown; and his duties, besides presiding in the upper court of exchequer, consisted in the custody of the king's treasure, and of the records deposited there, and the appointment of the commissioners and other officers employed in collecting the royal revenue. The treasury appears to have been first put in commission in 1635, and the last lord high treasurer was the Earl of Rochester (1685-87). The office of First Lord of the Treasury is now held by the Prime Minister, and he is also not unfrequently Chancellor of the Exchequer as well. The Lord High Treasurer of Scotland was created by James I. on his return from captivity in England. The office was modelled on the parallel institution in England, but it seems to have acquired more relative importance, for in 1617 it was declared the first office of State. Commissioners of the treasury were first appointed in Scotland in 1641, and its separate existence was abolished at the Union. A similar step was taken with regard to Ireland in 1816, where lord treasurers seem to have been in existence as early as the reign of Henry III.

Tremayne, ANDREW (d. 1563), one of the conspirators in Sir Henry Dudley's plot (1556), had been suspected of being involved, together with his brother Edward, in Wyatt's rebellion (1554) (q.v.), but nothing was proved against him. In 1560 Tremayne distinguished himself at the siege of Leith; he was killed at Havre at the same time as his twin brother Nicholas. Mr. Froude calls him "the most gallant of the splendid band of youths who had been driven into exile in Mary's time, and had roved the seas as privateers."

Trenchard, JOHN (b. 1650, d. 1695), first sat in the House of Commons in 1673, as member for Taunton. He brought in the first Exclusion Bill. He was imprisoned for his share in the Rye House Conspiracy, and was a vigorous supporter of the unfortunate invasion of Monmouth. He escaped to the Continent, and was expressly excepted from the Bill of Pardon of 1686. He returned with William III., and sat as a member of the Convention. In 1693 he was appointed Secretary of State. "Apparently," says Macaulay, "he was not trusted with any of the greater secrets of State, but was little more than a superintendent of police." He displayed great and perhaps excessive zeal in the suppression of the Jacobites. A general search for members of that political persuasion in Lancashire failed in its effects, owing to the betrayal of the design. Trenchard was thereupon made the subject of bitter pamphlet attacks. The prosecutions of the arrested men were complete failures. These proceedings were severely commented on by the House. Trenchard's health gave way, and he died soon afterwards.

Trenchard, JOHN, son of the foregoing (b. 1669, d. 1723), is chiefly remarkable as a political writer. In 1698 he published a pamphlet entitled The History of Standing Armies, in support of Whig doctrines on that subject. He was one of the commissioners appointed by Parliament to examine into the Irish land grants, and issued a most violent report on the subject. "He was," says Macaulay, "by calling a pamphleteer, and seems not to be aware that the sharpness of style and temper which may be tolerated in a pamphlet is inexcusable in a State paper." He subsequently published a journal called the Independent Whig, and also Cato's Letters (1720–23).

Trent, THE CASE OF THE, 1861. The British mail steamer Trent left Havana (Nov. 7, 1861) for St. Thomas with the mails for England, under charge of a commander in the navy, and with numerous passengers, including Messrs. Sidel and Mason, commissioners for the Confederate States. It was stopped (Nov. 8) at the entrance to the Bahama Channel, and about nine miles from the island of Cuba, by the American steamship of war San Jacinto, Captain Wilkes. The Confederate Commissioners and their secretaries were taken from the mail steamer, which was allowed to proceed on her voyage, and were carried to the United States, where they were imprisoned in a military fortress. As soon as intelligence of this occurrence reached London, Earl Russell, in a despatch on Nov. 30, 1861, assuming that the individuals named had been taken from on board a British vessel, the ship of a neutral power, while such vessel was pursuing a lawful and innocent voyage, instructed Lord Lyons to demand their release and a suitable apology. This note was supported by communications from France, Austria, Prussia, Russia, and Italy, sustaining the views of the British government. Mr. Seward, the American Secretary of State, justified the seizure on the grounds that the commissioners were contraband of war, and that Captain Wilkes was entitled to seize them as enemies or rebels. He denied the immunity of the Trent as a packet-boat, and declared that Captain Wilkes had exercised the right of search in a perfectly legal manner. He conceded, however, that Wilkes was guilty of an irregularity in not sending the vessel into an American port to be tried by a prize court, and finally based his acquiescence in the British demand on considerations connected with the complaints previously made by the United States as to the impressment of seamen from their vessels. The question was thus settled. Lord Russell, however, in a despatch of Jan. 11, 1862, explicitly denied that the commissioners could in any sense be described as contraband of war.

Tresilian, SIR ROBERT (d. 1388), was appointed Chief Justice of England in 1381. His first act was to try the insurgents of Wat Tyler's rebellion, and he performed his duty with such cruelty that no parallel can be found for his conduct till the campaign of Judge Jeffreys. He attached himself to the king and De Vere, and by his advice Richard annulled the Commission of Regency which had been appointed in 1386, Tresilian inducing the judges to join him in declaring that the commission was derogatory to the royalty of the king. When Parliament met in 1387, the barons were determined on his punishment; he was deprived of his office and appealed of treason. He sought refuge in flight, but was captured and hanged at Tyburn.

Trevor, SIR JOHN (b. 1633, d. 1717), was, says Macaulay, "bred half a pettifogger, and half a gambler." He was called to the bar in 1661. He was a creature of Judge Jeffreys', and as such was chosen Speaker in 1686. Shortly afterwards he became Master of the Rolls. After the Revolution he was sworn of the Privy Council. He was employed by Lord Caermarthen to buy the votes of the House of Commons. He again became Speaker in 1690, without opposition. We find him attempting to reconcile the non-juring bishops to the Church of England, but without success. He was subsequently created First Commissioner of the Great Seal, which duty he did not adequately perform owing to the time he was obliged to spend in the House of Commons. In 1696 he was accused of corruption, having received from the City of London £1,000 for expediting a local bill. It was known that he pocketed £8,000 a year beyond his official salary. In his place he was forced to put the question and declare the "ayes" had it. Next day he avoided putting the vote for his expulsion by pleading illness. He was, however, expelled the House.

Triers, THE COMMISSION OF, was established by Cromwell (March, 1654). Cromwell regulated the Church by means of two ordinances, one of which established local committees to eject unfit ministers, whilst the other established a central committee to examine ministers newly appointed. The latter, or Commission of Triers, consisted of thirty-eight persons, of whom nine were laymen and twenty-nine divines, to whom four divines and one layman were afterwards added. Their duty was to examine all future presentees to livings and all who had been appointed since April 1, 1653. Their certificate of fitness was to be regarded as qualifying candidates to receive the ministerial stipend, but it was expressly declared that it was not to be regarded as "any solemn or sacred setting apart for the office of the ministry." Baxter, though a Presbyterian, says, "To give them their due, they did abundance of good to the Church." "They saved many a congregation from ignorant, ungodly, drunken teachers." He goes on to add that they were too partial to Independents and Separatists, "yet so great was the benefit above the hurt which they brought to the Church, that many thousands of souls blessed God for the faithful ministers whom they let in."

Trim, THE REMONSTRANCE OF (1643), was a document drawn up by the Irish Catholics, and transmitted to the king through Ormonde. In it they complain of the penal laws and disabilities they have been suffering under since the 2nd Elizabeth, and also of the conduct of the Lord Justices in 1641, and of the threats of the English Parliament; they conclude with an offer of 10,000 men to defend the king's prerogative. The cessation soon followed.

Trimbuckjee Dainglia was an unworthy favourite of the Peishwa Bajee Rao, who had been originally a spy. In 1814 he treacherously murdered Gungadhur Shastree. He was in consequence demanded by and surrendered after some delay to the English government (1815). In 1816 he effected his escape from the fort of Tannah. At the end of the Mahratta and Pindarrie war he was arrested, imprisoned, and died in the fortress of Chunar.

Trimmers, THE, were a party of politicians who formed a third party in Parliament in the reign of Charles II., about 1680, between the Whigs and the Tories as they came to be called. Their leader, Halifax, was a Trimmer on principle, and looked upon the title as one of honour. True to their character, they voted in the Upper House against the Exclusion Bill, although they were known to be opposed to the Duke of York.

Trinidad, the most southerly of the West India Islands, was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and was for many years used by the Spaniards as a victualling station for their ships. In 1595 it was attacked by Sir Walter Raleigh, and in 1676 was ravaged by the French. In 1783 a free grant of land was promised by the King of Spain to every Catholic settler, and the result was a great immigration from other colonies, the bulk of the new-comers being Frenchmen. In 1797 Trinidad was taken by a British force under Sir Ralph Abercrombie and Admiral Harvey, and by the peace of 1802 England was confirmed in the possession of the island. Immediately after the occupation by the British, numbers of settlers arrived from Scotland and Ireland, and ever since that time the island has been making rapid progress in productiveness. In 1834 negro emancipation was accepted without any of the disturbances which proved so ruinous to Jamaica, and as a consequence Trinidad, with only a fifth of the population of Jamaica, exports about as much sugar as that island. It is a crown colony, the administration being vested in a governor, an executive council, and a legislative council, nominated by the crown.

Trinoda Necessitas, i.e., the three-fold necessity of repairing bridges (brig-bot), keeping up fortifications (burh-bot), and performing military service (fyrd), was incumbent on every holder of land in Anglo-Saxon times, even if he were exempt from every other service. The earliest mention of the trinoda necessitas occurs in the beginning of the eighth century. [FEUDALISM.]

Tripartite Chronicle, THE, is the title of a Latin poem by John Gower, in which he describes the chief events of the reign of Richard II. As the name implies, it is divided into three parts. The first, entitled "Opus Humanum," treats of the Wonderful Parliament and the rule of Gloucester and the barons; the second part, "Opus Inferni," relates the revenge taken by Richard on the Appellants; while the third, "Opus in Christo," deals with the deposition of Richard and the substitution of Henry. It is written throughout with a strong bias in favour of the Lancastrians, but contains much interesting information as to the state of England at the end of the fourteenth century.

Triple Alliance, THE (Jan. 23, 1668), was made, chiefly by the exertions of Sir William Temple and the Dutch statesman De Witt, between England, Holland, and Sweden. The three powers bound themselves to assist one another against France, and especially in checking the aggressions of Louis XIV. in the Spanish Netherlands. Finding himself threatened by this powerful coalition, Louis was compelled in the same year to make the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (q.v.) with Spain, by which he, while retaining many of the border fortresses of the Netherlands, gave up Franche-Comté, which he had also conquered, and agreed to retire from the Netherlands, while the Spaniards ceded to him many important frontier towns. The Triple Alliance, however, was of short duration, and was reversed two years afterwards by the Treaty of Dover, concluded between England and France (1670), and directed against Holland.

Triple Alliance (INDIA) (July 4, 1790) was concluded between the Company, under Lord Cornwallis' governorship, the Nizam, and the Peishwa. Its stipulations were that the three powers should attack Tippoo's dominions, both during and after the rains, and prosecute the war with vigour; that the Mahrattas and Nizam should join the English, if required, with 10,000 horse, for which they were to be fully reimbursed; that a British contingent should accompany their troops; that all conquests should be equally divided; and that none should make peace without the rest.

Trivet, or TRIVETH, NICHOLAS (b. 1258, d. 1358), was the son of Sir Thomas Trivet, Chief Justice of the King's Bench. He entered the Dominican order, and on his death-bed attained the position of prior. His Annales Sex Regum Angliæ (1136—1307) have passed through several editions, of which the most accessible is that published by the English Historical Society in 1845. They are also to be found in Luc d'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. 3. The work is chiefly a compilation from different authorities, but the latter part contains some interesting original matter. Mr. Gairdner says: "In clearness of narrative and distinctness of statement it exhibits a marked advance upon the ordinary chronicles of the time. The language, too, is polished and elegant."

Trokelow, JOHN OF (d. 1343), was a monk of Tynemouth, but in consequence of an act of disobedience was, about 1296, removed in chains to St. Albans, where he was employed to continue the Chronicle of Rishanger. His Annals extend from 1307 to 1323, and are valuable as contemporary authorities.

Trokelow's Annals have been published in the Rolls Series.

Trollop, SIR ANDREW (d. 1461), served in the French wars, and on the outbreak of the Wars of the Roses joined the Duke of York. In 1459, after the battle of Blue Heath, the combined forces of York, Salisbury, and Warwick assembled at Ludford, close to Ludlow. Here they were confronted by the king, and a battle was imminent, when Trollop deserted with a considerable body of men to Henry. His defection caused the Yorkists to retreat in disorder. Trollop commanded the van of the Lancastrians at the battle of Towton, where he was slain.

Trot of Turriff, THE, was a name given to a defeat of the Covenanters at Turriff by the Gordons (May, 1639).

Troyes, THE PEACE OF (1564), was concluded, after the surrender of Havre, between France and England. By it the queen's mother undertook to pay 120,000 crowns to England, free trade was to be allowed, and the French hostages were to be released. The English agents were Sir Thomas Smith and Sir Nicholas Throgmorton.

Troyes, THE TREATY OF (May 21, 1420), was concluded between Henry V., Charles VI.,

King of France, and the Burgundian party. The Dauphin and the Armagnacs were still in arms, and refused to recognise the treaty. The terms agreed upon were that the English king should cease to bear the title of King of France; Henry should have the title of regent and heir of France; Henry promised to maintain the French Parliaments in their privileges, and to preserve the privileges of all individuals, and all the laws and customs of the realm of France. Henry promised to restore to the French king all cities, castles, &c., that had revolted from him, "being on the side called that of the Dauphin and of Armagnac;" Normandy and all parts and cities conquered by King Henry were to be restored to France as soon as Henry succeeded to the throne of France; Henry of England was to succeed on the next vacancy to the throne of France; the two crowns were to be for ever united; each realm was to have its own laws and government, and neither was to be in any way subject to the other; finally, Henry was forthwith to espouse Catherine, daughter of the King of France.

Truro, THOMAS WILDE, LORD (b. 1782, d. 1855), was the son of an attorney; was educated at St. Paul's School; was called to the bar at the Inner Temple (1817); and rose steadily in his profession. In 1820 he was engaged as one of the counsel for Queen Caroline on her trial. He entered the House of Commons for Newark (1831); lost his seat in 1832; but was returned in 1835, 1837, 1839. In 1839 he became Solicitor-General, and in 1841 he was advanced to the Attorney-Generalship, but retired the same year with his party. In 1846 he was again Attorney-General, and in 1850 was made Lord Chancellor by Lord John Russell, and created a peer. In 1862 he retired with his party. As Lord Chancellor, he appointed a commission to inquire into the jurisdiction, pleading, and practice of the Court of Chancery. Their report recommended the abolition of the masters' offices, a measure which Lord Truro succeeded in passing though he had quitted office at the time. Several other important reforms in the procedure of the Chancery court and offices were effected by him.

Tudor, THE FAMILY OF, was of Welsh origin, Tudor being probably a corruption of Theodore. The first of the Tudors of whom we have individual knowledge was Owen Tudor, a gentleman who fought during the Wars of the Roses on the Lancastrian side, and who married Catherine of Valois, the widow of Henry V. By her he had two sons, Edmund and Jasper, whom Henry VI. created Earls of Richmond and Pembroke. The marriage of the Earl of Richmond with Margaret, daughter of John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, who was the heiress of the illegitimate branch of the House of Lancaster, founded the fortunes of the race. As soon as the house of York became unpopular, Henry, Earl of Richmond, the son of Edmond, was adopted by the party of the Red Rose as the only possible candidate for the throne. When his second attempt to gain the throne was successful, Henry became Henry VII., and was careful to confirm his dubious claims by marrying Elizabeth, the daughter of Edward IV., and to rule by a quasi-Parliamentary title.

The character of Henry VII. is, to a considerable extent, an enigma. He seems to have been regarded by his contemporaries with a mixture of hatred and admiration, the former called forth chiefly by the exactions of the last part of his reign. The central fact of home policy is the systematic repression of the old nobility, already almost exterminated by the Wars of the Roses, and his continuance of the régime of personal government inaugurated by Edward IV. Abroad he trusted rather to diplomacy than to arms, and the cold mysterious course of action which was adopted also by his contemporaries Louis XI. of France and Ferdinand the Catholic, of Spain, gained for them the title of "the three Magi." The marriage of his daughter Margaret with James IV. of Scotland was an instance of singular foresight. His other daughter, Mary, after marrying the decrepit Louis XII. of France, was united with her old love Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. One of her daughters was the mother of Lady Jane Grey; the heiresses of the others married into the great houses of Seymour and Stanley.

Few kings have been more popular at the time of their accession than the handsome and accomplished Henry VIII. His title was undisputed, and the able part which he soon began to play in foreign affairs still further aroused the national enthusiasm. He showed considerable ability in maintaining the balance of power in Europe, and by the aid of Wolsey was able to a great extent to play off Germany against France, to the great advantage of England. The divorce question, with its momentous consequences, was the turning point of the reign. Henry, always swayed by passion and impulse, was hurried, the nation apparently silently approving, into a rupture with the papacy, and sweeping measures of ecclesiastical reform, including the Act of Supremacy, and the destruction of the old system of monasticism. The Church aristocracy fell before him, as the landed aristocracy had fallen before his father, and on their ruins rose a new and subservient nobility. All this time Henry was sincerely Catholic; his hatred of Lutheranism, and his vigorous persecution of it when it appeared in England, were quite consistent with the publication of the ten articles of religion. During the latter part of his reign Henry was disliked by his subjects, and was conscious of that dislike. The courage with which he still confronted the formidable coalition of the emperor and the pope was not properly appreciated. Cromwell proved a more violently autocratic instrument than Wolsey had been; the king was vexed by agrarian revolts, and troubled by the failure of his marriage projects. During the last years of his life he was occupied chiefly in arranging the succession, and in alternately persecuting and protecting the parties of reaction and of reform.

The personality of young Edward, a sickly and precocious hothouse plant, is of comparatively little moment in the history of the house of Tudor. The brief reign divides itself into two periods; the first, during which the kingdom was under the uncertain guidance of the Protector Somerset, being marked by the violent advance of the Reformation and terminating in another agrarian revolt; the second being occupied by unprincipled intrigues for the management of the succession. The courage of Mary and the loyalty of the nation thwarted the schemes of Northumberland, and the Catholics of England, certainly a majority of the gentry, hailed with delight the accession of a sovereign who had suffered persecution and sorrow for the cause. It should not be forgotten that Mary did not begin by shedding blood. She spared Lady Jane Grey as long as she could, but her Tudor pride could brook no opposition, and the popular opposition to her marriage with Philip of Spain only made her the more bent on carrying out the project. By that miserable arrangement she wrecked her life. Her domestic life was utterly blighted. She was embroiled in a disastrous war with France, and finally she was induced by her advisers to enter upon a course of religious persecution, which has since unjustly come to be regarded as the chief, and, perhaps, only, feature of her reign.

It is impossible here to give more than the merest general outline of the character and policy of Elizabeth. From the first her attitude to Catholicism was perfectly consistent. With little real religious conviction, she was opposed to the papacy from purely political motives, and the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity were passed solely as a reply to the denial by Paul IV. of her right to succeed. From the same spirit she acted severely towards the Nonconformists; the pale of the English Church was to be as wide as possible, but no independence could be allowed outside of it. In spite of her persecutions, Elizabeth was really tolerant. The whole history of her reign turns upon the religious question, and the religious question in turn upon the succession question. Mary of Scotland was put forward by Catholic Europe as the legitimate candidate for the throne, and Philip of Spain, with the Guises at his back, posed as her champion. Elizabeth was, therefore, forced, like her father, even though it was against her will, to abandon a trimming foreign policy, and to become the chief of the Protestant cause; and yet in the very crisis of the struggle we find her, partly from motives of parsimony, partly from excess of caution, and partly from Tudor reverence for royal authority, acting in disregard of her ministers, and starving the rebellions of the Netherlands and of the Huguenots, no less than her own army and navy. It cannot be denied that in her struggle with the great tide of events which was finally stemmed by the Armada, she was favoured by good fortune to an extraordinary degree. Her marriage coquetries nearly wrecked the vessel of state more than once, and her indecision in dealing with Mary Stuart aggravated a very grave crisis. Yet, with all her faults, Elizabeth is among the very greatest of the sovereigns of England. In her personal grace and culture of character, her patriotism, her despotic spirit, which yet understood so well the temper and the needs of the nation, she exemplifies the highest qualities of the family, to which, on the whole, Englishmen of later times owe a great debt of gratitude.

The historian of the greater part of the Tudor period is Mr. Froude, and though critics may differ as to his conclusions, there can be but one opinion as to the graces of his style. Dr. Lingard on this period requires to be read with caution. Mr. Green is always suggestive. Brewer's Henry VIII. is of great importance. Tudor, JASPER (d. 1495), created Duke of Bedford at Henry VII.'s coronation, was the second son of Sir Owen Tudor, and consequently an uncle of the founder of the Tudor dynasty. In the Wars of the Roses he played an active part among the Lancastrian leaders, and it was his defeat at Mortimer's Cross by Edward IV., then known as the Earl of March, that gave Edward the possession of London and the crown of England at the same time. During the Yorkist supremacy Jasper Tudor was an exile. On his nephew's overthrow of Richard III., he was entrusted with the command of the royal forces during the earlier troubles of Henry's reign, and illness alone prevented his taking the leadership during the Cornish rising.

Tudor, SIR OWEN (d. 1461), claimed descent from Cadwaladr, the last so-called king of Britain, but his origin is very obscure. He seems to have been the godson of Owen Glyndwr, and he first appears in history as one of the band of Welshmen who, under David Gam, fought at Agincourt. Henry V. made him one of the squires of his body, and he held the same office to his successor. His handsome person gained him the love of Catherine, widow of Henry V., whom he secretly married in 1428. On Catherine's death he was imprisoned in Newgate, whence, however, he escaped twice, and was subsequently received into favour by Henry VI. He fought on the Lancastrian side in the Wars of the Roses, and was taken prisoner in the battle of Mortimer's Cross, carried to Hereford, and beheaded there. By his wife he had two sons, Edmund, Earl of Richmond, father of Henry VII., and Jasper, Earl of Pembroke.

Tulchan Bishops, THE, was a name given to the creatures of the Regent Morton, who were appointed to sees in accordance with the enactments of the Leith Convention (Jan., 1572) and the Perth Assembly later in the same year. The commissioners at Leith were the mere dupes and tools of a rapacious court, and a strange, heterogeneous compound of popery, prelacy, and presbytery was authorised, by which the avaricious nobility imagined they had secured their long-cherished design of obtaining for themselves the real possession of the wealth of the Church. It was decided (though the true nature of the transaction was veiled as far as possible) that as much valuable Church property could only be held by bishops, prelacy should continue, and creatures of the court should be appointed, who were to pay for their promotion by making over large portions of their temporalities to their patron, whoever he might be, who had procured their election. The new dignitaries quickly acquired the name of "Tulchan" bishops (from tulchan, a calf's skin, stuffed with straw, which was used in the Highlands to induce cows who had lost their calves to give their milk readily), for "the bishop had the title, but my lord got the milk, or commoditie." "Every lord," says James Melville in his Diary, "got a bishopric, and sought and presented to the kirk such a man as would be content with least, and get them most of tacks, feus, and pensions."

Tunnage and Poundage, a duty which, at first fluctuating, was eventually fixed at 3s. on every tun of wine, and five per cent. on all goods imported. It appears to have been first voted by the Commons in 1308. The original intention was that it should be applied to the protection of the merchant navy; and in Sir John Fortescue's scheme of reform we find that it was regarded as dedicated to that purpose. Nevertheless, the custom of voting the duty to the king for life, which was begun in the reign of Henry V., soon caused it to be looked upon as part of the royal revenue. Accordingly some indignation was not unreasonably excited in the the accession of Charles I., the king refused to vote it for one year. The House of Lords rejected the bill on its innovating tendency, and the king tried to levy the tax by force, but the London merchants

A remonstrance was carried into effect in 1629, and, though the king refused to give away, and persisted in order to avoid receiving, he was compelled in the following year to assent to an Act renouncing the right of levying the tax without the consent of Parliament. In 1641 the prerogative of levying customs on merchandise was taken away by an Act which granted the right of levying for two months only. In 1642, tonnage and poundage were granted to Charles II. and James II., for limited periods to William III. Anne II. it was made perpetual, and the diminution of the naval establishment was finally abolished by Pitt's Navigation Act of 1773.

THURSTON (b. 1474, d. 1559), was born in London (1522), and afterwards (1544) by Henry VIII., who employed him on various diplomatic missions. He was also named him in his will as one of the executors during the reign of Edward VI. In 1547 he was a member of the council for his opposition to the Reformation, and was imprisoned in the Tower for the offence. Though the ostensible charge was his complicity in the schemes of the Duke of Norfolk, he was released by Mary, queen of Elizabeth, Tunstall was appointed bishopric for refusing to take the oath of supremacy.

RELATIONS WITH. The relations between England and the Ottoman Empire under the head of Crusades. Between England and the Ottoman Empire with the reign of Elizabeth, the relations were of a commercial nature, and not of a political one, but the queen's policy was one of restraint against the Spaniards. Merchants (Harebone, Ellis, and others) resided in Constantinople, and obtained for English merchants equal privileges in the Ottoman Empire. In 1583 Harebone was appointed ambassador to the Porte, and in 1587 he was sent to invoke the aid of England against the "idolatrous Turks." To these advances the Ottoman Empire made no answer. Their power was decaying, and Roe, James II., tells emphatically how it had become "like an old body, crazed through many vices." During the seventeenth century a renewal of vigour gave the lie to Roe's prophecy of speedy dissolution, and Puritan England, on the whole, looked with favour on the power that checked the Catholic Austrians on the Danube, and so saved Protestant Germany. Louis XIV.'s alliance with Turkey, however, turned things the other way. Yet at the Congress of Carlowitz (1699) the English ambassador did his best to minimise the cessions of Turkish territory, and Sultan Achmet III. expressed his strong sense of gratitude for the efforts made by the English in their behalf. The general alliance between England and Russia during the early part of the eighteenth century involved us in some hostility to the Turks. The government of George III. protected the Russian fleet, which in 1768 sailed to the help of the revolted Greeks, and its acquiescence in the partition of Poland implied approval of the aggressions against Turkey. During the Coalition Ministry Fox acquiesced in the annexation of the Crimea. At last Pitt started the policy of opposition to Russian aggression, and of consequent support to Turkey in its struggle against Catherine and Joseph II. In 1807 Duckworth's disastrous expedition to Constantinople was designed to punish the alliance of Turkey and Napoleon. After the close of the Napoleonic war, England's policy has constantly tended to support Turkey as a necessary bulwark against Russia, but the difficulties created by Turkish misgovernment, and the impossibility of cordially supporting so effete a system, have largely modified the general idea in practice, and Turkey, although helped, has never been really treated as an independent power. The Greek insurrection nowhere excited more sympathy than in England; yet England, after Navarino, drew back, and, while giving Greece her liberty, limited her power, and narrowed her frontiers. Similarly in 1832 it hesitated to help Sultan Mahmoud against Mehemet Ali, and then, after Russia had sent a force against the rebellious Egyptian, joined with that power and France in restraining his advances. In 1839 English support of Turkey, again attacked by Mehemet and Ibrahim, was more thorough and decisive. In 1840 England, Russia, Austria, and Prussia joined with Turkey in a treaty defining the terms of their intervention. An English fleet under Stopford and Napier bombarded Beyrout and Acre, and drove Ibrahim out of Syria. In 1854 the English joined with France in the Crimean War (q.v.) for the defence of Turkey; but the success of the allies could only postpone the decay of their protégé. In 1858 England recognised the practical independence of Roumania; yet in 1860 it assisted in maintaining order in Syria [LEBANON QUESTION], and in 1867 in subduing Crete. In 1877 the outbreak of Greek insurrections in connection with a war between Turkey and Russia, again brought forward the question of the relation of England to the decaying State. Ultimately the Treaty of Berlin maintained the European peace, while recognising that the gradual reconstitution of the Turkish peninsula into autonomous Christian States is the only practical solution of the question. From that time the alliance of England and Turkey may be regarded as practically ended.

Turk's Islands and Caicos (or Keys), which form part of the Bahamas, were separated from the government of those islands in 1848. They were in that year formed into a presidency under the government of Jamaica, and affairs were administered by a president appointed by the crown, assisted by a council composed of eight members, four of whom were elected, and four nominated by the crown. In 1873 the Turk's Islands were annexed to Jamaica, and the government was locally vested in a commissioner, assisted by a legislative council.

Tutbury, in Staffordshire, twenty miles from Stafford, was granted by William the Conqueror to Henry de Ferrars, who built the castle. In 1322 it was garrisoned against Edward II. by Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, but surrendered. In 1350 John of Gaunt rebuilt the castle for his wife's residence. In 1568-9 Mary, Queen of Scots, was imprisoned there, under the charge of the Earl of Shrewsbury, but after a few months was removed to Wingfield. In 1585 she was again brought back to Tutbury, in charge of Sir Amyas Paulet, and remained there until her removal to Chartley. Tutbury was frequently visited by James I. and Charles I., for the latter of whom it was garrisoned by Lord Loughborough in the Civil War. It was taken and dismantled by the Parliamentary troops under Brereton (1646).

Twenge, SIR ROBERT, a knight of Yorkshire, organised a secret society in the year 1231, the object of which was to prevent the intrusion of foreigners into English benefices. Under his leadership masked men went about the country seizing the foreign ecclesiastics, pillaging their barns, and giving the corn to the poor. These doings were openly connived at by many of the leading men in the kingdom, and when Twenge went to Rome he took with him letters from the chief men in the realm remonstrating against the papal aggression. The pope was obliged to yield, and promised never again to interfere with the rights of patrons, but the promise was not kept long, as soon afterwards we find Grosseteste and others complaining of the number of Italians holding benefices in England.

grand scale that our history presents, was as brief as it was fierce and general; all its incidents lie within three weeks of June, 1381. The Tylers' Rebellion would name it more accurately, five at least of its leaders having been of that surname and occupation, though Wat of Maidstone alone has attained to historic fame. It has several singular and one or two inexplicable features; many and varied causes contributed to it; many and varied interests engaged in it; a seemingly sudden and isolated outburst kindled into flame a dozen of shires with an approach to simultaneousness possible only to concert and organisation; and after blazing furiously and in apparently irresistible might for a week or two, it sank into extinction as suddenly as it had risen. We catch a glimpse of an actual organisation in the celebrated letter of John Ball to the Commons of Kent. The force that produced the movement was made up of many simples, some of them opposite to one another. The exasperation of country artisans and unskilled labourers at the Statute of Labourers and with the too prosperous Flemings that had been imported, of city mechanics disabled in many directions by the guilds, of rustics at the revival of claims on the services that they had deemed obsolete, of the small farmers of Kent with landlords and lawyers, of disbanded soldiers at want of employment, formed a social contribution; discontent stirred by the levelling doctrines of Lollard agents in some places, clerical rage at alleged wrongs in others, formed a religious; the general severity of taxation and the particular offensiveness of the lately imposed poll-tax, hatred of John of Gaunt with some, faith in John of Gaunt with others, formed a political. These and other feelings condensed themselves into a bitter sense of wrong almost universal among the population that lived by the work of their hands. But the taxation and revival of villenage grievances were the strongest. The earliest rushes to arms were made nearly on the same day in Kent and Essex. Starting from Dartford on June 5, the Kentish movement had in a week made the circuit of the county, and drawn together an enormous host from town and country. On June 13 Wat Tyler led this host into London, then entirely defenceless. The instinct of destruction was powerful in these men, and vented itself on everything connected with what they most hated. They wrecked John of Gaunt's palace of the Savoy and the house of the Hospitallers at Clerkenwell, destroyed Temple Bar, killed every lawyer and Fleming they could find, and burnt every legal record they could lay their hands on. Then they occupied Tower Hill. On the same day the men of Essex, who had first risen at Fobbing, and murdered the Chief Justice and jurors, appeared at Mile End, while the men of Hertfordshire took up their position at Highbury. These were chiefly ustices, indignant at present and prospective treatment. Yet their conduct was comparatively free from violence. They demanded (1) the abolition of villenage, (2) a general pardon, (3) liberty to buy and sell untolled in all fairs and markets, and (4) the xing of the rent of their lands at fourpence n acre. Next day Richard left the Tower, et them at Mile End, listened to the tale of eir grievances, promised them all they sked, and persuaded them to go home, uring his absence the Kentish men burst nto the Tower, flooded its rooms, insulted he king's mother, dragged out Simon of udbury, Primate and Chancellor, Sir Robert ales, and Legge, the farmer of the poll-tax, nd had their heads struck off on Tower Hill. he ensuing night Richard passed at the Vardrobe; and next morning (June 15) he ncountered the rebels in Smithfield. There, hile parleying with the king and wrangling ith Sir Robert Newton, Tyler was suddenly mitted down by Walworth, the mayor, and ain by the king's followers. Richard's oolness and tact disarmed the rebels of the ary that rose within them at this deed; he ut himself at their head, led them to slington, and by granting the required berating charter on the spot, induced them o march away home. Meantime most of the ther southern and midland counties were in rms, the nobility and clergy retiring into heir fortified houses and leaving the open ountry to the mercy of the rebels; and urtherous deeds were done in many places. ut the insurgents of Norfolk, Cambridge, nd Huntingdon met a redoubtable antagonist n Henry Spencer, Bishop of Norwich, who allied forth, and striking fiercely at their oving bands, broke them in pieces one by ne, capturing, trying, and sending to the allows their most active leaders, notably the ormidable John Lytstere, whom men called king of the Commons. Before these decisive easures and the news of the doings in ondon, the insurrection quickly subsided. hen the work of vengeance began. The harters were revoked—indeed, the king had xceeded his prerogative in granting them— nd the courts of law passed the autumn in anding over wretches to the hangman. hough the worst excesses of the revolt had een perpetrated by the political insurgents, hese were gratified with a change of ad-ministration, while Parliament refused the ally aggrieved and well-behaved rustics the dress they had sought. But their blood ad not been shed in vain; the landlord class, ade wiser by the terrible lesson, desisted from urther prosecution of their claims, and allowed ee play to the liberating tendency of the age.

Tyndall, WILLIAM (b. 1484, d. 1536), the anslator of the Bible, was a student both at Oxford and Cambridge, and at the latter University probably came under the influence of Erasmus. While tutor in the family of Sir John Walsh, in Gloucestershire, he translated the Enchiridion of Erasmus, and for that, and his known anti-clerical views, fell under the displeasure of the bishop. In 1523 he went to London and tried to obtain assistance for his projected translation of the Bible. Failing to do so, however, he sailed for Hamburg, and there printed his first two gospels. During the rest of his life he kept himself for the most part in retirement, in company with his friend Fryth, his headquarters being at Antwerp, where he was befriended by English merchants. In 1529 the printing of Lutheran books was prohibited by a treaty between Henry VIII. and the Governors of the Netherlands. At length he was seized, at the instigation of Henry, when he went beyond the liberties of Antwerp, and was burnt by the order of the Emperor. The first part of the quarto edition of his translation of the New Testament reached England in 1526, the Pentateuch, in which he was assisted by Miles Coverdale, in 1530, and four editions of his New Testament were printed at Antwerp in 1534. About forty editions were afterwards published.

Tyrconnel, RICHARD TALBOT, EARL OF (d. 1691), was one of the most dissolute and abandoned of the persons attached to Charles II.'s court. In 1660 he took the lead in the infamous plot to defame the character of Anne Hyde. In 1677, after being engaged in a long course of devious intrigues, he was arrested as a Catholic conspirator, and banished. In 1685, however, he was restored to favour, and created Earl of Tyrconnel, and the following year sent to Ireland as Commander-in-Chief. He now became the champion of the Irish Catholics, and went to England, and tried to persuade James to repeal the Act of Settlement. He returned to Ireland in Feb., 1687, as Lord Deputy. The magistracy, the judicial bench, and the corporations were at once filled with Catholics, and the troops encouraged in all excesses against Protestants. When the news of James' flight reached Tyrconnel in 1689, he raised over 100,000 men, and in February Londonderry and Enniskillen alone held out against him. At the Boyne he commanded the Irish infantry. In 1690 he was for abandoning Limerick, and left it to its fate as far as he himself was concerned, and went to France. In the spring of 1691 he returned to Ireland, and was received with great respect, though the Irish had asked for a more energetic leader, and though it was known that he hated Sarsfield and St. Ruth. The fall of Athlone was attributed to his favouritism of Maxwell, and he had to leave the camp and go to Limerick. After Aghrim he was in better favour, but died in August, 1691.

Tyrell, SIR JAMES (d. 1502), was popularly supposed to have been the murderer of the young princes, Edward V. and Richard, Duke of York, when imprisoned by their uncle, Richard of Gloucester, in the Tower. The charge, however, is insufficiently supported by proof, and was not brought forward until after Tyrell's execution in 1502 as a confederate of the fugitive Earl of Suffolk. Tyrell had been for some time employed by Henry in the important position of Captain of Guisnes.

Tyrel, or Tirel, SIR WALTER, is generally credited with having accidentally slain William Rufus in the New Forest. Tirel himself denied the charge, but the facts that his name appears as the murderer in almost all the authorities for this period, and that he immediately fled across sea, seem to point to him as the actual homicide.

U

Uchtred of Galloway (d. circa 1178), the son of Fergus, joined his brother Gilbert in revolt against William the Lion (1174). A few months later he was murdered by his nephew Malcolm, at the instigation of Gilbert.

Udal, JOHN (d. 1592), a Puritan minister, was tried at Croydon for the publication of a work called A Demonstration of Discipline, which was alleged to be "a libel on the person of the queen, because it inveighed against the government of the Church established by her authority." Udal was condemned to death, but was spared at the intercession of Sir Walter Raleigh. He died in prison after his pardon had actually been made out.

Uffa, King of East Anglia, is said to have been the son of Wehla, the founder of the kingdom. From him the kings of the East Angles were considered to derive their descent, and for this reason were called Uffingas.

Uhtred, the son of Earl Waltheof, defeated the Scotch towards the commencement of the eleventh century, and thus saved the City of Durham (1006). For this he was rewarded with both the earldom of Deira and Bernicia. In 1013 he submitted to King Swegen, but in the course of the same year joined Edmund, only, however, to submit once more to Canute when that king gained the upper hand. Uhtred was, however, now murdered at the instigation of his old enemy Thurbrand (1016).

Ulf, Bishop of Dorchester, succeeded Eadnoth in the year 1049, much to the disgust of the Englishmen, who considered him utterly unfit for the office, and loathed him as a Norman. When Godwin returned in 1052, he fled, sword in hand, from London, and crossed over to the Continent, and was deprived of his see. He is spoken of as the bishop "who did nought bishop-like."

Ulf, EARL (d. circa 1025), is generally credited with having been instrumental in securing the rise of Godwin, who married his sister Gytta. His wife was Estrith, Canute's sister, but notwithstanding this relationship, he was put to death by this king somewhere about the year 1025.

Ulfcytel, ealdorman of the East Angles, led the men of his province against Swegen in 1004. The same year he and his Witan made peace with the invaders, but only so as to gain time. Before long he fought a drawn battle with the strangers. In 1010 he was defeated at Ringmere, mainly owing to the treachery of Thurcytel. Six years later he was slain at the battle of Assandun (1016).

Ulster, THE KINGDOM AND PROVINCE OF, appears to have been first colonised, at an unknown period, by Picts of Celtic origin. The great race movements which culminated in the formation of the over-kingdom of Meath by Tuathal [MEATH], affected the south rather than the north of Ireland; but about 335 A.D. we find some of his descendants invading Ulster from Meath with the countenance of the ard-ri (over-king), and winning for themselves the land of Uriel. They were followed, during the reign of Niall "of the nine hostages" (379—405), by other cadets of the reigning family, who became princes of Tyrconnel and Tyrone. With the arrival of St. Patrick (441), Ulster, which had lagged somewhat behind the rest of Ireland, received an extraordinary impetus, and became a centre whence large numbers of missionaries, chief of whom was St. Columba, issued forth to Britain and northern Europe. Ulster offered a rather more vigorous resistance to the invading Fingalls and Danes than did the rest of Ireland, and we find Murtogh O'Neill, about 950, making a triumphant circuit of Ireland. During the anarchy which preceded the Anglo-Norman invasion, the kings of Ulster were engaged in a long and arduous struggle with their Munster rivals, and Murtogh O'Loughlin, of the house of O'Neill, twice succeeded for a brief period in making himself over-king of Ireland (in 1148 and 1156). Ulster suffered little from the first invasion, and though Henry granted the province to De Courcy, he only succeeded in grasping a strip of land near Downpatrick. John, however, resumed the grant, and gave it to a younger member of the De Lacy family, through whose daughter and heiress it passed into the De Burgh family. After the murder of William, the third Earl of Ulster, in 1333, his heiress married Lionel, Duke of Clarence, and the earldom thus passed through females to the house of Mortimer, and to Richard, Earl of Cambridge, the grandfather of Edward IV., with whom it became vested in the crown. In the thirteenth century Ulster was practically independent. The English possessions were confined to the outskirts of Down, Antrim, and Fermanagh, and a town or two in Donegal. The invasion of the Bruces in 1315 was followed by the loss of even these paltry districts, and the O'Neills did what they pleased in Ulster before the accession of the Tudors. Under Henry VII. Turrough O'Donnell and Conn O'Neill were disposed to be friendly to the crown; the descendants of the latter chieftain became Earls of Tyrconnel, while the former was made Earl of Tyrone. When the first attempt to introduce the reformed doctrines was made, the primacy was transferred from Dublin to Armagh, where the O'Neills could protect it. The power of that race, however, was soon to be broken. The earldom of Tyrone was conferred by the government on Conn's bastard son Matthew, to the exclusion of his legitimate son Shane. The latter was, however, chosen chief by the tribe, and having murdered his brother, maintained his rights against the Lord-Lieutenant Sussex, partly by arms and partly by intrigue. For a while he was allowed to administer Ulster as "captain of Tyrone," and used the opportunity to oppress the O'Donnells and the M'Donnells, Scottish settlers in Antrim. These tribes promptly espoused the side of the new lord deputy, Sir Henry Sydney (1586), and Shane, out-manœuvred, was defeated and put to death by the M'Donnells. The earldom was granted to Matthew's son Hugh in 1587, and he was soon afterwards placed in possession of the territory. An able man, he formed a coalition, which relied on Spanish aid, of all the northern chiefs, together with the pretender to the honours of Kildare, against the English, and from 1595 to 1603 he waged a life and death struggle with the crown, which terminated in his submission on honourable terms. The province was, however, utterly ruined, and in the following reign he and his kinsman, the Earl of Tyrconnel, fled from Ireland in fear of the designs of the government. Six counties were thereupon declared to be forfeited to the crown, the minor chiefs were driven out on one pretence or another, and James set to work on the plantation of Ulster (q.v.), which was made with scientific precision, and was in consequence a success. Wentworth oppressed Ulster hardly less than the rest of Ireland, and he was especially severe on the Scottish Presbyterians. With the outbreak of the rebellion of 1641, Catholic Ulster at once sprang to arms under the brutal Sir Phelim O'Neill, who was afterwards superseded by Owen Roe O'Neill, a trained soldier. The latter in 1645 gained a considerable victory over Munroe, but the Irish parties began quarrelling among themselves, and Cromwell's work was easy. After the massacre of Drogheda, the chief towns of Ulster surrendered one after another, and the rebellion in that district was rapidly stamped out by Coote, the Protector's subordinate. By the Cromwellian settlement, the remaining Catholic gentry were transplanted into Connaught, or shipped to Barbadoes; the Presbyterians also of Down and Antrim, who had shown Royalist sympathies, were compelled to migrate to Munster. Of the lands thus vacated Antrim, Down, and Armagh were partitioned between adventurers and soldiers, and the rest of Ulster was colonised by the soldiers, who were allowed to remain practically undisturbed after the Restoration, though the Presbyterians suffered considerable persecution under the last of the Stuarts. Hence it can hardly be wondered that after the Revolution the Protestants of Ireland should have chosen Ulster as the spot on which to make a stand, and that Londonderry and Enniskillen should have held out against James. From that time forward Ulster remained distinct in character from the rest of Ireland. It was more prosperous, a valuable linen industry having been founded there by Huguenot refugees under William III., which a narrow mercantile policy was not able wholly to destroy, and which revived when in 1779 the Volunteers won free trade for Ireland. It was also emphatically Protestant, in spite of the persecution of the Presbyterians, who fled in large numbers across the Atlantic. Lastly it was emphatically loyal, though it was frequently disturbed by turbulent associations such as the Whiteboys, Peep-o'-day Boys, Orangemen, and the like, and though the United Irishmen of 1798, and the Fenians of a later date, drew recruits from Belfast and Londonderry almost as freely as from Cork or from Limerick. Since the Union the condition of Ulster has been on the whole peaceful and prosperous; but the Repeal agitation, and of late years the Home Rule movement (in which the Ulster Protestants have been on the side of England and the English connection), have perpetuated the distinction between it and the rest of Ireland.

ULSTER, THE PLANTATION OF. The troubles of the early years of the seventeenth century, the flight of Tyrconnel and Tyrone, and other rebellions, had resulted in the forfeiture of a very large part of Ulster to the crown. In 1608 a commission was appointed to consider what should be done with these large estates, and proposed to colonise the whole district with "retired civil and military servants," and with colonists from England and Scotland. Sir Arthur Chichester would have left the Irish in possession of their own territories, and only settled the new-comers here and there by agreement with them; but the commissioners recommended that large tracts should be completely handed over to the colonists, and taken away from the old inhabitants. In 1609 the scheme was ready. The escheated lands were divided into portions consisting of 1,000, 1,500, and 2,000 acres, and each large proprietor was bound to build a castle on his estate, and was forbidden to alienate his lands to Irishmen. Six counties were to be treated in this way—Tyrone, Coleraine, Donegal, Fermanagh, Cavan, and Armagh—and the natives were as a rule to be confined to the parts assigned to landholders of their own race, though in some cases they were allowed to remain on the grounds of the new-comers. Chichester, who was entrusted with the carrying out of these schemes, found himself in face of terrible difficulties, and could not secure that the natives should be treated with fairness and consideration. In 1610 he visited Ulster for the purpose of removing the Irish, and had to leave double garrisons behind him on his departure. In 1611 the work progressed better. The City of London had founded the colony of Derry, and everywhere things began to look more prosperous. It was even found possible to reduce the number of the troops. According to the original scheme, the division of the forfeited lands was to be as follows:—150,000 acres were to go to the English and Scotch Undertakers—who could have no Irish tenants; 45,500 acres to the servants of the crown in Ireland, with permission to have either Irish or English tenants; while 70,000 acres were to be left in the hands of the natives.

Ulster Massacre, THE. The Irish rebellion of 1641 began with a sudden attack on the English settlers in Ulster, and their violent expulsion from their holdings. According to the statement of Sir John Temple, 300,000 persons were destroyed between 1641 and the cessation of arms in 1643, of whom 150,000 perished in the first two months. Clarendon states that 40,000 or 50,000 of the English Protestants were "murdered before they suspected themselves to be in any danger or could provide for their defence." Other contemporary authorities give equally high figures. Mr. Lecky affirms that the figure of 300,000 exceeds by nearly a third the estimated number of Protestants in the whole island, and was computed to be more than ten times the number of Protestants that were living outside walled towns in which no massacre took place. Mr. Gardiner, while denying that there was any general massacre, or that the English were put to the sword in a body, considers that about 4,000 persons were put to death in cold blood, and about twice that number perished in consequence of the privation caused by their expulsion.

Umbeyle Campaign, THE. A fanatic conspiracy broke out in 1863 among the Sittana and other Afghan hill tribes. General Neville Chamberlain was unsuccessful against them, and was badly wounded in a battle near Umbeyle. Sir Hugh Rose then advanced against them, and General Garnock successfully assaulted Umbeyle and captured Mulka. On Christmas Day, 1863, the force retired, and the war was at an end.

Umritsar, THE TREATY OF (April 25, 1809), was concluded between the East India Company and Runjeet Singh. Its provisions were that the British government should have no concern with the territories and subjects of the Rajah north of the Sutlej; and that the Rajah should not commit any encroachments, or suffer any to be committed, on the possessions or rights of the chiefs under British protection south of it.

Underhill, EDWARD (d. circa 1549), known as the "Hot Gospeller," was a zealous Puritan, and one of the leaders of the insurgents in the western rebellion of 1549. He was imprisoned in Newgate by Queen Mary.

Undertakers, THE, sometimes called ADVENTURERS, were English gentlemen, chiefly from Devonshire, who undertook to keep possession of the lands forfeited to the crown in Ireland, or of lands which, though nominally the property of Englishmen, had been allowed to fall into Irish hands. The first attempt was made by a natural son of Sir Thomas Smith, in Ulster, about the year 1569; again by the Earl of Essex in 1575; but the result in both cases was failure. A similar attempt made by Sir Peter Carew and St. Leger in Munster, resulted in the outbreak of the great Geraldine rebellion. After its suppression the attempt was renewed; but this time the government insisted on two conditions, which were to be observed by the Adventurers; of which the principal were, that an English or Scottish family was to be settled on every 240 acres, and that no Irish tenants were to be admitted. But the "Undertakers," among whom were Sir W. Raleigh and Edmund Spenser, observed neither condition. Hence when O'Neill's revolt broke out (1596), they had to fly. In the beginning of James I.'s reign, however, they came back again in greater numbers.

Undertakers of 1614. When, in 1614, James I., crippled by a debt, which now amounted to £680,000, had determined to call a fresh Parliament, Sir Henry Neville and certain others offered to undertake that the House of Commons then to be elected would grant the king the large supplies of which he stood so greatly in need. Others engaged to secure the return of members whose views were strongly in favour of the royal prerogatives. The people by whose means the votes of the House were to be won over to meet the royal wishes were called by the name of Undertakers, but appear to have been men of little influence. James's best counsellors—Bacon, for example—were from the first distrustful of the scheme, and the king himself, in his opening speech, disowned his connection with the Undertakers. Again, seven years later, he refers to them as "a strange kind of beasts, called Undertakers—a name which in my nature I abhor."

Uniformity. THE FIRST ACT OF, was passed Jan. 15, 1549, in spite of the opposition of some of the bishops. It ordered the use of the Book of Common Prayer by all ministers on penalty of forfeiture of stipend, and six months' imprisonment, with heavier punishment for second and third offences. Learned persons were, however, permitted to use Latin, Greek, or even Hebrew for their own private advantage; while university chapels might hold all services (except the Communion) in the same tongue "for the further encouraging of learning." It was this Act that led in a great measure to the rebellion in the West of England in this year.

Uniformity. THE SECOND ACT OF (1559), "prohibited," says Mr. Hallam, "under pain of forfeiting goods and chattels for the first offence, of a year's imprisonment for the second, and of imprisonment during life for the third, the use by a minister, whether beneficed or not, of any but the established liturgy; and imposed a fine of one shilling on all who should absent themselves from Church on Sundays and holydays." It also confirmed the revised Book of Common Prayer, established by Edward VI., 1552, and inflicted heavy penalties on all who should make a mock of the new service, interrupt the minister, or have any other form used in Church.

Uniformity. THE THIRD ACT OF, was passed in 1662. This Act, after declaring that a universal agreement in the matter of public worship was conducive to the peace of the nation, bids all ministers in churches within the realm of England and Wales, use the Book of Common Prayer, and read the morning and evening prayers therein. All parsons, &c., holding any benefice, were publicly to read and declare their assent to the same book by St. Bartholomew's Day (1662), and if they refused were to be deprived of their livings. For the future all people presented to any benefice are to make a similar declaration. Every incumbent was to read the services publicly at least once a month, under pain of a fine of £5. Every dean, university reader, parson, or schoolmaster or private tutor, was to make declaration as to the unlawfulness of bearing arms against the king on any pretence whatever, and to deny the binding force of the Solemn League and Covenant. Schoolmasters and tutors were not to teach before obtaining a licence from the bishop or archbishop in whose diocese they were. No one who had not been episcopally ordained was to hold a benefice after St. Bartholomew's Day, 1662. Heads of colleges and lecturers were to subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles, and declare their assent to the Book of Common Prayer. In consequence of this Act more than 2,000 ministers resigned their preferments.

Union. [POOR LAWS.]

Union of England and Ireland (1800). After the suppression of the Rebellion of 1798, the Union had come to be recognised, not only in England, but also by many of the Irish, as a necessary measure, if only in order to save Ireland from itself. But the interests of the country did not outweigh the interests of individuals, and these latter were determined not to allow their own interests to be overlooked in the general well-being of the country. It at once became clear that the opposition of interested individuals would be fatal to the scheme, unless they were bought off. The English government accordingly set about the gigantic scheme of purchasing the Irish boroughs. Seats were paid for at the rate of £750 each, nor did the total sum paid as compensation for consent to the scheme amount to less than one million and a quarter. "Peers were further compensated for the loss of their privilege in the national council by profuse promises of English peerages, or promotion, in the peerage of Ireland. Commoners were conciliated by new honours, and by the largesses of the British government. Places were given or promised; pensions multiplied; secret service money exhausted." At length, by this wholesale system of political jobbing, the consent of the Irish Parliament was obtained, in spite of a few patriots, who still protested against "the sale of the liberties and free constitution of Ireland." The settlement of the terms of the Union did not occupy a long time. "Ireland was to be represented in Parliament by four spiritual lords sitting in rotation of sessions, by twenty-eight temporal peers elected for life by the Irish peerage, and by a hundred members of the House of Commons." The pledge to redress Catholic grievances, which had silenced the opposition of that portion of the community, had to wait thirty years for fulfilment, owing chiefly to the scruples of George III. But the restrictions on Irish commerce were removed, and her laws were administered with more justice and impartiality.

Union of England and Scotland.

For a century after the union of the crowns the two countries continued entirely separate kingdoms, with separate Parliaments. James I. and Bacon's attempt at legislative unity had proved signally unsuccessful. Under Cromwell the two nations had been for a time united under one legislature, but that union was severed at the Restoration, and Scotland replaced on the same independent footing as before. But after the Revolution it was seen that this state of things could not continue, and that as the two countries were now one in interest and in speech, they must also become one in law. The wisdom of William showed him the necessity of a complete amalgamation of his two kingdoms, but his death cut short his plans for carrying it out. Religious and commercial jealousies were still further impediments. The religious difficulty was an internal obstacle in Scotland itself. The hatred between the contending sects of Episcopacy and Presbyterianism had been fostered by the persecutions of the Restoration, and now each sect wished to be in the ascendant, and neither could brook the toleration of the other. The commercial difficulty lay between the two countries, and showed that the old feeling of hostility between them was not extinguished, and might on slight provocation again burst into flame. The English grudged the Scotch the advantages of an equal share of the trade with the colonies, and the Scotch refused to bear their part of the national debt. The Scotch Act of Security of 1703 showed only too plainly the unsatisfactory state of public feeling. From this Act the name of the Princess Sophia, the acknowledged heiress of the English throne, was omitted, and the proviso was made that no sovereign of England should be acknowledged in Scotland without giving full security for the preservation of the religious and trading liberties of that country. Jealousy of their country's independence led the Whigs to make common cause with the Jacobites, and in case of the queen's death there was great danger of both uniting in an effort for the restoration of the Stuarts. It was clear that a union was the only possible means of allaying the apprehension of a civil war. That the union was accomplished so successfully was due to the management of Somers. The Scotch proposal that the union should be federal was set aside, and it was resolved that as the two nations had virtually become one people, united by community of interests, so they should now become one in point of law, and as they already had one and the same sovereign, so they should have one and the same legislature. Commissioners from both kingdoms were empowered to draw up the Articles of Union, which were twenty-five in number. The chief provisions of these articles were that on May 1, 1707, England and Scotland should be united in one kingdom, bearing the name of Great Britain; that the succession to the crown of Scotland should be in all points the same as had been settled for England; that the United Kingdom should be represented by one Parliament; that thenceforward there should be community of rights and privileges between the two kingdoms, except where otherwise agreed upon by the Parliament; that all standards of coin, weights, and measures in Scotland should be assimilated to those of England; that the laws of trade, customs, and excise should be the same in both countries; that all other laws of Scotland should remain unchanged, but with the provision that they might be altered in time to come at the discretion of the united Parliament. To these articles was added an Act of Security for the maintenance of the Scottish Church and the four universities. This Act required each sovereign on his or her accession to take an oath to protect the Presbyterian Church as the established Church of Scotland. The whole judicial machinery for the administration of the Scottish law system remained untouched, but henceforward there would be a possibility of appeal from the decisions of the Court of Sessions to the House of Lords. In the Parliament of Great Britain Scotland was to be represented by forty-five members sent up by the Commons, and sixteen peers elected by their fellows as representatives of the peerage of Scotland. The Articles of Union received the royal assent, and the first Parliament of Great Britain met Oct. 23, 1707. A standard, on which were blended the flags of both nations, the crosses of St. Andrew and St. George, which had been first projected by James VI. under the name of the Union Jack, was adopted as the national flag of the United Kingdom.

United Irishmen, THE. The plan on which this society was afterwards constituted was sketched by Russel and Wolfe Tone. Its object was to be the establishment of the "rights of man," and correspondence with the Jacobin Club in Paris, and the English Revolution Society. Reform and Catholic Emancipation were to be among its immediate objects. On July 14, 1790, it was organised, but its first actual meeting took place at the Eagle in Dublin on Nov. 9. Hamilton Rowan and Wolfe Tone were the leaders; Napper Tandy was secretary. After the French victories in 1792, they began openly to talk of rebellion, and raised a national guard. The meeting of the Catholic Committee was thought to be the signal of war, but Fitz-Gibbon declaring the national guard illegal, only three men assembled in defiance of his proclamation. In the north the society made much show in green uniforms, but were disarmed in 1793. An attempt at a representative assembly was foiled by the Convention Bill. In 1794 they again began secretly to prepare for revolt. Their organisation, now secret, consisted of county committees, baronial committees, and elementary bodies, with an executive directory of five members at their head. The heads of these bodies were changed every fortnight, and they only corresponded with and knew of their superiors. They had about a million members, but the very perfection of their organisation was its great fault, as the seizure of a few leaders would paralyse the whole body. One of their chief schemes was to debauch the fidelity of the Dublin garrison, and though they were unsuccessful in this, the militia were almost entirely theirs. In 1796 Hoche, whom Lord Edward Fitzgerald and O'Connor went to see, promised them French help, and they boasted at that time that they could muster 200,000 men. The seizure of Keogh in Dublin, and of others in Belfast, however, paralysed them, and when the French were at Bantry the country remained quiet. In 1797 they had reorganised themselves, but General Lake, by disarming Ulster, again disabled them. This last step was taken in consequence of the report of a secret committee of the House of Commons; and at the same time a free pardon was promised to all the United Irishmen who surrendered before June 24. The Dublin men refused to rise at once, and in consequence the men of Ulster submitted. In 1798 the Catholics, with the concurrence of the Dublin committee, prepared to rise, but again the arrest of their leaders disconcerted their plans.

United Kingdom. The adoption by James I. of the title "King of Great Britain" instead of "of England and Scotland," was part of his wider plan of bringing about complete union between the two kingdoms. As early as April, 1604, the English Parliament was asked to consent to the change of style. But fears were expressed lest the laws and liberties of England might not hold good in the new realm of Britain, and the Commons urged that some agreement as to the terms of the union should precede the assumption of the title. James yielded to the advice of Cecil, and deferred the change. Bacon, in Considerations Touching the Union, which he laid before the king in the autumn, suggested that it would be better to proceed by proclamation: "the two difficulties are point of honour and love to the former names, and the doubt lest the alteration may induce and involve an alteration in the laws and policies of the kingdom. Both which, if your majesty shall assume the style by proclamation and not by Parliament, are satisfied; for then the usual names must needs remain in writs and records, the forms whereof cannot be altered but by Act of Parliament, and so the point of honour satisfied. And, again, your proclamation altereth no law, and so the scruple of a tacit or implied alteration of laws likewise satisfied." Accordingly on Oct. 20 James issued a proclamation: "As an imperial monarchy of these two great kingdoms doth comprehend the whole island, so it shall keep in all ensuing ages the united denomination of the invincible monarchy of Great Britain, and, therefore, by the force of our royal prerogative we assume to ourselves the style and title of King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland . . . to be used in all proclamations, missives, treaties, leagues, dedications, &c.;" and the inscription "J. D. G. Mag. Brit. F. et H. R." was placed on the coinage. James was, however, balked in his attempt to bring about union, and the title did not receive Parliamentary sanction till it was adopted for the United Kingdom of England and Scotland in 1707. By the Act of Union (with Ireland), 39 & 40 Geo. III., c. 67 (July, 1800), the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland were constituted the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, which has been the official designation since.

United States, RELATIONS WITH.
[AMERICAN COLONIES; AMERICAN WAR OF INDEPENDENCE; AMERICAN WAR.]

Universities. The word universitas is in Roman Law the synonym of collegium. In the Middle Ages it was originally used of any body of men when spoken of in their collective capacity; but it gradually became appropriated to those guilds or corporations either of masters or of scholars, the earliest of which originated in that great revival of intellectual activity throughout Europe which began at the end of the eleventh or the beginning of the twelfth century. The idea of a university may be said to have originated at Bologna, where a university of students was formed in the course of the twelfth century. The schools of Paris date their pre-eminent position from the teaching of Abelard in the first half of the twelfth century; but there is no trace of the formation of an organised society or university of masters till towards the close of the twelfth century.

Oxford was the earliest of the universities organised after the model of Paris, though in the division of the faculty of arts into Australes (South-countrymen) and Boraeales (North-countrymen), each under its "Proctor" (who at the daughter-university of Cambridge long retained the name of "Rector"), there seems a trace of an earlier organisation on the model of the two universities, each with its own rector, of Ultramontani and Citramontani at Bologna. The legend which attributes the foundation of the University of Oxford, and even of University College, to Alfred the Great, is supported only by documents now known to be forged or interpolated. There is no trace of any schools of the smallest reputation at Oxford till about the year 1232, when the Paris doctor of theology, Robert Pulleyn, is said to have taught there. In about 1250 the Italian jurist Vacarius introduced the study of Roman Law. At the beginning of the following century we find the university fully organised on the model of Paris, with some important differences. At Paris the masters had to obtain their licence to teach, or degree, from the Chancellor of the Cathedral or of St. Geneviève. At Oxford the chancellor was chosen by the masters, but derived his authority from the bishop of the distant see of Lincoln. He, in fact, united the functions of the chancellor and the rector at Paris, and eventually became more powerful than either. He was from the first an ecclesiastical judge in cases affecting scholars. After the great "Town" and "Gown" battle of 1209, in which three scholars were hanged by the townsmen, the university gained its first royal charter of privilege, and its chancellor obtained a civil and criminal, as well as an ecclesiastical, jurisdiction. Each of those sanguinary street-fights, with bow and arrow, or sword and dagger, between clerks and townsmen, which make up the history of mediæval Oxford, ended in the humiliation of the town and some accession to the privileges of the university. The chancellor eventually acquired (subject to an appeal to the university) cognisance of all cases in which a scholar was one party, except in cases of homicide or main.

The students (who usually began their arts course at thirteen or fifteen) at first lived sometimes in lodgings with townsmen, but usually in "halls" or "inns," which were boarding-houses kept by a master. In 1249, William of Durham left a legacy to provide pensions for four Masters of Arts studying theology, a foundation which developed into "University College." Some time between 1263 and 1268, Balliol College was founded for poor students in arts, by John Balliol and Dervorgilla, his wife. It was, however, the far larger foundation, in 1264, of Walter de Merton, Bishop of Rochester, which really originated the English college system. The foundation of Exeter followed in 1314, Oriel (by Edward II.) in 1326, Queen's (named after Queen Philippa by Robert Eglesfield her chaplain) in 1340. William of Wykeham's splendid foundation (1386), still known as New College, introduces a new era in college-building. After the foundation of Lincoln in 1427 came All Souls' (1437), and Magdalen in 1458, founded, the former by Archbishop Chichele, the latter by William of Waynflete, both Wykehamists, and imitators of Wykeham. Brasenose was founded in 1509, Corpus Christi—designed to foster the "New Learning"—by Bishop Fox, in 1516. Christ Church was begun under the name of Cardinal College by Wolsey, and completed by Henry VIII. in 1546. Trinity (1554), which occupies the site of an earlier college for Durham monks, and St. John's (1555) are the offspring of the Marian reaction: Jesus (1571), Wadham (1609), and Pembroke (1624) of the Reformation. Worcester, on the site of the hall once occupied by Gloucester monks, dates from 1714. Keble, founded in 1870, is the monument of the "Oxford movement." The ancient Magdalen Hall was endowed and incorporated as Hertford College in 1874.

The colleges had originally been intended only as a means of support for poor scholars; but their superior discipline led to the practice of sending wealthier boys as "commoners," or paying boarders, to them. The Reformation for a time nearly emptied the university; most of the halls disappeared, and the code of statutes imposed upon the university during the chancellorship of Laud, completed its transformation into a mere aggregate of colleges, by giving the "Hebdomadal Council" of heads of houses the sole initiative in university legislation.

From the time of the Restoration learning declined, and in the eighteenth century Oxford gradually sank into a state of intellectual torpor. The first sign of reviving life is the foundation of "Honour Schools," in classics and mathematics in 1807. And the "Oxford movement" gave a great impulse to the intellectual, as well as the ecclesiastical, activity of the university. The era of University Reform begins with the appointment of a Royal Commission of Inquiry in 1850. The Act of 1854 abolished the subscription to the Articles hitherto required at matriculation and on admission to the B.A. degree, and appointed an executive commission which abolished the local restrictions of scholarships and fellowships. The abolition of tests for the higher degrees was delayed till 1871. The commission of 1877 founded or augmented professorships at the expense of the colleges, limited the tenure of "idle" fellowships, and almost completely removed clerical restrictions.

The stories which attribute the foundation of CAMBRIDGE to Cantaber, a mythical Spanish prince, or to Sigebert, King of the East Angles in the seventh century, are among the stupidest of historical fabrications. The first authentic notice of Cambridge as a seat of learning is in 1209, when some of the students who left Oxford, in consequence of the disturbances of that year, established themselves at Cambridge. In 1229 came an immigration of students who had left Paris on account of the great quarrel of that university with the Friars. To this year belongs the first legal recognition of the university and its chancellor. It now appears to be organised after the model of Oxford.

The history of mediæval Cambridge is marked by the same struggle for independence against the bishop, and the same sanguinary street-fights between "Town" and "Gown," or North and South, as that of Oxford, and the chancellor gradually acquired nearly the same jurisdiction as at Oxford. The exemption of the university from the jurisdiction of the bishop and of the metropolitan was not, however, fully established till 1434. The statutes by which the university has been nominally governed down to the present century were imposed upon it by royal authority in 1570, chiefly through the influence of Whitgift, then Master of Trinity. They virtually destroyed the democratic government of the masters by the large powers which they conferred upon the heads of colleges.

In mediæval times Cambridge had never enjoyed the European celebrity of Oxford; but the English Reformation was a Cambridge movement. From that time, but still more conspicuously after the Restoration, to the present century, the superiority in intellectual activity was, as Macaulay boasts, "on the side of the less ancient and less splendid university." It was, in the main, the impulse given to mathematical study by Sir Isaac Newton, long resident in the university as Fellow of Trinity and Professor of Mathematics, which saved Cambridge from the stagnation of eighteenth-century Oxford. The lists of the Mathematical "Tripos" date from 1747. The Classical Tripos was founded in 1824.

The first college at Cambridge, Peterhouse, was founded by Hugh Balsham, Bishop of Ely, in the year 1257, upon the model of Merton College, Oxford, the rule of Merton being constantly appealed to in the statutes. Michaelhouse (now extinct) was founded in 1324, Clare in 1326, the King's Hall by Edward III. in 1327, Pembroke in 1347, Gonville (called Gonville and Caius since its refoundation by Dr. Caius in 1558) in 1348, Trinity Hall in 1350, Corpus Christi by the Cambridge guilds of Corpus Christi and of St. Mary in 1352. King's was founded in 1441 by Henry VI., out of the revenues of the suppressed "alien Priories." Queens' owes its origin (1448) to his consort, Margaret of Anjou, being re-founded in 1466 by Elizabeth Widville, consort of Edward IV. St. Catherine's was founded in 1473; Jesus in 1496; Christ's (incorporating an earlier college for training schoolmasters called God's House) in 1505; St. John's, on the site of the suppressed Hospital of St.

John, in 1511; Magdalene in 1519. Trinity College (from its foundation the leading college in the University) was erected by Henry VIII. in 1546, on the site of the suppressed Michaelhouse and King's Hall. Emmanuel was founded by a Puritan in 1584; Sidney Sussex dates from 1598, Downing from 1800. Selwyn has recently been added to the list of Cambridge colleges. The legislation of 1850, 1856, 1871, and 1877, in regard to Cambridge, has been similar to that in regard to Oxford.

The first Scottish university was founded at St. Andrews, in 1411, by Archbishop Henry Wardlaw. It owed its existence in a measure to the schism in the papacy, in which Scotland adhered to the French Popes of Avignon, and England to the Roman line. Although exempted from the obligation of acknowledging Clement VII., the schism added to the unpopularity and consequent ill-treatment to which Scottish students had always been more or less exposed at Oxford. At St. Andrews the bishop and his successors were appointed chancellors. The head of the university, however, was (as in all the Continental universities), the Lord Rector, who was and still is elected by the students. St. Salvator's College was founded by Bishop Kennedy, in 1456, that of St. Leonard by the boy-Archbishop Stewart and Prior Hepburn, in 1512. These two colleges are now amalgamated. The foundation of St. Mary's or "New College," was begun by Archbishop James Beaton in 1537, and completed by his two immediate successors.

The University of GLASGOW was founded in 1450 by Bishop Turnbull. The bishops were constituted chancellors. As at Paris the university was divided into four "nations," whose "Proctors" elected the Rector. In the sixteenth century the university fell into complete decay. Its revival dates from the appointment of the accomplished humanist, Andrew Melville, to the principalship of the "College of Glasgow," within the university, endowed out of Church estates placed at the disposal of the Town Council by Queen Mary. Henceforth the university and college became practically identical. The principalship of Melville marks the close of the mediæval or Aristotelian period in Scottish education. By him the study of Greek and the Logic of Ramus were first introduced into the universities. Classical scholarship, and especially Greek, have, however, never flourished in the Scottish universities. The prominence still accorded to Moral Philosophy and Logic in their curriculum, remains a witness to their mediæval origin.

The University of ABERDEEN was founded in 1494 by Bishop Elphinstoun. The foundation of Aberdeen was designed to be a means of civilising the Highlands and educating its clergy. A small college, subsequently called King's College, was provided for by the founder.

Marischal College was founded in 1593. Its assumed power of conferring degrees was recognised by Parliament in 1621.

What is now the University of EDINBURGH has grown out of the College of Edinburgh, founded in 1582 by the Town Council on the model of Calvin's "Academy" at Geneva. The power of conferring degrees seems to have been from the first assumed by the college (unless it was conferred by some lost charter), and was recognised by Act of the Scottish Parliament in 1621. The College eventually came to be called a "University." It remained under the government of the Town Council till the present century, but is now organised like the other Scottish universities, the administration resting chiefly with the professors.

The idea of founding a university at DURHAM dates from the days of Oliver Cromwell, who actually established a college there, which would have been erected into a university but for the opposition of the two old universities. The present university was founded by the Dean and Chapter of Durham in 1831, incorporated by royal charter, and liberally endowed with a portion of the caputular estates. There are two colleges at Durham, University College and Hatfield Hall; and the Colleges of Medicine and Physical Science at Newcastle-on-Tyne are fully incorporated with the university.

The University of LONDON differs from the older English and Scottish universities, in being a purely examining body, having no resident students, and no teaching staff. It examines and grants degrees in arts, science, laws, and literature, to men and women students alike. It was founded by Royal Charters and Act of Parliament in 1826.

VICTORIA University, to consist of Owens College, Manchester, and other colleges in the North of England, received a royal charter in 1880.

The University Education Act (Ireland) of 1879, provided for the dissolution of the "Queen's University" (founded 1850), and for the foundation of the Royal University of Ireland, which received its charter in 1880.

University Bill, THE IRISH. The essence of this measure as introduced by Mr. Gladstone in 1873 was, that the exclusive connection between Trinity College, Dublin, and the University of Dublin, was to cease, and that that college, as well as Sir Robert Peel's Queen's Colleges, excepting that at Galway—which was to be dissolved—and also several Roman Catholic seminaries, were to be placed in the same position regarding the university as an Oxford or Cambridge college. The bill, however, was soon opposed on all sides, the Roman Catholic clergy and the Dissenters being unfavourable to it, and the second reading was lost by 287 to 284.

Ushant, THE BATTLE OF, was fought on July 27, 1778, between the English and French fleets. The former, under the command of Keppel, consisted of thirty vessels; the latter of thirty-two. After a fight which lasted three hours, each fleet returned to its own harbour, without having captured or destroyed one of their opponent's ships. There was a general outcry against so dishonourable an engagement, and Keppel attempted to throw the blame of his ill-success upon his subordinate, Palliser, who recriminated upon his chief. Finally Sir Hugh Palliser brought definite charges against the admiral, and a court-martial was held, which, however, resulted in the acquittal of Keppel. The dispute between the two naval officers, of whom Keppel represented the Whig Opposition and Palliser the court party, was made an instrument of political agitation, and when Keppel was acquitted, London was illuminated for two nights.

Ussher, JAMES, Archbishop of Armagh (b. 1580, d. 1656), was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and was ordained in 1601. In 1615 he was employed in drawing up articles for the Irish Church; and five years later was appointed Bishop of Meath, from which post he was promoted in 1624 to be Archbishop of Armagh. When the Irish Rebellion broke out he escaped to England, when the king gave him the bishopric of Carlisle. He was in attendance on Charles I. at Oxford, and from 1646 to 1654 he was preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. His chief historical work is entitled Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates, a work of great learning and research.

Utrecht, THE PEACE OF, was signed March 31, 1713. Several times during the War of the Spanish Succession negotiations had been set on foot between England and France. In 1706, after the battle of Ramillies, Louis suggested a new partition treaty, "by which he would consent to acknowledge Queen Anne in England, to give the Dutch the barrier they demanded, to grant great commercial advantages to the maritime powers, and to surrender Spain and the Indies to the Archduke Charles, if only he could preserve for his grandson, Philip, a kingdom in Italy consisting of Milan, Naples, and Sicily." But the Emperor saw that the Dutch barrier would be taken from the Spanish dominions in the Netherlands, and therefore from his son; and Marlborough was anxious to continue the war for his own sake.

The Dutch were therefore induced to reject the demands. In 1709, after the battle of Oudenarde, the French king again tried to treat. The allies now demanded the resignation of the whole of the Spanish succession, together with the restoration of Newfoundland to England. Louis represented that his grandson would refuse to be altogether crownless. Thereupon the allies demanded that if Philip would not resign Spain within two months, Louis was to pledge himself to join the allies in expelling him thence. Next year the negotiations of the previous year were resumed at Gertruydenburg. In the interval the French had fought and lost the battle of Malplaquet. The demands of the previous year were renewed, but at length the English and Dutch waived the point of the assistance of Louis in ejecting his grandson. But the opposition of Savoy and Austria rendered general negotiations impossible. In Jan., 1711, for the first time, proposals were made from the side of the allies. In Jan., 1712, the congress of Utrecht opened. By April, 1713, all the treaties were signed except that between France and the Empire and Emperor. In the course of 1714 they also were concluded at Rastadt and Baden. The terms of the principal treaties were: (1) Between England and France. The Protestant succession, through the house of Hanover, was secured; the Pretender was to be compelled to quit France; a permanent severance of the crowns of France and Spain was solemnly promised; Newfoundland, Acadia, and the Hudson's Bay Territory were ceded to England. (2) The Dutch secured a strong fortress barrier; the Spanish Netherlands were handed over to them, and Lille was given back to France. (3) The Duke of Savoy secured Sicily and the title of king. (4) The treaty between Spain and England, signed in July, granted to England the possession of Gibraltar and Minorca [BARRIEN TREATY]; by the Assiento, a contract signed at Madrid, the grant of slave trade was withdrawn from France and given to England.

Dumont, Recueil de Traittés; Locky, Hist. of the Eighteenth Century.

Uxbridge, THE TREATY OF (Jan. and Feb., 1645), is the name given to the futile attempts at an understanding made between the commissioners of the king and the Parliament at the beginning of 1645. But it was soon evident that the demands of the Parliamentary party were too exorbitant to be granted, for they demanded not only the abolition of episcopacy, but also the establishment of the Directory instead of the Book of Common Prayer. To these requirements they added the command of the army and navy, and the renewal of hostilities in Ireland. The king was by no means prepared to go such lengths, and after some three weeks had been wasted, it was once more seen that the final appeal would have to be made to the sword.

Vacornagi, THE, were an ancient British tribe who possessed the country forming the modern shires of Banff, Elgin, and Nairn, with the east part of Inverness and Braemar in Aberdeenshire. They are mentioned by Ptolemy as lying between the Dumnonii and the Moray Firth, and, according to Professor Rhys, extended "from the Ness to the upper course of the Dee, and from the Moray Firth into the heart of Perthshire."

Rhys, Celtic Britain.

Vagabonds, THE ACT AGAINST (1704), empowered all justices of the peace to arrest such able-bodied men as should be found wandering about without any lawful calling or visible means of subsistence, and hand them over as recruits to her Majesty's officers. It was strongly approved of by Marlborough, who hoped thereby to recruit his army, but was bitterly opposed by Nottingham. It was opposed in the House of Commons, chiefly, however, because of the objection felt by the Tories towards a standing army. In the Upper House the bill was made the occasion for attacking the mean conduct of Sir Nathan Wright.

Vagrancy Acts. Enactments against vagrancy began with the Statutes of Labourers (the first in 1349), which aimed at securing cheap labour, and treated the labourers who wandered in search of better terms as criminals. By the Act of 1388—the origin of the English poor law—the labourer was forbidden to leave the hundred where he served without a passport from his hundred declaring the cause of his journey. In 1414 justices of the peace were empowered to recover fugitive labourers by writ in whatever part of the country they might be, and were given summary jurisdiction over all offences committed by them. Tudor legislation on the subject is "written in blood," and marks the terror felt in the break-up of mediæval society at the bands of vagrants wandering over the country. The Act of 1530 empowered justices and borough magistrates to cause able-bodied vagrants "to be tied to the end of a cart naked, and be beaten with whips throughout the town till their bodies were bloody." Five years later it was added that they were to be set to labour; "ruttlers," i.e., vagabonds calling themselves serving men, were to have their ears mutilated, and for the second offence to be hanged. By the Act of 1547 the vagrant was to be branded, and given as a slave for two years to anyone who asked for him, and if no one would take him he was to be sent back to his birthplace, and set to work on the highways, if necessary in chains. But this was felt to be too severe, and in 1549 the statute was repealed, and the previous Acts again came into force. The Act of 1597 ordering vagrants to be whipped, sent to their place of settlement, and there placed in the house of correction, and that of 1604, adding the branding of incorrigible rogues, remained in force till 1713. The present law is based on the Act of 1744 and 1824, by which the definitions of rogue and vagabond have been widely extended, and attempts made to distinguish between various classes of offences. It is scarcely necessary to add that imprisonment for short periods has taken the place of whipping and branding. "It may now be almost stated as a general proposition that any person of bad character who prowls about, apparently for an unlawful purpose, is liable to be treated as a rogue and a vagabond."

Valence, AYLMER DE (d. 1260), son of Hugh de Lusignan and Isabella, was in 1250 elected Bishop of Winchester. His unpopularity was very great, both with the barons and the clergy, and he was driven out of England in 1258. His quarrel with Boniface of Savoy in 1252 is one of the most noteworthy incidents in his life. It was said that at a parting banquet, just before leaving England, in 1258, he attempted to poison some of his chief opponents, but this assertion rests on no very authentic basis.

Valence, ATLMER DE, EARL OF PEMBROKE (d. 1324), was the son of William de Valence (q.v.). He was placed by Edward I. in command of the army against Robert Bruce, and succeeded in surprising him at Methven, but in 1307 he was defeated by the Scots at Loudon Hill. Shortly after the death of Edward I. he resigned his command in Scotland, and became one of the royal ministers. He was one of the Ordainers (1310), and was present at the battle of Bannockburn (1314). He strongly opposed Gaveston, and took him prisoner at Scarborough, but it was without his knowledge that the favourite was seized by Warwick, and beheaded without trial. This violent conduct on the part of Warwick and Lancaster alienated Pembroke, who then endeavoured to form a middle party between Lancaster and the king, and from May, 1318, to 1321 may be regarded as prime minister. He opposed Lancaster in 1322, and was one of the judges before whom he was tried. In 1324 he was sent over to France by the king, where he died—murdered, it was said, by the orders of Queen Isabella.

Valence, WILLIAM DE (d. 1296), was the son of Hugh de Lusignan and Isabella, widow of King John, and consequently half-brother to Henry III., from whom he received the earldom of Pembroke. He made himself extremely unpopular in England, and in 1258 was expelled from the country. He subsequently returned, fought for the king, and after the battle of Lewes had to flee, while his lands were confiscated. The defeat of the barons restored him his possessions, and he subsequently received large grants of land from the crown.

Valentia, or VALENTIANA, was the Roman name of the district between the Wall of Severus and that of Antoninus, and comprised the Lowlands of Scotland, Northumberland, and Cumberland. In 369 the country between the two walls was won back from the Celtic tribes by Theodosius, and given its new name, Valentia, in honour of the Emperor Valens. Mr. Skene is inclined to throw considerable doubts upon the generally-accepted proposition that Valentia lay between the two walls, and suggests that it was in reality Wales.

Val-es-Dunes, THE BATTLE OF (1047), was fought between Duke William of Normandy, aided by King Henry I. of France, and the rebellious Norman barons. William's victory was complete, and firmly established his power. Val-es-Dunes, the scene of the battle, is a broad plain not far from Caen.

Valetta, LA, the capital of Malta (q.v.), was besieged from Sept., 1798, to Sept., 1800, by a force of Maltese and English, who were anxious to drive the French out of the island. After being reduced to the verge of starvation the French garrison, commanded by General Vaubois, were compelled to surrender to General Pigot.

Vancouver's Island, on the west coast of North America, was in 1849 granted to the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1859 it became a crown colony, and in 1866 was incorporated with British Columbia (q.v.), whilst five years later the whole province became part of the Dominion of Canada (q.v.). Its provincial government is similar to that of the other provinces of the Dominion, and consists of a lieutenant-governor, an executive council, and a legislative assembly. The capital of the island is Victoria, and the chief sources of its wealth are gold and coal. The construction of the Canada Pacific Railway will increase its importance and favour its development in no ordinary degree.

Van Diemen's Land. [AUSTRALIA.]

Vane, SIR HENRY, THE ELDER (b. 1589, d. 1654), was employed on diplomatic business by Charles I., and subsequently became treasurer of the royal household. In 1639 he was appointed Secretary of State, through the queen's influence. He was a bitter opponent of Strafford, and one of the chief instruments in his conviction. He held his secretaryship till Nov., 1641, though he decidedly inclined towards the Opposition in Parliament, but retired into private life after being deprived of his offices. Clarendon says that he was the last of the king's counsellors who stayed with Parliament, and that,

"though he concurred in all the malicious designs against the king, and against the Church, he grew into the hatred and contempt of those who had made most use of him, and died in universal reproach."

Vane, SIR HENRY (b. 1612, d. 1662), the son of Sir Henry Vane, Comptroller of the King's Household, was educated at Westminster School and Magdalen Hall, Oxford. In 1635 he emigrated to Massachusetts, of which colony he was elected governor, but after a year's tenure of the office his advocacy of unlimited religious liberty lost him his post, and he returned to England in 1637. In the Long Parliament he became one of the leaders of the Root and Branch party, and his evidence played an important part in Strafford's trial. In July, 1643, Vane was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate the alliance with Scotland, and it was by his skill that the clause "according to the Word of God," was inserted in the Solemn League and Covenant. In the Parliament Vane was recognised throughout as one of the ablest leaders of the Independents, and sided with that party and with the army against the Presbyterians in 1647. Vane disapproved of the violation of the Parliament by Pride's Purge, and took no part in the king's trial. He was chosen as a member of the Council of State of the Republic, but refused the proposed oath approving of the punishment of the king. As head of the commission governing the navy, and chairman of the committee for drawing up the scheme for the constitution of a new Parliament, he played a very important part during this period; but his persistency in pressing forward the passing of his measure, and refusing Cromwell's plan, led the general to expel the Rump (1653). In 1656 he wrote a tract entitled A Healing Question Propounded, proposing the calling of a general convention to establish a free constitution, for which he was summoned before the Protector's council, and imprisoned at Carisbrooke for three months. In Richard Cromwell's Parliament, Vane represented Whitchurch, and headed the opposition to the new government. When the restored Rump quarrelled with the army, Vane took part with the army, and acted in the Council of State established by it. On the second restoration of the Rump, Vane was punished by being expelled from Parliament (Jan., 1660), and relegated to his estates in Durham. On the return of the king he was arrested (July, 1660), and wholly excepted from the amnesty, though it was agreed that the two Houses should petition Charles to spare his life. After two years' imprisonment he was tried (June, 1662), and sentenced to death, the king thinking, as he wrote to Clarendon, that he was too dangerous a man to live if he could honestly be put out of the way. He was executed on June 14, 1662.

Vansittart, HENRY, was a Madras civilian selected to succeed Clive in the government of Bengal (1760). He determined to depose Meer Jaffier and place Meer Cossim as ruler in his stead. In this plan, however, he was opposed by several members of his council. His attempts to force revenue reforms on Meer Cossim ended in the massacre of Patna (q.v.), and the restoration of Meer Jaffier. Notwithstanding the ill-success which attended his measures generally, Mr. Vansittart seems to have been a man of very good intentions. He attempted to check the illegitimate trading which the Company's servants carried on for their own benefit. In 1765 he returned to Europe, and in 1769 was appointed one of a company of three "Supervisors" sent out to India by the Company for the purposes of investigation and reform. On their voyage to Hindostan the frigate in which these gentlemen were embarked, disappeared in an unaccountable way, nothing having ever been heard of its unfortunate passengers from that day.

Varaville, THE BATTLE OF (1058), was fought by William of Normandy against the combined forces of France and Anjou. The latter were completely routed, and shortly afterwards peace was made. Varaville is on the Dive, not far from Falaise.

Vassalage is a word signifying the condition of feudal dependence. The term vassus (from a Celtic word originally meaning "a growing youth") appears first in Merovingian chronicles and charters in the sense of an unfree person, while in the Carolingian period it is used for a freeman who has commended himself to some more powerful person or corporation. Commendation was symbolised by the act of homage, which was accompanied by an oath of fealty. But at first the relation was a purely personal one, and implied no change in the ownership of the land. It was only when the beneficiary tie, that relation which arose from the grant of a benefice with the obligation of service, was united to commendation that the status known in the later Middle Ages as vassalage was perfected.

Frank feudalism arose then principally from the union of the beneficial system and commendation. Though commendation frequently occurs in England, its part in the creation of the English nobility by service, and of the semi-feudal condition of things immediately before the Conquest, is of comparatively small importance as compared with that of the comitatus and that of the English judicial system. The word vassus, or vassalus, is of very rare occurrence before the Conquest; though as early as Alfred the term is applied by Asser to the thanes of Somerset. The Conquest itself universalised a feudal tenure of land of the Continental type, and with the thing came the name. [FEUDALISM.]

VAVASSOUR (Fr. Vavasseur) was a small landowner. The word has been variously explained as signifying a person next in dignity to a baron, or merely a middle-class proprietor. Probably a vavassour is correctly defined as "a sub-vassal holding a small fief." The word is used in the prologue to the Canterbury Tales in reference to the Franklin.

Vellore Mutiny, THE (July, 1806). Vellore, a fortress eighty-eight miles west of Madras, had been selected as the residence of the family of Tippoo (q.v.). Here they were treated with great liberality by the English government, and subjected to little personal restraint; but made use of their opportunities to foment a deep spirit of disaffection in the native army—a design in which they were greatly aided by various innovations introduced by the adjutant-general into the military code. The Sepoys, for instance, had been forbidden to appear on parade with earrings, or any distinctive marks of caste; and were also required to shave the chin and trim the moustache after a particular model. These unnecessary orders were particularly vexatious, but it was a new form prescribed for the turban which gave the greatest offence because it was said to bear a resemblance to a European hat. The intrigues of the Tippoo family brought the affair to a head, and the insurrection broke out early in July, 1806, by the seizure of the powder magazine and the assault of the European barracks. The Sepoys, however, not daring to face the English soldiers at close quarters, kept up a murderous fire from a distance till about 170 of the English troops were wounded or killed. They then fell upon the officers of the garrison, of whom thirteen were slain. The surviving English troops, however, managed to hold their position till the arrival of Colonel Gillespie with succour from Arcot. An investigation was then opened, which succeeded in fixing the greater guilt of the revolt on the Tippoo family, who were accordingly removed to Calcutta.

Venner, THOMAS (d. 1661), a wine-cooper by trade, was the leader of a band of Fifth-Monarchy men, who appeared in arms in London in Jan., 1661, demanding the establishment of the monarchy of Christ. Though only a small number, the fanatics fought with great bravery, and the rising was not suppressed without some difficulty. Venner and sixteen others were executed.

Vere, SIR FRANCIS (b. 1554, d. 1608), accompanied Sir Philip Sidney (q.v.) to the Netherlands, and in 1587 was present at the defence of Sluys and Bergen-op-Zoom, where he greatly distinguished himself. Two years later he defended the island of Voorn against Manafeldt, and whilst he continued to fight for the States performed many brilliant actions. In 1596 he took part in the expedition to Cadiz, and in the following year accompanied Essex in his unfortunate expedition to the Azores. Towards the end of 1597 he returned to the Low Countries as Governor of Brill, took part in several actions against the Spaniards, and defended Ostend against an overwhelming force. In 1604, on the conclusion of peace between England and Spain, he returned to London, where he died.

Vere, SIR HORACE (b. 1565, d. 1635), served with his brother, Francis, in the Low Countries, and was present at the capture of Sluys. He succeeded his brother in the command of Brill till that town was restored to the States of Holland in 1616. On the breaking out of the Thirty Years' War he was set at the head of the force destined by James I. for the preservation of the Palatinate, but on this occasion was forced to surrender to Tilly at Mannheim. He was created Lord Vere of Tilbury by Charles I. on his accession to the crown, and was made Master of the Ordnance in 1629.

Vere, ROBERT DE, 9th Earl of Oxford, 1st Marquis of Dublin, and Duke of Ireland (d. 1392), was one of Richard II.'s chief favourites and advisers. He married Philippa, daughter of Ingelram de Coucy, and granddaughter of Edward III., but subsequently, having obtained a divorce from her, he married a German lady, who had come over with Anne of Bohemia (1387). De Vere quickly acquired a great ascendancy over the young king, by whom in 1386 he was created Marquis of Dublin, receiving as an appanage the whole territory and lordship of Ireland. In the next year he received the title of Duke of Ireland, and became practically the ruler of England. His chief opponent was the Duke of Gloucester, who was actuated more by selfishness than any desire for good government, and compelled the king to assent to the appointment of a commission of regency. After a feeble attempt at resistance, the king had to give way, and the chief favourites were appealed of treason. Among these was De Vere, who raised a small body of troops, and marched against Gloucester, but he was met at Radcot Bridge (1387) by the Earl of Derby, and, finding himself outnumbered, fled to Ireland. He was proclaimed a traitor by Parliament, but succeeded in making good his escape to the Continent. In 1389 he succeeded to the wealth of his fellow exile, the Earl of Paris, but notwithstanding this he seems to have died, if we may credit Walsingham's authority, some three years later in great poverty at Louvain. [RICHARD II.]

Verneuil, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 16, 1424), was fought by the English, under the Duke of Bedford, against the combined French and

Scotch force, commanded by Buchan, Constable of France. The want of discipline in the French army, and the misconduct of the Lombard mercenaries, contributed in no small degree to the victory of the English. The French were completely routed, and out of a force of 18,000 left between 4,000 and 5,000 on the field. Amongst those who fell were the Constable, and the Earl of Douglas, while the Duke of Alençon and other generals were taken prisoners. This victory practically ensured the supremacy of the English in the north of France. Verneuil is one of the frontier towns of Maine, and is not far from Evreux.

Vernicomes (or VENICOMES), THE, were an ancient British tribe who inhabited part of Perthshire, the whole of Angus, and a large part of Kincardineshire. According to Professor Rhys they occupied Mearns, Angus, and the east of Fife, having for their chief town an unidentified place, Orrea. The same authority regards this tribe, who are mentioned by Ptolemy, as being one with the later Mæatæ, and considers them to have been on the whole neither Goidelic nor Brythonic, i.e., not Celtic at all by race, but members of the aboriginal Picts.

Vernon, EDWARD, ADMIRAL (b. 1684, d. 1757), was the son of James Vernon (q.v.). Entering the navy, he served in the Vigo expedition, and was captain at twenty-one, and rear-admiral at twenty-four. He was member of Parliament for Penryn and Portsmouth from 1727 to 1741, and in this position was a strong opponent of Walpole. In 1739 he was despatched to the Antilles with a fleet to destroy the Spanish establishments there, but failed in his attempt to seize Porto-Bello from an insufficiency of force. In 1741 he was associated with Wentworth in the disastrous expedition against Carthage. But even this failure did not destroy his popularity at home, where he was elected for three boroughs at once, and continued to take part in politics for some years afterwards.

Vernon, JAMES (A. 1708), was a Whig statesman in the reign of William III. In Dec., 1697, on the sudden resignation of Sir William Trumbull, he was elevated from the post of Under-Secretary to that of Secretary of State, through the influence of Shrewsbury (q.v.). Soon afterwards, in conjunction with Montague, he was elected for Westminster. He attempted in vain to moderate the violence of the House of Commons on the Resumption Bill, proposing that William should be allowed to retain a third of the Irish grants. When the Partition Treaties were discussed he carried a resolution that the House would support the king, and even proposed that William should be authorised to conclude alliances. On the accession of Anne he was dismissed from office. He was, says Ranke, "a pliant Whig, of whom it was said that he knew how to avoid making enemies of those he was obliged to injure; one sees from his letters that, on the other hand, he was ever cautious, even in his warmest confidences—a caution needful in one's lifetime, no doubt, but useless to posterity. One would gladly have seen plainer language in his Correspondence." Vernon's Correspondence from 1696 to 1708 was edited by G. P. R. James, in three volumes, and is of considerable importance for the history of the years it covers.

Verona, CONGRESS OF (1822). This congress, which met in the year 1822, consisted of the representatives of the five great powers of Europe, viz., England, represented by the Duke of Wellington and Lord Strangford; France, represented by MM. de Montmorency and Chateaubriand; Russia, by the Emperor Alexander in person and Count Nesselrode; Austria, by Prince Metternich; and Prussia, by Prince Hardenberg. The chief topics for discussion were: (1) The insurrection in Greece and the relations between Russia and Turkey; (2) the evacuation of Piedmont and Naples by the Austrian troops; (3) the slave trade, which, however, could not be done away with because of the French interests involved in that traffic; (4) the question of the independence of the revolted South American States and the piracy of the neighbouring seas; (5) the question as to active interference in Spain. On this last subject England was isolated, all the other powers declaring that they would follow the example of France in their diplomatic relations with Spain.

Versailles, THE TREATY OF (September, 1763), closed the war between England and France, Spain, and the United States. The principal terms of the Treaty of Versailles were: The full recognition of the independence of the United States on the part of England, with the recognition of the limits of that republic, which also kept the right of fishing in the Newfoundland waters. England returned to France St. Pierre and Miquelon; in the West Indies, St. Lucia and Tobago; in the East, Pondicherry, Chandernagore, together with right of free commerce. France gave up the island of New Grenada, St. Vincent, Dominica, St. Kitts, Nevis, Montserrat, and others. In Africa England renounced Senegal and its dependencies, and restored Goree, but was guaranteed the possession of Fort St. James and the river Gambia, with a right to share in the gum trade from the mouth of the river St. Jean to Portendick. Permission was also given to fortify Dunkirk. As regards Spain, Minorca and the Floridas were given up by the English, who were, however, to be allowed to cut log-wood within certain limits, and who were to have Providence and the Bahamas restored to them. Holland yielded Negapatam, and promised not to harass English navigation in the Eastern Seas.

Vesparian was sent into Britain as "legatus legionum" in the year 43 A.D. In this capacity, according to Suetonius, he fought thirty battles with the natives, took twenty of their towns, and subdued the Isle of Wight. After attaining the Empire (70 A.D.) he continued to take some interest in Britain, to which island he sent more than one army for the purpose of conquest.

Vexin, THE. This province, which lay on the borderland of France and Normandy had, according to the Norman writers, been ceded by King Henry I. of France to Duke Robert of Normandy as the price of his assistance in that sovereign's restoration. During the years of William's childhood it had been resumed by France, and the conquest of Maine and England had occupied this duke's time too fully to give him leisure to reclaim the smaller province till towards the close of his reign. At last, irritated by the French king's jests, and the ravages committed on Norman ground by the French commanders in Mantes, he entered the Vexin in 1087. Mantes was razed to the ground, and it was among the burning embers of this town that William met with the accident which put an end to his life.

Vicar-General was the title given to Thomas Cromwell in his capacity of exercising "all the spiritual authority belonging to the king as head of the Church, for the due administration of justice in all cases touching the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and the godly reformation and redress of all errors, heresies, and abuses in the same Church," in 1535. In 1539 Cromwell was, by Act of Parliament, empowered to sit in this capacity "on the right syde of the Parliament, and upon the same fourme that the Archbishop of Canterbury sytteth on, and above the same Archbishop and his successors." It was in his capacity of Vicar-General that Cromwell issued the commission for inquiry into the religious houses throughout the kingdom.

Victoria Alexandrina, QUEEN (b. 1819, s. 1837), is the only child of the late Duke of Kent (the son of George III.), and the Princess Louisa Victoria of Saxe-Coburg (relict of the hereditary Prince of Leiningen). The Duke of Kent died 1820, and the general education of the Princess was directed, under her mother's care, by the Duchess of Northumberland, wife of the third duke. She succeeded to the throne in 1837; was married, 1840, to his late Highness Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, who died Dec. 14, 1861. [For the chief events of her Majesty's reign, see CRIMEAN Vienna, THE CONGRESS OF (1814—15), met to settle the affairs of Europe after the defeat of Napoleon and the entry of the allies into Paris. The Congress was attended by plenipotentiaries of all the great powers and most of the smaller ones of Europe. England was represented by Lord Castlereagh. The proceedings of the congress were much interfered with, first by the continual gaieties indulged in by the princes and ambassadors in Vienna; and, secondly, by the divergence of views that became manifest among the representatives of the great powers. A dispute, indeed, had arisen before the formal opening of the congress. An attempt had been made by Austria, Prussia, Russia, and England, to get the entire management of the conference into their hands, and to exclude France and the smaller powers from the settlement of Europe. This, however, failed through the determination of Talleyrand, who asserted the rights of France and the secondary states. In the congress itself it was evident that an arrangement had been made between Prussia and Russia for the disposal of the territories occupied by their troops; and this was so unwelcome to the others that in Jan., 1815, a secret convention was entered into between England, France, and Austria, to compel the adoption of the policy they advocated. This attitude of the three powers compelled Russia and Prussia to agree to a compromise, and the settlement was hastened by the news of Bonaparte's escape from Elba (Feb. 26, 1814). It was agreed that a large portion of Saxony should be given to Prussia, Posen should belong to Prussia, and Galicia to Austria, while the rest of Poland was secured to Russia; Luxemburg was given to the Netherlands, Switzerland was reorganised, the Bourbons were restored to Naples, the minor German states were restored, and the congress declared a universal disapprobation of the slave trade. The congress closed June 9, 1815.

Vienna, CONFERENCE OF (1853). Towards the end of July, 1853, a conference of the four great powers was held at Vienna. This conference adopted a certain note which had been previously drawn up in France as the embodiment of their views as to the Russo-Turkish question. Russia at once acceded to these terms, but the Porte refused its consent, objecting to certain passages. These objections the great powers subsequently allowed to have been well-founded; for, as the Sultan said, he could not accept a doctrine whose terms implied that the privileges of the Greek Church in his domains were only maintained by the championship of Russia, and also threw doubts on the good faith of the Turkish government as regards its fulfilment of treaty obligations. The Porte declared war on Oct. 5, upon which the congress inquired on what terms Turkey would treat for peace. The reply was: Only on the immediate and complete evacuation of Moldavia and Wallachia, the renewal of the treaties, and various other conditions which were recognised by the congress as reasonable. The congress accordingly drew up a protocol to this effect, and forwarded it to Russia, which power, however, rejected the terms offered, and proposed five new ones (Jan. 13, 1853). These being found impossible of acceptance, the conference dissolved.

Vienna, THE SECOND CONGRESS OF, met in March, 1855, and consisted of plenipotentiaries from England (Lord J. Russell), France, Austria, Turkey, and Russia. On March 26 it was adjourned, and only reopened towards the middle of April. Within a few days Lord Russell left Vienna, the French representative followed soon, and though the congress lingered on till the early days of June, it accomplished nothing.

Kingslake, The Invasion of the Crimea.

Vienna, THE TREATY OF (March, 1731), completed the settlement of Europe designed by the Treaty of Seville. By that treaty the Emperor had been isolated in Europe. He seized the duchy of Parma, and it seemed likely that England, in conjunction with France and Spain, would be forced into a war which would result in acquisitions by France in the Austrian Netherlands which would be dangerous to England. Accordingly, Sir Robert Walpole, in conjunction with Holland, opened negotiations with the Emperor. England guaranteed the Pragmatic Sanction, which secured the succession of the Austrian dominions, while Austria "accepted the terms proposed at Seville, agreed to destroy the Ostend Company, to establish Don Carlos in his duchies, and not again to threaten the balance of European power." The treaty was signed without the participation or assent of France.

Vigo Bay, THE EXPEDITION TO, in the War of the Spanish Succession, was despatched in 1702 under the command of the Duke of Ormonde, with Sir George Rooke at the head of the fleet. It consisted of fifty vessels, of which thirty were English and twenty Dutch. On July 1 they sailed from St. Helen's, and on Aug. 12 they anchored in the harbour of Cadiz. Through disunion and jealousy, very little was effected at this place besides the plunder of a few ports. News, however, now arrived from England of the arrival of the Spanish galleons in the Bay of Vigo, and instructions to take or destroy them were forwarded to Sir George Rooke, who, however, had received this information earlier. The Dutch vessels were communicated with, and on Oct.

11 it was resolved to attempt to capture the French and Spanish ships which were drawn up at Vigo Bay, in a position defended by a boom and a castle. Next day the Duke of Ormonde landed some soldiers to effect a diversion, and these soon made themselves masters of the castle. Meanwhile the boom was forced by the English ships, and the French admiral, seeing destruction imminent, gave orders to set fire to his own vessels. Of the enemy's men-of-war eleven were burnt, four were taken by the English and six by the Dutch. Of the galleons six were taken by the English and five by the Dutch, who, however, sunk six others. Of the treasure on board, valued at more than 40,000,000 "pieces of eight," much had been taken on shore before our arrival, and booty to the amount of about 11,000,000 "pieces of eight" alone fell into the hands of the victors.

Villa Viciosa, THE BATTLE OF (1710), in the War of the Spanish Succession, was the sequel to the unfortunate defeat of the allies in Spain at Brihuega. That defeat was mainly owing to the sluggishness of the Imperial general, Staremberg, in the support of General Stanhope. On coming within sight of Brihuega at last, Staremberg found that Stanhope had surrendered, and at once attempted to retreat, but finding that step impossible, he drew up his troops in order of battle. He had but thirteen thousand opposed to twenty. The left wing of the allied troops was completely routed by the cavalry of the enemy, amongst whom was Philip, the French candidate for the crown. Instead, however, of proceeding to attack the remainder of our army, the victorious troops fell to plundering the baggage, leaving Staremberg free to contend with the left wing, a contest in which he was so far successful that by nightfall he was left in possession of the field, from which the Duke of Vendôme and Philip had galloped in haste. The enemy's cannon were taken and our own recaptured, but the allied forces had suffered so much in the action, that Staremberg deemed it advisable to retreat to Saragossa.

Villénage, Villeins. These words respectively denote the depressed condition, and the class to which at one time the vast bulk of the population that was in immediate contact with the soil belonged. The villen class was the aggregate, formed by political and social influences, of several classes, some similar and all distinguishable, which began to be drawn closer to one another long before the Norman Conquest, and reached their common level years after that event. It is a fair surmise that the mutual attraction exercised on each other by the various kinds of ceorls and theowes, the former sinking, the latter rising, till they met and blended, had been working from an early date. The villains, however, were originally those who had a right to share in the common land of a vill. When Domesday Book was compiled, the sections of the labouring population that were in a few generations to combine into the general villain class were known as bordars, cottars or cotsets, serfs, and villains, the first and last in enormous majority. These may be assumed to have already come to differ in degree only; perhaps they were not far from the substantial amalgamation which eventually made a single class of them. When the coalescence and degradation were complete, they bore many names. As tillers of the soil, and of a status distinct from that of the lower class in towns, they were called rustics; as being exclusively of English birth natives or neifs; villains because they were bound to live on the villa, which had now become the property of feudal lords; and serfs because they had to serve another's will. The feature in the condition that accompanied every one of its varying stages and distinctions, and doubtless fixed the fate of the different constituents of the class, and may consequently be taken for the most significant, was the dependence of every member of it on a superior, the existence of an intermediary through whom alone they came under the eye of the law, and by whom alone their rights could be asserted. The moment this is seen in the historic development of our system—and it is clearly seen in the later Anglo-Saxon rule, that no man could be lordless—at that moment we become aware of a general set among the humbler dwellers in the land towards villenage. The fresh impetus given to the feudal principle by the Conquest, and the indifference of Norman judges to the degrees of English dependence, insured the completion of the process; when the twelfth century began, the men whose labour raised the necessary food for all, were in huge proportion “irremovable cultivators,” holding their cottages and patches of ground at the will of others, barely capable of political rights, and at the mercy of others for the exercise of such social rights as the law doled out to them; in a word, dependent on those who had lordship over them for everything that made living possible, and life supportable. The peculiar facts of their condition were summed in the single fact, they had a master. This master commanded their services; had nominally power to take from them everything they possessed; could transfer them in the lump with the land they tilled; they were—in some instances at least—reckoned part of the stock of his estate; against his will they were not at liberty to withdraw from the conditions of their birth. They could not buy their freedom from him with their own money, because all they had was in his power. If a villain ran away from his lord, he not only lost the holding that afforded him a livelihood, but was liable to be dragged back to his former dependence. The consent of his lord was needed to his becoming a knight or clerk, or to his educating his children for the service of the Church. Yet his lord's authority over him was not unbounded; for his cruelty or neglect the villain had a remedy in the king's court. And from all oppressions but his lord's he was absolutely safe; the law redressed the wrongs done to him by others as promptly as those of the most law-worthy man in the kingdom. He had, moreover, many comforts and little responsibility. He was generally left in undisturbed enjoyment of his small farm and the gains of his industry, was exempt from service in war, and often found his lord an indulgent master. There was more than one door to freedom that he might contrive to open; residence in a town as member of a gild for a year and a day, unclaimed by his lord, made a free man of him; the Church was on his side, ever raising her strong voice in favour of emancipation. Nor was he always an utter nonentity in politics, or overlooked in the great securities of the national rights. His oath was received in the great inquests; he was represented in the local gatherings; the Great Charter guaranteed his wainage against legal distraint. In course of time the villain's position came to be something like this: he owed his lord the customary services, whereby his lord's demesne was cultivated; and to render those his continual presence on his lord's estates was required; but his lord could not refuse him his customary rights in return, “his house and lands and rights of wood and hay,” and in relation to every one but his lord, his capacity as a citizen was unqualified—“he might inherit, purchase, sue in the courts of law.” His condition, too, had a tendency to improve; custom raised his hold upon his house and land into a form of tenure—that by villenage, which eventually developed into copyhold—he was allowed to pay his rent in money instead of service; in many cases his lord's grasp upon him gradually relaxed; the current of the time ran in favour of enfranchisement. In the middle of the fourteenth century a large number of the villains had become actually, a large number virtually, free; these were “free to cultivate their land, to redeem their children, to find the best market for their labour.” This beneficial movement was checked by the Great Plague, when the scarcity of labour gave the lords an interest in recovering stray or half-liberated villains, and the steps they took to this end drove the whole class to insurrection. The abolition of villenage and substitution of rent for its services were among the demands of the insurgents of 1381. The check, however, was but temporary; disappointed of their immediate object and cruelly punished as they were, the rustics benefited materially by the outburst. "The landlords ceased the practice of demanding base services; they let their lands to leasehold tenants, and accepted money payments in lieu of labour; they ceased to recall the emancipated labourer into serfdom, or to oppose his assertion of right in the courts of the manor and the county." It must be remembered, too, that emancipation had long been common, that the law was now making for freedom, throwing the burden of proof on the claimant lord, and construing doubtful points in favour of the claimed—ruling, for instance, that no bastard could be a villein. These causes affected mainly the "villeins regardant," as those whose bondage was dependent on land and disabled them only towards their lords, were called. It is suspected that there were also in England "villeins in gross," whose villenage was personal and absolute, whose services at least could be sold in open market, and who had not a trace of political status; but this is still a disputed point. "We may conjecture that the villein regardant had fallen into villenage by occupying some of the demesne of the lord on servile conditions, and that the villein in gross was a chattel of the lord whom he paid or maintained by a similar allotment of land." But even the more debased form slowly gave way before continuous charters of enfranchisement; by this process the last isolated bondmen and their families were, in Elizabeth's reign, quietly absorbed in the general mass of free citizens.

Villiers, ELIZABETH (d. 1720), was one of the ladies-in-waiting to Princess (afterwards Queen) Mary at the time of her marriage with William of Orange. She became the prince's mistress, for although "destitute of personal attractions and disfigured by a hideous squint," she was a woman of considerable talents, and "to the end of her life great politicians sought her advice." In 1693 William employed her in vain to try and induce the Duke of Shrewsbury to accept office. She married George Hamilton, afterwards Earl of Orkney. William bestowed on her a grant of part of the old crown property in Ireland (estimated at £24,000, though really only about £4,000 a year), and this grant became very unpopular when grossly exaggerated in value by the commission sent to inquire into the Irish forfeitures (1699). It was against Lady Orkney, Woodstock, and Keppel that the Resumption Bill of 1700 was chiefly directed.

Vimiera, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 21, 1808), during the Peninsular War, was brought on by an offensive movement of the French army under Junot, four days after the combat of Rorica. The village of Vimiera stands in a small plain at the foot of hills, near the river Maceira, and about nine miles from Torres Vedras. Sir Arthur Wellesley's object was to keep near the coast, in order to protect the landing of British troops; but although holding the road to Torres Vedras, he had been forestalled at that place by Junot, who had collected there the scattered troops of Laborde and Loison. Wellesley accordingly took up a defensive position, occupying two ridges and some high ground between them. On the high ground to the south of the village, Wellesley placed Fane and Anstruther with some infantry and six guns, while the bulk of the troops occupied the range west of the Maceira. On the heights to the east and north few troops were posted owing to a want of water. Junot's plan was to attack these heights, so thinly defended, and so to outflank the British left; but Wellesley, to meet this, withdrew large bodies from the right. The French attack on the centre, which was intended to be supported by the troops who were told off to outflank and destroy the English left, met with some little success at first, but was checked at the summit of the plateau by the 50th, who drove them back over the edge, and a cavalry charge completed their rout. In the meantime the French troops on the right, having too late extricated themselves from the ravines which had intercepted their progress, attacked Ferguson on the extreme left, but were vigorously repulsed. The pursuit, which would have destroyed the French army, routed as it was, was arrested by Burrard, who had arrived, and now took up the command.

Napier, Peninsular War.

Vincent, HENRY, was one of the chief leaders and orators of the Chartists. He was arrested and imprisoned at Newport for the violence of his language. A most determined attack was made on the prison to release him, but it was repelled by the energy of the mayor, Mr. Phillips, and the troops stationed at Newport (1839).

Vinegar Hill, THE BATTLE OF (1798), during the Irish Rebellion, was fought near Enniscorthy, in Wexford. The Irish rebels, headed by Father Murphy, assembled here, established a camp, and committed fearful cruelties in the neighbourhood. From May 29 till the time when the camp was stormed, the massacre of Protestants was a matter of almost daily occurrence. On June 26, the British troops, under the command of General Lake, advanced from five sides to attack the rebels, the road to Wexford being, however, perhaps intentionally, left open. The camp was taken without much fighting, only 400 out of 16,000 being killed. Thirteen guns, however, were taken, and the rest of the rebels fled in disorder to Wexford.

Virgil, POLYDORÉ (b. 1470 ? d. 1555 ?), was born at Urbino. Being sent by Alexander VI. to England for the purpose of collecting Peter's Pence, he so favourably impressed Henry VII. as to make that king desirous of keeping him in his realm. Being appointed Archdeacon of Wells, he was induced by Fox, Bishop of Winchester, to undertake to compile a history of England. This work was completed after several years' labour, and was published at Basle in 1534. It consists of twenty-six books, and extends to the end of Henry VII.'s reign. Though of contemporary authority only for the latter years of Henry VII., Polydore's production merits great praise as being the first English history which is critically compiled from the annals of the older chronicles. About 1550 Polydore Virgil went abroad again, still, however, enjoying the revenues of his English preferments, and is generally said to have died at Urbino about the year 1555.

Virgin Isles, THE, are a collection of islands in the West Indies (belonging to the Leeward group, and owned partly by Denmark, partly by Spain, and partly by Great Britain. They were discovered by Columbus (1493), and visited by Drake in 1580 and by the Earl of Cumberland in 1596. Tortola, and some other of the Virgin Islands, were in 1666 acquired by the English after they had driven out the Dutch buccaners, who had held them since about the year 1648, and were in the course of the same reign annexed to the Leeward Islands.

Viscount is a title of nobility between those of earl and baron. As an hereditary honour it was introduced into England in Edward II.'s reign from France, Henry de Beaumont being the first man created Viscount. The title has never been used to any great extent in England, though in latter times it has been the custom to confer it on prominent cabinet ministers when they are raised to the peerage. It must be remembered that the Latin word vices-comes is always used to translate the English sheriff; in this sense the word seems to have been brought into England from Normandy at the time of the Conquest, and was used by the invaders for the English shire-reeve because the Norman vices-comes was the nearest equivalent.

Visitation, THE COMMITTEE OF, appointed by the Scottish Parliament, consisted of Presbyterian clergymen, who were to purify the Church by visitation. The result was the expulsion of many Episcopalian clergy on charges of immorality, which were often the result of malice.

Vittoria, THE BATTLE OF (June 21, 1813), was the first great battle of Wellington's campaign of that year in the Peninsular War. Vittoria stands on a small eminence with the Zadora flowing through the plain on its northern side. In the Vittoria basin Joseph had collected all the baggage, camp-followers, and plunder of the last campaigns. On the 19th the allies came up, and encountered the French in some partial skirmishes. Joseph's plan was to hold the bridges over the Zadora, and Wellington determined to deliver three attacks on the French position, which was very widely extended. Hill, on the right, was to force the bridge of the narrow pass called La Puebla, and drive in the French left. Wellington himself was to carry the three chief bridges in the centre, while on the extreme left Graham was to turn the French right, and so enclose the whole army in the Vittoria basin between the Zadora and the Puebla range. On the morning of the 21st Hill seized the village of La Puebla, and while some of his men were detached to seize the heights, he himself pushed on through the pass, and carried the village of Subigana. In the centre, and on the left, Kemp and Graham succeeded in driving back the enemy, and before long all the English troops were across the Zadora. The French began to retreat, but were hotly assailed on all sides, especially by Wellington from the hill of Amez, which he had seized by a sudden rush. They nevertheless kept up a running fight for five miles, until after being driven from each successive position, they finally gave themselves up to a headlong flight, leaving women and children, baggage, and artillery behind them as spoil for the pursuing troops.

Vixen, SEIZURE OF THE. In 1837 Mr. Bell, an English merchant, infringed the Russian blockade of the coast of Circassia, but at the express advice and instigation of Mr. Urquhart, the English minister at Constantinople, who, it was believed, acted with the express cognisance of Lord Palmerston (q.v.). Great excitement was created; a large party in the country urgently demanded war to avenge this insult to the British flag. A select committee on the subject was moved for in the House of Commons, and it was refused by only a small majority.

Volunteer Convention, THE, at Dublin (1783). In accordance with the resolutions passed at the Dungannon Convention [VOLUNTEERS, THE IRISH], 300 members assembled in the Rotunda on Nov. 10, 1783, and under the presidency of Lord Charlemont, passed a Reform Bill excluding all Catholics. Hood brought it before Parliament on Nov. 29, but was beaten by two to one. On Dec. 1 the Convention adjourned sine die, and thus came to an end.

Volunteer Corps. Soon after the outbreak of the Great War with France, numerous Volunteer corps were raised in England to defend the country in case of invasion, and to overcome internal disorder if necessary. These regiments were chiefly raised from the gentry and the middle classes, and were armed and equipped at their own expense. Several of the corps consisted of cavalry. In 1803, when the war broke out again, the Volunteer movement received a great impetus. A bill known as the Military Service Bill was passed, authorising the enrolment as Volunteers of all able-bodied men. Many new regiments were formed, and the numbers of the Volunteers rose to over 300,000. Pitt put himself at the head of the movement, and, as Warden of the Cinque Ports, raised a force of 3,000 Volunteers, of which he was in command. Though not called upon to repel invasion, these Volunteer corps were frequently useful in suppressing riots. In 1859 the intemperate language used about England, in French newspapers and public meetings, roused the nation to its defenceless condition. In consequence large numbers of Rifle Volunteer Corps were formed all over the country. The movement spread and took firm root. In 1860 an Act was passed to regulate the conditions of service, and in 1862 amended. Several other statutes have been passed in reference to the Volunteers, and in 1870 an Act provided for the resumption by the crown of direct authority over the Volunteers. Thus the Volunteers were closely incorporated with the military system of the country, and placed under the direct control of the War Office. In 1881 they were further affected by the Regulations of the forces, and by administrative changes; the chief of which was that of attaching the Volunteer corps as auxiliary battalions of the line regiments. In recent years the number of this valuable force has generally been over 200,000, and has included infantry, artillery, engineers, and a small body of cavalry.

Volunteers, THE IRISH. The movement for establishing Volunteer corps began about 1778, owing, on the one hand, to the boldness of American privateers, and, on the other, to want of money, which prevented the Lord-Lieutenant from establishing a militia. It was part of the definite system of compelling the English government to grant legislative and commercial independence to Ireland by that country adopting the methods of agitation which had been so successful in America. In 1779 the first regular regiment, under command of the Duke of Leinster, was formed in Dublin, and though the Catholics were persuaded to abstain, Protestant corps were formed all over the country, commanded by country gentlemen. They were now 40,000 strong. On Sept. 13, Parliament passed a vote of thanks to them, and the patriots, anxious to imitate America, at once determined to use them to extort concessions from England. In this they had not miscalculated; and the government, being unable to spare troops for Ireland, had to grant free trade in 1779. Grattan had now begun to attack the Union. The Volunteers supported him, and elected Lord Charlemont, their leader, in defiance of the Castle. In the north they began to hold reviews, their flag bearing the inscription "Hibernia tandem libera." Soon after, they passed resolutions declaring free trade in danger and against the Perpetual Mutiny Bill. The House of Commons at last took the alarm, and in September, 1780, declared their resolutions, "false, scandalous, libellous, and tending to raise sedition." All through 1781 the Volunteers continued to increase till their numbers were estimated at 100,000. Meanwhile their uselessness in case of invasion had been shown by the fact that when Cork was threatened, only 300 came forward to defend it. In April, 1782, when Parliament again met, the Volunteers poured into Dublin in great numbers to give Grattan confidence. The Irish demands were granted, and without doubt the constitution of 1782 was due to the inability of the government to oppose any force to the Volunteers, who at this time actually had 80,000 men under arms, and 130,000 on the rolls. It was owing to their opposition that a projected increase of the army had to be given up. The second Convention at Dungannon declared in favour of Reform, and with the Earl of Bristol (q.v.) as a leader, the Volunteers became a real danger to the State when they assembled again in the "Volunteer Convention" (q.v.) of Nov. 10, 1783, at Dublin, under the presidency of Lord Charlemont, and drew up a Reform Bill, which excluded all Catholics. After this the better classes retired from the movement, and the ranks began to be largely filled with Catholics. In 1785 they were again the idols of the mob, though a vote of thanks to them was lost in the Commons. The failure of a congress to be held under their auspices through the firm action of the government, and the suppression of the Whiteboys in 1787, made them less formidable. Wolfe Tone tried to revive them, but without success, and the Arms Bill of 33 George III. finally put an end to the movement. The carrying out of the law being entrusted to the soldiery met with opposition at Belfast alone. Many of the arms of the Volunteers, however, had before this passed into the hands of the peasantry, and were used in 1798.

Vortigern appears to have been a prince of one of the British tribes (probably the Demetæ) in the middle of the fifth century. Innumerable stories concerning him are related by Nennius and Geoffrey of Monmouth, of none of which redound much to his credit. He, perhaps, represented the national British party as opposed to the Roman party led by Ambrosius Aurelianus. He is said to have invited the Saxons over to Britain to help him against the Picts. But Hengest is said to have very soon turned against him, and, after several engagements, to have driven him out of Kent. Of his subsequent history we have even less trustworthy accounts. According to Nennius he was burnt by fire from heaven, while Geoffrey declares he was burnt in his castle by the orders of Ambrosius. The story of his marriage with Rowena, the daughter of Hengest, rests on very bad authority, but the names of four of his sons, Vortimer (q.v.), Categirn, Pascent, and Faustus, are preserved in Nennius, who also says that St. Germanus severely reprimanded Vortigern for marrying his own daughter. He seems at first to have left the conduct of the war against the Jutish invaders to his eldest son, Vortimer, being himself at first friendly to the invaders. Nennius is also the authority for Hengest's massacre of the British, on which occasion, however, the king's life is said to have been spared. Such are the chief traditions which have been preserved concerning the reign of Vortigern. They belong to fable rather than to history.

Nennius (Eng. Hist. Soc.), c. 43, &c.

Vortimer (GORTIMER) (d. circa 450) was the eldest son of Vortigern (q.v.), and appears to have actively opposed Hengest and the Saxon invaders. He is said by Nennius to have valorously encountered them on four occasions, but as his name does not occur either in Gildas or Bede, any particulars about him must be extremely doubtful. According to Nennius's account, Vortimer at first succeeded in confining the Jutish invaders to the isle of Thanet, defeated them in three battles, and forced them to send over to Germany for a fresh supply of warriors. Three times after this he defeated the newcomers. Shortly after this last victory he died, with his last breath bidding his friends bury him by the sea-side, and uttering a prophecy that the strangers would not hold their conquests for ever.

Nennius, c. 43, 44, &c.

W

Wace, ROBERT (d. after 1183), was a native of Jersey, and became a prebendary of Bayeux. He wrote two long historical poems, Le Roman de Brut (first printed 1836), which is a paraphrase of the History of Geoffrey of Monmouth, and Le Roman de Rou, a chronicle of the Dukes of Normandy down to 1106. The latter poem has been edited by Sir A. Malet (1827), and translated by Mr. E. Taylor.

Wade, GEORGE, GENERAL (b. 1673, d. 1748), entered the army in 1690. He served under the Duke of Marlborough during the reign of Queen Anne. In 1707 he was raised to the rank of major-general. Wade was elected member for Hindon in 1715. In 1725 he was sent to pacify the Highlands in pursuance of the "Act for Disarming the Highlanders." "General Wade," says Lord Stanhope, "who had been sent into Scotland with very full powers, seems to have been a judicious and conciliatory man, inasmuch that he became personally popular, even whilst faithfully obeying most distasteful orders. He employed himself more usefully in making military roads across the Highlands." They have been immortalised in the famous lines—

"If you had but seen these roads before they were made,
You would hold up your hands and bless General Wade."

From 1722 to 1748 he sat as member for Bath. In 1744 he commanded the British forces in Flanders, but could accomplish nothing against the superior skill of Marshal Saxe. On the outbreak of the Jacobite Rebellion of 1745 he collected what troops he could at Newcastle. A false report that he was advancing to relieve Carlisle induced the Pretender to relinquish for awhile the siege of that city. However, he pursued the Pretender through Yorkshire, but his inactivity during the campaign was a general subject of complaint, and he was in consequence superseded in command by Hawley.

Wade, SIR WILLIAM, one of the diplomatists and statesmen of Queen Elizabeth's reign, was in 1584 sent to Madrid to explain to Philip the causes of his ambassador's (Mendoza) dismissal, but the king refused to see him. The same year he was entrusted with the task of explaining to the Queen of Scots her hopeless position if she refused a reconciliation with Elizabeth, and in 1585 vainly endeavoured to procure the extradition of the Jesuit Morgan from Henry III. of France. He subsequently took possession of the Queen of Scots' papers at Chartley after the discovery of the Babington Conspiracy.

Wager of Battle, "A relic of old Teutonic jurisprudence," was a Norman innovation introduced into England by William the Conqueror. A man charged with an offence by a private individual "had the right to plead not guilty, and throw down his glove and declare his readiness to defend his innocence with his body." If the challenge was accepted by the accuser, the two proceeded to fight on an appointed day; if the defendant was defeated, or unable to continue the combat all day, he was convicted and punished, while if he was victorious, or could protract the fight till nightfall, he was acquitted, and his adversary was fined sixty shillings and declared infamous. "The parties were obliged to fight in their own persons, except the appellant were a woman, a priest, an infant, sixty years old, lame, or blind, in any of which cases he might 'counterplead the battle,' and compel the defendant to put himself upon trial by his country. As a Norman innovation Wager of Battle was much disliked in England, and in borough charters we frequently find amongst the privileges granted to the burgesses, the one of exemption from trial by battle, which was not, however, legally abolished until 1819. In 1817 a certain Abraham Thornton, on his trial for alleged murder, demanded a "trial by battle," and on the refusal of the prosecutor to accede, was discharged; this led in 1819 to an Act abolishing "appeals of murder, treason, felony, or other offences, and Wager of Battle, or joining issue, and trial by Battle in Writs of Right." [ORDRAL.]

Waitangi, THE TREATY OF (Feb., 1840), was made between Captain Hobson, representing the English government, and the Maori chiefs. By it the sovereignty of New Zealand was handed over to England, whilst Captain Hobson promised protection to the natives together with the rights of British subjects, confirming also "to the chiefs and tribes of New Zealand the full, exclusive, and undisturbed possession of their lands, estates, forests, fisheries, and other properties which they might collectively or individually possess, so long as it might be their wish to retain the same in their possession."

Wakefield, THE BATTLE OF (Dec. 31, 1460), was an important Lancastrian victory during the Wars of the Roses. The battle of Northampton had placed the supreme power in the hands of York, who had been acknowledged heir to the crown, but Queen Margaret, who had fled to Scotland, refused to acknowledge this arrangement, whereby her son was deprived of the succession, and, raising an army in the north, advanced against the Yorkists. The Duke of York marched against her, and took up his position in his castle at Sandal, near Wakefield. Margaret advanced from York, and the Yorkists met them on Wakefield Green, between the town and Sandal Castle. The Yorkists, who were greatly inferior in numbers, were defeated, the duke was slain, his son, Rutland, was murdered by Lord Clifford while escaping from the battle-field, while the Earl of Salisbury and others were sent to Pontefract, where they were beheaded.

Eng. Chronicle (Camden Soc.); Arrival of Edward IV. (Camden Soc.)

Wakefield, EDWARD (d. 1862), was the originator of a peculiar system of colonisation, known as the "Wakefield system," which was to "reproduce in Australia the strong distinction of classes which was found in England;" with this object the land was to be sold for a high price to keep the agriculturists from becoming landowners, the lowest limit being fixed at a pound an acre. This system, which was at first adopted in South Australia and Victoria, as well as in New Zealand, was strongly opposed by Sir Richard Bourke, Governor of New South Wales, and, except in South Australia, never had any hold. In May, 1839, Mr. Wakefield became private secretary to Lord Durham, while High Commissioner of Canada.

Mill, Polit. Econ., bk. v., ch. xl., criticises Wakefield's proposals.

Wakefield, PETER OF, was a hermit celebrated in the reign of King John for the number and success of his prophecies. In 1213 John, who had paid little heed either to interdict or excommunication, was terrified into submission to the Pope by hearing that Peter had predicted that on the next Ascension Day John would not be a king. Strangely enough the prophecy received a kind of fulfilment from the fact that before the day mentioned John had ceded his kingdom to the Pope.

Wakeman, SIR GEORGE, was physician to Queen Catherine, wife of Charles II. He was accused of conspiring to poison the king at the instance of the queen. The chief witness against him was Titus Oates, whose evidence on this occasion was more than usually contradictory, and Wakeman was acquitted, but by the menace of a second trial was so frightened that he left the kingdom.

Walcheren Expedition, THE (1809), was projected by the British government on the renewal of the war between France and Austria, in order to effect a diversion, and assist the latter power, by compelling the French to withdraw part of their forces from the Danube valley. The capture of the immense arsenal which Bonaparte had fortified and extended, expressly as a menace to England, was also a great object. The armament, which was despatched late in July, was one of the largest ever sent forth by England, and consisted of sixty ships of the line and frigates, and an enormous number of transports, conveying over 40,000 infantry and cavalry; in all, Sir A. Alison computes that there must have been more than 100,000 men of all arms and both services. But the results achieved by this great force were miserably inadequate. Lord Chatham, the brother of William Pitt, who was in command, was destitute of decisive energy or military capacity. On July 29 part of the English force landed in the isle of Walcheren, and seized Middleburg, while other divisions captured the fortresses at the mouths of the Scheldt. Antwerp might have been seized by a coup-de-main; but instead, time was lost in the siege of Flushing, which surrendered August 16. By the time the English were prepared to begin the siege of Antwerp, that city had been put into a thorough state of defence, and the garrison had been very largely reinforced. As it was now the beginning of September, Lord Chatham, suspending operations, withdrew his troops to the island of Walcheren, and kept fifteen thousand of them there as a garrison, while the remainder were sent back to England. But the sanitary arrangements of the army were extraordinarily bad, and the damp climate of Walcheren told terribly on the soldiers. Before a month was over half the garrison was in hospital. Orders were therefore given to destroy Flushing, and abandon the island, which was completely evacuated before the end of the year. The failure of the expedition was made the occasion of violent attacks in Parliament on the ministry, who were only saved from a vote of censure by a narrow majority. A violent quarrel broke out between Canning, who was Foreign Minister, and Castlereagh, who was War Minister, and was held to be largely responsible for the mismanagement of the campaign, which resulted in a duel, and the resignation of both ministers.

Parliamentary Debates, vol. xv., appendix i.; Annual Register, 1806; Alison, Hist. of Europe, ch. ix.

Waldegrave, SIR EDWARD (d. Sept., 1561), one of Mary's most trusted advisers, used his utmost endeavours to prevent the queen's marriage with Philip. He was appointed in 1558 on a committee of ways and means, but found no favour with Elizabeth, by whom he was sent to the Tower for transgressing the Act of Uniformity (1561).

Walden, ROGER, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1406), was employed on diplomatic errands by Richard II., and in 1395 was appointed Lord High Treasurer of England. When Archbishop Arundel was driven into exile in 1397 the king obtained the archbishopric from the Pope for Walden. On the deposition of Richard II. Walden's life was threatened, but he came to terms with Arundel, and, resigning the see, retired into private life. In 1405 he was elected Bishop of London by Arundel's influence, and held that see till his death in the next year.

Wales is strictly the district inhabited by the foreigners, for that is the literal meaning of the term Welsh, applied by the English to all the Britons alike. Its limits have varied with the progress of the English arms. In the sixth century it included an unbroken stretch of country from the Clyde to the English Channel, but the conquest of Chester and the Severn Valley at the end of that century cut up the land of the Welsh into three distinct portions, of which the northern part has been described under Cumbria, and the southern under Dumnonia. It remains to speak of the central portion, which we still call Wales, but which was then called North Wales, to distinguish it from the West Wales, south of the Bristol Channel, and whose inhabitants called themselves Cymry, and the land Cymru. Before the end of the sixth century the modern Wales was simply a fragment of South Britain. It was originally peopled by the primitive pre-Aryan savages, who largely survived in the great tribe of the Silures; then by Goidels of the earlier Celtic migration, who long maintained their hold in the west; and then by Brythonic Celts, who were in turn subdued by the Romans, whose roads, towns, and mines showed the reality of their power, but whose withdrawal in 410 led to the breaking up of settled government, the relapse of the Britons into the tribal organisations so characteristic of the Celts, the relaxation of the feeble bonds which Roman Christianity had cast over them, and an anarchy which threatened speedy conquest by the English.

During the sixth century, however, a remarkable revival of energy seems to have occurred in Celtic Britain, and not least in Wales. The political revival, which set bounds to the English conquest, and united the Britons, firstly under Gwledigau, or temporary generals in war, such as the famous Arthur, and, at a later stage, under national kings, such as Cadwallon, who held Northumbria a whole year in servitude—the political revival, perhaps, affected Strathclyde more intimately than Wales. But even in Gildas we read of great princes, like Maelgwn of Gwynedd, and the tradition of the migration of Canedda from the region of the Wall to North Wales, of the expulsion of the Goidel by his descendants, and the story of Kentigern's wanderings from Clyde to Clwyd show that Wales, too, was affected by the movement. The peculiar organisation of the Celtic Church certainly originated in Wales, though its highest development was worked out in Ireland and Scotland.

But the promise of national development was never fulfilled. Enough was done to set limits to the Saxon conquest, but no really united state was formed. Despite the later stories of Kings of all Britain, and Kings of all Wales, Wales was during nearly the whole of its history split up into an infinity of tribal states, over which very rarely some powerful character or vigorous stock acquired a loose overlordship that was never strong enough to make itself permanent. In the north the Kings of Gwynedd were, perhaps, the strongest line in Wales, but their authority over much of the wide district so named was probably very slight. In the south we know of a very large number of petty states. In the south-west the kingdom of Demetia or Dyfed was in early times the most important. But to the north the aggressive state of Ceredigion grew at the expense of the older kingdom. Gwent, Morgannwg, Brecheiniog, and, in the north-east, Powis, were other important divisions. In short, Wales was a group of clan states, with a few greater sovereignties, claiming indefinite suzerainty over the lesser ones and each other.

The history of these petty states consists primarily in endless and purposeless feuds with each other, true "battles of kites and crows," as no political development, no national state gradually evolved from the conflict. But fierce invaders from east and west made it necessary for the petty kings to unite sometimes for common defence. The English from the east, the Irish Danes from the west, constantly plundered and pillaged. Especially terrible were the ravages of the "black pagans" from beyond sea. After a long period of predatory incursions, they perhaps ultimately formed a permanent settlement in Dyfed. On the west, the Mercian overlords were formidable neighbours during the eighth century. Offa conquered Pengwern and the western portion of Powis, and built a dyke from Dee to Wye to mark off the limits of his kingdom, and keep the Welsh marauders in check. He probably co-operated with Elvod, Bishop of Bangor, in forcing the Catholic Easter on the unwilling Welsh.

During this period the meagre Welsh annals give a bare catalogue of obscure kings. The end of the Mercian overlordship left the way clear for the development of the remarkable power of Rhodri Mawr (843—877), who seems to have added to his patrimony of Gwynedd, the kingdoms of Powis, Ceredigion, and Dyfed, and to have thus been ruler of nearly all Wales. It is said that on his death he divided his dominions into three portions among his three sons, and that the three chief states of later Wales—Gwynedd with its capital Aberffraw, Powis, with Mathraval as the royal seat now that Pengwern had become Shrewsbury, and Ceredigion, including Dyfed, with the king's residence at Dinevawr, near Llandilo. Under Rhodri's grandson, Howel Dha (q.v.) of Dinevawr (907—948), another hope of national unity arose. But the West Saxon monarchs were too strong for such attempts. The friendship of Asser had brought Alfred's troops into the western wilderness of Demetia. All the South Welsh kings acknowledged Alfred as their lord. South Welsh bishops were consecrated at Canterbury, and a deadly blow struck at the old wild freedom of the Welsh episcopate where every bishop was, so to say, archbishop as well as bishop of his own see. Howel himself attended Edward's and Athelstan's Witenagemots. The laws that go by his name are a curious combination of old Welsh customs with those of the English court. On Howel's death, Wales became more anarchic than ever. Its relation to England checked its internal development, but the English supremacy was too weak to impose order and strong government from without.

In 1016 Llewelyn ap Sitsyll conquered the usurper Aedhan ap Blegywryd, and inspired with new vigour the kingdom of Gwynedd. His son Gruffydd became king over all Welshmen, and, in close alliance with his father-in-law, Elfgar, Earl of the Mercians, played a really important part in the history of the time. At last the triumph of the house of Godwin proved fatal to the Welsh king. His great victories in Herefordshire, which far exceeded the measure of the border forays which are the staple of Welsh history, were punished by two brilliant English campaigns under Harold in person. At last in 1065, after Harold had ravaged Wales from end to end, Gruffydd was slain by the treachery of his own men. The conqueror divided his dominions among his kinsmen, Bleddyn and Rhiwallon, to be held as dependencies of the English crown, and, by pushing the English frontier still further westward, prepared the way for the new period of Saxon aggression, which made the Norman Conquest an event more important in Welsh than even in English history.

The foundation of the great border Palatinates by William I. was the first result of the Conquest on Wales. The earldoms of Hugh of Chester and Roger of Shrewsbury, proved an iron barrier which effectually set limits on Welsh forays for the future. Their military organisation made them equally capable of becoming centres of offensive warfare. In the true spirit of their race, a swarm of Norman knights and adventurers poured over the borders into Wales. The earldom of Chester soon extended its bounds to the Conwy, and its vassal Robert of Rhuddlan, governed the vale of Clwyd. The modern county of Montgomery roughly marks the district now added to the Shrewsbury earldom. Earl Robert of Belesme was the terror of all Welshmen. His brother Arnulf conquered Ceredigion and Dyfed. Bernard of Neufmarché, founded the lordship of Brecon in the old district of Brecheiniog. Robert Fitz-Hamon conquered the vale of Glamorgan. Gower, Kidwely, Ystradtwy, were similarly appropriated. Unable to withstand the Normans in the field, the Welsh withdrew to their mountain fastnesses, and, in sudden forays, revenged themselves on their oppressors. Revolt after revolt of the conquered peasantry confined the Norman lords to their castle walls. To guard against the repetition of such events, English, or Low German, colonists were planted in southern Dyfed, in Gower, and perhaps in parts of Glamorgan, and the old inhabitants ruthlessly driven out. Commerce came in the invaders' train, and towns sprang up in a community hitherto unacquainted with urban life. Norman priests and bishops followed the soldiers and merchants. The Welsh sees were finally subjected to Canterbury. The southern bishoprics were permanently bestowed on Normans. By the time of Henry I. the Normans had conquered all southern and western Wales worth having. After the fall of Rhys ap Tewdwr (1090), the native princes lay aside even the title of king. In Gwynedd alone, whose monarchs now begin to be called Princes or Kings of Wales, was a really strong Celtic power left. There the disastrous fate of Norman interlopers into the see of Bangor showed that the native spirit was still unsubdued. The territories thus conquered became known as the Lordship Marches. Conquered by independent adventurers, they possessed all the rights of a Palatine earldom. [PALATINE COUNTIES.] Their lords were practically kings on their own estates, and were bound to the English monarch by no other tie than simple allegiance. For all practical purposes they were as free as the lords of Aberffraw. After a generation or two, many begin to amalgamate with the conquered race, or at least to intermarry with them and get mixed up in their quarrels. The succession of great English barons to some of these lordships—for example, the union of Gloucester and Glamorgan—had an important reflex influence on English politics.

Yet the Welsh race was still far from being subdued. The return of Gruffydd ap Cynan from his Irish exile (1100) marks a new development of culture and literature among the Cymry. The Welsh bards renew their songs. The Welsh chroniclers become more copious. The old laws were re-edited. Even politically they were only reduced to a certain extent. The Marcher lords were as much divided as the Welsh chieftains. English help was far off, and often ineffectual. Physical difficulties always imposed obstacles on feudal armies among the mountains of Gwynedd. Henry II.'s three expeditions into Wales (1156, 1163, and 1165) were disastrous failures, and were followed with none of those indirect successes which had attended similar invasions of Rufus. Owen Gwynedd (d. 1169) was a prince of vigour, activity, and power. The expansive energy of the Normans was diverted into other channels, with the departure of Strongbow to Ireland. The Celtic sympathies of Geoffrey of Monmouth, the strangely chequered career of Giraldus Cambrensis show the approximation of the two races. Archbishop Baldwin's crusading tour throughout all Wales in 1188 marks the comparative peace that now reigned. The alliance of Llewelyn ap Iorwerth, who became Prince of Gwynedd in 1194, with the baronial opposition to John, shows that, despite differences of race, all feudal dependents of the Angevin monarchs had a common interest in setting limits to the arbitrary power of their impetuous overlord. Llewelyn's occupation of Shrewsbury helped the success of the movement that won Magna Charta, and the regard shown to his rights in that famous instrument suggests that the barons were not ungrateful for his aid. Llewelyn's marriage with John's bastard daughter, kept him in peace with Henry III. for some time. But in 1228 Henry sent an expedition against him that signally failed, and exacted nothing but barren homage from the powerful chieftain. Up to his death in 1240, Llewelyn waged constant and not unsuccessful war on the Lords Marchers, and succeeded in extending his power in some of those southern districts where their power was slight. Between 1240 and 1246, David, son of Llewelyn by his English wife, governed the principality; but in 1246 Llewelyn, son of Gruffydd, son of Llewelyn by a Welsh mother, succeeded him, at first jointly with his brothers, but afterwards alone. The national revival, which had been marked under Llewelyn ap Iorwerth, reached its culminating point in Llewelyn ap Gruffydd. The energy of the Welsh became greater, their literary activity bore greater results.

In 1255—57 the young prince Edward failed in his attempts to curb Llewelyn's power. In alliance with Simon de Montfort, Llewelyn took an active part against the king during the Barons' Wars. His projected marriage with Eleanor, Earl Simon's daughter, involved his alliance with the French crown and the remnants of the disaffected party in England. In 1275 Edward I. seized the bride on her way to Wales. A fierce attack of the injured prince upon the Marchers was followed in 1277 by an expedition of Edward that exacted his submission, and in 1278 he was allowed to marry Eleanor. But in 1282 his treacherous brother David incited him to a fresh revolt. Edward resolved to settle the Welsh question once for all. He made a great effort, systematically conquered the country, and, on Llewelyn's death in battle, declared his dominions forfeited to the crown. Thus Edward I. subdued the only native Welsh State of any importance. The Statute of Wales (12 Ed. I.) finally annexed the Principality (i.e., the dominions of Llewelyn) to the crown, introduced the English law, with a special judicial system under the Justice of Snowdon, and established six sheriffdoms of Anglesea, Carnarvon, Merioneth, Flint, Carmarthen, and Cardigan, with organisation analogous to those of the English shires. But the Principality, though united to the crown, was not absorbed in it. It was not a part of England, but a conquered country. It became the custom to invest with the dignity of Prince of Wales the eldest son of the sovereign. Edward's campaigns and legislation affected the Principality only. The hundred and forty Lordship Marchers went on as before, except that an Act of 1354 (28 Ed. III., c. 2) declared them dependent not on

Several revolts showed the unwillingness of Gwynedd to acquiesce in the English conquest. The strong line of Edwardian castles alone kept the country subdued. David's luckless rising in 1283, the revolts of Rhys ap Iaredudd in 1287 and 1292, that of Madoc, Mailgwn, and Morgan, in 1294, show the difficulty involved in establishing the Edwardian system. After it had slept for nearly a century, Welsh national feeling was again aroused by the revolt of Owen Glendower (1400), whose private feud with his neighbour, Lord Grey of Ruthin, became the germ of a determined effort to throw off the English yoke. In conjunction with the Percies, the Mortimers, and the Scots, afterwards with French support, Owen managed to defeat expedition after expedition sent against him by Henry IV. From one end of the country to the other he made his power felt, and managed to maintain his independence till his death (about 1416). But the English re-conquest was ultimately effected, and a series of harsh penal statutes was passed to check further revolts. The establishment at Ludlow of the Court of the President and Council of Wales (1478), was Edward IV.'s contribution to the establishment of a stronger system of government. The disorders of the period of revolt gradually disappeared. The conquerors and the conquered began to approximate towards each other. The Queen Dowager of England, and the last representative of the line of John of Gaunt, both married into the same Welsh family. Henry Tudor became King of England. His son passed a series of statutes which incorporated the Principality with England, restrained the powers of the Lords Marchers, made all Wales shire-ground, and introduced, with English laws, English local self-government and parliamentary representation (27 Hen. VIII., c. 26, and 34 & 35 Hen. VIII., c. 26). The only difference between Wales and England now, besides the still existing, though diminished, powers of the Marchers and the Court of the Council of Wales at Ludlow, was the fact that instead of being united to any English circuit, a special court of justice, called the "King's Great Sessions in Wales," was to be held twice a year under special justices; an arrangement which continued until 1830, when Wales and Cheshire were formed into new English circuits.

These great measures of justice formed a new epoch in Welsh history. The peaceful, if slow, acceptance of the Reformation, the literary and educational revival that began under Elizabeth, illustrate the beneficial results of the change. During the Civil War Wales was, as a whole, strongly Royalist. Some North Welsh castles were the last places to hold out for Charles I. Soon after the Revolution of 1688 the Court of Ludlow, and the remnants of the Marcher jurisdiction, were abolished. During the eighteenth century the Methodist movement profoundly influenced the character of Wales. While introducing a new religious fervour, a higher tone of morality, and a greater amount of energy, its Puritanism made much havoc with the more harmless features of old Welsh life. The movement began with Griffith Jones, vicar of Llanddowror, whose system of "circulating schools," established in 1730, was the only important step made in that age towards popular education. In 1736 Howell Harris began to preach. His connection with Whitefield determined the theology of Welsh Methodism. The suspension of the famous preacher, Daniel Rowland of Llangethio, first turned the Welsh Methodists in the direction of Nonconformity. In 1811 the formal separation from the Church took place. By that time the great bulk of the people had become Dissenters. Hardly until the present century did the industrial revolution affect Wales. The development of the coal and iron trades in the south has enormously increased its population and resources. [See also CELTS; CELTIC CHURCH; COUNTIES, THE WELSH; METHODISM.]

For early Welsh history, Gildas, perhaps parts of Nennius, the Annales Cambriae, and Brut y Tywysogion, badly edited in the Rolls Series, and the less authentic Gwentian Brut, published by the Cambrian Archaeological Society, are, with the so-called Laws of Howel Dha in Owen's Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales, and the scattered references in the English chronicles and charters, the chief authorities. Geoffrey of Monmouth, most of the Triads, and other literary sources, must be entirely disregarded. The "Four Bards" in Mr. Skene's Four Ancient Books of Wales are too obscure and doubtful to give much help to the historian. The works of Giraldus Cambrensis, especially his Itinerarium Cambriae, are, though not implicitly trustworthy, of very great importance for the twelfth century. With Edward I.'s conquest the native annals cease. The statutes affecting Wales become now an important source of information, and the English chronicles become fuller in their notices of the Edwardian conquest, and the revolt of Glendower, while the very extensive remains of Welsh literature, contain much of historical interest. Of modern books covering the whole subject, Warrington's History of Wales, and Miss J. Williams's History of Wales are the best, although neither are very critical. They are both largely based on a sixteenth century compilation, Powell's History of Cambria, that has obtained more credence than it always deserves. F. Walter, Das alte Wales, though too careless in its choice of authorities, is for coolness and impartiality the most valuable modern work. Early Welsh history is best treated in Skene's Preface to the Four Ancient Books of Wales; Jones, Vestiges of the Gael in Gwynedd; Jones and Freeman, History of St. David's; Stephens, Literature of the Cymry; Elton, Origins of English History, and Ebys, Celtic Britain. Freeman's Norman Conquest and William Rufus are exhaustive for the conquest of South Wales. Stephen, History of Criminal Law; Reeve, History of English Law, give the legal history of the incorporation of England and Wales. A large number of particular points are well worked up in the Archæologia Cambrensis. A good short account of Welsh Methodism is in Lecky's Hist. of Eng. Fuller accounts in Howell Harris's Autobiography, Lady Huntingdon's Memoirs, Middleton's Biographia Evangelica, and Dr. Rees's History of Nonconformity in Wales. [T. F. T.]

Wales, PRINCE OF, is the title usually borne by the heir apparent of the English sovereign. After the death of Llewelyn, the last native Prince of Wales, Edward I. in 1301 created his son Prince of Wales. It is noticeable that, whereas the heir apparent is born Duke of Cornwall, it is only by creation that he becomes Prince of Wales. The following is a list of all the English princes who have borne the title :—

Edward, son of Edward I. (afterwards Edward II.)

Edward, son of Edward III. (the Black Prince).

Richard, son of the Black Prince (afterwards Richard II.)

Henry, son of Henry IV. (afterwards Henry V.)

Edward, son of Henry VI.

Edward, son of Edward IV. (afterwards Edward V.)

Edward, son of Richard III.

Henry, son of Henry VII. (afterwards Henry VIII.)

Edward, son of Henry VIII. (afterwards Edward VI.)

Charles, son of James I. (afterwards Charles I.)

Charles, son of Charles I. (afterwards Charles II.)

James, son of James II. (the Old Pretender).

George, son of George I. (afterwards George II.)

Frederick, son of George II.

George, son of Frederick (afterwards George III.)

George, son of George III. (afterwards George IV.)

Albert Edward, son of Queen Victoria.

Wales, THE STATUTE OF (1284), was passed by Edward I. immediately after the conquest of Wales. Many English laws and regulations were introduced, such as the appointment of sheriffs, and the English law of succession; while, on the other hand, Welsh local customs, as far as they were comparatively unimportant, were retained.

Walker, GEORGE (d. July 1, 1690), was rector of the parish of Monaghan. He took refuge in Londonderry before the siege of that town, and was active in rousing the inhabitants to resist James's troops. On April 17, 1689, he was elected one of the governors of the city, an office he continued to hold till August, when he yielded up his authority to Colonel Kirke. There is still a Walker Club in the town, and his statue surmounts the pillar erected on one of the bastions in memory of the siege. When he arrived in London, soon after the delivery of Londonderry from the Irish, the House of Commons passed a vote of thanks to him, and the king gave him £5,000. In June, 1690, the bishopric of Derry fell vacant, and William at once bestowed it on him. He had, however, contracted a passion for war, and much shocked William by appearing at the head of the men of Londonderry in the campaign of 1690. He fell at the head of his men in resisting the Irish cavalry at the battle of the Boyne.

Walkinshaw, CLEMENTINA, was a mistress of Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Pretender. He first became acquainted with her on his expedition to Scotland in 1745. He sent for her after his return from that country, and soon she acquired complete dominion over him. It was believed that she was in the pay of the English ministers; accordingly, in 1748, the English Jacobites sent an agent named Macnamara to request that the lady should, for a time at least, retire to a convent. Charles, however, obstinately refused to agree to this. He had a daughter by her about 1760, who died in 1789.

Wallace, WILLIAM, the younger son of Wallace of Elderslie, in Renfrewshire, was outlawed for slaying an Englishman who had insulted him at Lanark. This circumstance, and the indignation with which he viewed the usurpation of Edward I., induced him in May, 1297, to make an attack on the English quarters at Lanark, where he killed Hazelrigg, the governor. He was soon joined by Sir William Douglas and a considerable body of Scots. The murder of his uncle, Sir Reginald Crawford, at Ayr, still further incensed him, and he utterly refused to join some of his supporters in making their submission to the English. On Sept. 11, 1297, Wallace thoroughly defeated the English at Stirling, following up his victory by a raid into England. The following year he was chosen governor of the kingdom, and as a consequence increased the jealousy of many of the Scottish barons. Meantime Edward had returned from Flanders and hurried to Scotland, where he defeated Wallace at Falkirk (q.v.) (July 22, 1298). At this time Wallace disappears from public life, and is said to have visited France and Rome. It is more probable that he remained in the wilds of his native country with a few followers. In 1306 he was betrayed into the hands of the English at Glasgow by his friend, Sir John Menteith, carried to London, and tried at Westminster. He was condemned as a rebel and traitor to the English king, and executed (Aug. 23, 1306). In spite of the want of authority which characterises most of the stories told about Sir William Wallace, it is apparent that he was a man of great capacity, and a military genius of a very high order.

Waller, EDMUND (b. 1605, d. 1687), poet, was a relation of John Hampden. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1623 took his seat in Parliament as member for Amersham.

The story of his unsuccessful courtship of Lady Dorothy Sydney, the daughter of the Earl of Leicester, appears to be well authenticated. A zealous member of the Long Parliament, Waller was appointed in 1643 one of the commissioners who negotiated with Charles at Oxford. There he was won over by the court, and played a decidedly equivocal part, agreeing on his return to London to publish a commission of array, and so having collected troops to seize the city by a coup-de-main. The plot, however, miscarried, and he was heavily fined and condemned to banishment, after an abject submission to the House of Commons. In 1651 he was allowed to return to England, and attempted to curry favour with the Protector by his "Panegyric on Cromwell," which he followed up by an ode to Charles II. after the Restoration. "Poets, sire," he wittily remarked to the king, "succeed better in fiction than in truth." In spite of his time-serving disposition, Waller was popular in the House of Commons, of which he was a member until 1683. His poems—dainty, but uninspired productions—have been frequently published. A fairly complete edition appeared in 1894.

Johnson, Lives of the Poets.

Waller, Sir William (b. 1597, d. 1668), was a cousin of the foregoing. His military education was acquired in Germany during the Thirty Years' War. In 1640 he was returned to the Long Parliament as member for Andover. On the outbreak of the Civil War he was sent into the west of England, and at first gained such success as to acquire for himself the title of "William the Conqueror," but in July, 1643, he was severely beaten both at Bath and Devizes. Parliament nevertheless thanked him for his exertions. In the following year he fell out with Essex, the commander-in-chief, and in consequence Charles managed to make a sortie from Oxford, and to defeat him at Cropredy Bridge. Waller again returned unsuccessful to London. In 1645 he was removed from his command by the Self-denying Ordinance, but soon resumed his appointment, and under Cromwell was successful in the west in the first campaign of the New Model army. In 1637 he was one of the leaders of the Presbyterian party who attempted in vain to oppose the advance of the army on the capital, and was one of the eleven members against whom its resentment was especially directed. In 1660, during the troubled time which preceded the Restoration, he was a member of the Council of State.

Vindication of Sir William Waller by Himself.

Wallingford, John of, was the author or transcriber of a chronicle extending from the year 449 to 1035. Of this chronicle Sir T. Hardy says:—"The author seems frequently desirous of examining and comparing authorities, and yet the result is only error and absurdity, as he confounds persons and places, and sets chronology at defiance." It is doubtful who the author was, but he probably lived about the beginning or middle of the thirteenth century, and was an inmate of the abbey of St. Albans.

Wallingford, William of (d. 1488), a monk of St. Albans, was appointed archdeacon and prior of the abbey in 1465, and held several subordinate offices. Charges of perjury and theft are made against him in the register known as that of John Whethamstede, but they are evidently written with considerable animus. He became abbot in 1476 on the death of William Albon. Of his tenure of office we have a very full account, but, though it gives an idea of somewhat fussy activity, it presents no feature of interest. His register, which he compiled in imitation of his predecessors, covers the period from 1476 to 1488, though the entries for the last two years are not numerous. It gives a powerful picture of the corruption of the monastic system. It has been edited by Mr. Riley in the Rolls Series together with the register of Wallingford's predecessors, John Whethamstede and William Albon.

Wallingford, The Treaty of (1153), is the name usually given to the peace made between Stephen and Prince Henry, though only the preliminary negotiations took place at Wallingford, the treaty itself being signed at Westminster. By this treaty Stephen was to retain the kingdom during his lifetime, but Henry was to succeed him, the rights of Stephen's children to the private dominions of their parent being guaranteed. At the same time a scheme of administrative reform was decided upon, which was intended to restore things as far as possible to the state in which they had been left by Henry I.

Walpole, Horace, Lord (b. 1678, d. 1757), the elder brother of Sir Robert, first appears as secretary to General Stanhope in Spain (1706). In 1707 he was appointed secretary to Henry Boyle, Chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1708 he was sent as secretary to an embassy to the Emperor, and was afterwards in the same position at the negotiations at Gertruydenberg. In 1716 he was sent as envoy to the Hague. He subsequently appeared at Hanover, and remonstrated with Stanhope for the suspicions he entertained of Townshend, and was sent home with letters calculated to heal the breach in the ministry. In 1720 he was appointed secretary to the Duke of Grafton, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. In 1723 he was despatched to Paris to counteract Sir Luke Schaub. He ardently attached himself to Cardinal Fleury. He remained in France until 1727. In 1728 he was one of the plenipotentiaries to the congress at Soissons. In 1733 Walpole was sent as envoy to the States-General. In 1739 he was sent to Holland to receive the auxiliary troops stipulated in case of hostilities. In 1741 he was made Secretary to the Exchequer, and in 1756 was raised to the peerage. "He was," says Stanhope, "a man who through life played a considerable part, but chiefly because he was the brother of Sir Robert." According to his nephew, "he knew something of everything, but how to hold his tongue, or how to apply his knowledge."

Walpole, Sir Robert, Earl of Orford (b. 1676, d. 1745), was the son of a Norfolk gentleman, and was educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge. In 1702 he entered Parliament as member for Castle Rising. He soon attracted the attention of the Whig leaders. In 1705 he was placed on the council of Prince George of Denmark as Lord High Admiral, and in 1708 succeeded St. John as Secretary at War. In 1710 he was one of the managers of Sacheverell's trial, of which he secretly disapproved; and when the Whig ministry was driven from office he persisted in resigning in spite of Harley's solicitations to him that he should retain his place. He now became with Somers a leader of the Whig opposition, and being charged with peculations as Secretary at War, he was expelled the House and sent to the Tower, where he remained till the prorogation. His defence was, however, quite complete, and he was re-elected for East Lynn. He wrote at this time two able pamphlets in support of the late ministry, The Debts of the Nation Stated and Considered, and The Thirty-five Millions Accounted For. On the accession of George I. Walpole was chosen chairman of the committee of inquiry into the conduct of the last ministry. He became First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. But he was disliked by the king, and angry at the dismissal of Townshend, so he resigned in 1717. In this year he had established the first sinking fund. Immediately he passed into unscrupulous opposition, and spoke against the Mutiny Act, the Quadruple Alliance, the Peerage Bill, and the repeal of the Schism Act. Finding opposition hopeless, he rejoined the ministry as Paymaster of the Forces in 1720. On the fall of the South Sea Company it was felt that he alone could deal with the matter, and his measures, though severe, were felt to be just. On the death of Stanhope he was left without a rival, and became Chancellor of the Exchequer and Prime Minister (April, 1721). His history is now the history of England. He crushed Atterbury's plot, and placed a tax to the amount of £100,000 on the nonjurors. Already his jealousy of rivals, the great fault in his character as a minister, had become apparent; and he and

Townshend drove Carteret from office. Meanwhile the situation abroad had become complicated; the alliance between Austria, Spain, and the Duke of Bourbon's party in France, was checked by the Treaty of Hanover between England and France. On the death of George I., Walpole, disliked by the new king, found himself in danger of being superseded by Sir Spencer Compton. Owing to the representations of Queen Caroline, he remained in power. The Opposition consisted of discontented Whigs led by Pulteney, and the remnant of the Tories under Bolingbroke. In 1730 Walpole quarrelled with Townshend, who retired from political life; and in 1733 with Chesterfield. His supporters consisted of such second-rate men as Newcastle, Stanhope, Compton, and Harrington. He had, however, at his back a majority secured by the most unscrupulous bribery. In 1729 the Treaty of Seville preserved the peace of Europe for a time. In 1733 Walpole brought forward his celebrated excise scheme, a measure thoroughly sound and justifiable; but such was the success of Pulteney in rousing public feeling against it that he had to abandon it. In 1734 he was much blamed for keeping aloof from the war waged by the Emperor against France and Spain. In this year the Opposition joined to attack the Septennial Act. They failed; and Bolingbroke withdrawing to France, the leadership of the party fell on the Prince of Wales, whom Walpole had offended by resisting the increase of his income. In 1737 Queen Caroline's death deprived him of a staunch and faithful friend. The Opposition, now reinforced by Pitt, continued to attack his pacific policy; Newcastle began to intrigue against him, and favoured the king's desire for war. Nevertheless, Walpole concluded a convention with Spain; and the Opposition wishing to drive matters to a crisis, seceded from the House. It had become obvious that he must declare war or resign. He chose the former course (1739). The war was disastrous. [GEORGE II.] In Feb., 1741, Mr. Sandys proposed that he should be removed from the king's councils. The motion was thrown out; but in the following year Walpole, taking his defeat on the Chippenham election petition (Feb. 2, 1745) as a test, resigned. He was created Lord Orford. In March a secret committee of inquiry against him was chosen; but in spite of its animosity it failed to bring any but the most trivial charges against the ex-minister. He seldom spoke in the Lords, having, as he remarked to his brother Horace, "left his tongue in the Commons." In 1745 he died, having retained his influence with the king to the last. Walpole's character was exposed to the most violent misrepresentation from his contemporaries. His jealousy of power made almost every eminent man of the age his enemy; while the corruption by which he maintained his position and debauched the House of Commons is indispensible. But to him are due the completion of the Revolution settlement, and the preservation of peace at a time when peace was most required by England. "He understood," says Lord Stanhope, "the true interest of his country better than any of his contemporaries." "The prudence, steadiness, and vigilance of that man," says Burke (Appeal from the New Whigs, &c.), "preserved the crown to this royal family, and with it their laws and liberty to this country."

Walpole, HORACE, EARL OF ORFORD (b. 1717, d. 1797), was the third son of Sir Robert Walpole, and the nephew of Lord Walpole. In 1741 he entered Parliament for Callington, but he never took a prominent part in debate. In 1757 he exerted himself in favour of Admiral Byng. He remained in Parliament till 1768. In 1791 he succeeded his nephew in the family title and estates; but never took his seat in the House of Lords. So far as he had any political feeling at all, he was inclined to a speculative Republicanism. As a man of letters, virtuoso, novelist, critic, and retailer of public and private gossip, Horace Walpole is one of the most characteristic figures of the eighteenth century. His Memoirs of the last ten years of George II.'s reign, though inaccurate and prejudiced, contain a good deal of information, and his letters (which are among the most entertaining in the language) are very valuable for the insight they give into the social history of the century. Walpole's work, Historic Doubts on the Life and Reign of Richard III., is curious and acute.

Walsingham, SIR FRANCIS (b. 1536, d. 1590), "the most penetrating statesman of his time," was born at Chislehurst, in Kent, and passed most of his youth abroad. On his return to England, after the accession of Queen Elizabeth, his abilities and accomplishments recommended him to the notice of Lord Burleigh, who sent him to the court of France as ambassador, in which capacity he showed great "fidelity, diligence, and caution." In 1573 Sir Francis was recalled, sworn of the Privy Council, and made one of the principal secretaries of state, devoting himself especially from this date to the unravelling of the numerous plots against the queen and her government. His system of espionage was most elaborate, and his spies were active, faithful, and ubiquitous. In 1581 he was employed to negotiate the proposed marriage between Elizabeth and the Duke of Anjou, but failed to bring the matter to a successful issue, through the caprice of the queen herself. Two years later Walsingham was sent on a mission to Scotland, and subsequently had the satisfaction of detecting Babington's conspiracy and of implicating in it the Queen of Scots. That Sir Francis was her enemy there is no doubt, but it is unlikely that he forged any of the letters produced in evidence, as Mary declared, and his reputed letter to Sir Amyas Paulet, urging him "to find out some way to shorten the life of the Scots queen" is most probably a forgery. He was subsequently the means of preventing a breach between Elizabeth and James VI. Sir Francis, who was a staunch Protestant, and a thoroughly religious man, did his best to procure toleration for the Puritans; he "has the honour of having sustained and cemented the Protestant cause in times of its greatest peril, and of having effectually ruined the interests of popery by detecting and baffling all its plots." The integrity of his character was such that with every facility for amassing wealth in an age of corruption, he died so poor as to leave barely enough to defray the expenses of his burial. A biographer of the next century (Lloyd) says of him, "His head was so strong that he could look into the depths of men and business, and dive into the whirlpools of state. Dexterous he was in finding a secret; close in keeping it. His conversation was insinuating and reserved; he saw every man, and none saw him."

Walsingham, THOMAS OF (A. 1440), a monk of St. Albans, and for some time Prior of Wymondham, wrote two most valuable historical works, Historia Brevis, a history of England from 1272 to 1422, and Ypodigma Neustria, a history of Normandy from Rolf to Henry V. He is very important for the reigns of Richard II. and Henry IV. and V., and gives us valuable accounts of Wycliffe and the Lollards, the Peasant Revolt, and the French wars of Henry V.'s reign.

Both Walsingham's works have been published in the Rolls Series.

Walter, HUBERT, Archbishop of Canterbury (1193—1205), and justiciar (1194—1198), was a nephew of Ranulf Glanville (q.v.), and first came into prominence during King Richard's captivity. He had accompanied the king on his crusade, and on his way homewards, hearing that Richard had been taken prisoner, he visited him. The king sent him over to England to act as viceroy in his absence, to counteract the intrigues of John, and raise the ransom, while at the same time he used his influence to obtain Hubert's election to the archbishopric. In 1184 he was appointed justiciar, and held that office for four years, governing well and vigorously, his most important work being the repression of the insurrection of William Fitz-Osbert. His expedition against the Welsh called down a reprimand from the Pope, a fact which shows that the age of fighting bishops was almost over. On the death of Richard, Hubert supported the claims of John to the throne, and was by him appointed chancellor. Hubert Walter is a favourable specimen of the statesman-ecclesiastic of the middle ages, and it is in the former light that he more frequently appears. "He was a strong minister," says Dr. Stubbs, "and although as a good Englishman he made the pressure of his master's hand lie as light as he could upon the people, as a good servant he tried to get out of the people as much treasure as he could for his master. In the raising of the money and in the administration of justice he tried and did much to train the people to habits of self-government. He taught them how to assess their taxes by jury, to elect the grand jury for the assizes of the judges, to choose representative knights to transact legal and judicial work—such representative knights as at a later time made convenient precedents for Parliamentary representation. The whole working of elective and representative institutions gained greatly under his management. He educated the people against the better time to come."

Hook, Lives of the Archbishops; R. Hoveden (Rolls Series).

Walter, Sir John (d. 1630), was attorney-general to Prince Charles in 1619, but refused to conduct the prosecution against Sir E. Coke. Notwithstanding this, he was made Chief Baron of the Exchequer by Charles I. in 1625. He showed considerable independence and spirit in the exercise of his judicial functions, and in 1629 gave his opinion against Holles, and other members of Parliament, being prosecuted for acts done in the House of Commons. For this the king prohibited his taking his seat on the bench, though he nominally held his office till his death.

Walters, Lucy (d. 1683), was the daughter of a Welsh gentleman, and in 1648 became the mistress of Charles II., by whom she was the mother of James, Duke of Monmouth. She lived with Charles in Holland. In 1656 she came over to England, where she was imprisoned in the Tower, but shortly afterwards released. After this little or nothing is known of her. When Monmouth put forward his claims to the throne it was contended by his adherents that his mother had been secretly married to Charles II., but of this assertion no proof was forthcoming, and Monmouth himself subsequently retracted it.

Waltheof (d. 1076) was a powerful nobleman, the son of Seward. After the battle of Hastings he submitted to William the Conqueror, and was allowed to retain his earldom of Northampton. Subsequently he rebelled, but was forgiven, retained in his earldom, and married to the Conqueror's niece, Judith. In 1075 he joined in the conspiracy of the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, with the intention of restoring the state of things which had existed in Edward the Confessor's time. What Waltheof's share in this plot was is very doubtful; probably it was no more than a tacit acquiescence. When the rebellion broke out he betrayed the plot to Lanfranc, and was for the moment pardoned, but shortly afterwards he was executed at Winchester, it is said at the instigation of his wife. His body was removed to Croyland, where miracles were said to be worked at his tomb. The English looked upon Waltheof as a martyr, and the later troubles of William's reign were considered by them to be judgments on him for the murder of the earl.

Walworth, Sir William, a citizen of London, was appointed with John Philipot in 1377 by Parliament to regulate the finances. In 1381 he was Lord Mayor of London, and attended the young king at his conference with Wat Tyler and the other insurgents. Fearing that Tyler was about to attack Richard, Walworth slew the rebel leader, for which feat he received the honour of knighthood.

Wansborough (WODNESBORO), on the Wiltshire Downs, near Swindon, was the scene of two important battles in Anglo-Saxon history—one in 591, in which Ceawlin of Wessex was defeated by his brother Coel; the other in 715, when Ine repulsed the Mercians.

Wandewash, THE BATTLE OF (Jan. 22, 1760), was fought during the Seven Years' War between the French and English in India. The two armies of Lally and Coote encountered each other near Wandewash. The English had 1,900 Europeans and 2,100 native infantry, with 1,250 native cavalry, and 16 field pieces; the French 2,250 native cavalry, and 1,300 sepoy, besides their Mahratta horse, with twenty field pieces. The forces were therefore pretty equal. After a brilliant combat, the French, who had suffered very severely, retreated. If the English native horse had done their duty, the defeat might have been even more decisive.

Wanton, Valentine (d. 1661), married a sister of Oliver Cromwell, and joined the Parliamentary cause in the Civil War. In 1646 he was made a colonel, and in 1648 was appointed one of the members of the High Court of Justice to try the king. He was present at all the sittings, and signed the death warrant. In 1649 he was made one of the Council of State, but his stern Republican views did not recommend him to Cromwell, and after the dissolution of the Long Parliament he retired into private life till Richard Cromwell's deposition, when he declared for the Parliament against the army, and joined Monk. Perceiving that the Restoration was inevitable, he withdrew to the Continent, where he remained in disguise till his death.

Warbeck, PERKIN (d. 1499), was the name of one of the most celebrated impostors in history, who, for several years during the reign of Henry VII., succeeded in persuading many persons that he was Richard, Duke of York, the younger of the two princes generally supposed to have been murdered in the Tower under Richard III. According to the story of the writers under the Tudors, he was in reality the son of a Jew of Tournay, who settled in London in the reign of Edward IV., and afterwards returned to Tournay. The lad after his father's death went to Antwerp, and came into communication with agents of the Duchess Margaret of Burgundy, who, struck by his noble demeanour and resemblance to the Yorkist family, conceived the design of bringing him up as a pretender to the English throne. This story is borne out by Warbeck's own Confession, and by a letter of Henry VII. to Sir Gilbert Talbot as early as 1493. Some writers, however, are still inclined to believe the very plausible hypothesis that he was a natural son of Edward IV. The mystery can hardly be completely solved. The history of Warbeck's proceedings is briefly this. In 1492 he made his appearance in Cork as Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, and obtained a reception so encouraging to his hopes of success, that Charles VIII. of France thought it well to specially invite him to take up his residence at Paris. He did not, however, have any long enjoyment of the French king's protection and hospitality, for Henry made it a special article of the treaty concluded at Estaples in the autumn of 1492 that no further shelter or assistance should be given to Warbeck. Flanders was the pretender's next refuge, and here he received a most cordial welcome from Margaret, Duchess of Burgundy, who acknowledged him at once as her nephew, honouring him on all occasions with the title of the "White Rose of England." Warbeck's arrival in Flanders was the signal for the commencement of a vast system of conspiracy in England against Henry's life and authority; but the king's resolute caution, and the zealous activity of his spies, conspicuous among whom was Sir Robert Clifford, proved more than a match for the efforts of his enemies. Sir William Stanley, Lord Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Montfort, all prominent adherents of Warbeck, were brought to the block; and the pretended Duke of York, forced by these occurrences into a display of decided action, made in July, 1495, a hurried descent upon the coast of Kent. This, however, was a miserable failure, ending in the capture on Deal beach of a portion of his troops by the people of Sandwich. This experience of the feeling of the country for his cause drove Warbeck in despair to Flanders; but the commercial treaty concluded in Feb., 1496, between Henry and Philip, Duke of Burgundy, expressly stipulating for his expulsion, the impostor, after an unsuccessful attempt to make a settlement in Ireland, crossed over thence to Scotland. Here his fortunes began for a time to look somewhat brighter: the Scottish monarch received him as Richard IV., the lawful King of England, and, as a very practical proof of the sincerity of his belief in his pretensions, bestowed upon him in marriage a kinswoman of his own, the Lady Catherine Gordon. Two fruitless invasions of England, and probably, too, the influence of Ferdinand of Spain, tended to greatly cool James IV.'s affection for Warbeck's cause, and in July, 1497, he requested him to leave the country. Thus once again abandoned by his friends, Warbeck found a temporary refuge in the wilds and fastnesses of Ireland, which, however, he left on receiving an invitation from the people of Devon and Cornwall to make another attempt in England. He landed accordingly at Whitsand, near Penzance, Sept. 27, 1497, and, after capturing St. Michael's Mount, laid active siege to Exeter. On the approach, however, of the royal forces under Lord Daubeney, Warbeck retired to Taunton, whence, in despair of success, he withdrew secretly to the sanctuary of Beaulieu, in the New Forest. Here, on promise of his life being spared, he surrendered himself, Oct. 5, to Lord Daubeney, by whom he was despatched a prisoner to London. For a time Warbeck was treated with marked leniency, but on his attempting to escape in June, 1498, he was at once placed in close confinement in the Tower; and towards the end of the following year, in Nov., 1499, he was executed, in company with his fellow-prisoner, the young Earl of Warwick, on a charge of again attempting to escape, and of having conspired with Warwick and others, as a part of his plan, to get forcible possession of the Tower.

Wards, THE COURT OF, was a court of record founded by 32 Hen. VIII., c. 46, for the survey and management of the rights of the crown over its wards. Being joined to the Court of Liveries by 33 Hen. VIII., ch. 22, it was called the Court of Wards and Liveries. The seal of the Court was kept by its chief officer, the Master of Wards. Its province was to see that the king had the full profits of tenure, arising from the custody of the heirs of his tenants being infants or idiots, from the licences and fines for the marriage of the kings' widows, and from the sums paid for livery of seisin by the heir on entering on his estate. A Court of Wards established in Ireland by James I. compelled all heirs in the king's custody to be educated as Protestants, and enforced the oath of supremacy as a condition of livery of seisin. The jurisdiction of the Court of Wards was unduly extended, and became very oppressive under the first two Stuart kings. On Feb. 24, 1645, the House of Commons "passed a vote that the Court of Wards itself, and all wardships, tenures, licences for alienation, &c., should be taken away;" and the lords concurred therein. The Court was finally abolished by the statute, 12 Car. ii., ch. 24, which destroyed military tenures.

Wardship ranked as one of the Feudal Incidents, and consisted in the right of the lord, if the heir were under age on the death of the ancestor, to the custody of the land and the person. This right, which was obviously capable of great abuse, was carefully limited by Magna Charta. [FEUDALISM.]

Warham, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1532), was highly distinguished among the many prelates who favoured the spread of the new learning in England. Among his protégés was Erasmus, who speaks of him in terms of great regard. Warham was made Keeper of the Great Seal (1502), and Lord Chancellor (1503), an office in which he was continued by Henry VIII. In the following year he became successively Bishop of London and Archbishop of Canterbury. The chief event of his primacy was an inquiry into the condition of the monasteries with a view to their reform. In 1515 he resigned the chancellorship on account of some difference with Wolsey, then Archbishop of York. We subsequently find him commenting adversely on the cardinal's severe taxation. The growing opposition to Rome greatly alarmed him; and when the clergy took the grave step of acknowledging that they could not legislate without the consent of Parliament, he resigned office, and not long afterwards died.

Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury.

Warrenne, WILLIAM DE (d. 1087), a Norman baron, distantly related to the Conqueror, was one of the commanders at the battle of Hastings, and in 1073 was appointed regent of the kingdom in William's absence. He assisted William Rufus against Robert, and died shortly after the coronation of the former.

Warrenne, JOHN, EARL OF (d. 1304), was an adherent of the king in the early part of the Barons' War, and fought on the Royalist side at Lewes. Subsequently he quarrelled with the king, and assaulted the royal justiciary in Westminster Hall in 1268. He retired to his estates in Surrey, and fortified his castle of Reigate against Prince Edward in 1268, but was compelled to surrender. He did not, however, entirely forfeit Edward's favour. He bore a conspicuous part in the Scottish wars, and was appointed Guardian of Scotland in 1296. In 1297 he was in command of the army which was defeated by Wallace at Stirling. He sided with the baronial party in the disputes which led to the confirmation of the charters, and in the Parliament of Lincoln (1301).

Warrenne, JOHN, EARL (d. 1347), a powerful member of the old aristocracy, maintained an independent attitude during the troubles of Edward II.'s reign. He did not oppose Gaveston at first, and although he subsequently joined in the attack on the Despencers, he was faithful to the king at Boroughbridge, as well as after the landing of Mortimer and Isabella. He was subsequently appointed one of the Council of Regency during Edward III.'s minority.

Warrington, THE TOWN OF, near Liverpool, was an object of contention more than once by the rival parties in the Great Rebellion. In the summer of 1643 it was besieged and taken by the Parliamentarians, and in 1648 the Scots were defeated there by General Lambert after a severe tussle. Again, in 1651, it was the scene of a partial success gained by Charles II. over the forces of the Commonwealth. An attempt was made to check the Young Pretender's army there in 1745, but it was foiled by the activity of the rebels.

Warwick was probably one of the capitals of the Mercian kings. Destroyed by the Danes, it was rebuilt by Ethelfleda, the "Lady of the Mercians," who built a fortress there in 913. It appears as a borough in Domesday. The castle was repaired and enlarged under William the Conqueror. It sent members to Parliament from the reign of Edward I. onwards, but was not regularly incorporated till the reign of Philip and Mary.

Warwick, PEERAGE OF. The Earldom of Warwick appears to have been first conferred on Roger de Bellomonte, who received the title from William the Conqueror, and died in 1123. In the thirteenth century the dignity passed by marriage into the family of the Marischals, Earls of Pembroke, and subsequently by William de Mauduit, from whom it descended in 1267 to William de Beauchamp. In 1449 Richard Neville, eldest son of Richard, Earl of Salisbury, married Anne, the heiress of the Beauchamp estates, and was created Earl of Warwick. In 1471, on the attainder of the Earl after the battle of Barnet, the dignity was conferred on the Duke of Clarence, who had married his daughter Isabella. His son bore the title, but it became extinct on his execution in 1499. In 1547 it was revived for John Dudley, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, and was also borne by his son Ambrose Dudley, on whose death in 1589, it became extinct. It was revived in 1618, and conferred on Robert, Lord Rich. It became extinct in this family in 1759. It was revived the same year for Francis Greville, Earl Brooke, whose descendants have since borne the titles of Brooke and Warwick.

Warwick, Ambrose Dudley, Earl of (d. 1590), son of the Duke of Northumberland, was brought to trial, and condemned (1553) for his participation in his father's plot, but was not executed. In 1563 he was in command of the English garrison at Havre when it was forced to surrender; and after his return to England was proposed by Elizabeth as a husband for the Queen of Scots. In the rebellion of 1569, he was in command of some of the royal forces, and aided materially in crushing the insurrection. "He appears," says Miss Aikin, "to have preserved through life the character of a man of honour, and a brave soldier."

Aikin, Court of Queen Elizabeth.

Warwick, Edward Plantagenet, Earl of (d. 1499), was the son of George, Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV., by Anne, sister of the Earl of Warwick, known as the Kingmaker. After the execution of his father, in 1478 the young earl was kept in honourable confinement at the castle of Sheriff-Hutton, in Yorkshire until Henry's accession to the throne in 1485, when the earl's Yorkist blood, and the strong claims it gave him to the crown of England, made it a very obvious necessity on the new king's part to have him placed in the more secure prison of the Tower of London. From this prison he never again emerged except on two occasions, viz., in 1487, when he was paraded through the principal streets of London to disprove the imposture of Lambert Simnel, and in 1499, when he was beheaded on a charge of being concerned with Perkin Warbeck (q.v.), then also a prisoner in the Tower, in a conspiracy to get forcible possession of the Tower, and effect the overthrow of Henry's government.

Warwick, Guy, Earl of (d. 1315), distinguished himself in the Scottish wars in Edward I.'s time. In the next reign he took a prominent part in the opposition to Gaveston, and was one of the ordainers appointed in 1310. In 1312 he seized Gaveston, who had given him mortal insult by nicknaming him "The Black Dog of Arden," as he was being conducted to London by Pembroke, and had him beheaded without trial. Warwick died shortly afterwards—according to one account, by poison.

Warwick, Richard Beauchamp, Earl of (b. 1381, d. 1439), son of Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, fought on the Royalist side in the battle of Shrewsbury, and distinguished himself in the Welsh wars. He was appointed governor of Henry VI. during his childhood, and held the office of regent of France from 1437 to 1439.

Warwick, Richard Neville, Earl of (b. 1428, d. 1471), was the son of Richard, Earl of Salisbury, and married Anne, daughter and heiress of the Earl of Warwick, with whom he received the title as well as the estates of the Beauchamp family. He thus became the owner of enormous wealth and landed property, and by his liberality and profuse hospitality he became a great favourite with the people. He espoused the cause of the Duke of York, with whom he fought at the first battle of St. Albans in 1455. In the same year he was made Captain of Calais. A quarrel which took place between Warwick's retainers and some of the king's servants in 1459 led to a renewal of the Civil War. After the affair at Ludford he fled to Calais, and afterwards joined York in Ireland, where they arranged a plan of action, and returning to England in 1460 defeated the Lancastrians at Northampton, and took the king prisoner. After the battle of Wakefield, Warwick attempted to intercept Margaret's march to London, but was defeated at St. Albans. Retreating with a considerable force, he effected a junction with Edward at Chipping-Norton, and returned to London, when Edward IV. was proclaimed king. Warwick took part in the battle of Towton, and was richly rewarded by Edward, receiving the captaincy of Dover, the wardenship of the Scottish marches, the offices of Lord Chamberlain and Steward, with large grants of forfeited lands. Warwick's policy was to strengthen the new dynasty by a strict and cordial alliance with the French king, and for this purpose he set on foot negotiations for marrying Edward to Bona of Savoy, sister of Louis XI. But the king preferred the alliance of Burgundy, and his marriage with Elizabeth Woodville entirely upset Warwick's plans. The ascendancy of the Queen's kinsfolk completed Warwick's estrangement, and he intrigued with Clarence, who in 1469 married his eldest daughter without the king's knowledge. An insurrection in Yorkshire now induced the king to apply for help to Warwick, who returned from Calais but for the purpose of destroying the power of the Woodvilles. The king was taken prisoner. Rivers and Sir John Woodville were beheaded, and for a time the government was completely in Warwick's hands. But in 1470 the king escaped, and the defeat of the insurgents at Losecoat Field obliged Warwick once more to seek refuge at Calais. By the influence of Louis XI. a reconciliation was made between Warwick and Queen Margaret, in accordance with which Warwick invaded England. He was joined by his brother, Montague, and others, while Edward fled to Burgundy. Henry was released from the Tower, and Warwick was once more supreme. But in the next year (1471) Edward returned, was joined by Clarence, and entered London. Warwick was encamped at Barnet, and here, after a hard-fought battle, he was defeated and slain. The character of the "last of the barons," or the "Kingmaker," as Warwick has been called, was in some respects an exaggeration of the ordinary baronial type. But as a politician he had sagacity and foresight; and he was a skilful warrior and military leader, rather of the modern than of the mediæval kind. He left two daughters, Isabella, who was married to the Duke of Clarence; and Anne, married first to Edward, son of Henry VI., and secondly to Richard, Duke of Gloucester. [WARS OF THE ROSES.]

Warwick, THOMAS BEAUCHAMP, EARL OF (d. 1401), was appointed Governor to Richard II. during his minority. In 1386 he joined Gloucester, and was one of the lords who appealed De Vere, and the other royal ministers, of treason. In 1397 he was accused of conspiring with Gloucester against the king, and condemned to death. But having confessed his guilt, his sentence was commuted to exile, and he was banished to the Isle of Man. On the deposition of Richard II. he was released.

Washington, founded in 1790 as the Federal capital of the United States, was attacked by the English during the American War (1812—14). A body of troops under General Ross was landed on the Chesapeake, while a fleet under Admiral Cockburn assisted in the operations. The Americans were able to offer little resistance to the veterans of the Peninsula, who had been sent straight off from Bordeaux for this service. The town was occupied by the British, and though there was little loss of life, the Capitol, and all the public buildings and offices, were destroyed; an act which caused great indignation both in America and Europe. [AMERICAN WAR.]

Washington, THE TREATY OF (May 8, 1871), was concluded between England and the United States. Its provisions were that a mixed court of arbitrators should meet to adjust the Alabama claims at Geneva, and that by this award the two nations should be bound, prescribing also the rules in accordance with which the arbitrators should decide on their verdict; that the inhabitants of the United States should have the liberty to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the sea-coasts and shores and in the bays, harbours, and creeks of Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the colony of Prince Edward's Island, and of the various islands adjacent, with permission to land for the purpose of drying their nets or curing their fish; that this liberty should only extend to sea-fishing; that the subjects of Great Britain should have similar rights of fishing and landing on the eastern sea coasts and shores of the United States north of the 39th parallel; that the navigation of the River St. Lawrence, its tributaries, and canals, should be open to the subjects of the United States; that in return the Lake Michigan, and the canals between it and the Atlantic, should be open to British subjects. That the San Juan question should be decided by arbitration. That this treaty should last for ten years, and should not expire after that time until two years have elapsed from the date when notice of withdrawal is given by either party. In accordance with this treaty the Geneva Commission of Arbitrators met to decide the Alabama claims, and the San Juan question was arbitrated by the German Emperor William, 1872. [GENEVA AWARD.]

Washington, GEORGE (b. 1732, d. 1799), distinguished himself at the age of nineteen, on the outbreak of hostilities between England and France, and was aide-de-camp to General Braddock in his unsuccessful expedition against Fort Duquesne, taking part also in its capture in 1758. Together with Patrick Henry, he represented Virginia at the General Congress at Virginia in 1774, and expressed moderate views by no means favourable to secession. On the outbreak of the war he was chosen commander-in-chief. This is the place for the very briefest account only of his military operations. His first great success was in compelling the English to evacuate Boston in March, 1776, but he was defeated at Long Island by General Howe, and compelled to retreat west of the Delaware. A succession of defeats, notably one at Brandywine in Sept., 1777, followed two slight successes at Trenton and Princeton, but they were more than compensated by the victory of Gates at Saratoga (Oct., 1777). In June, 1778, he fought an indecisive battle at Monmouth Court House. During the greater part of 1779 and 1780 he remained inactive, owing to the weakness of his army; but in 1781, having been appointed to the command of the army of the South, he was enabled to direct the important operations of Green and Morgan, which resulted in the collapse of the British attack, and the surrender of Lord Cornwallis. On the conclusion of peace, Washington resigned his commission to Congress, and retired to his farm. He was, however, in 1787, elected President of the National Convention at Philadelphia, which remodelled the constitution. Two years later he was elected President of the United States, and again in 1792. Perhaps the most distinguishing feature in his tenure of office was the skill with which he kept America clear of the complications created by the French Revolution. In 1794 hostilities seemed imminent with England, but Washington averted them by sending John Jay to London on a special mission, and two years later negotiated a commercial treaty. He declined to be nominated for the presidency a third time. Just before his death, when war with France seemed at hand, he was appointed commander-in-chief.

Waterloo, THE BATTLE OF (June 18, 1815), was one of the decisive battles in history, since it closed the great European war against France, and it decided the fate of Napoleon and of Europe. In June, 1815, Napoleon crossed the Belgian frontier. Wellington's army was drawn up so as to cover Brussels, in a long line from Charleroi to Antwerp. The Prussians, under Blücher, extended eastward from Charleroi to Liège. Napoleon attempted to push between the two armies, and to crush them in detail. On the 16th he attacked the Prussians at Charleroi, and drove them back. On the 16th his right attacked the Prussians at Ligny, and, after a hard battle, forced them to retreat. Ney, with the French left, at the same time attacked the English at Quatre Bras. After fighting all day, they fell back. The English slowly retired towards Brussels on the 17th. Wellington, relying on assistance from Blücher, who was slowly retreating towards Wavre, determined to fight at Waterloo. The field of battle consisted of two low lines of hills, running parallel to one another, east and west, and separated by a valley about half a mile in breadth. Wellington took up a position on the northern ridge, about twelve miles south of Brussels, with the Forest of Soignies in his rear, the centre of the position being the hamlet of Mont St. Jean. His army was drawn up in two lines. On the extreme left of the front line were light cavalry, next to them were the fifth and fourth Hanoverian brigades. On the right of these was Bylandt's Dutch and Belgian infantry, with Pack and Kemp's brigades on their right. On their right, and garrisoning the farm-buildings of La Haye Sainte, stood the Third Division, under Alten, consisting of the King's German legion, and a Hanoverian brigade. To their right again was Halkett's brigade, and the two brigades of the Guards, under Maitland and Byng, who held the farm of Hougomont. The second line was composed entirely of cavalry, the greatest strength being concentrated behind the centre, resting on the Charleroi road; Lord Uxbridge being in command of the whole. The French on the opposite ridge were drawn up in two lines, with the entire Imperial Guard, cavalry, and infantry, in rear of the centre as a reserve. The battle began at half-past eleven by a fierce attack on Hougomont under Jerome; but though the French won the gardens and orchards, they could not drive the Guards from the buildings themselves. As this attack failed in its main object, Napoleon directed a grand attack on the left-centre of the allied position. As the columns approached, the Dutch and Belgian troops fled in panic; but Picton, with the 3,000 men who formed the brigades of Pack and Kemp, seized the moment when the French halted on the brow of the hill. His men fired a volley at thirty yards' distance, and then, charging, drove the columns back over the hill. Meanwhile Kellermann's cuirassiers, who had ridden up the Charleroi road in support of Ney's attack, had been charged by Lord Uxbridge, at the head of the Household Brigade, and had been driven back in headlong confusion. It was about half-past three when Napoleon found that his grand attack had failed, and that, far from making any way, he had very much weakened his right wing, while, at the same time, there were sure signs of the approach of the Prussians. He directed all his splendid cavalry to attack the centre and right, while fresh assaults were made upon Hougomont and La Haye Sainte. But the cuirassiers could make no impression on the impenetrable squares of British infantry, and the artillery played upon them as they retired, so that they were almost wholly destroyed. In the meantime the attacks on La Haye Sainte had been carried on with determined vigour; and between six and seven o'clock the French took the place. The Prussians were pressing on, and were already carrying on a fierce contest for the possession of Plancenoit, which lay in the rear of the French right, and which the Young Guard had been detached to hold. Napoleon ordered the Old Guard, who had as yet taken no part in the struggle, to advance. The two columns advanced between La Haye Sainte and Hougomont. They were suddenly encountered on the top of the ascent by Maitland's Guards, who were lying down. When the French arrived at the top, the Guards suddenly rose up, at a distance of fifty yards, and while the French attempted to deploy into line, showered volley after volley into their ranks, till they became disordered. Then the Guards charged, and drove the French column headlong down the hill, returning to their position, however, in time to take part in the destruction of the second column, which bore on, undismayed, slightly towards the left. The column broke, and fled in disorder. Napoleon, meanwhile, was rallying the remains of the first column of the Old Guard round La Belle Alliance; but Wellington now took the offensive. Soon after eight o'clock he gave the word for a general advance along the whole line. The British troops rushed down from the ridge, and up the opposite slope. The Old Guard bravely rallied, and attempted to stem the current. But it was in vain. The British swept away all resistance in their impetuous rush; and the French army gave itself up to flight in hopeless confusion, every one seeking only his own safety. Wellington, riding back, met Blücher at La Belle Alliance, and entrusted to him the pursuit with the Prussians, who were comparatively fresh. The allies, under Wellington, had lost 15,000 men killed and wounded in the battle; the Prussians 7,000; but the French army was annihilated. It lost from 23,000 to 30,000, and the survivors were a mere scattered mob. Wellington's army had numbered about 68,000 at the beginning of the battle, Napoleon's about 70,000.

Watling Street was one of the great Roman roads through Britain. Starting from Richborough, it passed by Canterbury, whence, leaving Rochester to the right, it ran to London, which it passed through, thence to Verulam, Dunstable, Towcaster, Weedon, Dovebridge, High Cross, Fazeley, and Wellington, to Wroxeter. It then crossed the Severn, and continued by Rowton and Bala to Tommen-y-Mawr, where it divided into two branches. One ran by Beddgelert to Caernarvon and Anglesea; the other by Dolwyddelan to the Menai Straits, where one branch went to Holyhead, and the other through Aber to Chester, thence by Northwich, Manchester, Ilkley, Masham, and Newton, to Catterick. Crossing the Tees, it ran by Binchester, Echeester, and Corbridge, into Scotland, thence by Jedburgh to the interior of Scotland, probably as far as the Forth. Other authorities regard the road between London and Wroxeter as alone properly the Watling Street. But the name seems popularly to have been used to denote several lines of Roman highways. Watson, RICHARD, Bishop of Llandaff (b. 1737, d. 1816), was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a Fellow in 1760. He became Professor of Chemistry in 1764, and in 1771 Regius Professor of Divinity. He wrote largely both on scientific subjects and on theology, and had also written some pamphlets to defend and explain Whig principles, when, in July, 1782, he was made Bishop of Llandaff by Lord Shelburne. He sided with the Whigs in the House of Lords, and supported the claims of the Prince of Wales on the Regency question. In 1792, in his charge to the clergy, he vehemently eulogised the French Revolution. Subsequently he changed his views on this subject, and wrote in 1798 an Address to the People of Great Britain, which was an energetic appeal in favour of the war against France, and excited immense public attention. In 1803 he wrote another pamphlet on the same subject. His best-known work is perhaps his Apology for the Bible against the attacks of Thomas Paine.

Waurin, JOHN DE (d. circa 1471), was a French knight, who fought in the battle of Agincourt, but subsequently joined the English, and attached himself to Sir John Fastolf. He wrote a chronicle of England from the earliest times to the year 1471, which has been published in the Rolls Series.

Waverley, THE ANNALS OF, is one of the monastic chronicles—written in the Cistercian Abbey of that name in Surrey—which extends from the Incarnation to the year 1291. From 1277 to the end the work appears to be contemporary, and is of great value. It has been published in the Rolls Series.

Waynflete, WILLIAM (d. 1486), was master of Winchester School from about 1432 to 1443, when he was made first provost of Eton. In 1447 he was elected Bishop of Winchester, and in 1456 became Chancellor. In 1460 he resigned the Great Seal, and, though he had been an attached friend to Henry VI., he lived unmolested by Edward IV. In 1448 Waynflete commenced the foundation of Magdalen College in Oxford, which was completed in 1456. He also founded a school in his native town of Waynflete, in Lincolnshire.

Ways and Means, THE COMMITTEE OF, is a Committee of the whole House of Commons appointed to determine how the money is to be raised which has been voted to the Crown after the resolutions framed by the Committee of Supply have been agreed to. Its principal duty is to receive the budget or financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Resolutions for new ways of raising revenue are often submitted to it previous to being embodied in bills.

Wedderburn, ALEXANDER, LORD LOUGHBOROUGH and EARL OF ROSSLYN (b. 1733, d. 1805), was the son of a Scotch advocate and judge. He was called to the Scotch bar, but his short career in Scotland came to an abrupt conclusion in 1757, and he came to London, and was called to the English bar. In 1762, through the interest of Lord Bute, he was returned to Parliament for the Rothsay and

Inverary Burghs. In 1769 he spoke in support of the legality of Wilkes's election, which earned him a congratulatory banquet at the hands of the Opposition. In 1771, however, he left his party, and became Solicitor-General to Lord North. In his new office he is described as "elegant, subtle, and insinuating," but he had no great opportunity of displaying his powers till, in 1773, he defended Lord Clive against General Burgoyne's resolution. During the following years he defended the policy of the ministry on the American war. In 1778 he refused the office of Chief Baron, and continued in Parliament to urge the prosecution of the war. Next year he became Attorney-General, and delivered his last great speech in the Lower House in favour of a firm policy of repression towards Ireland. In 1780 he became Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, with the title of Lord Loughborough. When the Coalition ministry was formed (1783) the Great Seal was put into commission, and Lord Loughborough was appointed one of the commissioners, but in 1784 the chancellorship was given to Lord Thurlow. In his disgust, Lord Loughborough became a complete Foxite. He now took all pains to cultivate favour with the Prince of Wales, and advocated his claims in the debates on the Regency Bill. In 1791 he made a vigorous attack on Pitt's Russian policy, and became so strong a Whig that he advocated measures for Catholic relief, "although it is now certain that when he became keeper of the king's conscience, he poisoned the royal mind by scruples about the coronation oath, and that he obstructed the policy which he at this time advocated." He now opened negotiations with Pitt, who, in return for his services in securing the adherence of the Duke of Portland to the Pitt ministry, obtained for him the Great Seal (Jan., 1793). In 1794 he advised the State prosecutions for sedition, and, while he cooled towards the Prince of Wales, tried to win favour with George III. In 1800 he opposed all measures for Catholic emancipation connected with the Union, and became somewhat estranged from Pitt. The next year he betrayed the Prime Minister's private correspondence to the king, and thereby obtained the dismissal of Pitt. Addington, succeeding to the vacant place, got rid of Lord Loughborough by the bribe of an elevation to an earldom, with the title of Earl of Rosslyn. Henceforth his Parliamentary career was unimportant. At his death George III. is reported to have said, "He has not left a greater knave behind him in my dominions."

Wedmore, THE PEACE OF (879), is the name frequently given to the treaty between Alfred and Guthrum, though the treaty was certainly concluded at Chippenham. The village of Wedmore lies near Athelney, between Bridgewater and Yeovil. The treaty is of great importance, as assigning a definite district to the Danes, and establishing a modus vivendi between them and the English. The boundaries here agreed upon were—"Up on the Thames, and then up on the Lea, and along the Lea to its source, then right to Bedford; then up on the Ouse unto Watling Street." Thus the Danes were to leave Wessex, but keep East Anglia and the north-eastern part of Mercia, but the south-western part of Mercia was united to the kingdom of Wessex. "Speaking roughly," says Mr. Freeman, "Alfred recovered that part of Mercia which had been originally West Saxon, and which had been conquered by the Angles in the seventh and eighth centuries. . . . The Danes got much the largest part of England; still Alfred contrived to keep London." [ALFRED; DANES; MERCA.]

Welles, LEO, LORD (d. 1461), was a distinguished commander in the French wars, and in 1438 was made Lieutenant of Ireland, which office he held till 1443. He fought on the Lancastrian side in the Wars of the Roses, and fell in the battle of Towton.

Welles, RICHARD, LORD (d. 1470), son of the above, was allowed to receive his father's goods and estates by Edward IV., though he had been attainted, and in 1468 he was restored to all his honours. In 1470 his son raised a rebellion in Lincolnshire, and Lord Welles, being unable to induce him to submit, was put to death by Edward, contrary to a promise he had made.

Welles, SIR ROBERT (d. 1470), was the son of Richard, Lord Welles. In 1470, probably at the instigation of the Earl of Warwick, he raised a rebellion in Lincolnshire. Although the cry of "King Henry!" was raised, and many Lancastrians joined his standard, it would seem that his real object was to set Clarence on the throne. Before assistance could arrive from Warwick or Clarence, he was attacked by the king, and totally defeated in the battle of Loosecoat Field, near Stamford. He was captured, and beheaded the day after the battle, having made a full confession of his designs.

Wellesley, RICHARD COLLEY, MARQUESS OF (b. 1760, d. 1842), was the eldest son of the first Earl of Mornington, and elder brother of the Duke of Wellington. He took his seat in the Irish House of Lords as soon as he became of age, and also entered the English House of Commons as member for Beeralston in 1786, and afterwards for Windsor. He took the Tory side in the debates on the Regency of 1789, and greatly distinguished himself. In 1797, having previously occupied a seat on the Board of Control, he received a British peerage (as Baron Mornington), and was nominated to succeed Lord Cornwallis as Governor-General of India. In 1799 he became Marquess Wellesley in the Irish peerage. His governor-generalship in India was an eventful period. On first landing he found the English power exposed to great dangers, owing to the existence of a formidable body of disciplined troops in the service of the Nizam. By great firmness and skill Lord Mornington prevailed on the Nizam to disband his army, and to enter into a subsidiary alliance with England. He next determined to crush the power of Tippoo Sultan (q.v.), who was then deeply engaged in intrigues with France. Owing to the firmness and energy of the viceroy, the troops were speedily put into a state of efficiency. In 1799 war was declared on Tippoo, and three armies advanced on Seringapatam. The Bombay army won a victory at Sudasera, and that of Madras at Malavelly and Arikera. Seringapatam was invested and captured, and Tippoo slain in the assault. Mysore was partitioned, and the Mohammedan dynasty driven out. In 1801 Lord Wellesley organised the Red Sea expedition (q.v.), and despatched a large force into Egypt to assist in the operations against the French. He then proceeded to intervene in the affairs of the Mahratta States. He forced the treaty of Bassein upon the Peishwa Bajee Rao. Thereupon a combination of Scindiah, Holkar, and the Rajah of Berar was formed against the English, and the result was the hardly contested campaigns in which the British, under Colonel Wellesley and Lake, were completely successful. The siege of Ali-gurh, the battles of Delhi and Laswaree, soon reduced Scindiah's French battalions in Hindostan; the battles of Assye and Argaom were followed by the treaties of Deogaom and Surgee Anjengao, which embodied the submission of Scindiah and the Bhonslah.

Meanwhile Lord Wellesley had paid much attention to the commercial development of India. He gave great offence to the Court of Directors partly by the magnitude and expense of his military exploits, partly by allowing private English vessels to trade in India, contrary to the Company's monopoly. In 1805 Lord Wellesley was recalled. Attempts were unsuccessfully made in Parliament to accuse him of high crimes and misdemeanours, and the Court of Proprietors passed a vote of censure on him by a large majority. But after thirty years the feeling changed, and the directors, taking advantage of the publication of his despatches, voted him a grant of £20,000, and ordered his statue to be placed in the India House. His policy in India was to establish English influence; to oblige the native rulers to enter into permanent treaties with him; to place the political management of their provinces in the hands of a British Resident; to pay for the support of an army largely officered by Europeans; while the native princes at the same time retained the domestic government in their own hands. "The administration of Lord Wellesley may be regarded as the third great epoch in the formation of the British Indian empire. . . . Lord Wellesley was the first to perceive that in India a political equilibrium was impossible; that peace was only to be insured by establishing the preponderance of British power; and that the task of breaking down the Mahratta confederacy was as practicable as, sooner or later, it must have been necessary, to be undertaken."

In 1808 Lord Wellesley was appointed ambassador in Spain. From 1809 to Jan., 1812, he was Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Mr. Perceval's cabinet, but resigned in consequence of a difference with his colleagues on the Roman Catholic claims in Ireland. In May, 1812, he unsuccessfully attempted to form a coalition government. Under Lord Liverpool's ministry he was the champion of the rights of the Roman Catholics in Ireland. In 1815 he loudly censured some of the provisions of the peace with France. From 1821 to 1828 he was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, but when his brother, the Duke of Wellington, took office, and declared against the Catholic claims, the Lord-Lieutenant resigned. In 1831 he was appointed Lord Steward, under the Grey Ministry, and in 1833 again became Lord-Lieutenant, but resigned in 1834.

Wellington, ARTHUR WELLESLEY, DUKE OF (b. 1769, d. 1852), was the fourth son of the first Earl of Mornington. He was educated at Eton, and afterwards at the military college at Angers, where he studied under the celebrated Pignerol. He entered the army in Mar., 1787. His career in the field commenced in Holland (1794), under the Duke of York. He shared the hardships of this campaign, occupying the post of honour, the rearguard. He received a colonelcy in 1796. His next service was in India, where he passed through the whole of the Mysore War, and the Siege of Seringapatam, being attached to the Nizam's contingent of horse. In July, 1799, he was nominated Governor of Seringapatam and Mysore, and the command in chief of the army of occupation was entrusted to him. He exercised the great powers conferred upon him in such a way as to deserve and obtain the gratitude and respect of the natives, and to display his own extraordinary talents for organisation and command. While thus employed he found it necessary to take the field against the marauder Dhoondiah Waugh, whom he routed and slew. In 1803 he was raised to the rank of major-general, and shortly afterwards the Mahratta War broke out. Major-General Wellesley was appointed to the command of the force destined to restore the Peishwa to his throne after the conclusion of the Treaty of Bassein, as well as to act against the Mahratta chiefs. Operations in the Deccan were quickly opened, and concluded by Wellesley's brilliant victory at Assye (Sept. 23, 1803), and Argaum (Nov. 19), which effectually subdued the opposition of Scindiah and the Rajah of Berar. Shortly after the close of the Mahratta War, General Wellesley quitted India, and after an absence of five years landed once more in England. In 1807 he was appointed Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. In the following August he was nominated to a command in the expedition to Copenhagen, and rendered important services, for which he received the special thanks of Parliament. On July 12 the same year he started, with a command of 10,000 men, for Portugal, the Portland ministry having sent these troops at the request of the Portuguese government, who feared the ambitious designs of Napoleon. He landed successfully at Mondego, marched on Lisbon, and defeated the French at Roliça. Sir Harry Burrard, who had been appointed over Wellesley's head, now arrived and took the command, and countermanded all Wellesley's dispositions for the attack on Junot at Corres Vedras. The French therefore assailed the English at Vimiera, and again Sir Harry Burrard prevented the English success being decisive by forbidding Wellesley to pursue and cut off the French retreat to Torres Vedras. The Convention of Cintra roused the general indignation in England against the expedition and its commanders, and especially, but most unwarrantably, against Wellesley. He returned to England and resumed his Irish duties and his seat in Parliament. In 1809, when the French had entirely occupied the Peninsula, Wellesley was sent out again with 24,000 men. He landed at Lisbon (April 22), marched against Soult, who was strongly posted at Oporto, and drove him into Galicia. The state of his commissariat rendered it impossible to pursue and march on Madrid as he had intended; while the obstinacy and imbecility of the Spanish generals rendered co-operation impossible. In spite, therefore, of the crushing victory of Talavera (q.v.), he was obliged to retreat. The next year was occupied with the inroad of Napoleon, the victory of Busaco, and the successful defence of the lines of Torres Vedras. At last, in 1812, after the capture of Badajos and Ciudad Rodrigo, Wellington began his march across Spain by defeating the French at Salamanca; opened the road to Madrid; and marched from thence to Burgos. He was, however, compelled to retire once more to the Portuguese frontier. In 1813 he marched straight to Vittoria, and from victory to victory till Soult was finally routed at Orthez, and the abdication of Napoleon ended the great Peninsular War (q.v.). At the close of the campaign he was for his services created Marquis of Douro and Duke of Wellington; the House of Commons voted him an annuity of £10,000, which was afterwards commuted for the sum of £400,000, and on July 1 the thanks of the House were conveyed to him by the Speaker. The highest honours were conferred on him by the allies, and he was made a field-marshal in each of the principal armies of Europe. In August he proceeded to Paris to represent the British government at the court of the Tuileries. He remained five months, and bore a principal share in the negotiations of this year. In Jan., 1815, the duke was accredited to Vienna as one of the representatives of Britain at the Congress of the European Powers, and united with Austria and France in resisting the demands of Russia and Prussia. In February Napoleon broke loose from Elba, and Wellington was appointed Commander-in-Chief against him. The Hundred Days ended at Waterloo (q.v.), and the allied armies marched on Paris, where Wellington had the greatest difficulty in restraining the Prussian desire for vengeance; and it was in consequence of his advice that the army of occupation, which was to have remained for five years, evacuated France at the end of three. The military career of the duke thus came to an end. In Oct., 1818, while attending the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, he was offered and accepted the office of Master-General of the Ordnance, with a seat in the Cabinet. He took no prominent part, however, in the administration of home affairs, though he shared the odium which accrued to the government from its coercive policy. He represented Great Britain at the Congress of Verona in 1822, and protested against the armed intervention of the French court in the affairs of Spain. In 1826, he was sent on a special mission to St. Petersburg for the purpose of promoting a peaceable settlement of the Greek question. In the following year he refused to serve under Mr. Canning, and resigned the post of Commander-in-Chief which had naturally come to him on the death of the Duke of York. In 1828, he himself became Prime Minister of England. The Canningites were allowed to retain their seats for a short time, but very soon dissensions arose, and they were either driven out or resigned spontaneously. The great question of Roman Catholic Emancipation had now for a quarter of a century occupied the attention of the legislature, and had become not so much a question of abstract principle and policy as of national peace and security. The continued anarchy of Ireland, the interminable division of cabinets, the distraction of imperial councils, and the utter impossibility of maintaining such a state of things, at last satisfied the duke and Sir Robert Peel that the time had come when the clamorous demand of the Roman Catholics should be conceded. The premier had a clear perception of the difficulties to be encountered, and the sacrifices which must be made in thus surrendering the citadel of Protestant ascendancy, but having made up his mind that this measure was necessary, he carried it through resolutely and characteristically. His policy was announced in the speech from the throne (Feb. 5th, 1829), and so vigorously was the measure pressed, that in spite of the most determined opposition, the Relief Bill passed both Houses by a large majority, and in little more than a month became law. The ministry of the duke was greatly weakened by his victory over the principles and prejudices of his party. His opponents were not conciliated, while many of his old supporters had become furious in their indignation. The duke failed to read the signs of the times, and his obstinate opposition to Parliamentary Reform caused the downfall of his ministry, the accession of Earl Grey (1831), and the passing of the Reform Bill (q.v.). At the final crisis of the Bill, Wellington, at the request of the king, left the House of Lords, followed by about a hundred peers, to allow the Bill to pass. All through this period the tide of popular feeling ran strongly against the duke, who found it necessary to protect his windows from the mob by casings of iron. When the excitement of the Reform agitation had subsided, popular feeling towards him gradually changed; and during the rest of his life he retained a firm hold on the affections of the English people. In 1834 the king announced his intention to recall the duke to his councils, but the latter insisted that Sir Robert Peel was the proper person to be placed at the head of the government, and himself accepted the post of Foreign Secretary. In 1835, he retired with his leader, and never again took charge of any of the great civil departments of state. In 1841, on the return of his party to power, he accepted a seat in the Cabinet, but without office; though he took an active part in the business of the country. In 1842, he again became Commander-in-Chief, and was confirmed in the office for life by patent under the Great Seal. When the Irish famine brought the Anti-Corn-law agitation to a crisis, he changed with Peel, and gave that minister the warmest and most consistent support in his new commercial policy. It was in fact mainly through the duke's influence that the opposition of the great territorial magnates was withdrawn. On the complete break-up of the Conservative party, in 1846, the duke formally intimated his final retirement from political life, and never again took any part in the debates in the House of Lords except on military matters. But he continued to take the warmest interest in the welfare of the army, the country, and the sovereign, and was regarded by the queen as a friendly and intimate adviser. With the nation the popularity of "the duke" during his later years was extraordinary and almost unique. Wherever he appeared he was received with enthusiasm and affection. On Sept. 14, 1852, he died at Walmer Castle, where he resided as Warden of the Cinque Ports. Of Wellington's eminence as a general there is no question. In an age of great commanders he was one of the greatest; inferior to few of his contemporaries, save the great opponent whose designs he so often defeated. The integrity, honesty, and disinterested simplicity of his private character are equally little open to doubt. His position as a statesman admits of more dispute. That he did not altogether comprehend the spirit of the age in which he lived, and that he offered an unbending front to reforms which in the end he was obliged to accept, can scarcely be denied.

Welsh Judicature, ABOLITION OF (11 Geo. IV. & 1 Will. IV.). In 1820 a select committee was appointed to inquire into the Welsh judicature, which had existed for centuries, in spite of proposals to remove it. The Common Laws Commissioners of 1822 decided that its continuance was indefensible. Peel, therefore, introduced (1830) a bill for its abolition, and for adding an additional judge to each of the three superior courts at Westminster. The bill became law in 1830. The Special Sessions in Wales were abolished, and that country, with Cheshire, erected into new circuits, served by the ordinary judges.

Wendover, ROGER OF (d. 1236), was a monk of St. Albans, and for a few years Prior of Belvoir. The great work usually though not universally attributed to him, Flores Historiarum, extends from the Creation to the year 1235, and for the last thirty-five is a most valuable authority. "It is from him," says Mr. Gairdner, "we derive most of the information we possess about the reign of King John; and the straightforward simplicity with which he tells the tale, denouncing wickedness and injustice where necessary, without invective or high-colouring of any kind, is admirable." His work was continued from 1235 by Matthew Paris.

There is an edition of the Flores in the Rolls Series, and a translation in Bohn's Antiquarian Library.

Wenlock, LORD (d. 1471), was originally a supporter of the Lancastrian party, and fought in the first battle of St. Albans. Subsequently he went over to the Yorkists, and was attainted in 1459. He commanded the rear of the Yorkist army in the battle of Towton, and many honours and rewards were given him by Edward IV. He afterwards joined Warwick and the malcontents, and fought on the Lancastrian side in the battle of Tewkesbury, where he was slain, it is said by Somerset, who suspected him of treachery.

Wensleydale's Case, LORD (1856). Sir James Parke, judge of the Court of Exchequer, was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Wensleydale; but the patent which conferred the title on him contained the unusual recital that his barony was to be held "for the term of his natural life." This creation was an attempt to revive a right which had lain in abeyance since the reign of Richard II. There was a very strong feeling in the House of Lords against this, and Lord Lyndhurst acted as its exponent. Three great legal authorities who seldom united on any point, were agreed in strenuous opposition to this change—Lords Lyndhurst, Brougham, and Campbell. The Lord Chancellor, on the other hand, supported it, and was probably the author of the proposal. After some discussion, and the proposal of a great number of resolutions, the government yielded, and conferred on Sir James Parke a patent of peerage drawn up in the ordinary form.

Wentworth, PAUL, the brother of Peter Wentworth, and "the most distinguished assertor of civil liberty in Elizabeth's reign," in 1586 upheld the privileges of Parliament against the prerogative of the queen, who had sent to order the Commons to proceed no further in the matter of her marriage.

Wentworth, PETER, was member for Trengon, in Cornwall, and a man "whose courageous and independent spirit had already drawn upon him repeated manifestations of royal displeasure." During the session of 1576 he made a speech reflecting on the undue influence of the queen on the Parliament, and defending the privileges of the House. For this he was sequestered, and a committee of all the privy councillors in the House was appointed to examine him. He was sent to the Tower, but released at the queen's request in a month, being reprimanded on his knees by the Speaker. In 1588 he was again committed to the Tower through the instrumentality of the Speaker, Serjeant Puckering (afterwards Lord Keeper), for some questions which he proposed to put in favour of liberty of speech. In 1593 he was again imprisoned for presenting a petition to the Lord Keeper, desiring "the Lords of the Upper House to join with those of the Lower in imploring her majesty to entail the succession of the crown, for which they had already prepared a bill."

Wentworth, SIR THOMAS. [STRATFORD.]

Wentworth, THOMAS, 1ST LORD (d. 1551), was employed in 1549 in the suppression of the Norfolk Rebellion; as a member of the council he subsequently took an active part against Protector Somerset.

Wentworth, THOMAS, 2ND LORD (d. 1590), succeeded his father (1551). In 1554 he was Governor of Calais, a post which he continued to hold until the town was lost (1558). On its capitulation, which, had Wentworth's warnings been listened to in England, might have been prevented, the governor was detained a prisoner. In the following year he was tried for treason and cowardice, together with some of his subordinate officers, but was acquitted.

Wergild, in Anglo-Saxon times, was the money value of each man's life, and the sum which, in case of his death by violence, had to be paid by the murderer, either to his kinsmen or gild-brethren, or in the case of a serf to his master. The amount of the wergild depended entirely on the rank of the person slain, and was carefully graduated. Thus the wer of the king was 7,200 shillings, that of an ealdorman 2,400 shillings, while a king's thegn was valued at 1,200 shillings, an ordinary thegn at 600 shillings, and a ceorl at 200. Wessex, THE KINGDOM OF. This state, which eventually expanded into the kingdom of the English, but when separate covered at one time seven modern counties, was founded by the West Saxons in 519. These settlers seem to have been at first called Gewissas, which word also is supposed to mean men of the west, and had been already spreading over and planting themselves in the Itchen valley for twenty-four years. Some inquirers believe that during this time the work of conquest and occupation was carried on "by independent bands of settlers," who had not yet felt the need of a common leader, but who, in 519, were brought to a union under the kingship of Cerdic and his son, Cynric. Indeed, to these "aldermen," as it calls them, the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle gives all the distinction from the first, informing us that they came to Britain in 495 with five ships, and had a fight with the Welsh on the very day of their arrival; were, in 501, followed by Port; slew, in 508, 5,000 Britons, and their King Natanleod; were, in 514, joined by Stuf and Wihtgar, leading a third invading force; "laid their grasp on the kingship" in 519, thus establishing the kingdom that has since swelled into the British empire. Their battle at Mons Badonicus, in 520, with "the king, in whom some have recognised the majestic figure of Ambrosius" (Elton), some the mysterious Arthur, some both, is reported from the other side. Cerdic lived, fought, and slew—routing the Britons at Cerdiclea in 527, and over-running Wight in 530—till 534, when he died, leaving his task to be carried on by Cynric. The exact extent of Cynric's kingdom is unknown, but it had certainly spread beyond Hampshire. It was reserved for his son, Ceawlin, to make the West Saxon a large and powerful state. Beginning in 560, Ceawlin reigned for thirty-one years. Aided by his brother, Cuthwulf, he overthrew Ethelbert of Kent, vanquished the Britons at Bedford in 571, vanquished them again at Derham in Gloucestershire in 577, and took into his kingdom Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire, northern Wiltshire, and the Severn Valley. In 584 he fought, and lost his brother, in the battle of Fethanlea, a place that Dr. Guest identifies with Faddiley, regarding the campaign as a conquering march as far as Cheshire, but others conjecture to have been Frethern. In either case the West Saxons had extended their conquests far beyond the line of the Thames and the Somersetshire Avon, to which they had been at first restricted. But Ceawlin would seem to have gone too fast; disaster overtook his arms in the end. Beaten at Gloucestersburg by his own subjects, he fled, and died in exile. After this rebuff the advance of the West Saxons was held in check for more than two hundred years. They lost to Mercia the conquests they had made beyond the Thames, and they even lay under the Mercian yoke for nineteen years (733—752). But they had compensations. About 635 they were converted to Christianity by Birinus; under Kenwalch (Cenwealh) they pushed their western frontier from the Axe to the Parret; then, under Ina, beyond the Parret; from the same Ina they obtained the first English code of laws; and, led by Cuthred, they broke the Mercian yoke from off their necks by a great victory over Ethelbald at Burford in 752. At the same time they gave two examples that have not been lost on their posterity—in 672 they took a woman for their ruler, Sexburh, Kenwalch's widow, and in 755 they dethroned Cuthred's successor, Sigebert, after he had reigned a year. Ina, too, added to the bishopric of Winchester, founded by Kenwalch, that of Sherborne, of which the see was later on shifted to Salisbury. This stage of West Saxon history closed with 800, when Egbert came to the throne. Feared by his predecessor, Brihtic, he had passed several years in exile near Charlemagne, and is thought to have profited greatly thereby. It was his fate not only to extend the kingdom, and bring it once more to the front, but also to raise it to the lordship of the other kingdoms and states. In his days Wessex reached the Tamar, the invading Mercians were overthrown at Ellandun in 823, and their sceptre was wrested from them, while the aggressive Danes and the Cornishmen were beaten in a great battle at Hengestdown in 835. Between 823 and 828 every other people south of the Tweed had been annexed to or made dependent on the West Saxons. The Danish wars gave a new turn to the growth of Wessex. Under Alfred she was virtually stripped of her external supremacy, but her immediate territory was much increased. The impulse thus gained continued under Alfred's son and grandsons, till Wessex far outgrew its name, and lost itself in the English kingdom, but her distinguishing legal customs, the West-saxnalage, survived till Henry II. reduced English law to a uniform system.

West African Colonies and Settlements. THE, consist of those on the Gambia, the Gold Coast, Lagos, and Sierra Leone. They are all crown colonies—that is, the crown has entire control over the administration. (1) The Gambia was first colonised after 1618; a patent having been granted to some Exeter merchants by Elizabeth to trade in the district. Its trade chiefly consisted in slaves, and its white population has greatly decreased since the abolition of slavery. Until 1843, when it became an independent colony, it was subject to Sierra Leone. It became a portion of the government of West Africa settlements by charter in 1843. (2) Sierra Leone was at first settled solely with negroes. It became a British colony in 1787, and has since been maintained for the suppression of the slave-trade. (3) The Gold Coast was first visited by Englishmen in 1591. It became the possession of the African Company of merchants in 1750, and they ceded it to the crown in 1820. Several times during this century the English protectorate over the tribes of the interior has caused us to come into collision with the Ashantees, the last occasion being in 1872—73, when Coomassie, their capital, was burnt. In 1872 the Dutch surrendered all their settlements on the Gold Coast to England in return for compensation elsewhere. The Gold Coast became an independent colony in 1874. (4) Lagos, originally belonging to the King of Dahomey, was captured by the British in 1851, and the slave-trade suppressed. It was formally ceded by the king in 1861.

Westbury, RICHARD BETHELL, LORD (b. 1800, d. 1873), was the son of a physician at Bristol; he was educated at Wadham College, Oxford. He was called to the bar (1823), and soon acquired an extensive practice. He obtained distinguished success as advocate for Brazenose College in a suit which brought him a continually increasing practice, and in 1840 he became a Queen's Counsel. In 1847 he unsuccessfully contested Shaftesbury in the Liberal interest. In 1851 he was more successful, and was returned for Aylesbury as a "Liberal, favourable to the ballot and the abolition of Church rates." In 1859 he was elected for Wolverhampton, which he continued to represent till he was called to the Upper House. In Dec., 1852, he became Solicitor-General under the Coalition government of Lord Aberdeen. His services at this time were of much use to Mr. Gladstone in carrying the Succession Duty Bill, many of the points in which were so intricate and so strictly technical, that no one but an equity lawyer could have explained them properly to the House. The success in fact was in the main due to Sir Richard Bethell, who also took an active part about the same time in carrying the bills for reforming the University of Oxford, and for abolishing the Ecclesiastical Courts. In the winter of 1856—7 Sir Richard became Attorney-General. It became his duty to introduce and carry through the House the Probate and Administration Act and the Divorce Act, and this duty he discharged effectually and successfully. When the new Court of Probate and Matrimonial Causes was formed, the judgeship was first offered by Lord Palmerston to Sir Richard Bethell, who, however, refused it. In 1857 he carried successfully through the House of Commons another important measure, the Fraudulent Trustees Bill. He had a large share in the preparation of the Conspiracy to Murder Bill of 1858, which caused the retirement of Lord Palmerston's Cabinet from office. In 1861, on the death of Lord Campbell, the Great Seal was offered to Sir Richard, and he took his seat in the House of Lords as Lord Westbury, having previously carried the Bankruptcy Bill of 1861 through the Lower House. In the summer of 1865 some scandalous proceedings which it was thought he ought to have detected and checked, were brought to light in connection with the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, and in consequence of these, and of an adverse motion in the House of Commons, he resigned the Great Seal in the July of that year. From that date down to his death, Lord Westbury constantly took part in the decision of Appeals brought before the House of Lords, and as Arbitrator in delicate and important commercial cases.

Westminster Abbey was commenced by Edward the Confessor in 1049, and consecrated in Dec., 1065. The rebuilding was commenced by Henry III. in 1220, and the chapter house begun in 1250. In 1256 Parliament first met in the chapter house at Westminster, and their last sitting in this building was in Jan., 1547. The sanctuary rights of the abbey were abolished in 1602. In 1739 the Western Tower was finished, and in 1808—22 the abbey was repaired and partly reconstructed. The restoration of the chapter house was begun in 1866 and finished in 1871. The altar screen was restored in 1867.

Westminster Assembly, THE, was convoked by order of the Long Parliament in the summer of 1643, to consider the condition of the Church, as "many things in its liturgy, discipline, and government required further and more perfect reformation." It met on July 1, and, after a sermon from Dr. Twiss, the Prolocutor, began its sessions in Henry VII.'s chapel, whence it afterwards removed to the Jerusalem Chamber. The assembly consisted of both lay and clerical members, and was never very numerous—about sixty attending its ordinary sittings. The great majority of the assembly were inclined to Presbyterianism, and many of them profoundly convinced of its Divine Right. This party was further strengthened when political necessities involved a close alliance with the Scots, and compelled the assembly to accept the Solemn League and Covenant, and to add to its numbers Henderson, Baillie, and other commissioners of the General Assembly of the Scottish Church. Their predominance was further assured when the moderate Episcopalians, the advocates of "Ussher's model," including the archbishop himself, either refused to sit or withdrew from the assembly. But a small though extremely energetic and intelligent opposition, consisting partly of "Erastians," like the lawyers Selden, St. John, and Whitelocke; and the divines, Coleman, and, to some extent, Lightfoot; and partly of Independents, like the "dissenting brethren," Vane, Nye, Goodwin, Bridge, Burroughs, and Simpson. Burgess, Calamy, Marshall, and Ash, were, with the Scots, the most famous of the Presbyterian party. After 1645 Charles Herle was its Prolocutor. The debates of the assembly extended over nearly all possible subjects of theology. From July, 1643, to the summer of 1647 it pursued its way uninterrupted. It spent much time on the revision of the Articles, which involved endless theological discussion. It superseded the Prayer Book by the Directory of Public Worship. It did its best to establish a rigid Presbyterian organisation, slightly modified by a few insignificant concessions to the Independents, and, pending its establishment, it took upon itself the function of ordaining ministers. It drew up the celebrated Westminster Confession of Faith with the Longer and Shorter Catechisms, which have since remained the authoritative expositions of British Presbyterianism. Possessing no direct power, it was necessarily somewhat dependent on the Parliament to which it owed its existence; though this did not prevent the active section exalting the spiritual power so highly as to call down upon the assembly the threat of an action for præmunire. After the summer of 1647, the retirement of the Scots marked the ending of the main business of the Assembly. But up to the spring in 1652 a small number of its divines continued to meet for the purpose of examining candidates for ordination, until Cromwell's dissolution of the Rump led to their silent disappearance without formal dismissal. Despite their narrowness and bigotry, the members of the Westminster Assembly had shown much learning and zeal, and some moderation, in a critical and arduous duty.

[T. F. T.]

Westminster, MATTHEW OF (fl. circa 1325), was a Benedictine monk. His Flores Historiarum begins with the creation of the world, and ends with the year 1307. The first part, an abridgment of the Bible and a sketch of Roman history, is of no worth, and his description of the beginnings of English history shows a strong inclination to the marvellous. His account of the Norman kings, chiefly based on Roger of Wendover, is, however, very careful, but the most valuable part of his chronicle is that dealing with the reigns of John, Henry III., and Edward I. He seems throughout to have been an accurate and painstaking writer. Matthew of Westminster, more sinned against than sinning, was the source of numerous compilations in the following century. An edition of the Flores Historiarum was published in 1870, and there is an English translation of them by C. D. Yonge in Bohn's Antiquarian Library.

Westminster, THE FIRST STATUTE OF (1276), was one of the earliest of Edward I.'s great legal measures, and was a measure of reform and consolidation. It contains fifty-one clauses, and covers the whole ground of legislation, so that, as Dr. Stubbs says, it is "almost a code in itself." Its language now recalls that of Canute or Alfred, now anticipates that of our own day: on the one hand common right is to be done to all, as well poor as rich, without respect of persons; on the other, elections are to be free, and no man is by force, malice, or menace to disturb them. The spirit of the Great Charter is not less discernible; excessive amercements, abuses of wardship, irregular demands for feudal aids, are forbidden in the same words, or by amending enactments. The inquiry system of Henry II., the law of wreck, and the institution of coroner's measures of Richard and his ministers, come under review, as well as the Provisions of Oxford, and the Statute of Marlborough.

Stubbs, Const. Hist. and Select Charters.

Westminster, THE SECOND STATUTE OF (1285), like the preceding, is rather a code than a simple statute. It contains the famous article De Donis Conditionalibus, alters and improves the laws relating to manorial jurisdictions, trial of criminals, the rights of commonage, dower, and advowsons.

Westminster, THE PROVISIONS OF (1259), were drawn up in accordance with the plan prescribed by the Provisions of Oxford (q.v.). They were republished by Henry III. in 1262, and again in 1264, during his captivity. They were subsequently embodied in the Statute of Marlborough (1267). They provide for the orderly inheritance of property, forbid the disparaging marriage of wards, and the granting of lands, &c., to aliens; the offices of state and the fortresses are to be put into the hands of Englishmen only; ecclesiastics shall not acquire any land without the sanction of the immediate lord, and benefit of clergy is limited.

Westminster Hall was built by William Rufus in 1097-99. It was used for sittings of the courts of law in 1224. Richard II. had the hall rebuilt in 1397. The law courts, which had been attached to the outside walls of the hall, were taken down in 1884 after the completion of the Royal Courts of Justice in the Strand.

Westmoreland, CHARLES NEVILLE, EARL OF (d. 1584), one of the most powerful Catholic nobles of Elizabeth's reign, though a man devoid of talent, was a leader in the Northern Rebellion of 1569, and achieved the only success in the insurrection by the capture of Barnard Castle from Sir George Bowes. On the collapse of the movement he made his escape to the border, and in spite of many attempts to seize him, managed, with better fortune than the Earl of Northumberland, to find an asylum with the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands, where he dragged out a tedious existence in poverty and obscurity, barely supplied with the necessities of life by a slender pension from the King of Spain.

Westmoreland, RALPH NEVILLE, EARL OF (d. 1425), was the son of John, Lord Neville. In 1386 he was made Guardian of the West Marches, and in 1399 Earl of Westmoreland. He joined Bolingbroke on his landing in England, and was by him created Earl Marshal. He fought for Henry IV. against the Percies; prevented the Earl of Northumberland from joining his son Hotspur; checked the incursions of the Scots, and by gross treachery got Archbishop Scrope, the Earl of Nottingham, and other partisans of the Percies into his hands. He married first Margaret, daughter of the Earl of Stafford; and secondly, Joan Beaufort, daughter of John of Gaunt.

Wetherell, SIR CHARLES (b. 1770, d. 1846), was the son of the Very Rev. Nathan Wetherell, Dean of Hereford. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and was called to the bar (1794). His friendship with Lord Eldon, who received the Great Seal in 1801, stood him in good stead. His practice increased continually, and in 1816 he was made king's counsel. In 1817 he undertook the defence of Watson after the Spa Fields Riots, but this proceeding did not further his chances of promotion. In 1818 he was elected M.P. for Shaftesbury, but never acquired any great influence with the House. From 1820 to 1826 he represented the city of Oxford. From 1826 to 1830 he sat for Plympton; and in 1830 he was elected for Boroughbridge, which was disfranchised by the Reform Bill. He then retired from Parliament. In 1824 he was appointed Solicitor-General by the Earl of Liverpool; and in 1826 he succeeded to the Attorney-Generalship, an office which he did not, however, hold longer than till April 30 the following year. In 1828 he again became Attorney-General under the Duke of Wellington, but resigned when the government accepted the Catholic Relief Act. He opposed Lord Grey's Reform Bill with the greatest ability and perseverance, and in consequence became extremely unpopular in the country. In 1831, therefore, when he proceeded to Bristol to hold the October Sessions as Recorder of the town, his carriage was surrounded by an infuriated mob, and he and the other corporate authorities were pelted with stones. Sir Charles retained his office, however, in spite of this, till his death, which was due to an accident when out driving.

Wexford was frequently the scene of conflict in Irish wars and rebellions. It was taken by Fitzgerald and Fitzstaple in 1169. In 1462 it was seized by Sir John Butler, and recovered by the Earl of Ormonde. In the autumn of 1641 it was captured by the Irish rebels. Cromwell appeared before Wexford after the capture of Drogheda in 1650, and he refused to grant the terms demanded by the governor, and demanded an unconditional surrender, giving only an hour for reflection. The gates were not opened at the end of the hour granted, and the town was at once stormed. Some 3,000 or 4,000 people were massacred (Oct. 9, 1650). It was in Wexford that the rebellion of 1798 assumed its most dangerous form. It broke out on May 26, and the troops were defeated in rapid succession at Oulast, Enniscorthy, and at the Three Rocks. In consequence of this last defeat, General Fawcett, who had been advancing to support Maxwell, who commanded in Wexford, retreated, and on the 31st Maxwell himself had to follow his example, his men refusing to fight. The Protestant inhabitants and fugitives had fled to the ships in the harbour, but were brought back and thrown into prison. After the rebel defeat at New Ross the Protestants were given a choice between conversion to Catholicism and death. On June 20 ninety-seven Protestants were murdered after a mock trial. The nominal leader of the rebels was Baginell Harvey, but the real leader a priest named Murphy. Lake's victory at Vinegar Hill (June 21, 1798) crushed the Wexford rebellion, and the insurgents evacuated the town the same day.

Whalley, EDWARD (d. circa 1679), was a member of an ancient Nottinghamshire family, and a first cousin of Oliver Cromwell. He joined the Parliamentary army, and distinguished himself by his bravery at Naseby, for which he was made a colonel of horse. During Charles I.'s imprisonment at Hampton Court he was placed in Whalley's charge. In 1655 he was made one of the major-generals, and subsequently one of the "lords" of Cromwell's Upper House. He took a prominent part in the trial of the king, and was one of those who signed the death warrant. When the Restoration was inevitable he fled to America, where he led a life of danger, having continually to hide in the woods and among Puritan friends, who protected him from the warrant which had been issued against him.

Whalley, RICHARD, one of the most unscrupulous adherents of Protector Somerset, was receiver-general in Yorkshire, where he managed to appropriate a good deal of the public money. In 1551 he was accused of having formed a plot for the restoration of the Protector.

Wharncliffe, JAMES STUART WORTLEY MACKENZIE, BARON (b. 1776, d. 1845), was the grandson of the third Earl of Bute. He was educated at the Charterhouse, entered the army in 1791, and quitted it in 1801, after having obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1797 he was elected to Parliament for the borough of Bossiney in Cornwall. In 1812, after the failure of many ministerial negotiations, he was chosen to move an address to the Prince Regent, praying that he would form a strong and efficient ministry. In 1818 he succeeded to his large inheritance, and was elected for Yorkshire, which he represented till 1826, when, having offended his constituents by his opinions on the Catholic question, he was not re-elected. He was, however, elevated to the peerage. He strenuously opposed the Reform Bill in 1831, but was reconciled to it later by Earl Grey. He opposed the Whigs as long as they were in power, but when Sir R. Peel was recalled from Italy (Nov., 1834) to form a Conservative government, he took office as Lord Privy Seal, which he held till April, 1835. In 1841, on the return of Peel to power, Lord Wharncliffe became President of the Council.

Wharton, PHILIP, DUKE OF (b. 1699, d. 1731), son of Thomas, Marquis of Wharton, early displayed extraordinary talents, combined with an utterly dissolute and unprincipled character. In 1716 he went abroad and had interviews with the Pretender and queen-dowager, and offered them his services. He sat in the Irish Parliament as a Whig, but on coming to England he passed into Opposition. His talents were employed in publishing an Opposition paper, known as the True Briton. In 1720 his violent attack on Lord Stanhope and the ministry, when the South Sea Company was under discussion, so enraged that statesman as to cause a rush of blood to his head, which proved fatal. [STANHOPE.] Wharton made a fine speech in 1722 in defence of Atterbury. Shortly afterwards his debts compelled him to leave England. He went to Spain, where he openly attached himself to the Pretender's cause, and was created by him Duke of Northumberland. He became a pretended convert to Roman Catholicism. At this time the schemes of Ripperda, the Spanish minister, had resulted in a close alliance between Spain and Austria, while by a secret treaty these powers pledged themselves to assist the restoration of the Stuarts. But the imprudence of Wharton and Ripperda ruined the plan. Wharton had so far cast aside his nationality as to become a volunteer in the siege of Gibraltar. In 1728 he tried to be reconciled with the English court, but they, through Horace Walpole, refused to remit the indictment for high treason which had been preferred against him. His character has been drawn in Pope's lines:—

"Wharton, the scorn and wonder of our days,
Whose ruling passion was the lust of praise.

A fool, with more of wit than half mankind;
Too rash for thought—for action too refin'd;
A tyrant to the wife his heart approves;
A rebel to the very king he loves."

Wharton, THOMAS, MARQUIS OF (b. 1640, d. 1715), was the son of Philip, Lord Wharton, who had fought on the side of the Parliament in the Civil War. He was educated in the strictest Calvinism, but nevertheless became one of the most dissolute of the Cavaliers at the Restoration. He was, however, throughout his life a firm adherent of the Whig party. In 1685 he was elected for Buckinghamshire, where his political influence was very great. It is said that in this and other counties he sent thirty members to Parliament. He was one of the boldest opponents of James II. When James reprimanded the Commons on the subject of the Test Act, Wharton proposed that a time should be appointed for taking the king's answer into consideration. By his song "Lillibullero" (q.v.), a satire on Tyrconnell's administration, Wharton afterwards boasted that he had sung a king out of three kingdoms. On the arrival of William in England Wharton joined him at Exeter. When the throne was declared vacant, Wharton was the first to propose that it should be occupied by William and Mary. In 1695 he conducted an attack on the Tory ministry. A committee was appointed to examine the books of the city of London and the East India Company. He was placed in the chair; and the result of the inquiry moved the impeachment of the Duke of Leeds. In 1696 he supported the bill for Fenwick's attainder, which caused the Whigs to triumph completely. He was made Chief Justice in Eyre, retaining his place of Comptroller of the Household. In 1697 he hoped to be made Secretary of State; but William refused to grant the request, for fear of alienating the Tories. Next year a Tory reaction set in, and Wharton's candidates were defeated throughout England. In 1700 he proposed amendments in the bill for the resumption of Irish land grants. A struggle took place between the Lords and Commons; but the former yielded, and Wharton retired from London. In 1701 he regained all his influence in Buckinghamshire. On the accession of Anne he was removed from his employments. In 1705 he proposed a Regency Bill in the case of the queen's demise. In 1708, after the Junto had joined Godolphin's ministry, he was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. There he showed great hostility to the Catholics, but was disposed to conciliate the Dissenters. He was superseded by Ormonde in 1710. His administration was bitterly attacked by Swift, whose Short Character of the Earl of Wharton is a satire of the most savage character. During the last session of Anne's Parliament he displayed great zeal for the Protestant Succession. He opposed Bolingbroke's Schism Act; he proposed that the Duke of Lorraine should be compelled to expel the Pretender from his dominions; he advocated the issuing of a proclamation offering a reward for the apprehension of the Pretender, whether dead or alive. On the accession of George he was made Lord Privy Seal, and created a marquis. In the next year he died. Wharton's private character was irredeemably bad. He was notorious as the greatest profligate in England, and his effrontery and mendacity had no bounds. He was the most thorough-going and unscrupulous of all the Whig party men of the age. "The falsest of mankind in all relations but one: he was the truest of Whigs," says Macaulay.

Whethamstede, JOHN OF (d. 1464), was Abbot of St. Albans, and wrote a chronicle or register of events from 1441 to 1460. Though a very meagre record, owing to the dearth of contemporary writers at this period, this chronicle is of considerable importance, and is published in the Rolls Series.

Whig. This famous party name was first used to denote the stern Covenanters of south-western Scotland, who struggled against the Royalist and Episcopal Restoration of 1660, and frequently rose in fruitless revolt against the government of Charles II. About 1679, during the height of the Popish Plot agitation, the name was applied to the champions of the Exclusion Bill, at first in derision, but before long as their accepted name. The Whig party had, however, existed in fact long before it existed in name. It sprang from the old Country party, which had begun the contest with Charles I., and had, with varying fortunes, continued to struggle against his son. In this sense the germ of the Whig party is almost as old as the end of the reign of Elizabeth. Proscribed after the failure of the Exclusion Bill, the Whig party found their principles accepted by nearly the whole nation in 1688. The accession of the house of Hanover completed a triumph which lasted until the accession of George III. During this long period of power the Whigs became conservative. Those who had been zealous for the old liberties of the nation, for Magna Carta, the Habeas Corpus Act, and the "Social Contract," now regarded the Revolution, the Toleration Act, and the Bill of Rights as including all the most important of their principles. All now needed was to preserve the admirable constitution which the Revolution had given us, and to govern the country in its spirit. The opposition to the crown had always been led by the aristocracy. The triumph of the opposition made the English government a "Venetian oligarchy," while reducing the sovereign to the position of the doge. Of this party in its earliest stage, Locke was the great teacher; Somers and Walpole, perhaps, the greatest practical statesmen. But the long tenure of power demoralised the party, so that from being stationary it became almost reactionary, while most corrupt in its administration. Attacked both from the popular and royalist sides by Chatham and George III., the want of agreement between the two elements of opposition, and the narrowly personal character of George III.'s policy, postponed for a time its final defeat. At last Chatham's son repudiated the name of Whig, and, in alliance with the crown, dealt a death-blow to the Whig aristocracy. The writings of Burke enshrine in its most perfect form the Whig theory of government. But with the French Revolution new political factors came into play, which revolutionised again the Whig party. The meaning of the term changed. "Revolution Whigs," like Burke, became practically Tories. The more active section of the party became Liberal, if not Radical. Fox was the founder of the New Whigs, whose first principle was admiration of the French Revolution, and who were the progenitors of the modern Liberal party. Their principles triumphed in the Reform Bill of 1832; but once in power the aristocratic and conservative element which still remained in the Whig party began to show itself again to the disgust of the more advanced section of the Reformers. Gradually the word Whig became so discredited that Whig progressists preferred to borrow from Continental politics the term Liberal as a better designation of their party. The development of new party principles by the changes involved in the Reform Act completed the change. Ultimately the term Whig has become almost a term of reproach in the great party which has inherited its traditions, and is popularly used to denote a timid and rather old-fashioned type of aristocratic politician.

Whiggamores' Raid, THE, is the name given to the proceedings of a body of Covenanters (1648) who assembled at Mauchline in Ayrshire, under Lord Eglinton, and marched to Edinburgh.

Whitbread, SAMUEL (b. 1758, d. 1815), was the son of a London brewer, his mother being a daughter of Lord Cornwallis, and was educated at Eton, and St. John's College, Oxford. In 1790 he was returned to Parliament for Bedford, and first signalled himself by a powerful speech in opposition to the proposal of the ministry for a Russian armament. In the following year (1793) he opposed the project of a war with France. Throughout the long sway of Pitt, Whitbread was one of the foremost men among the Opposition. When in 1805 the Opposition decided to bring Lord Melville to account, Whitbread was selected to move the resolutions. Consistent in his view of the war policy throughout, he never ceased to inveigh against the rupture of the Peace of Amiens, and broke with a large section of his own party, who were at last convinced of the insincerity of Napoleon's professions. In 1809 he took a prominent and fearless part in the inquiry into the Duke of York's conduct. On Napoleon's escape from Elba, Whitbread again raised his voice against any attempt to impose a ruler on France and to interfere with the choice of the nation. Unfortunately he only lived just long enough to see the end of a war which he so violently detested. He incurred much odium in his attempts to put down the jobbery which had prevented Drury Lane Theatre from occupying the national position which it ought to have held. The strain thus entailed on him, combined with his Parliamentary labours, were too much for him. His mind gave way, and on July 6, 1815, he died by his own hand.

White, JOHN, Bishop of Lincoln and afterwards of Winchester (b. 1511, d. 1660), was a strong opponent of the Reformation, and was imprisoned in the Tower by Edward VI. Under Mary he obtained high favour at court, and was one of the commissioners appointed to try Cranmer for heresy (1555). On the accession of Elizabeth he was again sent to the Tower for preaching a violent sermon against the queen.

White Bands, THE PARLIAMENT OF (1321), was the name given to the Parliament which banished the Despencers, from the white favours which were worn by the adherents of the barons.

Whiteboys, THE. The increased demand for salt beef and salt butter in the middle of the eighteenth century, gave a great impetus to the change from tillage to pasture in Ireland. Tithes aggravated the sufferings of the tenants which necessarily followed this change. The Whiteboy movement was the result; it was formidable chiefly in Tipperary and Limerick. In the spring of 1760 troops had to be sent there together with a special commission to try the numerous offenders, but few were convicted. The leader of the Whiteboys called himself Captain Danger, and from 1762 to 1765 his commands were better obeyed and enforced than the law. At last the gentry formed bodies of Volunteers, and this, together with the execution of a certain Father Sheehy, repressed the outrages for a time. In 1786, however, the Whiteboys reappeared in Munster; they mustered in opposition to the payment of tithes, and forced the people to swear to obey the Captain's right. They disarmed all Protestants, and committed terrible outrages, especially on curates and clergymen of the Established Church. In 1786 they were bold enough to attack a detachment of the 20th Regiment; they were driven off with some difficulty, as they had managed to arm themselves with the arms of the Volunteers. In the same year a special bill for the "Protection of the Clergy" had to be passed. General Luttrell was now sent down with troops, and he and Lord Tyrone stopped the movement for the moment. But soon after, the High Sheriff had to fly for his life from the Whiteboys, and now at last the gentry were roused, and headed by Lord Kenmare, a Catholic, hunted them down without mercy, while shiploads were sent off to Botany Bay. After the Rebellion of 1798, nothing was heard of them for some time, but in 1821 they again appeared in Munster. The Insurrection Act checked them, but in 1823 they were worse than ever. After that, however, these bands of plunderers assumed a different name.

Whitelocke, BULSTRODE (b. 1605, d. 1676), son of Judge Sir James Whitelocke, became a student at the Middle Temple, and was elected member for Marlow in Nov., 1640. At the trial of the Earl of Strafford, Whitelocke had the charge of the last seven articles of the impeachment. At the outbreak of the war he raised troops, and occupied Oxford for the Parliament (Aug., 1642), but was forced to abandon it immediately. He acted as one of the Commissioners for the Parliament during the negotiations at Oxford and Uxbridge, and was also a member of the Westminster Assembly. In May, 1647, he voted against the disbanding of the army, and in March, 1648, was appointed one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal. Whitelocke refused to take part in the preparation of the king's trial, but continued to hold his place under the Commonwealth, and received a seat in the Council of State. Although he disapproved of the violent dissolution of the Parliament, he accepted from Cromwell the post of ambassador to Sweden (Nov., 1653). After concluding a treaty of amity with Queen Christina, he returned to England, and resumed his duties as Commissioner for the custody of the Great Seal. From this office he was dismissed (June, 1656), for opposing Cromwell's ordinance for the reform of Chancery. He was nominated as a member of Cromwell's House of Lords, but refused to accept the title of viscount which the Protector wished to confer on him. Richard appointed him Keeper of the Great Seal, but he nevertheless became a member of the Council of State of the restored Rump, and when the army and Parliament quarrelled, sided with the army, and attempted to raise a regiment to oppose Monk. He remained in retirement from the close of 1659 to the final dissolution of the Long Parliament, and did not offer himself for election to the Convention. The House of Commons by 175 to 134 votes decided that Whitelocke should have the benefit of the Act of Indemnity, and he escaped all punishment.

A book called Whitelocke's Memorials was published in 1882. Mr. Sanford, in his Studies of the Great Rebellion, calls this work "a compilation which is manifestly a bookseller's speculation, founded on some rough notes of Whitelocke's, eked out by scraps from the newspapers, and other much more doubtful sources of information; and edited by some Royalist who had little personal knowledge of the general events of the Civil War, and who has not only made sad confusion in dates, but has also introduced certain passages which may be safely pronounced to be absolute forgeries." Anthony Wood says, that the anonymous editor was Arthur, Earl of Annesley.

Whitgift, JOHN (b. 1530, d. 1604), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Great (Trimsby, and educated at Cambridge, and became Master of Trinity in 1567. Having early become a zealous advocate of the Reformed doctrines, he would have been compelled to quit England during the Marian persecution, had he not been protected by Dr. Perne, a pupil. After the accession of Elizabeth, Whitgift soon acquired great reputation as a preacher, and in 1573 was made Dean of Lincoln, subsequently obtaining the see of Worcester in 1576. In 1583 he accepted the primacy of England in succession to Archbishop Grindal, and at once set himself to remedy the abuses caused by his predecessor's leniency. He issued articles for the regulation of the Church of extreme severity, and took active measures against the Puritans whom he had formerly attacked in his answer to Cartwright's Admonition (q.v.). On the death of Sir Thomas Bromley in 1587, the post of Lord High Chancellor was offered to the archbishop, but refused by him to his great honour. In 1595 he drew up the famous Lambeth Articles, and on the death of the queen endeavoured to win the favour of her successor, an attempt in which he succeeded admirably, owing to his politic flattery of James. Though nominally president of the Hampton Court Conference in 1604, he delegated most of his duties to Bishop Bancroft, owing to his old age, and died shortly afterwards of a paralytic stroke. Mosheim says of him, "He was disinterested, consistent, single-minded, liberal, and discerning above most men. His great natural blemish was hastiness of temper. This, however, he corrected by a spirit so thoroughly considerate and forgiving that his friends rather apprehended from him undue lenity. When principle was at stake he would make no compromise. In secular politics he did not interfere, usually retiring from the council board when it was unoccupied by ecclesiastical affairs."

Whithern (or CANDIDA CASA) was the capital of the district subsequently known as Galloway, and is said to have been the see of St. Ninian, who in 397 built a church there, which he dedicated to St. Martin of Tours. About 730 the Northumbrians founded a bishopric here under Pecthelm, but the line of Anglie bishops came to an end with Beadulf in 803.

Widdrington, SIR THOMAS (d. 1664), was a member of an ancient Northumberland family, and was elected member for Berwick in 1640. He took a prominent part on the Presbyterian side against the bishops, but finding subsequently that the Independents were the rising party, he joined them, and in 1648 was made one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal. He refused to take any part in the king's trial, but in 1651 was made one of the Council of State. He was in favour of making the young Duke of Gloucester king under restrictions, but this advice was not relished either by the Cromwellian or Republican factions. Cromwell reappointed him to his commissionership, but on his refusing to assent to the proposed reforms in Chancery, he was removed from office in 1655. He was chosen Speaker of the Parliament of 1656, in which capacity he presented the Humble Petition and Advice to Cromwell, and strongly advocated his assuming the royal title. In 1658 he was made Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and in 1660 Commissioner of the Great Seal, which office he held till the Restoration. He owed his rise in great measure to his having married a sister of Lord Fairfax, though his legal attainments were by no means small.

Wight, THE ISLE OF (called by the Romans Vectis, and in Domesday Book WICET and WYHT), was conquered by Claudius in A.D. 43, and subsequently had to submit to raids from Cerdic the Saxon and the Danes. Earl Godwin, after his banishment by Edward the Confessor, made a descent on the island in 1052. After the Conquest William allotted the island to William Fitz-Osbern, who was created Lord of the Isle of Wight. Fitz-Osbern built the greater part of Carisbrooke Castle. The island was frequently plundered by the French down to the reign of Richard III. In the reign of Henry VI. it was allotted to the Earl of Warwick, who received the title of King of the Isle of Wight, and on the accession of Edward IV. it passed to Earl Rivers, whose successors, the Woodvilles, were Captains of the Isle of Wight for several generations. The first governor of the island was the Earl of Pembroke, appointed by the Long Parliament. He was succeeded by Colonel Hammond, to whom Charles I. repaired after his escape from Hampton Court. During the imprisonment of the king at Carisbrooke, and subsequently at Hurst Castle, the complicated negotiations and intrigues between the king and Parliament were carried on chiefly at Newport.

Wightgar (d. 543?) was one of the invaders of Wessex (514), and is said to have been a nephew of Cerdic. Together with his brother Stuf, he assisted Cerdic and Cynric against the Britons, and they received the Isle of Wight in 534 as a tributary kingdom. From him Carisbrooke (Wigtare-byrig) is supposed to derive its name.

Wihfred, King of Kent (692—725), was son of Egbert and brother of Edric. After the death of the latter in 687 (?) there seems to have been an interregnum till 692, when Wihfred, having purchased peace from Wessex, was chosen king. His reign was successful, and he is spoken of as "an admirable ruler, an invincible warrior, and a pious Christian."

Wilberforce, WILLIAM (b. 1759, d. 1833), a member of an old Yorkshire family, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he formed a close friendship with Pitt. On leaving Cambridge, he was returned to Parliament for Hull, his native town. He at once opposed North, especially in regard to the American War. But on Pitt becoming Prime Minister, he exerted all his powers in support of the struggling government; and at the general election in 1784, he was identified with the Tories, and chosen to represent his native county against all the influence of the Whig families. In Parliament he strongly supported Pitt's measures for Parliamentary Reform. In 1787 he first mentioned in Parliament the subject of the slave trade, with which his name is most familiarly associated, and in the next year proposed a resolution pledging the House to take the subject into consideration. After a long series of preliminary struggles, Wilberforce, in 1791, proposed to prevent the further importation of African negroes into the colonies. The bill was rejected by a majority of seventy-five votes. The next year he proposed a measure for gradually educating the negroes, so that they might at length be fit to be emancipated. This was passed; and from that time forward Wilberforce persevered in order to obtain the total abolition of the trade. His efforts were at length crowned with success. What his friend Pitt had found impossible to achieve, the Whig administration of 1807 accomplished with little difficulty, with only sixteen dissentient voices, a triumphant result, which was no doubt in some measure due to the opportune appearance of a book by Wilberforce on the subject. Already in 1797 he had acquired considerable celebrity as an author by a book discussing the contrast between the practice and profession of English Christianity, especially among the upper classes. After the abolition of the English slave trade, he was not satisfied at the result of his exertions, but still strove for its universal extinction by all countries. But his efforts were not entirely confined in this particular channel. He took an active part in miscellaneous questions, and gained a very conspicuous place in Parliament, both by his own genius and singularly captivating oratory, and by his entire independence of party. An instance of this may be seen in his conduct with regard to Lord Melville, whose refusal to render an account of public moneys he criticised sharply, in spite of his friendship for Melville's patron, Pitt. In 1812 he retired, on account of ill-health, from the representation of Yorkshire, which had at six successive elections triumphantly returned him, and in 1825 he retired altogether from Parliament. He lived on in broken health for eight years more, and died in 1833. "Few persons," said Lord Brougham, "have ever either reached a higher and more enviable place in the esteem of their fellow-creatures, or have better deserved the place than Wilberforce, whose genius was elevated by his virtues, and exalted by his piety."

Wilfred (or WILFRITH), St. (b. 630? d. 709), was educated at the court of Northumbria and, taking holy orders, went to Rome in the year 654, and on his return became tutor to the son of Oswiu, King of Northumbria, from whom he received the monastery of Ripon. At the Synod of Whitby he powerfully supported the Roman views, and was appointed to the archbishopric of York. He then passed over into Gaul, to Ægilbert, Bishop of Paris, but during his absence Chad was appointed to York, and Wilfred, when he returned, found himself obliged to retire to Ripon. In 669, however, Chad resigned York to him, and Wilfrid held it till 678. He, however, again quarrelled with the Northumbrian king, and was driven out, his vast diocese, which comprised the whole Northumbrian kingdom, being divided into the bishoprics of York, Lindisfarne, and Hexham. Wilfrid, after spending some time among the heathens of Friesland, went to Rome to appeal to the Pope. He obtained a papal decree in his favour, but it was disregarded. Unable to obtain restitution of his see, he visited the heathen South Saxons, and converted them. At length, in 687, a portion of his diocese was restored, and he was established at Hexham, but was again driven out in 691, and spent several years in Mercia. In 702 or 703 he made another journey to Rome, obtained another decree in his favour in 705, and passed the remaining years of his life as Bishop of Hexham. He died at Oundle in 709. He was buried in the monastery of Ripon.

Wilkes, JOHN (b. 1727, d. 1797), the son of Israel Wilkes, a rich distiller, was born on Oct. 17, 1727. Early in life he was persuaded to marry a rich heiress, whom he treated with much cruelty and neglect. In the gayest and most vicious society of a gay and vicious age, he soon became conspicuous by the brilliance of his wit, and his reckless debauchery. In 1757, after being previously rejected at Berwick, he bought himself a seat at Aylesbury. In June, 1762, with Churchill's help, he started a periodical, known as the North Briton. In it he cleverly managed to suit the popular sentiments of the time, and especially pandered to the general indignation against Bute, and the animosity felt towards the Scotch nation. On April 23, 1763, appeared "Number 45," which attacked the royal speech at the close of the late session. Grenville signalled his entrance into office by arresting Wilkes under a general warrant. After being examined before Lords Halifax and Egremont, the Secretaries of State, he was sent to the Tower, from which he was soon released in virtue of his prerogative as a member of Parliament. He then retired to Paris. On the meeting of Parliament in November, a resolution was passed, declaring No. 45 to be "a false, scandalous, and malicious libel;" and it was also resolved that privilege of Parliament does not extend to the case of writing and publishing seditious libels. Being prevented from obeying an order of the House to attend in his place, he was expelled in his absence. The peers went further; and, on the information of Lord Sandwich, who had himself been a partner in nearly all Wilkes's vices, ordered prosecution to be instituted against him on account of a work entitled An Essay on Woman, of which thirteen copies only had been printed, and those for private circulation. Wilkes knew that the Court of King's Bench, under the presidency of Lord Mansfield, would decide against him, and preferred to be condemned in his absence. The sentence passed on him was outlawry, and for four years he remained abroad. In Feb., 1768, he ventured again to appear in London, and in the conspicuous position of candidate for the City. He was defeated in the City, but at once announced himself as a candidate for Middlesex. He was welcomed with acclamations by the electors, and carried by an overwhelming majority. The outlawry was at length reversed; but on the original charge Wilkes was ordered to pay a fine of £1,000, and sentenced to imprisonment for twenty-two calendar months. In Nov., 1768, Wilkes addressed a petition to the House, in which he claimed his privilege against further imprisonment. This was disallowed. In the February following, his expulsion was voted, and a new writ was issued for Middlesex. The electors, however, again elected him. The Commons replied by a decision that Wilkes having been expelled was incapable of being returned to the same Parliament, and that his election was null and void; but the electors of Middlesex again returned him by a majority of 800 over the court candidate, Colonel Luttrell. The House now decided that Luttrell ought to have been elected. A petition against his election was lodged; but the House was not to be convinced by the arguments of Grenville, Wedderburn, and Burke, and confirmed his election. In January, 1770, Dowdeswell twice attacked the resolution of the Commons in a substantive motion, and the protest was annually renewed by Sir George Savile, only to meet with a contemptuous rejection. At length, in 1774, the Parliament was dissolved; and Wilkes was returned again for Middlesex, while he held the office of Lord Mayor. The contest was not re-opened, Wilkes was allowed to take his seat, and he now bent all his efforts to have the resolution which had declared his incapacity expunged from the journals of the House "as subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors." Year after year he proposed his motion, but it was not till May, 1782, when the Rockingham government was in power, that all the declarations, orders, and resolutions on the Middlesex election were expunged from the journals. Thus at length, by his firm conduct, Wilkes had obtained from Parliament a clear recognition of the right of every constituency to return the member of its choice. But in the meantime he had been waging another contest with the same body. The right of reporting the debates of the House had been always denied by Parliament, and had been watched with cautious jealousy, and the printers who issued reports of debates were prosecuted. Wilkes took up their cause, and was backed by all the strength of the City authorities, and the contest finally took the form of a struggle between Parliament and the City, in the course of which the Lord Mayor Crosby, and Alderman Oliver, both members of the House, were in March, 1771, committed to the Tower. The House, however, shrank from a new contest with Wilkes, who was the chief offender. The imprisoned members were released on the prorogation of Parliament, and the contest thus ended in the defeat of Parliament. As a Parliamentary speaker Wilkes was an utter failure, and never carried any weight in the House. The electors of Middlesex still stood by him as long as he chose to ask for their suffrages. His cheerful disposition was not affected by the change in his position, and he was never happier than in the society of his dearly loved daughter. At length, "reconciled to every reputable opponent, from the king downwards," he died at the close of 1799.

William I., King of the English (Dec. 25, 1066 — Sept. 9, 1087). This, the most masterly spirit of the most masterly race of his time, was a grandson, alike of Richard the Good, Duke of Normandy, and of Fulk, the tanner of Falaise, and was born at Falaise in 1027 or 1028. The tanner's daughter, Harlotta, or Herleva, is said to have caught the eye of the duke's son as she was washing linen; an irregular union followed, which lasted through the remainder of Robert's life and brief tenure of the duchy (1028—1035). Of this union William, famous as the Bastard, and a daughter, Adelaide, afterwards Countess of Ponthieu, were the issue. After her lover's death, Herleva wedded a noble Norman, Herlwin of Conteville, and bore him two children, Odo and Robert, who were both to share in the greatness of their half-brother. Odo became Bishop of Bayeux and Earl of Kent; Robert, Earl of Mortain and of Cornwall. William was barely eight years old when his life entered the domain of history. In 1035 his father died at Nicea, as he was returning from Jerusalem. Before leaving Normandy, Duke Robert had persuaded his chief nobles to swear allegiance to the lad as heir to the duchy, and they now nominally kept their word. William became Duke of Normandy, but his first twelve years of rule were such as few princes have been called on to face, as only a rarely-gifted boy could live through. The Norman nobles threw off all governance; despising the child-duke and his guardians, they did what was right in their own eyes; they waged private war, and plotted against and killed one another as if no central authority existed. The other members of the ducal family, resenting the preference of a bastard to one of themselves, made their young kinsman the constant mark of murderous designs, and William had more than one miraculous deliverance out of their hands. His friends were few and weak; even the French king, Henry, who owed his crown to William's father, turned against him, and robbed him of an important frontier fortress, Tillières. His boyhood was one of unceasing mortifications, anxieties, treacheries, perils, and alarms, but redeemed by one reassuring experience, the touching fidelity of his guardians and humble friends. Two of these were poisoned, and one laid down his life to save his young master's. This was Osbern, who held the door of William's sleeping-room in the castle of Vaudreuil against a sudden inburst of armed men seeking his life, and, before falling dead, had won him the time needed for his escape. Then his maternal uncle, Walter, took up the task of self-devotion, patiently keeping watch over his steps, and sheltering him from harm, till his character had begun to show its natural strength, and Ralph Wacey, an honourable kinsman, had accepted the post of guardian. The ground was now somewhat firmer under William's feet; at fifteen he was able to give his earliest proof of a capacity for bridling anarchy by wresting Falaise Castle from a rebellious vassal. His independent career began in 1047 in a very striking manner. The lawless spirits of the Cotentin, where the Danish blood and temper still abounded, had risen in rebellion, surprised the castle of Valognes, where William was lying, and forced him to flee for his life through the darkness of the night. Not long afterwards he met them with the most loyal of his vassals and his reconciled lord, the French king, at Val-ès-dunes, near Caen, and beat them utterly, crushing the revolt at a single blow. Then, as generally through his life, he treated his vanquished rebels with singular clemency. Thus firmly fixed in his ducal seat, he proceeded to achievements that gained him a European fame before he ever drew sword in England. He established law and order throughout his duchy, adding such correctives to the prevalent feudalism as might make a strong central government possible. His measures met with a stubborn resistance, and over and over again he reduced to submission the ungovernable among his subjects. With the hereditary foe of his house, Geoffrey Martel of Anjou, he resolutely grappled, and in 1049 recovered Alençon, and snatched Domfront from him, departing at the former place from his accustomed lenity by striking off the hands and feet of thirty-two of its defenders, who had beaten hides over their walls in scornful reference to his origin. He took the first step towards his conquest of England by visiting King Edward, his childless kinsman, in 1062, and receiving from him the assurances, necessarily vague, that he afterwards gave out to have been a promise of the succession to the kingdom. In the next year he took to wife, despite Pope Leo's inhibition, his cousin, Matilda of Flanders, Count Baldwin's daughter, whom he had loved for four years. The papal ban under which he then fell was not removed till 1060; and religious and charitable foundations were erected by him and his wife as the prescribed atonement for their defiance of the Church. His growing greatness then gave offence to his suzerain, King Henry, who twice led an army into Normandy to clip the wings of his power. On the first occasion (1064) one of his two invading columns was surprised and routed by Robert of Eu at Mortemer, whereupon the other made all haste to get home again. On the second (1066), just when his force had been halved by the rising tide of the Dive, near Varaville, William came down upon the hinder half thus isolated, and cut it in pieces, scaring Henry not only into a swift retreat, but also into the making of a peace that restored Tillières, and proved lasting. By this time the duchy had increased considerably at the expense of its neighbours, especially of Anjou, and in the wisdom of its rule and general prosperity outdistanced most other states. In 1063 William made his great Continental acquisition in the conquest of Maine, upon which a compact with its last count, Herbert Wakedog, gave him a claim, but which the resistance of a part of the people obliged him to reduce by force of arms. Next year he made war on Conan of Brittany with complete success. This was probably the expedition on which Harold of England, an impressed guest, was his companion, and after which Harold took the oath that Norman writers declare to have pledged him to uphold the duke's claim to the English throne: for the greatest crisis of William's life, and one of the greatest in European history, was approaching.

Early in 1066 it came. Edward of England died on Jan. 5, and the vacant throne was at once filled by Harold. William felt himself overreached, and lost no time in making himself even with his ready rival, and vindicating his position as a candidate for the English crown. He proceeded to seek material and moral support from every quarter that could supply either, won over the Pope, won over his unwilling subjects, drew to his banner swarms of volunteers from surrounding lands, and thus gathered round his cause not merely a noble host of fighting men, but the general sympathy of Europe. On Sept. 28 he landed at Pevensey, marched to Hastings, and on Oct. 14 decided Harold's fate, his own, and England's, at the terrible fight of Senlac. It was his battle in every sense; above all earthly forces, it was his own skill, ready resource, and prowess that gave him the victory. His subsequent movements made him master of the south-eastern counties; at Berkhamstead he was offered, and accepted, the kingdom, and on Christmas Day he was crowned at Westminster. Thus he became a conqueror. But the task of completing and securing his conquest still lay before him, and it cost him four years of rarely exemplified vigilance, toil, and endurance. After a long visit to Normandy in 1067, he was recalled thence to deal with risings of his new subjects. He won Exeter, and subdued the western counties; marched to Warwick, and brought the Earls Edwin and Morcar, who had rebelled against him, to their knees, entered York, and subdued the northern counties. Next year (1069) he had to confront a general outburst of the west, midlands, and north, and a great Danish invasion, but by wise management and indomitable valour he overcame both insurgents and invaders. He found arguments that persuaded the Danes to withdraw, scattered the rebels, or drove them before him, stormed York, while the men of the west sank under the blows of his captains. On the authority of later writers he is said to have utterly laid waste, and practically depopulated all northern England, but this seems to me a heightened way of describing a thing that, in its broader features at least, is not above question. A winter march upon Chester, across a country impassable to an army less resolutely led, finished the work of conquest (1070). But other work remained. The Church was more firmly linked to the centre of western Christendom; its administration was separated from the general, of which it had hitherto been a part; the ranks of the clergy were strengthened by the preferment to high place among them of foreign genius and learning, such as was Lanfranc of Pavia and Bec, and an impulse given to the building of churches after a grander type. Rules of law, not inequitably fitted to the wants of a mixed population, were framed and established; a strict execution of justice was everywhere enforced, and trading in slaves was forbidden. Edgar the Atheling was conciliated, and became one of William's most favoured courtiers. The stubborn mind of Hereward was overcome; he is thought to have even taken service under William. Conqueror as he was, William strove hard to prevent the Norman yoke being excessively galling to the conquered. But he had still much fighting to do, both abroad and in Britain. Abroad he had, in 1073, to recover rebellious Maine, with a force that was in a large measure English, to suppress a rising of his son Robert against him, to counteract the enmity of Philip of France and Fulk of Anjou. At home he saw reason to invade Scotland in 1071; and, marching as far as Abernethy, made a peace there with King Malcolm, and in 1075, during one of his absences, the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, whose feudal instincts he had curbed, rebelled, but were defeated by Lanfranc. For his part in this affair Walthef died on the scaffold. William's greatest deed was his last, the compilation of Domesday Book, accomplished in 1086. Sorrows came upon him in later life; his son Richard was killed in the New Forest; in 1083 his wife, Matilda, died; his brother, Odo, entered into intrigues that forced William to throw him into prison. On Sept. 9, 1087, his own busy and brilliant career came to a close. Philip of France had once more picked a quarrel with him; this exploded in war, in the course of which Mantes was burnt, and William received a mortal injury by a fall from his horse. Borne to the priory of St. Gervais, near Rouen, he there died. He was buried in his own foundation of St. Stephen's in Caen. William was a man of extraordinary power and of many virtues, intellectual and moral, a certain greatness of soul being the chief. To Englishmen his value has been principally this—he was the founder of strong government in England. We must bear in mind that his best known title is now misleading; "conqueror" in his days meant merely "acquirer," a gainer of possessions in any other way than by regular process, such as inheritance. Strictly speaking, William III. was also a conqueror.

William II., KING (b. 1060, s. Sept. 26, 1087, d. Aug. 2, 1100). William the Red (Rufus) was the third son of the Conqueror and Matilda of Flanders. He was the Conqueror's favourite son; for he had never swerved from his filial obligations, and had shown his father a seemingly sincere affection. He was, moreover, a young man of good parts and steadfastness—knowing well, and always acting upon, the distinction between substance and shadow. Nor did his vices develop early. It is nothing surprising, then, to be told that when the elder William lay upon his dying bed, he expressed a wish that this most dutiful of sons should have England after his death; he is said to have even given Rufus a letter to Lanfranc, recommending his cause to the influential primate's support. With this, William at once hastened to England. There was much in the situation to discourage him. Most of the barons would have preferred his eldest brother, Robert, and Lanfranc himself was undecided at first. The primate's indecision, however, soon gave way; he may have concluded that the strong-tempered William, despite his faults, would probably be a more effective king than the easy-natured Robert, when feudal anarchy was the most menacing evil; at any rate he secured the crown for William. But he made conditions. These were, that William should swear to maintain justice and mercy throughout the kingdom, to defend, against all, the peace, freedom, and security of all churches, and to comply with his instructions and counsels in and through all things. William took the prescribed oaths with the utmost readiness; and seventeen days after the father's death, and possibly after observing some form of election, Lanfranc crowned the son. A few months later a powerful section of the nobles, discontented at the separation of the kingdom from the duchy (of whom Odo, now released and restored to his earldom of Kent, Roger, Earl of Shrewsbury, William of St. Carileph, Bishop of Durham, were the chief), took up arms with the design of reuniting the two countries by making Robert king; and a force sent by Robert crossed to Pevensy to their aid. By Lanfranc's advice William threw himself on the support of the native English, solemnly promising them better laws, lighter taxation, and other good things; and the English, urged on by expectation and St. Wulfstan, crowded to his standard. Their success was complete. The invaders were driven back from Pevensy over the sea; Rochester was taken after a dogged siege; and when Odo perfidiously renewed the strife, William once more called the natives to his help, commanding all those who did not wish to be branded as nothing to join him. They joined him in flocks; and Odo was chased with ignominy from the land. But William soon forgot his promises. And the death of Lanfranc, in 1089, left him uncontrolled. His subsequent career was marked by selfishness and wanton tyranny, moderated only by occasional fits of sickness. The Church in particular felt his grasping hand. The revenues of vacant sees and abbeys were seized, and, to further enrich the crown, the vacancies were deliberately prolonged. It was his policy to deal with clerical exactly as with lay fees, to get the entire Church organisation into his power, and make it a perpetual feeder of his own revenues. In Anselm, however, whom he had nominated to the see of Canterbury in 1093, after four years' vacancy, when he was prostrated at Gloucester by a dangerous illness, he found an uncompromising adversary. The meek primate stoutly withstood all William's efforts to enslave the Church and degrade the clergy; he carefully avoided every trap that William laid in his path to surprise him into an admission of an authority over the Church, or doing anything that had the appearance of simony; a prolonged quarrel ensued; the Council of Rockingham failed to reconcile the two; and Anselm went into exile for a time. Then William had his unrestrained will. His confidential adviser and instrument was the notorious Ranulf Flambard, the Justiciar, who earned much infamy in his service by the zeal and callousness with which he executed his purposes. The Danegeld was revived; in 1094 the fyrd of the kingdom was marched down to Hastings, and dismissed on payment of ten shillings a man; not a pretence that ingenuity could suggest for extorting money was overlooked; the forest law was mercilessly enforced. The nobility of the Conquest also suffered grievously; gaps were made in their ranks, and forfeitures were frequent. No class escaped William's oppression. The actual events in his reign were few and unimportant. In 1090 he carried the war against Robert into Normandy, then combined with him to despoil Henry, and succeeded in doing so. He took Cumberland from the King of Scots in 1091, settled a southern colony there, and refounded Carlisle. In 1095 he took advantage of Robert's eagerness to get away on the first Crusade to make a keen bargain with him for the administration of Normandy and Maine. He afterwards suppressed with astonishing promptitude a rebellion in Maine. On Aug. 2, 1100, he was accidentally killed in the New Forest by an arrow that was originally despatched by his own or some unknown hand. William Rufus was the most graceless of all our early kings, was irreligious, greedy, and utterly devoid of principle. He was, however, a man of excellent mental gifts; and was a sayer of sharp sayings, chiefly cynical.

William III., King of England and

Prince of Orange (b. Nov. 4, 1650, s. Feb. 13, 1689, d. Mar. 8, 1702), was the son of William II., Prince of Orange, and Mary, daughter of King Charles I. of England. He was born a few days after his father's death, and his youth was passed under the jealous guardianship of the aristocratic party in the Netherlands, headed by John de Witt. His exclusion from the Stadtholderate was suggested by Cromwell, and agreed to by the States (1654). William received but little education, but early showed great interest in political and military questions, and in the doctrines of Calvinism. From a child he was weak and sickly. His chief and almost only amusement was the chase. At the age of fifteen he was deprived of his personal attendants by the jealous government. He took a part in the Councils of State at eighteen. The French invasion changed this state of affairs. The De Witts were murdered by the populace; and William, who neglected to punish the murderers, became the head of the government. In 1672 he took command of the army, recovered Naerden, and took Bonn. Louis XIV. thereupon confiscated his principalities and gave them to the Count of Auvergne. During the next four years he fought the French without much success. He was defeated by Condé at Senef (1674), and failed in his attempts to take Oudenarde and Maestricht (1678); he was driven back at Cassel, and compelled to raise the siege of Charleroi. Nevertheless the Dutch had already elected him Stadtholder, Captain-General and Admiral-General, and extended the offices to his descendants (Feb., 1674). Charles II. of England determined thereupon to marry him to his niece Mary, daughter of James, Duke of York. After some deliberation on the part of William, the marriage took place (Nov., 1677), and a scheme was formed for an alliance with England which the States-General declined to ratify. Aided by the English he attacked Marshal Luxemburg near Mons with some success, but the news of the conclusion of the Treaty of Nimeguen caused him to suspend operations (1678). We next find him planning a great European combination against Louis XIV. A scheme was on foot for making him the future Protector of England (1681). He attempted to mediate between Charles II. and his Parliament, and proposed a congress for the settlement of all questions at issue in Europe (1683). On the accession of James II. the Prince of Orange drew nearer to him, although steadily opposing his Romanising schemes. He opposed Monmouth's rash attempt on the crown, advising him to go and fight the Turks; and although the blunders of the States-General permitted his departure for England, William sent back the English regiments which were in the Dutch service. His attention was now entirely absorbed by his design of uniting the nations of Europe in resistance to Louis XIV., and he rejected all ideas of an invasion of England to which he was urged by Mordaunt. He saw that his claims would clash with those of his wife. Still the Romanising schemes of James II. gradually made him the head of the English Opposition. He wrote to the king strongly recommending the withdrawal of the Declaration of Indulgence. In 1686 he sent his envoy Dykvelt to England to confer with the leading statesmen. He was now completely estranged from James II., who was much annoyed by the publication at this time of William's views concerning the Indulgence. On the birth of the young Prince of Wales William sent his congratulations to James. In May, 1688, Edward Russell went over to Holland to sound the prince, but received a guarded reply. In August he received an invitation to England, signed by seven leading men, which he accepted. Great difficulties lay before him. He was afraid of the veto of the States-General, and of the alienation of the Catholic powers. James's treatment of the clergy, and importation of Irish troops to England, removed his difficulties there. Having completed his preparations William issued a declaration, in which he declared his intention of going to England with an armed force as husband of the heiress of England. After being driven back by the winds, he landed at Torbay (Nov. 5). At Exeter he was joined by many influential personages, and James was deserted by the army at Salisbury. William advanced towards London, and negotiations were opened between him and the king. James, however, resolved to fly, but was stopped by some fishermen and returned to London. William's position was now extremely difficult, but he was greatly relieved by the final escape of James to France. The Convention, which met on Jan. 22, 1689, declared the throne vacant, and after passing the Declaration of Rights (q.v.), caused William and Mary to be proclaimed King and Queen of England (Feb. 13, 1689). The reign may be said to be roughly divided into two parts by the Treaty of Ryswick (1697), during the first of which William was engaged in active resistance of Louis XIV., while the second is modified by the Spanish Succession question. William's first ministry was of a mixed character. War was declared against France in May. In Ireland the native race showed every inclination to hold out for King James, who betook himself thither. Londonderry was besieged, but relieved by Kirke, and the battle of Newton Butler gave William the advantage for the time being. Meanwhile in Scotland the crown was offered to William (April 11). Dundee, however, raised the Highlanders in favour of James, and won a battle, but lost his life at Killiecrankie. Mackay, by his victories at St. Johnstone's and Dunkeld, concluded the war. At home, party quarrels reached a great height, but Parliament passed the Bill of Rights. Next year William determined to go to Ireland and relieve Schomberg. He won the battle of the Boyne (July 1), but was compelled to raise the siege of Limerick and return home. The English fleet had been disgracefully beaten at Beachy Head. In 1691 Ginkell concluded the Irish war by taking Athlone, winning the battle of Aghrim, and besieging Limerick. The Pacification of Limerick settled the Irish question for a time. At home Preston's Plot was discovered and thwarted. Abroad, though unsuccessful in the field, William greatly strengthened his great coalition by the Congress at the Hague. Early in 1692 Marlborough's intrigues with the Jacobites in France were discovered, and he was dismissed from his offices, and in consequence the Princess Anne quarrelled with the queen. The massacre of Glencoe (Feb. 13) must ever remain a stain on the memory of William III. The projected invasion of England was thwarted by Russell's great victory off La Hogue (May 19). William was defeated by Marshal Luxembourg at Steinkirk in August. In Parliament Montague's financial ability re-established the Land Tax, and started a loan which proved the origin of the national debt. Military and naval affairs were unfortunate in their results in 1693. The loss of the Smyrna fleet was followed by the defeat at Landen in July. William, disgusted with party quarrels, determined to form a united Whig ministry. The year 1694 is important from a financial point of view. The Bank of England was established, and the East India Company's charter renewed. The disclosure of the venality in connection with the East India Company compelled the Tories, Sir John Trevor and Carmarthen, to retire from office. The naval events of the year are unimportant, although Marlborough's treachery had resulted in the destruction of the expedition against Brest. The Triennial Act, which had previously been vetoed by William, passed in December. In the same month Queen Mary died of small-pox, and William was almost heart-broken at her loss. In the next year William was successful in his operations against Namur, which surrendered in August. The year 1796 opened successfully with the re-establishment of the currency. The Tory Land Bank, however, proved a failure, and the money required by the king was furnished by the Bank of England. The discovery of Berwick's Plot, and the infamous Assassination Plot, created great enthusiasm, and an association was formed for the protection of the king. The chief business of the session was the trial and attainder of Sir John Fenwick, who was executed in the following January. The ministry was now completely Whig. The war with France was concluded by the Treaty of Ryswick (Sept., 1697). William was deeply mortified by the successful introduction of the bill for the reduction of the standing army. The Irish Parliament of this year passed several statutes of a highly penal nature. In 1698 Montague formed a General East India Company as a rival to that already existing, but the scheme was eventually a failure. An attempt to settle the Spanish Succession question resolved itself into the First Partition Treaty (Oct. 11). The Tory party, now very strong, succeeded in carrying a bill which necessitated the dismissal of the Dutch guards. The king, deeply mortified, formed the intention of abandoning England, and was only dissuaded by the prayers of Somers. The majority in the Commons severely attacked the measures of the late ministry, their favourite objects being Montague and Russell. They also "tacked" to the Land Tax Bill a clause empowering commissioners to inquire into the disposal of forfeited lands in Ireland. William in anger prorogued Parliament (May 4, 1698). Discontent in Scotland reached a high pitch when certain news arrived of the utter failure of the great Darien scheme. The Resumption Bill was passed in April, 1700, greatly to the annoyance of William and at the risk of a permanent breach between the two Houses. Meanwhile the diplomacy of William had brought about the Second Partition Treaty. It was not well received in England. William now dismissed his old ministry, and relied on an entirely Tory administration, which passed the Act of Succession necessitated by the death of the young Duke of Gloucester, the heir to the throne. The Commons hurried on impeachments against the late ministry on account of their share in the Partition Treaties, which, however, proved abortive. The Kentish Petition and the Legion Memorial proved at the same time that popular feeling was on the king's side. He ventured, therefore, to prorogue Parliament (June, 1701). He went to Holland, and there consolidated the grand alliance between England, Holland, and the Emperor, directed against the evident intention of Louis XIV. to seize the Spanish throne for his grandson. Soon afterwards James II. died and the French king acknowledged the Pretender as King of England (Sept. 6). This thoroughly roused English patriotism, and loyal addresses poured in on all sides. William, who had returned in ill-health in November, accordingly seized the opportunity to summon a new Parliament. It was of a far more Whig temper than its predecessor. The "pretended Prince of Wales" was attainted of high treason, and an abjuration oath made necessary for every employment in Church and State. But William's days were numbered. On Feb. 20 he fell from his horse and broke his collarbone. He gave his assent to the Succession Act, and surrounded by his old friends breathed his last on March 8 (1702). "Wherein," says Ranke, "lay his greatness? It lay in the position he took up and steadily maintained; in the world-wide historic results, some of which he himself achieved in his lifetime, while of others he only laid the foundations, or advanced them a stage. . . . The most important question of the day, and that of the highest importance for the future of mankind in Europe, was the rise of the French monarchy to universal preponderance, which threatened the independence of every country and every race. The living impulse, then, which determined King William's career, sprang out of his opposition to this already domineering and over-grasping power. If this was to be carried through, no political or theological party attitude was to be thought of. To have brought a coalition of heterogeneous elements into existence, and to have successfully opposed it to the overwhelming might of France—this is the historic achievement of William III. No one was ever cleverer at building up confederations and holding them together, or in commanding armies of the most various composition without arousing national antipathies; no one knew better how in contests at home to await the right moment, to give way, and yet to hold fast."

William IV., King (b. Aug. 21, 1765, s. June 26, 1830, d. June 20, 1837), was the third son of George III. At the age of thirteen he was entered as a midshipman on board the Prince George, a ninety-eight gun ship. In 1779 he saw active service under Rodney, and served his time as a midshipman in cruising vessels on the West Indies, and off the coasts of Nova Scotia and Canada. He served under Lord Keith on the North American station, under Lord Hood off the Delaware River, and under Nelson upon the Leeward Island station. Between the latter commander and himself a strong and lasting friendship grew up. In 1785 he received his lieutenant's commission. In 1786 he was appointed captain of the Pegasus. In 1787 he sailed for the West Indies as commander of the Andromeda frigate. In 1790 he was made rear-admiral of the blue by order in council. On May 19, 1789, he was created Duke of Clarence and St. Andrews and Earl of Munster, and on June 8 following took his seat in the House of Lords. In 1811 he was made admiral of the fleet, and in 1814 hoisted his flag to convoy Louis XVIII.

of France to his kingdom. During the earlier part of the same year he was present as an amateur before Antwerp, and distinguished himself by his coolness and courage. A marriage was negotiated for him with the Princess Adelaide Louisa, daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg Meiningen. They were married at Kew, 1818, and shortly after proceeded to reside in Hanover, Parliament having granted on the occasion an accession of only £6,000 to the duke's income. The duchess had two daughters, who both died almost immediately. At the prosecution of Queen Caroline (1820) the Duke of Clarence supported the bill of pains and penalties. On the death of Earl St. Vincent (1823) he was promoted to the rank of general of marines. On the death of his brother, the Duke of York, he became heir presumptive to the crown, and received an accession to his income, which raised it to £40,000 a year. On April 17, the same year, he was appointed Lord High Admiral. The Duke of Wellington, however, then premier, having some objections to the expense of his highness's progresses, he resigned the office (1828). At the death of George IV. the Duke of Clarence succeeded to the throne (June 26, 1830). In the presence of the Privy Council assembled on that day, according to custom, the new king, with marked emphasis, expressed to the Duke of Wellington his entire approval of the way in which his grace had carried on the government hitherto. This was a distinct declaration in favour of the old system, and against Reform. The king in fact had strong personal objections to the Reform Bill, and in the crisis of May, 1832, when the Lords were preparing to reject the bill a third time, he would not consent to create new peers, and allowed the Grey ministry to resign. But the failure of Wellington to form a ministry convinced him that the feeling of the nation was emphatically in favour of the bill. He used his personal intercession with the peers to induce them to pass the bill, and was even prepared to "swamp" the House of Lords with new peers if the advice was rejected. The bill, however, was carried, and followed by the other reforming statutes which have made William IV.'s short reign an eventful period in modern English history. The king liked neither the Whig ministers nor their policy, and in 1834 (Nov. 15) he exercised his prerogative, and suddenly dismissed Lord Melbourne and his colleagues. But the Peel ministry was hopelessly weak, and in 1835 (April) the king found it expedient to recall Lord Melbourne to his councils. William IV., though not greatly distinguished for talent and character, was a kindly and good-natured man, with the courage and firmness of his race, if also with its hereditary obstinacy. "He would have passed," says Mr. Walpole, "in private life for a good-natured sailor."

Williams, JOHN, Archbishop of York (b. 1582, d. 1650), was a member of an old Welsh family, and, after a brilliant university career, received many valuable preferments in the Church, being at length made Dean of Westminster in 1620. He was also one of the royal chaplains, and high in favour both with James I. and Buckingham. In 1621 he was made Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, in which office his great ability and industry supplied the place of early legal training, and in the same year was appointed Bishop of Lincoln. But Buckingham's favour did not last long, and by his influence Charles I. removed Williams from his office in 1625. Laud also was a great antagonist of his, and through his influence Williams was condemned in 1637 to pay a heavy fine, be imprisoned, and suspended from his ecclesiastical functions on the charge of having revealed the king's secrets, and tampered with witnesses. In 1640 he was released, and soon regained the king's favour by supporting the cause of the prerogative and episcopacy, and in 1641 was advanced to the archbishopric of York. Soon after this he was insulted by the mob, and on protesting with the other bishops against their being thus excluded from Parliament, he was sent to the Tower. After the outbreak of the Civil War he zealously assisted the king, both with money and advice, and is said to have mourned sincerely for his death. His character is very unfavourably painted by Clarendon. He is said by this writer to have been "of a proud, restless, and overweening spirit, a very imperious and fiery temper, and a very corrupt nature." On the other hand, Mr. Foss, summing up his character, comes to the conclusion that he was "though too much of a temporiser, honest and sincere, and generally wise in the advice which he offered, and to the monarchs whom he served he was faithful and true."

William Clito (d. 1128) was the eldest son of Robert of Normandy. After the battle of Tenchebrai he was placed under the care of Helie de St. Saen, who guarded him most loyally against Henry's attempts to seize him. His claims were supported by the French king and Fulk V. of Anjou, the latter of whom affianced his daughter Sibyl to him. The victory of Henry at Brenneville (1124) destroyed his hopes, and he had to content himself with claiming the country of Flanders, to which he had succeeded by the failure of the male line. He had almost succeeded in making himself master of the country when he was pierced by a lance while besieging the town of Alost, and died in 1128.

William the Lion, King of Scotland (1165—1214), son of Prince Henry and Ada de Warrenne, succeeded his brother, Malcolm IV., as King of Scotland (1165). Having failed in obtaining the restoration of Northumberland from the English king, he listened eagerly to the proposals of Prince Henry of England, and in 1173 hurried to the north of England, whence, however, he was driven back by Richard de Lucy and Humphrey de Bohun. The following year he again invaded England, took several castles, and laid waste the country. He was taken prisoner at Alnwick (July 13), and thence hurried with every symptom of indignity before Henry at Northampton. The English king sent his royal prisoner to Falaise in Normandy, where, in December, 1174, a treaty was concluded acknowledging the supremacy of England over Scotland, and making all Scotchmen the vassals of the English king. This subjection lasted until Richard I. restored Scottish independence for the sum of 10,000 marks in 1189. On William's release after the Treaty of Falaise, he found himself compelled to quell an insurrection in Galloway, and to subdue Ross a few years later (1179). In 1181 a fresh insurrection, due partly to dissatisfaction at the Treaty of Falaise, broke out in the north in favour of Donald Bane MacWilliam, and lasted six years, during which time William was also at variance with the people of Galloway. In 1188 an abortive conference was held at Brigham between the King of Scotland and the Bishop of Durham as the representative of Henry II. In 1196 William took Caithness from the Norwegian Earl Harold, but restored it to him on payment of a sum of money (1202). The suppression of another insurrection under Godfrey MacWilliam, in Ross (1211), was the closing act of William's domestic troubles. William in the early part of his reign had quarrelled with Pope Alexander III., who placed his kingdom under an interdict, which was, however, removed by Lucius III. in 1182; in 1203 he expressed his satisfaction at the interdict laid by Innocent III. on England, owing to the unsatisfactory nature of an interview he had with John at Lincoln in Nov., 1200. From this time for twelve years England and Scotland were frequently on the point of coming to blows owing to John's persistence in attempting to build a castle at Tweedmouth to overlook Berwick. In 1212, however, a close alliance was made between the two kings at Durham. In Dec., 1214, William died at Stirling, leaving behind him a reputation for energy of character and impetuosity. It was his constant endeavour to carry out the policy of his grandfather David. He left Scotland in a far more advanced state of feudalism than his predecessor had done. William married Ermengarde de Bellomonte.

served in the Netherlands under Sir John Norris and the Earl of Leicester, the latter of whom treated him exceedingly badly from jealousy of one who had so distinguished himself. In 1587 the Prince of Parma in vain endeavoured to induce Sir Roger to quit his allegiance, and enter the Spanish service.

Willoughby of PARHAM, WILLIAM, LORD (d. 1666), was for some time connected with the Parliamentary party. After the execution of Charles I. he joined the Royalists, and in 1650 went out to Barbadoes, where in the following year he defeated an expedition under Admiral Ayscue, who had been sent out by Cromwell to punish the Royalist proclivities of the Barbadians. He was soon afterwards compelled to return to England, where, after the Restoration, he obtained substantial marks of favour from Charles II. In 1663 he returned to Barbadoes as governor, and in the following year took St. Lucia. Two years later he perished in an expedition against Guadeloupe.

Willoughby, ROBERT, LORD, was a distinguished military commander of the fifteenth century. In 1415 he was present with Henry V. at the siege of Harfleur, and the battle of Agincourt. In 1418 he was at the siege of Rouen, and in 1424 at Verneuil. The following year, in company with Sir John Fastolfe, he defeated the French and relieved Alençon. In 1428 he accompanied Cardinal Beaufort in his expedition to Bohemia. Returning, he again took part in the French war, assisted at the capture of St. Denis and Pontoise in 1435, and was charged with the defence of Paris in this year. He was obliged to surrender the capital in April, 1436. One of his last exploits was the defeat of the French at Amiens, in 1441. The date of his death is uncertain.

Willoughby of BROOK, ROBERT, LORD (d. 1508), was a zealous adherent of the house of Lancaster. As a distinguishing mark of Henry's gratitude for his past services, Sir Robert Willoughby was raised to the peerage during the sitting of Henry's first Parliament in 1485, under the title of Lord Willoughby of Brook. In 1488 he was given the command of the English force sent to the aid of the Duke of Brittany in 1488, and in 1497 relieved Exeter when besieged by the Cornish rebels.

Wills, THE STATUTE OF (1540), was explained and re-enacted in 1543. Its object was to remove the restrictions imposed under the Plantagenets, on the testamentary power over freehold land. It provided, therefore, that any one being seized in fee simple and being a person capable of making a will, might devise to any other person, except to bodies corporate, two-thirds of their lands and tenements held in chivalry, and the whole of those held in socage. On the abolition of chivalry after the Restoration, this practically included all landed property except copyhold tenements.

Wilmington, SPENCER COMPTON, LORD (d. 1743), a son of the Earl of Northampton, was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons in 1715. He was a favourite of George II. while Prince of Wales; and on the prince's accession he was commissioned to form a ministry. Walpole, however, gained over the king by proposing to increase the civil list; and Queen Caroline's influence was employed in his favour. Compton could not even draw up the speech from the throne, and had to apply to his rival for assistance. He saw that his power was gone, and soon accepted the position of President of the Council, with a peerage as Lord Wilmington. He gave a lukewarm support to Walpole, and remained neutral when, in 1741, Mr. Sandys' motion that he should be removed from the king's council was brought forward. On the fall of Walpole in January, 1742, Pulteney, who refused the premiership, proposed Wilmington as First Lord of the Treasury and nominal head of the government. He retained most of the old ministers. The only incident in his brief administration was the committee of inquiry against Walpole [WALPOLE]. "He was," says Stanhope, "respectable in his public, regular in his private, character . . . but the seals of office were too heavy for his hands."

Stanhope, Hist. of Eng.; Coxe, Walpole.

Wilson, SIR ARCHDALE (b. 1803, d. 1874), entered the Bengal army 1819, served at the siege of Bhurtpore (1825—26); commanded the artillery as lieutenant-colonel in the Julundhur Doab in 1848—49, and rose through various grades to brigadier-commander of the Bengal artillery at Meerut (1857). Here the Indian Mutiny (q.v.) first broke out, and here Wilson gained the first victory over them. On June 7 he joined Sir H. Barnard at Ali-pore, and on the latter's death succeeded to the command of the army besieging Delhi. On the 20th Delhi surrendered to him. Wilson subsequently commanded the artillery at the siege of Lucknow. For these services he was thanked by both Houses, made in succession a Companion, Knight-Commander, and Grand Cross of the Bath, granted a pension of £1,000 a year by the Company, and created a baronet.

Wiltshire, THOMAS BOLEYN, EARL OF (d. 1538), was the father of the ill-fated Anne Boleyn. When first made aware of the king's passion for his daughter, he does not appear to have given Henry's wishes any sort of encouragement. On the contrary, when the king, after breaking off the courtship then going on between Anne Boleyn and Lord Henry Percy, visited him suddenly at his house at Hever, Sir Thomas Boleyn, though fully aware of the real object of Henry's visit, did not give him any opportunity of seeing or conversing with his daughter. In course of time, however, both he and his daughter yielded to the king's perseverance, and Sir Thomas, in view of his future greatness as father-in-law of the king, was made successively Viscount Rochford and Earl of Wiltshire. [ANNE BOLEYN.]

Wiltshire, WILLIAM LE SCROPE, EARL OF (d. 1399), was the son of Richard le Scrope, Chancellor of England. He was highly in favour with Richard II., who made him his treasurer, and created him Earl of Wiltshire in 1395. He was one of the king's chief advisers during the latter years of his reign, and on the landing of Henry of Lancaster in 1399, he was seized at Bristol and beheaded without trial.

Wiltshire, JAMES BUTLER, EARL OF (d. 1461), was the son of the Earl of Ormonde, and was created Earl of Wiltshire by Henry VI. He was a staunch Lancastrian, and fought for that party in the first battle of St. Albans, at Wakefield, Mortimer's Cross, and Towton. After this last engagement he was captured by the Yorkists and beheaded at Newcastle.

Wimbleton, EDWARD CECIL, LORD (d. 1638), an admiral who is chiefly known to history as having in 1625 commanded a disastrous expedition against Cadiz, which was to form part of a general attack on Spain, planned by Charles I. and Buckingham. The appointment, which was made on personal grounds, proved very unfortunate. Lord Wimbleton failed to destroy the shipping in the harbour of Cadiz, and was soon compelled to re-embark, owing to the disorderly behaviour of his crews. After having allowed the Plate fleet from the West Indies to escape him, he returned to England. It is said that on the return voyage he carefully distributed some men suffering from contagious disease among the healthy crews.

Winchelsey, ROBERT (b. circa 1245), Archbishop of Canterbury (1294–1313), was born at Winchelsea, and after a most distinguished academical career, during which he was successively Rector of the University of Paris and Chancellor of Oxford, he was elected to the archbishopric. Not long after his appointment Boniface VIII. issued the famous Bull Clericis Laicos, forbidding the payment of taxes to the king by the clergy without the leave of the Pope; Winchelsey gladly availed himself of the excuse to decline to allow any more great grants of Church revenue to the king. The contest with Edward I. was a protracted one, the clergy refusing to pay were outlawed, and the possessions of the see of Canterbury seized, but a compromise had to be made. The archbishop showed that the papal prohibition did not apply to money required for purposes of national defence, and offered to do his best to obtain a grant from the clergy if the king would confirm the Charters. This was agreed to, and in 1297 and 1300 the Charters were confirmed, in the latter case certain important articles being added to them. In 1301 Winchelsey again quarrelled with the king. The circumstances are doubtful, but it would seem that the archbishop was accused of treason, and of plotting to dethrone Edward in favour of his son. In 1305 the archbishop was formally accused and summoned to Rome, nor did he return again till after the death of Edward I. During Edward II.'s reign we find him opposing Gaveston, and doing what he could to restrain the excesses of the young king. Winchelsey was eminent as a scholar and a divine, and famous for his charity and piety; but in public affairs he attempted to play the part of Langton, for which he was unsuited, and for which there was no necessity. His policy was also complicated by the foolish arrogance of Boniface, and by the determination of Edward. By his want of tact and steadiness, the archbishop alienated both the king and the Pope.

Winchester (the GWENT of the Celts, and VENTA BELGARUM of the Romans) was probably an important town before the Roman invasion. It was conquered by the Saxons under Cerdic in 519, and became the capital of the West Saxon kingdom in the seventh century. In 662 it was made the seat of a bishopric. In 860 it was taken by the Danes. During the later West Saxon and Danish period it was very frequently the centre of government for England, and the place where the Witenagemots was held. In 1141 it was burnt during the war between Stephen and the Empress Maud, and was the place where the treaty between the two powers was concluded (1153). In June, 1216, it was taken by Louis the Dauphin. In 1266 it was sacked by Simon de Montfort. In 1285 the important Statute of Winchester was passed here by Edward I. The cathedral begun by Cenwealh in 643, and completed in 984, was rebuilt in the eleventh century, and reconstructed by Bishops Wykeham, Beaufort, and Waynflete in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The college was founded by William of Wykeham in 1393. In March, 1644, Waller inflicted a defeat on the Royalists at Clinton Down near Winchester. On Oct. 6 of the following year it was captured by Cromwell, and the castle was demolished; on the site of this fortress a palace was begun in 1683, but was left unfinished.

Winchester, SIR WILLIAM PAULET, MARQUIS OF (b. 1476, d. 1572), Lord St. John of Bassing (1539), Earl of Wiltshire (1556), and Marquis of Winchester (1551), "the crafty fox with a fair countenance," was Treasurer of the Household to Henry VIII., and one of the judges at the trial of Anne Boleyn. By the will of the king he was appointed one of the Council of Regency, and became President of the Council. As a firm supporter of the Protector Somerset, Paulet succeeded Wriothesley as Lord Keeper (March 7, 1547), but only held the office till October, when, owing to his incompetence as a judge, he was succeeded by Lord Chancellor Rich. On Somerset's fall he joined the party of the Earl of Warwick and actually presided as Lord High Steward at the duke's trial in the year 1551, pronouncing sentence of death upon his benefactor. For some time he remained a supporter of Warwick, but his leaning towards the Catholic religion, together with the instinct of self-interest, gradually enlisted his sympathies on the side of the Princess Mary, though after her accession he continued in opposition to Gardiner and the persecuting party. At the age of eighty-four, Lord Winchester obtained the office of Lord High Treasurer to Queen Elizabeth, an office which he held until his death.

Winchester, THE STATUTE OF (1285), was one of those enactments by which Edward I. sought to remodel and improve upon the legislation of Henry II. This statute was intended to place the military system on a better footing, and reorganises the watch and ward. It revived and developed the military and police action of the hundred, the hue and cry, the watch and ward, the fyrd or militia of the counties. The Assize of Arms, with its provisions that every man should keep armour and weapons proper to his condition, is re-enacted. The statute, in fact, attempts to restore the ancient and popular military system of the English, which had lasted through the Conquest. "It is," says Dr. Stubbs, "a monument of the persistence of primitive institutions, working their way through the superstratum of feudalism, and gaining strength in the process."

Winchester, THE ANNALS OF THE MONASTERY OF, extend from A.D. 519 to A.D. 1277. The first part is, as usual, meagre, and from 1066 to 1267 the compiler relies on the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, Matthew Paris, and other obvious sources of information. The last part is contemporary, but even then the interest is chiefly of a local nature. The annals have been edited by Mr. Luard in the second volume of the Annales Monastici in the Rolls Series.

Windebank, SIR FRANCIS (d. 1646), son of Sir Thomas Windebank, was educated at St. John's College, Oxford, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1601. He became Clerk of the Council, and was, by the influence of his old friend, Laud, appointed Secretary of State (June, 1632). He was the king's agent in the secret negotiations with Spain in 1634, the intermediary between Charles and the papal agent, Panzani, and one of the committee of eight entrusted with Scotch affairs (1639). In May, 1640, he applied to the Pope's agent, Rossetti, for money and arms to be employed against the Scots. On the assembly of the Long Parliament he was attached for non-execution of the penal laws against the Catholics, and fled to France (Dec. 10, 1640), where he died.

Windham, WILLIAM (b. 1750, d. 1810), was educated at Eton and Oxford. His first appearance in politics was at a meeting of the county gentlemen of Norfolk in 1778, where he spoke with much vigour against a proposal to subscribe to aid the government in carrying on the war against the American Colonies. In 1782 he was returned to Parliament for Norwich, and very soon made himself conspicuous, and he was in the following year appointed Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, which place he resigned within four months, on finding that it required the employment of acts which he felt to be dishonourable. He became very intimate with Burke and Dr. Johnson, and although at first, like all the Whigs, he hailed with joy the outbreak of the French Revolution, yet in 1793, horrified by the later outrages of the movement, he took Burke's view of it, and was a warm advocate of the policy which Burke wished to see adopted towards the Revolutionary government. In the following year he went on a mission to the Duke of York, who was in command of an expedition in Flanders, and was in the same year appointed Secretary at War, with a seat in the cabinet. He followed Pitt out of office in 1801, nor did he again take office until, after Pitt's death, he became Secretary at War and of the Colonies in the administration of "All the Talents." On their dismissal, Windham too returned to opposition, and remained in that position until in Jan., 1810, he died of a tumour produced by his extraordinary endeavours to rescue a great library from flames. "In him were strangely mingled a zealous love of literature, and an ardent passion for field sports of every kind. And so genial were his manners that in spite of his liberal views he was almost as great a favourite with the king as he was popular with the nation at large." Of his position as a speaker and a statesman, Sir E. May says, "Superior to Sheridan in education and attainments, and little inferior in wit, he never achieved successes so dazzling; yet he maintained a higher place among the debaters of his age. Though his pretensions to the higher qualities of a statesman were inconsiderable, and his want of discretion and temper too often impaired his unquestionable merits in debate, his numerous talents and virtues graced a long and distinguished public life."

Window Tax, THE, was first imposed in 1695 by the Act 6 & 7 Wm. III., c. 18, and was frequently re-imposed, notwithstanding its injurious effect in offering an obstacle to good ventilation. It was repealed and the house-tax substituted for it in 1851.

Windsor Castle appears to have been first regularly used as a royal residence by Henry I., although there seems to have been a fortress there previous to the Conquest. To Henry I.'s building, Henry III. made several additions; but it was in the reign of Edward III., under the designing hand of William of Wykeham, that the castle as we now know it began to rise. St. George's Chapel was rebuilt by Edward IV., its architects being Richard Beauchamp, Bishop of Salisbury, and after his death in 1481, Sir Reginald Bray, architect of Henry VII.'s Chapel at Westminster. Elizabeth formed the terraces, and erected or altered the gate known by her name. Charles II. erected the Star building, which was afterwards Gothicked by James Wyatt. Traces of Sir Christopher Wren are to be found in the edifice, but his plan of rebuilding the south side of the Upper Ward was not carried out. St. George's Chapel, which was much injured by the Puritans in 1648, was re-decorated in 1787-90. Of late years no alteration or improvements of much importance have been made.

Wingfield, SIR ANTHONY, Vice-Chamberlain to Henry VIII. (1547), was named in the king's will one of the council who were to govern during the minority of Edward VI. He bore a leading part in the measures taken against Protector Somerset.

Winter, SIR WILLIAM, ADMIRAL, was in Dec., 1559, sent to the Firth of Forth by Elizabeth to do any damage he could to the French. The queen, as was her wont, commissioned him to act on his own responsibility, being thus enabled to disavow his actions in case of failure. On his arrival in the Firth he managed to provoke the French to attack him, and retaliated by seizing Burntisland, which had been occupied by the enemy, and destroying some of their vessels. Had his successes at sea been backed up by energetic action on the part of the land forces, Leith would have fallen at once. In 1569 Winter commanded an expedition to La Rochelle, which brought supplies to Condé, and in 1580 did good service on the Irish coast, being present at Smerwick. He is credited with having originated the plan of sending fire-ships amongst the Spanish vessels, which proved so destructive to the Armada. The mixture of caution and dashing courage which he displayed, together with his steadfast loyalty, made him one of the most valued servants of Elizabeth, and he well deserved Cecil's praise—"of Mr. Winter all men speak so well, I need not mention him."

Winton, GREGORY OF, was a monk of St. Peter's, Gloucester. His Annales, which extend from A.D. 681 to A.D. 1290, have never been printed.

Wintoun, ANDREW OF, a Scotch annalist, lived about 1400. His Originale Cronykil of Scotland, printed in 1795, is a valuable source of information for early Scottish history.

Winwidfield, THE BATTLE OF (635), between Penda of Mercia and Oswy of Northumbria, resulted in the defeat and death of the former. The place is, probably, Winmoor, near Leeds, the river Winwied being identical with the Aire.

Wishart, GEORGE, was one of the Protestant preachers who incurred the wrath of Cardinal Beaton. He was tried at St. Andrews, and burnt (1545). He is said to have entered thoroughly into the plot for assassinating the cardinal.

Wishart, ROBERT, Bishop of Glasgow, was one of the Scotch commissioners (1289) who tried to arrange for the marriage of the Maid of Norway and Prince Edward. He joined Wallace's party in 1297, but a few months later negotiated the treaty by which many of the Scotch nobles made submission to Edward. In 1303 he was exiled for two years, but the next year recovered Edward's favour. He counselled the English king to hold a general assembly of the Scotch nation at Perth in 1304, and to appoint commissioners to regulate the government of Scotland. He was continually taking oaths of fealty to one side or another, and breaking them. Having sided with Robert Bruce in 1306, he was taken prisoner in the same year at Cupar in Fife, and imprisoned at Nottingham.

Witenagemot, THE, means the meeting or council of the wise men (Witan), and in Anglo-Saxon times was the highest council in the land. The theory that the Witenagemot was an assembly to which every freeman had a right to come (as he undoubtedly had to the shire-mote) is scarcely tenable. We have little evidence of any such right beyond the fact that at certain national crises, as at the exile of Godwin in 1051, or on sudden Danish invasions, and even at the election of a new king, a tumultuous concourse of spectators attended the meetings of the Witan, and shouted applause or disapprobation of the proposals made. But this right, if it existed, must have been purely theoretical. Whatever claims the Witenagemot has to the position of a national council rest upon the fact that it contained the official leaders of the nation, both in Church and State. But it was primarily a royal council. It consisted of "the king, sometimes accompanied by his wife and sons; the bishops of the kingdom, the ealdormen of the shires or provinces, and a number of the king's friends and dependants. These last generally describe themselves as ministri, or king's thegns, and numbered amongst themselves no doubt the chief officers of the household, and the most eminent of the persons who, in the relation of gesith or comes to the king, held portions of folklund or of royal demesne, and were bound to him by the oath of fealty. Occasionally a praefectus or gerefa appears in the early charters; he is probably the heah-gerefa or high-steward of the household. . . . Under the later kings a considerable number of abbots attest the charters." Thus the Witan were a small body of men, of high position, and all closely connected with the administration. The tendency was towards the increase of the king's thegns, who at the end of the West Saxon period outnumber all the other members of the council. Probably the Witenagemot met at regular intervals, and at fixed places, but in the absence of exact dates it is impossible to speak with certainty about this. With regard to the functions of the Witan Mr. Kemble has laid down twelve canons on the subject as follows:—(1) They possessed a consultative voice, and a right to consider every public act which could be authorised by the king. (2) They deliberated upon the making of new laws which were to be added to the existing folk-right, and which were then promulgated by their own and the king's authority. (3) They had the power of making alliances and treaties of peace, and of settling their terms. (4) They had the power of electing the king. (5) They had the power to depose the king if his government was not conducted for the benefit of his people. (6) They had the power with the king of appointing prelates to vacant sees. (7) The king and the Witan had also power to regulate ecclesiastical matters, appoint fasts and festivals, and decide upon the levy and expenditure of ecclesiastical revenues. (8) The king and the Witan had power to levy taxes for the public service. (9) The king and his Witan had power to raise land and sea forces when occasion demanded. (10) The Witan possessed the power of recommending, assenting to, and guaranteeing grants of land, and of permitting the conversion of folklund into bookland and vice versa. (11) The Witan possessed the power of adjudging the lands of offenders and intestates to be forfeit to the king. (12) The Witan acted as a supreme court of justice both in civil and criminal causes. Thus the Witenagemot was a supreme council for deliberation, administration, and assent, as well as for judicial and taxative purposes. Its real power naturally varied inversely with that of the king. "Under a strong king," says Bishop Stubbs, "many of these claims are futile; the whole public land seems, by the eleventh century, to have been regarded as at the king's disposal really if not in name; the sheriffs, ealdorman, and bishops are named by the king; if he be a pious one, the bishops are chosen by him with respect to the consent of the diocesan clergy; if he be a peremptory one, they are appointed by his determined will. But the powers of legislation and taxation are never lost, nor does the king execute judgment without a court which is in name and in reality perhaps a portion of the Witenagemot." It may also be added that the power of election tended to become formal, and that the power of deposition was very seldom exercised. After the union of the kingdoms, the crown remained in the West Saxon family, and ordinarily went by hereditary descent, though in all cases a formal election was made, and though in several cases an uncle of full age was preferred to the infant son of the deceased sovereign. The elevation of Canute to the throne is an exception, but his title rested rather on conquest than on election, so that the election of Harold II. remains the sole instance of the Witan freely electing a king outside the royal house. Of deposition, there is likewise but a solitary instance after Egbert, that of Ethelred II. in 1013. The analogy seen by some historians of the past and present centuries between the Witenagemot and the House of Commons is misleading. There is little resemblance between an elective and representative chamber, and a council of magnates and royal officers.

Wolfe, GENERAL JAMES (b. 1726, d. 1759), entered the army at the age of fourteen, and was present at the battles of Dettingen (1742), Fontenoy (1745), and Lawfeldt (1747). He first attracted Pitt's notice in 1757, when a combined military and naval expedition was despatched against Rochefort under Admiral Hawke and General Mordaunt. In 1758 he served under General Amherst at the siege of Louisbourg on Cape Breton Island. In 1759 Pitt entrusted him with the attack on Quebec. This was to be a combined movement, but the combination failed, owing to the fact that the plan was too extensive. Wolfe, with 8,000 men, embarked in Admiral Saunders's squadron, and reached the Isle of Orleans in the St. Lawrence.

Repeated attempts were made to induce Montcalm, the French commander, to leave the lines of Beaufort, but without success. Finding that nothing could be effected from the Isle of Orleans, Wolfe moved the army above Quebec, but Montcalm refused to move, and Wolfe was in despair. At length it occurred to him to surprise the heights of Abraham. Collecting boats, he crossed the river, climbed the heights with great difficulty, and when morning came was in position opposite the French. Montcalm was forced to cross the St. Charles, and offer battle. The English gained a complete victory. Wolfe fell, but before he died he knew that he had won the day. [QUERREC.]

Wolsey, THOMAS, Archbishop of York (b. 1471, d. 1530), was the son of a wealthy Ipswich butcher. Educated at Magdalen College, he obtained his degree when barely fifteen; and, as a consequence, became familiarly known among his university associates as the "Boy Bachelor." In virtue of this early proficiency Wolsey soon succeeded to a Magdalen fellowship, and was shortly afterwards appointed master of the school attached to his college. Among his pupils at this school were the sons of the Marquis of Dorset, who presented Wolsey, in Oct., 1500, to the living of Lymington, in Somersetshire. Here Wolsey is said to have on one occasion played so unbecomingly a part in his parish revelries as to bring upon himself the degradation of the stocks, and to have been compelled to abandon his living. By this time, however, he had made many influential friends, and through the interest of some of these he obtained the post of secretary and domestic chaplain to Henry Deane, Archbishop of Canterbury, which he continued to hold till the death of the primate in 1503, when he secured an appointment in the chaplaincy at Calais. The strong common sense Wolsey displayed in the discharge of his duties caused him to be appointed one of the chaplains to the king. Wolsey soon secured the notice and friendship of Bishop Fox, the Lord Privy Seal, and of Sir Thomas Lovel, the Treasurer of the Royal Household. He was thus speedily selected for the transaction of Henry's more confidential business; and so highly appreciated were his diplomatic services at the courts of Germany and Scotland, that the king, some two months before his death, conferred upon him the deanery of Lincoln (1509). While, however, Wolsey's tact and energy were a strong recommendation of him to a keen judge of men like Henry VII., his wit, gay humour, and varied personal accomplishments made him the indispensable companion of that monarch's successor; and his upward progress under Henry VIII. was rapid and brilliant. Soon occupying the position of almoner to the king, and of a royal councillor, Wolsey received in quick succession the living of Torrington, in Devon, the magistracy of the Order of the Garter, a Windsor canonry, and the important deanery of York. Accompanying Henry to France in 1513, he was appointed by him to the see of Tournay, which the fortune of war had temporarily placed in English hands; and as compensation for the purely nominal character of this last preferment, Wolsey was promoted in Feb., 1514, to the bishopric of Lincoln, whence he was translated, before the expiration of the year, to the archbishopric of York. In the following year (1515) his English dignities were crowned by the reception of a cardinal's hat from Pope Leo X., with the title of St. Cecilia, an honour which was quickly succeeded by a commission from the pontiff as Legatus a latere. About this time, too, his revenues from various sources were still further increased by the gift from the king of the administration of the see of Bath and Wells, and the temporalities of the wealthy abbey of St. Albans; and by the enjoyment, one after the other, of the bishoprics of Durham and Winchester. Wolsey's position at Henry's court was now not only one of enormous emolument, but one that carried with it a degree of power and influence more extensive than had ever previously been wielded by a minister of the crown. For several years, indeed, he directed the foreign policy of his country, lending the English support to France and Germany alternately, according as it seemed to suit the varying necessities of his own personal interests, while his supremacy in all that related to the domestic government of the kingdom was only nominally subordinate to that of Henry himself. Difficult and dangerous, however, as was the commanding position to which he had attained with such unexampled rapidity, Wolsey succeeded in holding his place in the king's favour for some considerable time, and his good fortune in this respect was due not only to the watchful tact with which he on all occasions conducted himself in his dealings with Henry, but also partly to the fact that the primary object of his ambition, viz., the reformation and aggrandisement of the English Church, was one for which, in the early period of his reign at least, the king had felt a considerable degree of sympathy. While he impressed the popular mind with the pre-eminent state and magnificence of a Church dignitary, by the everyday pomp of his household arrangements, and by his gorgeous preparations for the reception of his cardinal's hat, he endeavoured to awaken a more permanent respect for the clergy as a body by instituting a series of greatly-needed ecclesiastical reforms. Conspicuous among his measures for purging the Church of some of the more crying abuses into which she had fallen latterly was the suppression of several of the smaller monasteries, and the devotion of the funds thus obtained to the establishment of Cardinal's College (now Christ Church) at Oxford, and of a new grammar school at Ipswich, designed to serve as a sort of preparatory institution for the university. In his endeavours to raise the social status of the Church, and to make her ordained servants an example to the country of sound learning and morality of life, Wolsey was compelled to make the utmost use of the power at his command. It was his zeal in this matter that led him to hazard a breach of the Statute of Præmunire by accepting the appointment of papal legate from Leo X., for experience speedily taught him that the authority of an ordinary English prelate was quite insufficient to act with any effect against the monasteries and other strongholds of ecclesiastical corruption.

Rapid beyond all comparison as had been Wolsey's rise to the position of the most influential subject in Europe, his fall was fully as sudden and conspicuous. By the indecision he exhibited in the matter of Henry's divorce, he not only lost the king's confidence, but excited against himself the disappointed fury of Anne Boleyn. His enemies, who were many and powerful, were not slow to take advantage of his misfortunes, and to revive popular indignation against him on account of his oppressive taxation and his arbitrary system of government. Prosecuted in 1529 under the Statute of Præmunire, he had to resign the Great Seal and retire to his see of Winchester. This evidence, however, of his lost influence, was not sufficient to satisfy the jealous vengeance of his political rivals; and, though he received several kind messages from the king, his troubles were speedily augmented by his impeachment in the House of Lords. The faithful devotion of Wolsey's servant, Thomas Cromwell, and some lingering remnant of regard in Henry's heart for the once powerful cardinal, caused the bill to be thrown out in the House of Commons; but the Statute of Præmunire was allowed to have its full course, and all Wolsey's property was declared forfeited to the crown. The fallen minister was allowed subsequently to withdraw to his diocese of York; but as the popularity he had begun to acquire there by his courtesy and hospitality awakened the fears of his successors in court favour, he was again arrested in 1530 on a charge of high treason. His health had greatly suffered in the anxieties accompanying his terrible reverse of fortune, and he was allowed in consequence to travel towards London by a succession of easy journeys. After a fortnight's stay at the mansion of the Earl of Shrewsbury, a violent dysentery by which he was attacked so reduced his strength that, when in the neighbourhood of Leicester, he was compelled to accept the hospitality offered him at the monastery there. He reached the monastery on Nov.

26, 1530, and died within three days of his arrival, on Nov. 29, 1530. He was buried in the abbey precincts, but no monument covers his remains there. [HENRY VIII.; CROMWELL; CRANMER; ANNE BOLEYN.]

The State Papers of Henry VIII., with Mr. J. S. Brewer's invaluable Introduction, give the fullest history of Wolsey's administration and perhaps the fairest estimate of his character. The historians of the sixteenth century, Hall, Holinshed, and Grafton, are of little real value for Wolsey.

Wood, SIR ANDREW, of Largo, was the first great naval officer Scotland possessed. On the murder of James III. he declared for his son against the council. In 1490 he captured five English vessels with only two of his own; and subsequently took the three ships which had been sent under the command of Stephen Ball to avenge the insult.

Wood, ANTHONY (b. 1632, d. 1695), was an antiquarian of great research and industry. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, and took his B.A. degree in 1652. In 1674 he published his History and Antiquities of Oxford, the copyright of which was purchased by the university, a work which was subsequently continued by Gutch in 1786. In 1691 appeared the Athenæ Oxonienses: an exact History of all the Writers and Bishops who have had their Education in the University of Oxford from 1500 to 1695, to which are added the Fasti, or Annals of the said University. An attack on Lord Clarendon, contained in this work, procured for its author expulsion from the university, and he was afterwards embroiled in disputes with Bishop Burnet.

Woodfall, WILLIAM, a printer, was tried in 1770 for publishing Junius's "Letter to the King." The right of the jury to judge of the criminality of the libel having been denied by Lord Mansfield, they found the prisoner guilty of "printing and publishing only." Lord Mansfield was severely taken to task in the House of Lords for his arbitrary conduct, but the question was not settled until twenty years after, by Fox's Libel Act.

Wood's Halfpence. There was no mint in Ireland in 1722, and there being a want of small coin, and a great deal of base money dating from the times of Elizabeth and James I., a patent for coining copper money was granted to the royal mistress, the Duchess of Kendal, and by her sold to Wood, an English ironmonger. He was to be allowed to coin £108,000 worth of halfpence and farthings, a pound of copper to be coined into thirty pence, for Ireland. In England twenty-three pence only were coined from one pound, but as the cost of transport and an import duty had to be considered, the difference was not really unreasonable. The gains Wood would make were calculated at £4,000, and no doubt the amount of copper to be put in circulation was excessive, since about £15,000 worth would have been enough. The excitement in Ireland, however, was out of all proportion to the real importance of the matter. The Irish House of Commons absurdly enough pretending that Ireland would lose £150 on every 100 lbs. of copper coined; it was also intimated that the coin as actually issued was debased. Sir Isaac Newton, however, examined it and found it fully as good as was required. In 1723 the sum to be coined was reduced, but in 1724 Swift's Drapier's Letters appeared, and all Ireland, including even the Chancellor and the Archbishop of Dublin, was unanimous in refusing the new halfpence. Carteret came over and attempted to prosecute the "Drapier," but the grand jury not only ignored the indictment, but presented all persons who had accepted the new coin. At last in 1725 Walpole gave in to the clamour raised in Ireland, the patent was revoked, and the Irish Parliament passed a vote of thanks to the king. Wood got 3,000 guineas for eight years as compensation from the Irish Pension List, but under a false name.

Woodstock, THE ASSIZE OF (1184), was the great code of regulations relating to the royal forests, issued by Henry II. It was subsequently considerably modified by Magna Charta, and Henry III.'s Charter of the Forest. The Assize of Woodstock is the first formal Act relating to the forests that is in existence. The Act was somewhat less severe than the legislation on the subject under William the Conqueror and Henry I. But the punishment for breaches of this law were heavy, and it was carried out with burdensome rigour. "And this," says Dr. Stubbs, "is altogether the part of his [Henry's] legislation that savours most strongly of tyranny." The Assize carefully preserves the game and wood of the forest, orders a jury of twelve men in each forest county to be chosen for the custody of vert and venison, and requires every person of twelve years and upwards living within the bounds of the forests to take the oath of peace. Death was to be the penalty for a third infraction of the forest laws. [Further information given under ASSIZE OF WOODSTOCK.]

The Assize is given in Stubbs, Select Charters.

Woodville, LORD EDWARD, was a brother of Edward IV.'s wife, and consequently uncle to the queen of Henry VII. He obtained a temporary notoriety in the reign of this latter monarch by his expedition at the head of 400 men to aid the Duke of Brittany in 1488, notwithstanding the king's positive orders against the despatch from England of any expedition with such an object. Besides exciting considerable indignation in France, this proceeding on the part of Lord Woodville had the effect of forcing Henry to adopt a definite position with regard to the dispute between France and Brittany. The news of the French victory at St. Aubin (July 28, 1488), and of the death of Lord Woodville, with the almost total destruction of the small English force which he commanded, raised public feeling in England to an extent which Henry could no longer afford to ignore; and, although there continued to be a secret arrangement with Charles VIII. on the subject, a supply of troops was at once sent to the aid of Brittany. At the time of the ill-starred expedition which ended in defeat and slaughter at St. Aubin, Lord Woodville was Governor of the Isle of Wight.

Woodville, ELIZABETH. [ELIZABETH WOODVILLE.]

Worcester, FLORENCE OF. [FLORENCE OF WORCESTER.]

Worcester, JOHN TIPTOT, EARL OF (d. 1470), was a strong Yorkist partisan. He held the office of Treasurer in 1452, and early in Edward IV.'s reign was made Constable, and rendered himself odious by his cruelties. He was Lieutenant of Ireland in 1467, and held other important offices. In 1470, on the restoration of Henry VI., he was captured, and beheaded on Tower Hill. He was illustrious for his learning and his patronage of learned men; he translated many works into English, and spent a great part of his life in travel and study.

Worcester, THOMAS PERCY, EARL OF (d. 1403), was the younger brother of Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland, and served with distinction in the French wars. He afterwards became Steward of the Household to Richard II., who created him Earl of Worcester. He joined Henry of Lancaster, but in 1403 took part in his brother's rebellion against him. He fought in the battle of Shrewsbury, where he was taken prisoner, and beheaded two days after.

Worcester, WILLIAM OF (d. circa 1480), a physician, wrote the Annals of England from 1524 to 1468, which were subsequently continued by another hand to 1491. It has been published by Hearne.

Worcester, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 3, 1651), was fought between the Scottish and Parliamentarians during the unsuccessful expedition of Charles II. to England previous to the Restoration. After the battle of Dunbar and the capture of Edinburgh by Cromwell, Charles made a sudden movement southwards in January, hoping to cut off a portion of the English army, which lay south of the Forth. Cromwell thereupon moved northwards towards Perth, and so left open the way to England. The king promptly hastened across the frontier, and advanced rapidly to Worcester, which he entered on Aug. 22. There he lay inactive, and allowed Cromwell to overtake him. The Parliamentary army attacked in two divisions, connected by a bridge of boats, Fleetwood on the west bank of the Severn, Cromwell marching on the east bank upon the town itself. Charles first attacked Cromwell, but without success, and he was driven back into the town, where the two divisions of the enemy met, and drove the Royalists through the streets. They made no attempt to rally, and the war soon came to an end.

Carlyle, Cromwell's Letters.

Worcester, THE CITY AND BOROUGH OF, has, perhaps, had a more disturbed history than any town in England. From 894, when it was almost entirely destroyed by the Danes, its annals present a long series of sieges, burnings, and captures. Rebuilt by Ethelred, it was retaken by Hardicanute in 1041. In 1074 it was occupied by the barons of Hereford, and a conspiracy against William crushed. The cathedral, founded by Bishop Oswald in 983 on the ruins of a previous building, was destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt by Bishop Wulstan in 1084, but again suffered twice from fire, and was repaired and reconsecrated in 1280. During the troubles of Stephen's reign Worcester was plundered by the Empress, and besieged by the king, and again by his son, Eustace. Hugh of Mortimer held the castle against Henry II. in 1157. A council was held there in 1240. In Henry III.'s reign it became a stronghold of the baronial party, the king being taken there after the battle of Lewes. Worcester was plundered in 1401 by Owen Glendower, who held it until driven off by Henry IV. In 1642 it was taken by Prince Rupert, but was recovered by the Parliamentarians under Colonel Fiennes in the same year. Lastly, Charles II. was defeated there in Sept., 1651.

Worms, THE TREATY OF (Sept. 17, 1743), was signed by England, Austria, and Sardinia. After the battle of Dettingen in the War of the Austrian Succession, negotiations for peace were set on foot, but were abruptly broken off owing to the desire of England to carry on the war with France. Accordingly the treaty was signed at Worms on Sept. 13. It was negotiated by Carteret without reference to the ministers at home, and they accordingly refused to ratify a separate and secret convention by which Maria Theresa was to be supplied with a subsidy of £300,000 a year as long as "the necessity of her affairs shall require." The treaty agreed to assure the Pragmatic Sanction and the European balance; the King of Sardinia was to have a yearly subsidy of £200,000 from England, the cession of the Vigevanese from Austria, and the command of the allies in Italy, on condition that he should bring to the field an army of 45,000, and renounce his pretensions to the Milanese. This alliance was met by the League of Frankfurt, of which the most important members were France and Prussia.

Wotton, DR. NICHOLAS (b. 1497, d. 1566), was employed by Thomas Cromwell (1537) to arrange the marriage of Henry VIII. and Anne of Cleves. Made Dean of Canterbury and York by Henry, who had a high opinion of his abilities, he was named one of the council of executors appointed by the king's will, and subsequently became a trusted servant of Mary, for whom he discovered the plot of Sir Henry Dudley (1566). In the same year he laid bare a conspiracy to seize Calais, and averted the danger for the moment. In 1558 he was one of the English representatives in the discussion of a proposed peace with France, which took place at Cercamp, and in the following year was present at the negotiations at Cambray, while in 1565 he was sent to Bruges to discuss the subject of the suppression of English pirates who were alleged to be doing great damage to the Spanish shipping. Dr. Wotton was offered the primacy in 1559 before the appointment of Archbishop Parker, but refused it, knowing that he was no theologian, and that "more than administrative ability and knowledge of the world was at this time required in the primate."

Wray, SIR CHRISTOPHER (d. 1592), one of the favourite judges of Queen Elizabeth, was an active member of Parliament during the reign of Mary, and up to 1571, when he was chosen Speaker. In 1572 he was made a judge, and two years later became Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, in which capacity he presided at the trial of Secretary Davison. Sir Edward Coke calls him "a most reverend judge, of profound and judicial knowledge, accompanied with a ready and singular capacity, grave and sensible elocution, and continual and admirable patience."

Wright, SIR NATHAN (b. 1653, d. 1721), was called to the bar in 1677. He assisted at the trial of the Seven Bishops. In 1697 he was created King's Sergeant. On the dismissal of Somers, he was appointed Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal. In 1702 we find him addressing the commission which had been appointed to frame the union with Scotland. He rendered himself objectionable by his partisanship of the Church. He was restricted to silence in the Upper House, where he performed the duties of a Speaker, for want of a peerage. We find him accused of leaving out, in his list of the Justices of the Peace, all who were not of Tory politics. He was removed in 1706. Mr. Wyon says of him that "his legal acquirements were below the requisite standard, and his character for meanness and avarice ill-qualified him to preside over the most august assembly in the kingdom." Wright, WILLIAM, a doctor of law, who flourished in the reign of Henry VIII., and is famous as being Henry's first envoy to Rome respecting his projected divorce from Catherine of Aragon. Wright's mission was entirely without any tangible results, and the facts that (1) Clement VII. was at that time a prisoner in the hands of Charles V., and (2) that Henry's ideas on the subject of the divorce had not reached the decided stage they attained a little later, naturally prevented Wright from doing much more than preparing the papal mind for a favourable reception of Henry's wishes.

Writs, PARLIAMENTARY, are addressed to the sheriff of a county directing him to cause to be elected a member or members to the House of Commons in case of a general election or vacancy. They issue upon the warrant of the Lord Chancellor, or, during the sitting of the House, upon the warrant of the Speaker. The first instance of a writ of summons in their later form is in 1213, when the king directed that four discreet men should be returned from each shire ad loquendum nobiscum de negotiis regni nostri, and at the same date four men and the reeve were summoned from the township or demeane. It was not until the end of the reign of Edward I. that Parliament assumed its final form, and that the possibility of the merchants and lawyers being summoned as separate sub-estates ceased. Of the other estates of the realm, writs of summons were addressed in the times of Henry III. and Edward I. to a certain select number of hereditary barons, who, in conjunction with the prelates, formed, by the middle of the fourteenth century, the House of Lords. The form of the early Parliamentary writs illustrates very clearly the different functions of the three estates. The magnates are usually summoned ad tractandum; the Commons, ad consulendum et consentiendum, that is, the latter body are regarded as having inferior powers. Prelates were summoned de fide et dilectione; lords temporal, de fide et homagio or de homagio et ligeantia. Writs of summons to the Commons are important in the qualifications introduced, which vary from the formula "de discretionibus et legalionibus" of 1275 to the qualification that members should be "gladiis unitos," or belted knights, introduced in 1340. Later changes depend upon the election Acts in force at different periods, such as those imposing a property qualification on electors, and directing the methods of election.

Wroth, SIR THOMAS, was sent to Ireland (1564) as a special commissioner, in conjunction with Sir Nicholas Arnold, to inquire into the complaints which had been made against the English army. He had previously been employed on diplomatic missions in Germany, and had been one of the witnesses to Edward VI.'s "device" for altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey.

Wrotham Heath, THE BATTLE OF (Jan., 1554), resulted in the defeat of the Kentish insurgents under Sir Henry Isey by Lord Abergavenny. Wrotham is a small town near Sevenoaks in Kent.

Wulhelm, Archbishop of Canterbury (923—942), was translated from Wells. His episcopate saw the commencement of the movement in favour of monasticism and rigid celibacy, which was to agitate the Church in the reigns of his immediate successors.

Wulfhere (659—675), King of Mercia, was the son of Penda and brother of Peada. On the death of the latter, Oswiu of Northumbria assumed the government of Mercia, but in 659 the Northumbrian yoke was shaken off and Wulfhere proclaimed king. He was successful in his wars against Wessex, and having conquered the Isle of Wight, granted it to Ethelwald of Sussex. He carried on the work of conversion begun by Peada, and founded the bishopric of Lichfield. One of his daughters was St. Werburgh.

Wulfred, Archbishop of Canterbury (805—832), was chosen on the death of Ethelhard. "He was," says Dean Hook, "a good, easy, prudent man; equally intent on serving his own family and on improving the property and estates of the chapter and the see." And this is all that can be said of him, for though he held the archbishopric for more than twenty-six years, he did nothing worthy of record.

Florence of Worcester; Hook, Archbishops.

Wyatt, SIR THOMAS (d. April 11, 1554), was the son of Sir Thomas Wyatt the poet. In Jan., 1554, he became one of the leaders in the rebellion against Mary, though he is said to have had nothing to do with the origin of the plot. The insurrection which was caused by national discontent at the contemplated marriage of Mary with Philip of Spain, had for its object the deposition of the queen in favour of the Princess Elizabeth and Courtenay, Earl of Devon. Sir Thomas Wyatt was charged with the duty of raising Kent, and so well did he perform his mission, that Kent was the only part of the country where the rebellion assumed at all formidable dimensions. "He excited," says Mr. Lingard, "the applause of his very adversaries by the secrecy and address with which he organised the rising, and by the spirit and perseverance with which he conducted the enterprise." A delay, however, in taking possession of London, proved fatal to Wyatt's success; and after a sharp engagement he found himself compelled to surrender at Temple Bar to Sir Maurice Berkeley. After his capture he implicated Courtenay by his confessions; but though every endeavour was made to extort from him a full revelation, he steadfastly refused to buy his life at the price of an accusation of the Princess Elizabeth, which was what her enemies, with Bishop Gardiner at their head, were labouring to obtain; and at the last moment retracted what he had said concerning Courtenay's guilt.

Wycliffe, JOHN, was born about the year 1320, or a little later. Leland, the antiquary, names his birthplace as Ipswell, or Hipswell, near Richmond in Yorkshire, and states that he derived his origin from the family which held the lordship of Wycliffe-on-Tees. It was this connection plainly that drew him to Balliol College, Oxford, which had been founded by John Balliol, of Barnard Castle, on the borders of Durham, in the preceding century. By an old mistake, Wycliffe has been described as first a commoner of Queen's College, and a confusion (as it appears) with a namesake, makes him fellow and seneschal of Merton. In all probability, however, he remained a member of Balliol until he was chosen master of the college some time after 1356, but not later than 1360. In 1361 he was instituted to the college living of Fillingham, near Lincoln, and shortly afterwards resigned the mastership. He does not appear, however, to have given up his work as a teacher in Oxford, for we find him renting rooms at Queen's College, doubtless with this object, at various dates between 1363 and 1380. But in this interval—if we are to accept a view now nearly universally credited, which rests indeed upon abundant contemporary evidence, but which none the less may have arisen from the confusion above referred to with the other John Wycliffe, of Merton—the future Reformer was nominated by Archbishop Islip in 1365, warden of his foundation of Canterbury Hall, the site of which now forms a portion of Christchurch, Oxford. Wycliffe and three fellows, secular clergymen, were appointed in the place of three monks whose position in the hall had been a source of disturbance; but in 1367 Islip's successor, Archbishop Langham, himself a monk, expelled Wycliffe and the fellows who had entered with him, and substituted regular clergymen. Wycliffe appealed to Rome; judgment was given against him in 1369 and published in 1370, and the sentence was enforced by royal writ in 1372. His living of Fillingham he exchanged in 1368 for Ludgershall, in Buckinghamshire, and in 1374 he was presented by the crown to the rectory of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, where he remained until his death.

During these years Wycliffe had written a variety of scholastic treatises; then, turning to theology, he had devoted himself in particular to expanding and applying his theory of the divine government, known to us as the doctrine of dominion. He erected a sort of theocratic feudalism where each man "held" of God, without the interposition of any mesne lord, and where "grace" or "charity" was the sole indispensable condition of tenure. When Wycliffe went on to explain that the universal power claimed by the Pope could only belong by right to the "Lord-in-chief," who had never delegated his authority in that sense to man, it was evident that in the doctrinaire might be found one able to do good service to his country, especially at a time when England was pressed by demands for tribute to the Pope, and overrun by his emissaries. Accordingly we find that Wycliffe was made chaplain to the king; in 1366 he wrote against the papal claim, and in 1374 acted as one of the royal commissioners at the conference held at Bruges, with the object of settling the disputed question of "provisions." Wycliffe now appears as a hearty co-operator with John of Gaunt, though it should seem that the only point they had in common was a desire to repress the overgrown power of the endowed clergy. Through this connection rather than from any serious charge of incorrect doctrine, Wycliffe was cited by William Courtenay, Bishop of London, a declared opponent of the Duke of Lancaster, to appear before him at St. Paul's in Feb., 1377; but the trial broke up in an undignified quarrel between John, who accompanied Wycliffe, and the bishop. Wycliffe's teaching, however, with regard to the rights of the Church, especially as to the temporalities, had already reached Rome; and a few months later a series of bulls were directed against him by Gregory XI. But the king's death in June delayed their execution, and the attempted action of the Archbishop of Canterbury was thwarted for some time by the independent attitude of the University of Oxford. Meantime Wycliffe published his answer to the papal accusation. At length, in the spring of 1378, he had to appear at Lambeth; but here again the session was interrupted by an uproar of the people, who resented the intrusion of papal bulls: and Wycliffe was simply forbidden to lecture upon the subjects which had given offence. The Great Schism, however, which began in the same year, exasperated his opposition to the papacy. He went further than before, and ventured to dispute the doctrine of transubstantiation. He turned from the clergy to the commonalty, and began to address them in English tracts; he denounced the papacy, the monastic, and now particularly the mendicant, orders. He planned and mainly executed, with the help of John Purvey and other friends, a translation of the Bible into English, the first complete version ever attempted, which was quickly spread abroad in innumerable copies; at least 165 manuscripts of it, in whole or in part, have come down to us, in spite of the strong measures taken by the Church for its suppression. He sent out his disciples, the "poor priests," to preach his doctrines throughout the country. But the hostility among the leading churchmen aroused by these movements was much more languid than might have been anticipated. A vigorous attack was made upon his principal adherents in Oxford, Nicholas Hereford, Remyngdon, Ashton, and Bedeman, in 1382, and they were induced to recant. But the heresiarch himself was hardly at all molested, though his doctrines were condemned by the Chancellor of Oxford, and by a provincial council held at the Blackfriars in London, in May, 1382: it is said also that he had to appear in person at another council at Oxford in November of that year; but no sentence was passed upon him. He retired unmolested to Lutterworth and died there from a paralysis on Dec. 31, 1384. Wycliffe was a strenuous and conscientious, if in some respects injudicious, advocate of Church reform. So far he was in unison with perhaps a majority of the earnest clergy of his day. With the Franciscans he found a chief cause of the corruption of the Church in the excessive possession of temporal goods by the clergy. He parted company with them, as with all loyal Catholics, when he sought to reform the doctrinal system, and to destroy almost everything upon which the sacerdotal principle was based. But by this very course of teaching he attached the multitude to him, weary as it was of the perfunctory ministrations of a corrupt order. It is in his English works, his short, robust tracts and sermons—far more than in his Latin ones, which, although of a high interest, are but too plainly the products of a declining and artificial period of scholasticism—that Wycliffe shows his real genius; and he may almost be said to have invented English prose as a vehicle of literary exposition. His influence was permanent, though not perhaps very extensive; but the fact which makes him a true herald of the Protestant Reformation was his assertion of the rights of the individual conscience before God and against any human intermediary whatsoever.

Wykeham, WILLIAM OF (b. 1324, d. 1404), was born at Wykeham in Hampshire. He long served Edward III. in the capacity of surveyor of works, and built for him many noble edifices, Windsor Castle among the number. He became warden of the forests south of the Trent, Keeper of the Privy Seal, President of the Council, Bishop of Winchester, and at length Chancellor in 1367. In 1371 he was driven from court, and his temporalities seized on charges of corruption, which were subsequently proved to be unfounded. On the accession of Richard II. he was restored to favour, but took little further part in public affairs till 1389, when he was induced, much against his inclination, to accept again the office of Chancellor. He held the Great Seal for two years and a half, during which period tranquillity and good government prevailed. In 1391 he retired from public life, and devoted his energies to the administration of his diocese, and the founding and endowing of the noble establishments of New College, Oxford, and St. Mary, Winchester. Wykeham was a man of such a blameless life that one of his contemporaries said that his enemies in attacking him were trying to find a knot in a rush.

Wykes, THOMAS, Canon of Osney (flor. circa 1250), was the author of a chronicle otherwise called Chronicon Salisburgiensis Monasterii. It begins with the Conquest and goes down to 1289, after which it is continued by an anonymous author to 1304. Only the part dealing with the struggles between Henry III. and the barons is of much value. The chronicle has been published by Gale in the second volume of Ætium Anglicanarum Scriptores, 1687.

Wymund, a monk of Furness, was made Bishop of Man (1134). As soon as he had obtained this position he gave out that he was a son of Angus, Earl of Moray, assumed the name of Malcolm MacHeth, and, supported by the Norwegian King of the Isles, and by Somerlaed of Argyle, whose daughter he had married, invaded Scotland, causing great trouble to David, who, however, at length took him prisoner (1137), and confined him in the castle of Roxburgh. He was liberated, and made Earl of Ross by Malcolm IV. (1157). Mr. Robertson considers that Wymund and Malcolm MacHeth were two different people.

Wyndham, SIR WILLIAM (b. 1687, d. 1740), sat for the county of Somerset (1710), and in 1713 became Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was a follower of Bolingbroke's, and introduced in the House that Schism Act which drove Oxford from office. In Bolingbroke's projected ministry he was to have been head of the commission of the Privy Seal. Wyndham's Jacobitism had at any rate the merit of sincerity. On the accession of George I. he was dismissed from office. In Opposition he vigorously opposed the proclamation for a new Parliament, for which he was reprimanded by the Speaker, and defended the fallen ministry. In 1715, on the outbreak of the Jacobite insurrection in the north, he was promptly arrested, and committed to the Tower. Bolingbroke informs us that he and Lord Lansdowne were the only two men who could possibly have organised an insurrection in the west of England, and there is no doubt that he held the threads of the conspiracy. On his release he continued until his death a vigorous opponent of Walpole, his eloquence, which was very great, being especially directed against that statesman. He was the recognised leader of the Tory part of the composite Opposition. His best speech was made in 1734 against the Septennial Act. In 1739 he announced that he and his friends were going to secede from the House, and solemnly took leave of it for ever. But the manoeuvre was not a success, and the Opposition returned to their places. It was generally believed at the time that Wyndham wished to play the part of a political martyr, and be sent to the Tower. "As a statesman," says Lord Stanhope, "he wanted only a better cause, a longer life, and the lustre of official station for perfect fame. His oratory, more official and stately than Pulteney's, and, perhaps, less ready, was not less effective."

Wynendaal, SKIRMISH AT (1708), was one of the episodes of the siege of Lille during the War of the Spanish Succession. On Sept. 27 a huge convoy departed from Ostend for the English army. Lamotte, the officer in command of the French cavalry, hastened to intercept it towards evening at Wynendaal, near which the road passes through a wood. He found the wood, however, occupied by an officer named Webb, with 6,000 men, supported towards the end of the action by Cadogan, with some squadrons of horse, who drove off the enemy at all points. The convoy arrived safely at the English camp.

Xiphilinus was a Greek monk who lived in the eleventh century, and who has left us an epitome of several of the lost works of Dio Cassius, from which we get considerable information concerning the early history of Britain.

Yarmouth, SOPHIA DE WALMODEN, COUNTESS OF (d. 1765), was a mistress of George II. He had known her in Hanover, and shortly after the death of Queen Caroline she was brought to England, and created Countess of Yarmouth—"the last instance," says Stanhope, "in our annals of a British peerage bestowed on a royal mistress. Her character was quiet and inoffensive, and though she did not at first possess, she gradually gained considerable influence over the king." She was summoned when George was found dead, and by a codicil to that king's will was bequeathed £10,000. [GEORGE II.]

Harvey, Memoirs.

Yaxted, FRANCIS (d. 1565), one of the household of Mary Queen of Scots, was employed by her in various confidential missions, the details of which he invariably betrayed to Elizabeth's minister. In 1565 he was sent to Philip of Spain to obtain the aid of that monarch against the English queen, and was drowned on his way back in charge of a large sum of money, which he was conveying as a present from Spain to Mary. "Yaxted," says Mr. Froude, "was a conspirator of the kind most dangerous to his employers—vain, loud, and confident, fond of boasting of his acquaintance with kings and princes, and 'promising to bring to a good end whatsoever should be committed to him.'"

Yelverton, SIR CHRISTOPHER (d. 1612), who had on several occasions distinguished himself by his Parliamentary speeches in favour of the restriction of the royal prerogative within due limits, was in 1597 elected Speaker of the House of Commons. By his conduct while holding his office he managed to regain the favour of the queen, which he had forfeited by his previous speeches, and in 1602 was made a judge of the Queen's Bench. His character is described as that of "a gentleman, a learned man, and a lawyer; one that will deliver his mind with perspicuous reason and great comeliness."

Yeomanry, THE (England), was the name given to a force of volunteer cavalry, first raised in 1761, and embodied in 1797, when numerous regiments were formed. In 1814, when the Volunteers were disbanded, many of the Yeomanry Cavalry were allowed to exist, under regulations providing that they should be called out for short periods of exercise every year. In 1871 the command of the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers was vested in the crown and the War Office. [VOLUNTEERS.]

Yeomanry, THE (Ireland), were embodied in Sept., 1796, as the Militia could not be trusted in so dangerous a time. The government being afraid of a religious war, had long refused the applications of the gentry to be allowed to raise men at their own expense, but could not refuse any longer. The Orangemen entered largely into these corps, of which Dublin alone raised four regiments of foot and four troops of horse. Thirty thousand men were soon under arms, nearly all of whom were Protestants. It was the Yeomanry who effected the disarmament of Ulster in 1797, and to them more than to any other force was the suppression of the rebellion of 1798 due. It cannot, however, be denied that their free use of the lash, the picket, and the pitchcap, both before and during the revolt, may have prevented the insurgents from laying down their arms, and led to many of the cruelties committed by the peasantry.

Yonge, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1755), was the eldest son and successor of Sir Walter Yonge, Bart., of Culloden, near Honiton, in Devonshire. He was elected member for Honiton at the beginning of George I.'s reign, and succeeded to his father's estates in 1731. In 1717 he was appointed a commissioner for examining the debts due to the army; in 1724 a Lord-Commissioner to the Treasury. About 1730 he was made Secretary of War and a member of the Privy Council. He was a strong supporter of Walpole, who was accustomed to say of him, "that nothing but Yonge's character could keep down such parts, and nothing but his parts could support his character." In 1746 he was a member of the committee for managing the impeachment of Lord Lovat.

York (Latin, Eboracum; Old English, Eborforwic) was the capital of Roman Britain, a fortress where the head-quarters of the Sixth Legion, and for a time of the Ninth, were situated, and the site of an important colony. Its two rivers, the Ouse and the Foss, strengthened its walls, and the former made it an important commercial centre. Constantius Chlorus died there, and Constantine the Great was there hailed Emperor by his troops (306 A.D.). It was also the seat of one of the bishoprics of the Romano-British Church. Under the Anglian kings it preserved its position as a capital; first of Deira, afterwards of the greater kingdom of Northumbria. In 627 Paulinus baptised King Edwin in the hastily-built chapel where the cathedral afterwards rose. The organisation of the English Church, effected by Theodore, made York an archbishopric, though quite dependent on Canterbury, until Archbishop Egbert vindicated its claims to metropolitan independence. In 867 it was taken by the Danes, and its recovery by Athelstan took place in 937. At the Conquest it contained about 10,000 people. It submitted to William, who built a castle there in 1068. It was taken in Sept., 1069, by an English revolt aided by a Danish fleet, but retaken by William without opposition at the end of the year. In the reign of John, York had a merchant gild, and possessed a mayor and aldermen. During the long wars with Scotland it was very frequently the meeting-place of Parliaments. In 1298 Edward I.; in 1314, 1318, 1319, and 1322 Edward II.; in 1328, 1332, 1333, 1334, and 1335 Edward III. held sessions at York, and again in 1464 a Parliament was summoned thither by Edward IV. Its commerce continued to flourish, although diminished by the rise of Hull, and Edward III. for a time freed the staple there. Richard II. made the city a county, and Henry VI. extended its jurisdiction over the Wapentake of the Ainsty. The Yorkist kings cultivated the favour of the citizens, and Richard III. counted them his truest supporters. York suffered greatly at the Reformation from the destruction of the hospitals, chapels, and chantries which abounded there. It was captured by the rebels during the Pilgrimage of Grace (1536), and became the seat of the Council of the North, which was erected there during those disturbances. At York also met the commission which commenced the inquiry into the charges against Mary Queen of Scots (1568). In the civil wars of the next century the city played a still more important part. There, in 1642, Charles I. collected his partisans, and the surrender of York in July, 1644, sealed the fate of the north of England. Its occupation by Fairfax in Jan., 1660, enabled Monk to advance into England, and materially forwarded the Restoration. Like most other corporations York lost its charter in 1684, and had it restored in Nov., 1688. In the same month Lord Danby seized the city, then governed by Sir John Reresby, and declared for a free Parliament and the Protestant religion. At the time of the Revolution of 1688, York probably contained about 10,000 inhabitants. Though its trade was fast diminishing, and its political weight decreased as great manufacturing towns grew up in the north of England, it still retained its importance as a social centre. "What has been, and is, the chief support of the city at present," wrote Drake in his History of York (1737), "is the resort to and residence of several country gentlemen with their families in it." As the judicial and political centre of the largest of English counties, as the ecclesiastical centre of a much wider district, it continues to rank amongst the great cities of England.

York, ARCHBISHOPS OF. [ARCHBISHOPS.]

York, HOUSE OF. The regal house of York was the most short-lived of our dynasties. Beginning with the proclamation of Edward IV. (March 4, 1461), it ended with the fall of Edward's youngest brother, Richard, on the field of Bosworth (Aug. 22, 1485). It sprang from a marriage, made early in the fifteenth century, between Richard, Earl of Cambridge, and Anne Mortimer, his first cousin twice removed. Richard was the younger son of the fifth son of Edward III. (Edmund, Duke of York), and Anne was the great grand-daughter of the third son (Lionel, Duke of Clarence). Thus the designation of the house came from a younger, its title to the crown from an elder, son of Edward III. Another Richard, born in 1410, was the issue of this marriage, and as early as 1424 a succession of events had made this Richard heir general of Edward III. It came about in this way. The Black Prince's line expired with Richard II.; King Edward's second son died in his infancy; Lionel's sole child, Philippa, and her husband, Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, had a son, Roger, whose children, Edmund and Anne, were in Henry V.'s reign the only descendants of Lionel, Duke of Clarence. In 1424 Edmund died childless. Consequently, just when the most inefficient of the royal descendants of John of Gaunt, Edward's fourth son, was beginning to reign, the undoubted representative of the third was growing up into a manly vigour and a healthy robustness of character, which promised a really competent ruler. Richard had also become the only representative of the family of York, for his father, having conspired with others against Henry V., had been beheaded in the summer of 1415, and a few months afterwards his uncle, Edmund, Duke of York, had fallen at Agincourt, leaving no issue.

Notwithstanding his father's treason, the full favour of the court shone upon Richard's path from the first. He was carefully brought up as his father's, mother's, and uncle's heir, and was allowed to connect himself by marriage with the wide-spread and influential Neville family, whose head, Ralph, Earl of Westmoreland, had indeed been his guardian for a time. He wedded Ralph's daughter, Cicely, and thus, when the big moment arrived, had linked to his aspirations and fortunes such powerful nobles as his brothers-in-law, Richard Neville, Earl of Salisbury, and

William, Lord Fauconberg, and Richard's sons, Richard, Earl of Warwick, and John, Lord Montacute; while the advisers of Henry VI. took every pains to add to his greatness. By giving him command in France and then making him regent there, and appointing him to the Irish lieutenancy, they threw opportunities in his way which he was able and willing to turn to account. He was, therefore, between 1450 and 1460 the foremost man in England. Yet his claim to the throne was not put forward till the meeting of Parliament in Oct., 1460. Its soundness is not indisputable. Succession to the crown did not then follow the same rule as succession to private property; the transmission of a right to the throne through an heiress, such as Philippa of Clarence, had never been established, and, even if it were admitted, its virtue was destroyed by the sixty years' prescription, the Acts of Parliament, and the oft-repeated oaths of allegiance, that made for Henry's right. The lords of Parliament shrank from giving judgment, and Richard agreed not to press his claim on being declared Henry's heir. Slain in the following December with his second son, Edmund, after the fight of Wakefield, he left his rights to his eldest son, Edward, Earl of March, who soon asserted them with a strong hand. Edward simply seized the crown on March 4, 1461. The victory of Towton, and the voice of a Parliament that met in November, ratified the act, and Edward IV. was recognised as full king from the date of his proclamation. Mismanagement, and the alienation of Warwick, expelled him from the kingdom in 1470, but in 1471 he recovered his royalty, holding it in security till his death in April, 1483. By that time his second brother, George, Duke of Clarence, was dead, despatched, on a condemnation for treason, in some unknown fashion; but Edward left two sons, Edward, called the Fifth, and Richard, and five daughters. His youngest brother, however, Richard, Duke of Gloucester, cunningly supplanted and then murdered the two sons, reigning as Richard III. for two years. Richard's crimes estranged from him several staunch Yorkists, who then promoted a marriage between Edward IV.'s eldest daughter, Elizabeth, and Henry Tudor. Before the combination that ensued Richard perished on Bosworth Field on Aug. 22, 1485. Henry married Elizabeth, and thus the rival houses coalesced. Another daughter of Edward IV.'s married the Earl of Devon, and was the mother of the Marquis of Exeter, so fortunate and unfortunate in Henry VIII.'s reign. Clarence, who was married to the Earl of Warwick's elder daughter, Isabella, left two children, Edward, Earl of Warwick, who was kept in prison by Henry VII. till complicity with a design of Perkin Warbeck's led to his execution, and Margaret, created Countess of Salisbury, and executed by Henry VIII. The chief historical distinction of the house of York is, that it was the first to set the fashion of constitutional despotism in England.

York, EDMUND OF LANGLEY, DUKE OF (b. 1341, d. 1402), was the fifth son of Edward III. In 1362 he was made Earl of Cambridge, and on the accession of Richard II. was appointed one of the council of regency. He did not take any prominent part in the battles of his nephew's reign, but in 1385 was made Duke of York, and in 1399, during the king's absence in Ireland, was appointed regent. On Bolingbroke's landing, York raised a force to oppose him, but finding him more powerful than he had expected, he was induced to make terms with him, and to believe that Henry had no traitorous designs against the king. Subsequently he proposed to Richard to resign the crown, thereby preserving a semblance of legality to what was in reality a revolution. After this he retired to his domain, where he spent the last years of his life. He figures as a weak man, of moderate views, and always ready by mediation to prevent civil strife. His desertion of Richard, whose representative he was in England, can scarcely be palliated, particularly as, if he had made a firm stand on hearing of Bolingbroke's landing, the barons would probably have submitted. Edmund was twice married, first to Isabella, daughter of Pedro the Cruel of Castile, and secondly to Joan, daughter of Thomas Holand, Earl of Kent.

York, EDWARD, DUKE OF (d. 1415), was the son of Edmund of Langley. In the lifetime of his father he was created Earl of Rutland, and subsequently Duke of Albemarle by Richard II. He accompanied the king on his expedition to Ireland in the year 1399, but, on learning of Bolingbroke's success, deserted Richard. Henry deprived him of his dukedom, but despite the fact that Lord Fitzwalter and many other barons accused him of abetting Richard in his tyrannical acts, he received no other punishment. In 1400 he conspired with the Earl of Huntingdon and others against Henry, but turned traitor, and revealed the plot to the king. He accompanied Henry V. to France, and was one of the commanders in the battle of Agincourt, where he was slain. He married Philippa, daughter of Lord Mohun, but left no issue.

York, FREDERICK AUGUSTUS, DUKE OF (b. 1763, d. 1827), was the second son of George III., and, as early as his elder brother, broke away from the rigid discipline by which their parents fondly hoped to preserve them from the evils of the world. At the age of twenty-one he was created Duke of York and Albany, and Earl of Ulster. But already in his third year he had been elevated by his father to the half-secularised bishopric of Osnabrück. In 1791 he married Charlotte, eldest daughter of Frederick William, King of Prussia, when his income was increased by a vote of £30,000 per annum. In 1793 he was placed in command of an expedition to the Netherlands, to act with the Prince of Saxe-Coburg against France. Though giving some proofs of personal gallantry, he soon made it clear that his royal birth was his only qualification for command. Fortunately for England the duke became disgusted at his want of success, and retreated, leaving Abercromby in command. As a reward for the military ability displayed in this campaign, he was in 1795 appointed Commander-in-chief of the Forces, and in 1799 was again entrusted with the command of an expedition to the Low Countries, in which, however, the only successes gained were due to Abercromby. The campaign finally ended in a disgraceful convention with the French. The duke was compelled to resign his office because of the shameful disclosures as to the way in which he allowed his mistress, Mrs. Clarke, to influence the military appointments, but was later restored to his old office under his brother's regency. His last act in public life was a most violent speech in the House of Lords against Catholic Emancipation in 1826. In the following January he died.

York, RICHARD, DUKE OF (b. circa 1410, d. 1460), was the son of Richard, Earl of Cambridge, by Anne, daughter of Roger, Earl of March. In 1425 he was relieved from the effects of his father's attainder, and succeeded to the estates and titles of his uncles, Edward, Duke of York, and Edmund, Earl of March. In 1430 he was made Constable of England, in 1432 he was appointed guardian of the coast of Normandy, and in 1436 was made regent of France, and advanced with an army almost to the gates of Paris. In the next year he was recalled, but in 1440 was appointed regent again, holding office till 1445. In 1449 he was made Lieutenant of Ireland, and governed that country with great wisdom and moderation during the one year for which he held this post. On his return to England in 1450 he came prominently forward as the opponent of the Duke of Somerset. He was as popular as Somerset was odious, and had powerful allies in the Nevilles, with whom he was closely connected by his marriage with Cecily, daughter of the Earl of Westmoreland. In 1451 a proposal was made in Parliament that York should be declared heir to the crown, but this was not seriously entertained, and the proposer was imprisoned. In 1452 York, declaring that his sole object was to rid the king of Somerset and other evil counsellors, raised a force, and marched to London. Henry met him at Blackheath, and York laid before him a bill of accusation against Somerset, at the same time swearing fealty to the king, and promising for the future to sue for remedy in legal form. The birth of an heir to Henry in 1453 deprived York of all hope of succeeding peacefully to the throne, while the imbecility of the king gave him the office of Protector, which he held till Henry's recovery in 1455, Somerset being in prison during this period. On the king's restoration to health York was dismissed and Somerset reinstated. The first battle of St. Albans followed, in which the latter was slain, and the king shortly afterwards becoming once more imbecile, York was again appointed Protector. When in Feb., 1456, Henry recovered, and York was relieved of his office, two years of comparative peace followed, and in March, 1458, a great pacification took place at St. Paul's. The misgovernment and misfortunes of the country, and the alienation of the Nevilles gave York another opportunity in 1459. The Yorkists were marching south when Lord Audley tried to stop them at Blore Heath, but was defeated, and battle was imminent at Ludlow when the defection of Trollop alarmed the Yorkists, and they fled. The duke went to Ireland, and in the Parliament held at Coventry at the end of the year was attainted. In 1460 the Yorkist lords planned a return to England, and York issued a manifesto against the royal ministers. The battle of Northampton placed the king at their mercy, and the Parliament which met repealed the duke's attainders. York now for the first time asserted his claim to the throne, and after a long discussion a compromise was effected, by which Henry was to retain the crown during his life-time, after which it was to revert to York and his heirs. Meanwhile the duke and his sons were not to molest the king, any attempt on the duke's life was made high treason, and the principality of Wales was handed over to him. However, Margaret, who refused to recognise this arrangement, had been collecting an army in the north, and against her the Duke of York marched. The battle of Wakefield ensued on the last day of the year, when York was slain. His head was placed on the walls of York, garished with a paper crown, but was taken down after the battle of Towton. By his marriage with Cecily Neville the duke had eight sons and four daughters, of whom four sons and one daughter died in childhood. Of the others, Edward and Richard became kings, Edmund was killed at Wakefield, and George was created Duke of Clarence. His daughters were Anne, who married the Duke of Exeter, and secondly Sir J. St. Leger; Elizabeth, who married John, Earl of Suffolk, and Margaret, who married Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy.

Yorke, CHARLES (b. 1723, d. 1770), was the second son of the first Lord Hardwicke. Called to the bar in 1743, he soon obtained a large practice, and in the next year made his reputation as a jurist by the publication of Some Considerations on the Laws of Forfeiture for High Treason. In 1747 he was returned to Parliament for Reigate, and in Nov., 1756, he was appointed Solicitor-General. In the following July he was doomed to a bitter disappointment when Pitt insisted on making Pratt Attorney-General over his head. For this slight he never quite forgave Pitt, and on the accession of George III. attached himself to Bute. On Pratt's appointment to the Chief Justiceship of the Common Pleas in Jan., 1762, he became Attorney-General. Bute's administration, however, was short-lived, and early in 1763, he made way for Sir Fletcher Norton. Out of office Yorke's reputation in the House rose. He strongly condemned the action of the government in issuing general warrants. In 1765 he became again Attorney-General during the Rockingham administration, but resigned his office on their falling in the following year, and continued in opposition until the last few days of his life, but his activity was confined for the most part to the courts, and was not employed in any vigorous opposition to the government. Towards the beginning of 1770, on the resignation of Lord Camden, he was offered the chancellorship—a post which he accepted after having declined it twice. Within a week of this date he died, suspected of having put an end to his own life by suicide.

Yorke, SIR ROLAND (fl. 1587), was a "soldier of fortune," who was the bitter enemy of Leicester, and who is said to have been instrumental in bringing about the treachery of Sir William Stanley in delivering up Deventer to the Spaniards (1587). At the same time Yorke himself gave up the forts at Zutphen, of which he was in command, and went over to Philip.

Yorktown, THE SURRENDER OF (Oct. 19, 1781), is memorable as the last important act of the American War of Independence. Early in August Cornwallis had, in obedience to orders from Clinton, withdrawn into Yorktown, a place whose safety required a naval superiority in its defenders, and at this time that superiority had passed away to the French, who had a large fleet under De Grasse in those waters. Cornwallis was aware of the danger of his position, especially so when, on Sept. 28, the combined French and American armies appeared in sight. On Oct. 1 the investment was completed, and works were begun with a view to the bombardment of the English position. After an ineffectual attempt to carry the infantry across the strait into Gloucester, a small town on the opposite headland, Cornwallis sent a flag of truce proposing to capitulate on condition that the garrisons of Gloucester and Yorktown should be sent home on their word of honour not again to serve against America or her allies. Washington would not accept these terms, and finally Cornwallis surrendered his public stores and artillery in the two forts, as well as all the shipping in the harbour, the men to remain prisoners of war in America, the ships to become the property of France. With the surrender at Yorktown the war was virtually at an end.

Young, ARTHUR (b. 1741, d. 1820), was a writer of numerous works on agriculture and rural economy, to collect information on which subjects he made numerous journeys through the British Isles and on the Continent. In 1784 he published a periodical work called the Annals of Agriculture. In 1789 he was appointed Secretary to the Board of Agriculture. Young's works, especially his Political Arithmetic (1774) and his Travels (1792), are of very great value for the light they throw on the state of society, trade, and agriculture in England, Ireland, and France. Young's account of France, which he visited on the eve of the Revolution, is of singular interest.

Young, ROBERT (d. 1700), one of the most disreputable informers of the seventeenth century, was ordained a deacon in the Irish Church, but was expelled from his first parish for immorality, and from his third for bigamy. In 1684 he was convicted of having forged Sanicroff's signature, and was sentenced to the pillory and imprisonment. When Monmouth's insurrection broke out he gave witness of a pretended conspiracy in Suffolk against the king, but his evidence was proved to be false. After the Revolution he determined to become an accuser of the Jacobites, and concocted a story of a plot against William and Mary. In 1692, he forged a paper purporting to be an association for the restoration of the banished king, to which he appended the names of Marlborough, Cornbury, Salisbury, Sanicroff, and Sprat, Bishop of Rochester. A subordinate agent named Blackhead dropped the paper in one of Sprat's flower-pots. Young thereupon laid information before the Privy Council. Marlborough was committed to the Tower, and Sprat taken into custody, but the document could not be found. Blackhead thereupon rescued it from its hiding-place, and gave it to Young, who had it conveyed to the Secretary of State. But when confronted by Sprat, Blackhead lost his presence of mind, and confessed all. Young, however, with unblushing effrontery persisted in his denial. Young was imprisoned and pilloried. He was finally hanged for coining.

Young England Party, THE, was the name given to a group of Tory politicians during the Corn-Law struggles of 1842-46, mostly young members of aristocratic families. They came prominently before the public in the autumn of 1844. It was the theory of the Young England Party that what was supposed to be the ancient relation between rich and poor should be restored. The landowners and wealthy classes were to be the benevolent protectors and leaders, while the poor were to be obedient and trustful dependants. Every effort was to be made to improve the material condition of the labouring classes, while at the same time a firm resistance was to be offered to the levelling spirit of the age, to free-trade, and to the principles of the Liberals generally. Combined with a good deal of coxcombry and conceit, there was an element of usefulness in the Young Englanders. "What the Tractarian priesthood were at this time requiring of their flocks," says Miss Martineau, "the Young England politicians were striving for with the working classes; and the spectacle was seen of Sunday sports encouraged, as in the old Catholic times; and popular festivals revived at which young lords and members of Parliament pulled off their coats to play cricket with the labourers, or moved about among the crowd in the park or on the green, in the style of the feudal superior of old." In Parliament the Young England politicians, affecting to believe in the "Old Tory principles" of the preceding century, chiefly distinguished themselves by their noisy opposition to the Whigs. They opposed the repeal of the Corn Laws, violently attacked Peel for his change of policy, and declined to join the Peelites. Among their most prominent members were Lord J. Manners, and the Hon. G. Smythe, member for Canterbury; and Mr. Disraeli lent them his support, and was looked upon in some sort as their leader.

Young Ireland Party. The group of men known under this name, among whom Gavan Duffy, Meagher, and Mitchell are the best known, were at first followers of O'Connell, and did much for the Irish cause by writing papers, historical romances, and national songs, and by publishing old ones. In 1843 they separated from O'Connell after his failure to repel force by force at Clontarf, and began to be known as the Physical Force Party. In 1848 Smith O'Brien became their leader, and as a consequence of his futile attempt at rebellion, many of them were sentenced to transportation, or at least had to leave Ireland. Some of them, like Gavan Duffy, attained high distinction in the colonies.

Zemaun Shah (d. 1802), the ruler of Afghanistan, threatened to invade India during the years 1795—98, and even entered into negotiations with Tippoo Sultan. Lord Wellesley, however, concluded an alliance with Persia against him, and internal factions prevented his intended invasion. He was slain during the civil war in 1802.

Zemindars, THE, are Indian revenue officers to whom the right of collecting so much revenue was originally farmed out by the Mogul dynasty. These officers tended to become hereditary, and thus to assume the position of an aristocracy collecting tribute from the land, a quota of which was paid into the coffers of the state. In Cornwallis's settlement of Bengal these tax-gatherers were elevated into landed aristocracy, on the model of the English. The term "zemindar" has consequently become identified in meaning with the expression "landed proprietor."

Zulestein, WILLIAM HENRY NASSAU (d. 1702), was an illegitimate cousin-german of William of Orange, afterwards William III., and employed by him in the intrigues with the English Opposition in 1687. "His bearing was that of a gallant soldier; a military man who had never appeared to trouble himself about political affairs could, without exciting any suspicion, hold with the English aristocracy an intercourse which, if he had been a noted master of statecraft, would have been jealously watched." He was again sent to congratulate King James on the birth of the Prince of Wales. When William invaded England, Zulestein was sent to James declining a proposed conference with the Prince of Orange. On the accession of William he was made Master of the Robes. In 1691 he accompanied William to Holland. In 1695 Zulestein was created Earl of Rochford, and received large grants of property in Ireland, which were attacked by the Commons in the Resumption Bill.

Zutphen, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 22, 1586), was fought in Guelderland between the Spaniards under the Prince of Parma and the English forces, who were assisting the Dutch, under the Earls of Leicester and Essex and Lord Willoughby. The English were besieging Zutphen, and attempted to cut off a force which was bringing provisions to the beleaguered garrison; but were completely foiled. The battle is famous as the one in which Sir Philip Sidney received his death-wound.

APPENDIX.

Breda, THE DECLARATION OF (April 4, 1660), was sent to England by Charles II. after negotiations had been opened with him by Monk for his return to England. In this he promised (1) pardon to all who should apply for it within forty days, except such as should be excepted by Parliament; (2) "liberty to tender consciences; that no man should be disquieted for differences of opinion in matters of religion which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom;" and that he would consent to any Act of Parliament for granting this indulgence; (3) that all claims to landed property should be determined in Parliament; and (4) the payment of arrears to Monk's soldiers.

The text of the Declaration is given in Clarendon, Hist. of the Rebellion (ed. 1826, vii. 462).

Brewer, John Sherren (b. 1810, d. 1879), graduated at Queen's College, Oxford, in 1833. From 1841 till 1877 he was Professor of English Literature and History at King's College, London. He was appointed by the Master of the Rolls to edit the Calendar of State Papers relating to the reign of Henry VIII., and wrote some masterly introductions to them. Mr. Brewer's introductions and prefaces to the Calendar have been collected under the title, The Reign of Henry VIII., and form one of the most important historical works produced in England during recent years.

Dalling and Bulwer, HENRY LYTTON EARLE BULWER, LORD (b. 1804, d. 1872), was the son of General Bulwer, and elder brother of Lord Lytton. After sixteen years in the diplomatic service, he was sent as minister to Madrid in 1843, where he remained until in 1848 he was ordered to leave the kingdom upon presenting to the queen-mother Lord Palmerston's recommendations to adopt a more liberal policy. From 1849 to 1852 he was minister at Washington (where he negotiated the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty), and from 1852 to 1855 at Florence. In 1857 he succeeded Lord Stratford de Redcliffe as ambassador at Constantinople, and held this post till 1865. In 1871 he was created Baron Dalling and Bulwer.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners, THE. In 1835 a commission was appointed "to consider the state of the several dioceses in England and Wales with reference to the amount of their revenues, and the more equal distribution of episcopal duties; to consider also the state of cathedral and collegiate churches with a view to the suggestion of such measures as may render them more conducive to the efficiency of the Established Church; and to devise the best means of providing for the cure of souls, with special reference to the residence of the clergy on their respective benefices." This commission drew up several reports recommending a fairer distribution of episcopal duties and revenues, and the establishment of a fund to provide for worship in poor districts by the appropriation of part of the revenues of cathedral and collegiate churches, and of the surplus revenues of certain bishoprics. For this latter purpose a commission was created by an Act of 1836 with all the powers of a perpetual corporation. In 1850 the Queen was empowered to nominate two "Church Estates Commissioners" (one paid), and the archbishop, one (paid). These were to be members of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and to form with two other members the "Church Estates' Committee," which was to manage all the property of the Commission. They were empowered by Acts of 1850 and 1860 to secure fixed instead of their fluctuating incomes to bishops, and to manage episcopal estates. They make grants to or increase the endowments of poor livings, and arrange for the creation of new parishes; and their consent is necessary for leases, exchange of advowsons, &c. In 1856 they became also the Church Building Commissioners (first created in 1818).

Elgin, JAMES BRUCE, 8TH EARL OF (b. 1811, d. 1863), was the eldest son of Thomas, seventh Earl of Elgin, and eleventh Earl of Kincardine. He entered Parliament as member for Southampton in the Conservative interest in 1841. In 1842 he resigned his seat in the Commons on being appointed Governor-General of Jamaica. In 1846 he was sent to Canada to deal with the difficulties which had arisen there. He carried out the conciliatory policy of his father-in-law, Lord Durham; preserved neutrality between the two parties; developed the resources of the country, agricultural and commercial; and did much to quell discontent and render more secure the ties between Canada and the mother country. In reward for these services he was raised to the English peerage with the title of Baron Elgin. From Canada he went to China as special ambassador, and successfully negotiated the Peace of Tientsin after the capture of Canton and the rout of the Celestials. In 1859 he entered Lord Palmerston's cabinet, with the office of Postmaster-General. In consequence, however, of the refusal of the Chinese to receive his brother, Mr. Bruce, as envoy, in accordance with the treaty, which refusal was followed by the disaster on the Peiho, he was sent again to sustain English authority, and was once more completely successful (1860). He was shortly afterwards appointed to succeed Lord Canning as Governor-General of India. Under his judicious arrangements India made considerable advances in financial and commercial prosperity. He provoked no contests, and attempted no acquisitions of territory, but developed the internal and material resources of the country. In the autumn of 1863 Lord Elgin started on a tour of inspection of the north of India with the intention of visiting Cashmere. He was seized with illness in the Himalayan Passes, and died Nov., 1863.

Ellenborough, EDWARD LAW, EARL OF (b. 1790, d. 1871). He was the son of Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough; was educated at Eton and Cambridge; entered Parliament in 1814; but was soon removed to the Upper House on succeeding his father as Baron Ellenborough in 1818. He first took office as Lord Privy Seal in the Duke of Wellington's administration. In 1834 he was appointed President of the Board of Control in Sir Robert Peel's government; and occupied the same position in Sir Robert's second administration of 1841. Soon after, he accepted the Governor-Generalship of India, where he arrived early in 1842. Under his administration in that country, was accomplished the expedition into Afghanistan, under Generals Pollock and Nott, which resulted in the recapture of Ghuzni and Cabul, and the rescue of Lady Sale and the other English prisoners. The conquest of Scinde by Sir Charles Napier, in 1843, was also undertaken by Lord Ellenborough's government, but his policy did not meet with the approval of the Court of Directors, and in 1844 he was recalled by that body. The Duke of Wellington, however, defended Lord Ellenborough's policy in Parliament, and on his return home he was created an earl. From Jan. to July, 1846, he filled the post of the First Lord of the Admiralty in Sir R. Peel's administration, and in 1858 he undertook for two months, under Lord Derby's administration, his old office of President of the Board of Control. After this time he did not again take office, though he continued to be a most powerful and eloquent speaker in the House of Lords.

Fuentes d'Onoro, THE BATTLE OF (May 5, 1811), was one of the most hard fought and critical battles of the Peninsular War. Wellington's object was to cover the siege of Almeida, while Massena was attempting to relieve the place. Wellington accordingly took up a position on strong ground to the east of Almeida, between that place and Ciudad Rodrigo. After a battle which lasted all day, the French withdrew to a position which they maintained for two days without making any demonstration of attack; and on the 10th, Massena withdrew across the Agueda. "Both sides claimed the victory, and Massena had certainly gained great advantages at first." Nevertheless, Wellington had obtained his object, while Massena had failed to relieve Almeida. Gilds (probably from Anglo-Saxon gilden, to pay). Associations of various kinds, for mutual assistance, were of considerable antiquity in England. Among the Anglo-Saxons three kinds of gilds may be distinguished—religious and social gilds, "frithgilds," and merchant gilds. Of the first of these, two well-known examples are the gilds of Abbotsbury and of Exeter, of which the statutes, dating from the earlier part of the eleventh century, prescribe contributions towards feasts and for religious purposes, and direct provision to be made for the burial of members. The thegns' gild at Cambridge, of the same period, did more than provide for mutual help of this sort; it exacted recompense from thieves who robbed its members, and paid wergild for a brother who slew a man righteously. Such regulations imply that a certain authority was recognised in the gild officers, and the gild itself may therefore be looked upon as a rudimentary town corporation.

In the laws of Ine mention is made of the gegildan, to whom the wergild of a stranger was to be paid; and those of Alfred fix the share to be paid or received by the gegildan of a man who is without relatives. Concerning the meaning of these enactments a long controversy has arisen, which has as yet come to no definite result; possibly they merely refer to gilds of foreigners in the seaport towns; possibly they indicate a system of gilds spread over the whole country. In the latter case, we must suppose that gilds grew up to take the place of the family for the purposes of police, when the family tie began to be loosened. We are on surer ground when we come to the Judicia Civitatis Londonie of the time of Athelstan, which describes itself as "ordained and confirmed by the bishops and reeves of London among our frithgegildas (brethren of a peace gild), as well eorlish as ceorlish," to supplement the decrees of recent Witenagemots. It provides for common banquets, and the singing of funeral psalms. But its chief object is the enforcement of mutual defence; payment is made towards a common insurance and police fund; directions are given for the pursuit of thieves and the exaction of compensation; and the members are arranged in bodies of tens and hundreds under headmen. This ordinance may be interpreted either as pointing to the creation de novo by the public authorities of an organisation for the maintenance of order, or as merely the recognition of institutions already existing. In any case, such a system was probably peculiar to London. While social and religious guilds existed to the close of the Middle Ages, there is no mention of frithgilds after the Conquest.

The merchant gild (gilda mercatoria, ceapmanne gilde), or Hansa, probably arose in several towns in the early part of the eleventh century. As seen soon after the Conquest, it owns property, contains all the traders of the town, and regulates its trade. "In the reign of Henry II. the possession of a merchant guild had become the sign and token of municipal independence; it was in fact, if not in theory, the governing body of the town in which it was allowed to exist. It is recognised by Glanvill as identical with the communa of the privileged towns, the municipal corporation of the later age." (Stubbs.) [Towns.]

It is difficult to determine the relation between the merchant gild and the trade or craft guilds which first became prominent in the reign of Henry II. These gradually obtained royal sanction, and during the fourteenth century gained complete control of industry. In most cases the merchant gild was entirely merged in the corporation; while the trade guilds became completely self-governing, and imposed on their members minute regulations as to trade processes and personal morality. It was an industry of small shops and of general equality; for each master employed only two or three workmen (who earned at least half as much as he did, and might fairly hope to become masters in their turn), together with an apprentice or so. But with the beginning of the fifteenth century, it became in some crafts very difficult to rise to the position of master, and there are traces of the formation of separate yeomen's, i.e., journeymen's, gilda. This part of gild history has not yet been adequately examined, and the stages of change are not clear. It is, however, evident that in spite of the Statute of Apprentices by which Elizabeth extended the gild regulations as to apprentices to all the trades in existence at the time, the gilds were already dying; the same Act entrusted the fixing of wages to the justices. During the seventeenth century the small-shop system gave way to the domestic system, and that in the eighteenth to the factory system; and early in the present century the last remnants of the gild restrictions were abolished by statute. [TRADES' UNIONS.]

It is to be added that the Act of Edward VI. confiscating all the gild endowments (except those of the London Gilds or Companies), on the pretence that they were applied to superstitious uses, was one of the chief causes of the pauperism which made the Poor Law of Elizabeth necessary.

Toulmin Smith's English Guilds (Early Eng. Text Soc., 1870), Brentano's Introduction to which on The History and Development of Gilds, is the foundation of almost all that has been written on the subject in England subsequently. Many of his conclusions have been disputed by Ochenskowski, Englands Wirthschaftliche Entwicklung im Ausgange des Mittelalters, 1879, and Gross, Gilda Mercatoria (Göttingen, 1888). For the earliest English gilds, see Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. xl.; Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, i. 461 seq.; Kemble, Saxons, bk. i., ch. ix.; Schmid, Gesetz der Angelsachsen, Glossar. s.v. Gegilda. Gordon, MAJOR-GENERAL CHARLES GEORGE, son of Lieutenant-General Gordon, was born in 1833. After serving through the Crimean War as lieutenant of Engineers, he was engaged in the Chinese expedition (1860), and was raised to the rank of major. He then made a long journey in company with a friend through parts of China hitherto unvisited by Europeans, and soon after his return to Shanghai was appointed, in Feb., 1863, to the command of a Chinese force for the suppression of the Taeping rebellion. "Chinese" Gordon, as he was henceforth usually styled, did the work with skill and bravery in fifteen months, and was rewarded by the Chinese government with the highest military rank, and by the English with a lieutenant-colonelcy. From 1865 to 1871 he was Commanding Royal Engineer at Gravesend, and from 1871 to 1873 British Commissioner on the Danube. In 1873 he accepted the appointment of Governor of the Equatorial Provinces of Egypt for the Khedive, was created a Pasha, and in 1877 Governor of the Soudan. Here he remained till 1879, doing much to give peace and good government to that country, and to suppress the slave trade. In 1880 he became private secretary to the Viceroy of India, but resigned that post almost immediately. In 1881 he commanded the Engineers at Mauritius for ten months, and became major-general. Next year he was invited to the Cape of Good Hope to take the command of the Colonial forces, as a war was threatening with the Basutos, but his advice was disregarded and he resigned. He then visited the Holy Land, and had on his return already accepted from the King of the Belgians the command of an anti-slavery expedition to the Congo, when he was requested by the British government to go to Khartoum (1884) as High Commissioner and Governor-General of the Sudan. He left London on Jan. 18, and reached Khartoum on Feb. 18. Assisted only by a single European officer, and at the head of a cowardly and disaffected Egyptian garrison, he held the town with extraordinary ability against the Sudanese. An expedition was (Sept., 1884) prepared for his relief.

Grand Alliance, THE, was the name given to the alliance between England, Holland, and the Empire, concluded at the Hague, Sept. 7, 1701. The treaty declared the desirability of compensating the Emperor for the loss of Spain, and of providing for the security of England and Holland. As, however, William could not at the moment be sure of energetic support in England, he pledged himself, in case the overtures of the allies were rejected by France, only to attempt to conquer Milan for Austria, and the barrier fortresses for Holland. The alliance was afterwards joined by Prussia, Jan. 20, 1702; by Portugal, May 16, 1703; and by Savoy, Oct. 25, 1703; and its object became the conquest of all the Spanish Empire, and especially of Spain itself. Green, JOHN RICHARD (b. 1837, d. 1883), was educated at Jesus College, Oxford. In 1860 he took orders, and was for some years engaged in clerical work in the east of London. He was appointed Lambeth librarian in succession to Professor Stubbs. Mr. Green was an enthusiastic student of English history. Besides papers in various periodicals, he wrote A Short History of the English People, which had an extraordinary and almost unprecedented popularity. It was afterwards republished and enlarged as A History of the English People.

High Commission, THE COURT OF, was the name given to a judicial committee instituted in the reign of Elizabeth to investigate ecclesiastical cases. Edward VI. and Mary frequently had recourse to the plan of exercising their jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters through special commissioners. General commissions were issued by Edward in 1549 and 1551 to a number of royal councillors, theologians, and lawyers, to inquire into heresy and nonconformity, and a somewhat similar commission appeared in 1557, though in this case it was restricted to inquiry, and further action was left to the bishops' courts. The statute (1 Eliz., c. 1) restoring the royal jurisdiction in matters ecclesiastical, empowered the queen to nominate commissioners to exercise this power; accordingly two months later (July, 1559) a commission was directed to Parker, Grindal, and seventeen other persons, chiefly state officials and lawyers, which followed in the main the form of those of Mary. They were to inquire, "as well by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men, as also by witnesses, and other ways and means ye can devise," into offences against the acts of supremacy and uniformity, heresy, adulteries, and other ecclesiastical crimes. The subsequent commissions were drawn on the model of this one. The commission of 1583, on which Hallam has laid such stress, seems to differ little from preceding ones. But Whitgift appears to have used the power of proceeding by oath ex-officio more freely than his predecessors, and drew up an elaborate list of questions to be asked of the accused, a method which Burleigh complained of as "too much savouring of the Roman Inquisition." In the case of Cawdrey, it was held by the judges that the act did not abrogate the older ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the sovereign, nor lessen her power of imposing penalties. In the reign of James frequent disputes arose with the common-law courts as to the limits of the power of the High Commission; in 1611 Coke laid down that it had no right to fine or imprison, except in cases of heresy and schism, and, with six other judges, nominated members of the court by a new commission, refused to sit. During the whole of its existence the court busied itself in enforcing uniformity, and little change in this respect was made by Laud. The number of ministers touched by the High Commission has been grossly exaggerated; during two years of its greatest activity only three persons were deprived and seven suspended. Laud's hand is rather to be seen in its increased vigilance in cases of adultery, and in the impartiality with which it punished offenders of rank. The court was abolished by Act of the Long Parliament (July, 1641). In 1609 a Court of High Commission had been established by James in each of the two archiepiscopal provinces of Scotland; Charles was obliged to consent to their abolition in Sept., 1638.

In spite of the Act of 1641, and that of 1661, confirming it, James II., in July, 1686, created a new Court of Commission for ecclesiastical causes. It consisted of seven members—the Chancellor Jeffreys, Sanicroft (who refused to sit), the Bishops of Durham and Rochester, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President, and Chief Justice. By this court Compton was suspended from his episcopal functions, the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge deprived of his office, and Hough's election as President of Magdalen quashed. It was abolished by the Bill of Rights.

Hopton, Sir RALPH (b. 1598, d. 1652), was member for Wells in the Long Parliament, and at first sided with the popular party, but from the end of 1641 with the Royalists. In the summer of 1642 he was sent into the West to assist in raising an army for the king. In the following year the Cornish army, which he commanded, defeated the Parliamentary forces at Braddock Down (Jan. 19, 1643), Stratton and Lansdown (July 5). At the last of these battles he was severely wounded. For his services he was created Baron Hopton of Stratton, and appointed Governor of Bristol. He was appointed to command the king's troops in the West (Jan. 15, 1646), was defeated by Fairfax at Torrington (Feb. 16), and laid down his arms a month later. He then joined the Prince of Wales at Scilly, and died at Bruges in 1652.

Independents. As early as 1568 a congregation of Separatists existed in London, organised upon the principle that Christians ought to be gathered together in strictly voluntary and self-governing congregations or churches. They numbered about two hundred, all poor, and the majority women, under the pastorate of a certain Richard Fitz. The first prominent teacher of this theory, however, was Robert Browne, a clergyman and graduate of Cambridge, whose greatest activity was during the years from 1571 to 1581. Owing to the protection of his powerful relative, Burleigh, Browne escaped punishment, and finally conformed. But his tracts formed the great storehouse of argument for those who had accepted his doctrine—especially numerous in the eastern counties—and they were long known only as Brownists. Several Separatist churches were formed, especially in London, which met in secret, and were often discovered and dispersed by the authorities; many of their members were imprisoned and five executed. Of these Henry Barrowe, a barrister of Gray's Inn, executed in 1593 for the publication of seditious books, i.e., pamphlets against the Established Church, was the most important, and for some time "Barrowist" was used as a synonym of Brownist. The repressive measures of the government caused the members of a Brownist church, which had been formed in London about 1592, to flee to Holland, and they finally settled at Amsterdam. Another and more successful church was that of Nottinghamshire men at Leyden under John Robinson, and this Leyden church is the true "parent of Independency alike in England and America." In 1620 the first settlement was made in New England by Independents coming from Holland in the Mayflower; the New World became the refuge of all who were attacked by the ecclesiastical authorities at home, and Independency became practically the established religion in the New England colonies.

The example of New England was of the greatest importance when, with the meeting of the Long Parliament, the Independents at last obtained freedom of speech in England. It is not necessary here to show how the growth of Independency accompanied the victories of the New Model; and how the attempt to substitute the complete Presbyterian system for that of Episcopacy was defeated. Few of the early Independents advocated entire voluntarism, and many accepted benefices and received tithes under the rule of Cromwell. But in such cases, while the minister preached to all the parishioners in the parish church, there was often an attempt to create side by side with the parochial organisation, a special Independent Church. Difficulties arose when the Independent ministers refused to administer the sacrament to persons outside this inner church, and one at least of the justices on assize advised aggrieved parishioners to withhold tithes. In 1658 a synod of Independent Churches was held in London which drew up the Savoy Declaration, following in doctrine the Westminster Confession, but adding their peculiar theory of Church government. The Act of Uniformity drove Independents with Presbyterians out of the National Church, and the rigid penal code of Charles II. prevented their meeting in worship. Later in the reign of Charles II., and under James II., they again began to form churches, and under William III. obtained toleration. But their numbers were much diminished, and it was not till the evangelical movement of the latter half of the eighteenth century that they began to recover strength. As meanwhile the Presbyterian body had declined in numbers, and had largely become Unitarian, they became in the nineteenth century one of the most important of the Nonconformist bodies. During the eighteenth century they had long received a regium donum of £1,000 a year for the widows of ministers; but in the nineteenth the wrongfulness of endowment became one of their main tenets. They are now more usually known as Congregationalists, and are united in a "Congregational Union of England," with subordinate "County Unions."

The best accounts of the history of Independency are—from the side of the Church of England, that of Curtels, in Dissent in its Relation to the Church of England, and from the Congregationalist side that of Fairbairn, in his article on Independents in the Encyclopædia Britannica; see also Stoughton, Religion in England; Gardiner, Hist. Eng.; Masson, Life and Times of Milton; Skeat, History of Free Churches. [W. J. A.]

Land Tax. This was first levied in 1690, when it was 3s. in the pound. It was originally an annual grant, and varied in amount each year; but in 1798 it was made perpetual, and was fixed at 4s. in the pound upon the valuation of 1692, provision being made for its redemption by the payment of a lump sum. This has been taken advantage of by many landowners; but at the present time there is still a large quantity of land on which the tax has not been redeemed and is still levied.

Langside, THE BATTLE OF (May 13, 1668), was fought near Glasgow between the forces of Mary Queen of Scots, who had just escaped from Lochleven Castle, and those of the Regent Murray, who had with him Lord Morton and Kirkcaldy of Grange. Mary, in spite of the superior numbers of her army, was defeated by the excellent generalship shown by her opponents.

Largs, THE BATTLE OF (Oct. 2, 1263), was fought between Hacon of Norway and the army of Alexander III. on the coast of Ayrshire. A severe storm had shattered the Norwegian fleet, and barely 1,200 men were opposed to the Scottish force. The ground was fiercely contested, and, though the Scots claimed a victory, the battle really appears to have been indecisive.

Lathe was a division of the county of Kent, answering to the Riding of Yorkshire, or possibly to the Rape of Sussex, and corresponding, it is just possible, either to the original counties of the Kentish folk, or to the smaller sub-kingdoms, which were agglomerated to make up the kingdom.

Levellers was the name given to an important party during the period of the Commonwealth. Early in 1647 a considerable ultra-Republican sect appeared in the New Model Army, especially among the Adjutators. The rejection of the Army Proposals by Charles, and the increasing hostility displayed by the Commons towards the army, furthered the spread of such opinions, and many of the soldiers distrusted Cromwell himself on account of his too lenient treatment of the king, and their distrust produced the mutiny of Nov. 15. [ADJUTATORS.]

A more formidable outbreak took place early in 1649. Lilburne, and those who thought with him, considered the existing republic too aristocratic, and little better than the monarchy to which it had succeeded. In two pamphlets, England's New Chains Discovered, and The Hunting of the Foxes (i.e., the army magnates) from Newmarket to Whitehall by Five Small Beagles, Lilburne demanded that the Council of State should be dissolved and the management of public affairs should be given to Parliamentary Committees of short duration; that greater liberty of conscience and of the press should be permitted; that a new and reformed Parliament should speedily come together, and the Self-denying Ordinance revived. Lilburne and three other of the next conspicuous Levellers—Overton, Walwyn, and Prince—were arrested and brought before the Council; they were committed to the Tower. On April 25 a mutiny broke out among a troop quartered in Bishopsgate, who refused to obey an order to leave London. But Fairfax and Cromwell came up quickly and crushed the rising: fifteen mutineers were tried by court-martial, and one, Lockyer, shot in St. Paul's Churchyard. More formidable risings took place in various parts of the country. A Captain Thompson with two hundred troopers rose in revolt at Banbury, issuing a manifesto, but he was overpowered by his colonel. From Salisbury a thousand insurgents marched toward London; they were surrounded by Cromwell at Burford, and surrendered, and Cornet Thompson, a brother of the captain, and two corporals were shot, and the very dangerous military Levelling movement was over.

Before this, another and more harmless Levelling movement had been defeated. Some thirty men met on St. Margaret's Hill and St. George's Hill, near Cobham in Surrey, where they "dugged the ground and sowed it with roots and beans." They were dispersed, and their leaders brought before the Council. There, one of them, Everard, declared that "what they did was to renew the ancient community of enjoying the fruits of the earth, and to distribute the benefit thereof to the poor and needy. But they intend not to meddle with any man's property nor to break down any pales or enclosures; but only to meddle with what was common and untitled, and to make it fruitful for the use of man; that the time will suddenly be, that all men shall willingly come in and submit to this community."

Cromwell's attitude towards the Levellers appears in a speech of 1654, where he declares his approval of "the Ranks and Orders of men whereby England hath been known for hundreds of years. A nobleman, a gentleman, and a yeoman; that is a good interest of the nation. Did not that Levelling principle tend to the reducing of all to an equality? What was the purport of it but to make the tenant as liberal a fortune as the landlord?"

Lewis, SIR GEORGE CORNEWALL (b. 1806, d. 1863), the eldest son of Sir Thomas Frankland Lewis, of Harpton Court, Radnorshire, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, and called to the bar at the Middle Temple (1831). In 1835 he was appointed one of the Commissioners of Inquiry for the Relief of the Poor and into the state of the Church in Ireland; and in the following year was placed on the Commission of Inquiry into the Affairs of Malta; and was a Poor-Law Commissioner from Jan., 1839, to July, 1847, when he was first elected member for the county of Hereford. He sat for that county until 1852, and from March, 1855, to his death represented the Radnor district of boroughs. He succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his father in 1855. Sir George Lewis filled numerous important offices in the government. He was appointed Secretary to the Board of Control from Nov., 1847, to May, 1848; Under Secretary for the Home Department to July, 1850; Financial Secretary to the Treasury to Feb., 1852; Chancellor of the Exchequer from March, 1855, to Feb., 1858; and was appointed Secretary of State to the Home Department, June, 1859. On the resignation of Lord Herbert, 1861, Sir George was appointed by Lord Palmerston Secretary for War, which office he held till his death. Sir G. C. Lewis wrote numerous works on antiquities, history, and political philosophy. His Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion was published in 1849, and Dialogue on the Best Form of Government, in 1863.

Manning, ROBERT, or ROBERT DE BRUNNE (now Bourn) in Lincolnshire, was a canon of the Gilbertine order, who lived for a considerable time at Sempringham, and afterwards at other Gilbertine houses in Lincolnshire. About 1303 he translated a French Manuel des Pêchés under the title Handlyng Synne; and between 1327 and 1338 the French Chronicle of Langtoft (down to the death of Edward I.) into English rhyme, with additions which are occasionally of considerable historical value.

The Chronicle was published by Hearne, Oxford, 1725; and again in 1810.

Maynooth College owes its origin to a bill introduced by Pelham in 1795 for founding a Catholic academy in Ireland. It was at first intended for both priests and laymen, but afterwards for the former only. An Act for its government was passed in 1800. In 1845 Sir Robert Peel, with the support of the Whigs and Irish members, carried a bill through both Houses incorporating the college, raising the annual grant to £2,000, and giving £30,000 towards the repairing of the buildings; 800 students were to be accommodated there. In 1860 the college was again enlarged. The Irish Church Act of 1869, however, determined that the annual grant should cease (Jan., 1871), but compensation was made to the college.

Melbourne, WILLIAM LAMB, VISCOUNT (b. 1779, d. 1848), was the second son of Peniston, first Viscount Melbourne. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and at Glasgow University. In 1805 he entered the House of Commons as member for Leominster, and joined the Opposition under Fox. When Mr. Canning was commissioned to form a cabinet, Lamb accepted the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, and in that country the Roman Catholic party hailed his arrival "with a degree of triumph that was almost absurd." He accepted office later under Lord Goderich, and under the Duke of Wellington, and during this period seems to have been alienated from the extreme Whigs, and to have drawn nearer to the Tories. When the East Retford question, however, came before the House Mr. Lamb supported the Whigs, and this insubordination ended in his being compelled once more to join the Opposition. In 1828 he succeeded his father in the House of Lords. He took office under Lord Grey, in 1830, as Home Secretary. In 1834 the Irish Church difficulties caused considerable secession from the cabinet, and Lord Grey found his position untenable. The king sent for Lord Melbourne, who contrived to construct a cabinet, which lasted till the end of the year. The death of Earl Spencer, which took Lord Althorp away from the Commons and the Exchequer, caused the fall of the cabinet. The king called upon Lord Melbourne to retire, and, on the advice of the Duke of Wellington, summoned Sir R. Peel from Italy to assume the premiership. The new government did not last over the year. A new Parliament decided against them, and Melbourne formed a mixed government, which lasted from 1835 to Sept., 1841. During the latter part of William IV.'s reign Lord Melbourne had no special difficulties to encounter. At the beginning of Queen Victoria's reign the prime minister's position was one that required address and tact, and by universal acknowledgment Lord Melbourne filled it with success, and in such a way as to earn the gratitude of her Majesty. The ministry, however, had been gradually losing ground ever since its formation. It had only maintained itself at all by yielding to O'Connell, and earning the doubtful support of the Irish "tail." Several important Acts were added to the statute book by it, including the New Poor Law, the two Irish Tithe Bills, and the Municipal Corporations Act. The administration was attacked both by the Tories and the discontented Whigs, and in 1839 Lord Melbourne, after a practical defeat on the Jamaica question, resigned. Sir Robert Peel, however, declined to form a ministry on account of the disputes about the royal household, known as the "Bedchamber Question," and Lord Melbourne returned. The general election of 1841 resulted in a Conservative majority, and the government resigned, giving place to Sir R. Peel. After his resignation Lord Melbourne, though he continued the confidential friend and counsellor of the Queen, took little active part in public affairs.

Mitchell, JOHN (b. 1812, d. March 21, 1875), was one of the leaders of the Young Ireland party in 1848, and in his journal, the United Irishman, supported open rebellion. He was tried, but found not guilty. When the Treason Felony Act was passed, however, he was again arrested, and his newspaper suppressed. He was finally sentenced to fourteen years' transportation, and sent to Bermuda. He escaped by breaking his parole, and fled to the United States, where he became an ardent partisan of the Confederates. In 1874 he came to Ireland, and was returned to Parliament unopposed for Tipperary county. On Mr. Disraeli's motion, however, he was declared incapable of sitting. A new writ being issued, he was again elected, but Captain Moore, a Conservative, who was next on the poll, claimed the seat, and it was adjudged to him by the Irish Court of Common Pleas. Mitchell now intended to stand for every Irish county in turn, but died before he could carry out his plan.

Montrose, James Graham, 5th Earl of (b. 1612, d. 1650), at first espoused the cause of the Covenanters, whose troops he commanded in the north of Scotland. Having got possession of his enemy, Huntly, by violating his safe-conduct (1639), Montrose sent him to Edinburgh, and continued his movements against the Gordons and other Royalists, whom he defeated at Stonehaven, subsequently routing them again at the Bridge of Dee. In 1641 Montrose, annoyed at the Covenanters refusing him the supreme command, went over to the side of the king, who created him a marquis in 1644. In his Highland campaign (1644—45), Montrose was most successful, defeating the Covenanters at Tippermuir, Aberdeen, Auldearn, Alford, and Kilsyth, though he was himself beaten at Philiphaugh (Sept., 1645). He was for a time Viceroy of Scotland, but Charles, during his eight months' sojourn in the Scottish camp, withdrew his commission, and he was compelled to leave Scotland. After the death of the king (1649), Montrose landed in the Orkneys with about 2,000 men, and crossed to the mainland, where he was defeated and taken prisoner at Inverchurron in Ross-shire. He was hanged at Edinburgh with every mark of indignity, May 25, 1650.

Murphy, Father John (d. June 26, 1798), was the son of a small farmer, and educated for the priesthood at Seville. In 1794 he took the oath of allegiance, but was the first to rise at the head of his parishioners on May 26, 1798. He soon gathered some 5,000 men around him, and committed fearful cruelties. He was victorious over the troops at Enniscorthy and Oulast, and established a camp at Vinegar Hill; his forces increased to 60,000 in consequence of his success, and he plundered and murdered the Protestants at his leisure. On the 29th he set out for Wexford, and after defeating an English force at Three Rocks, and capturing their guns, he occupied Wexford on May 31. He then determined to march on Dublin, and defeated Colonel Walpole at Ballymore. He now, however, loitered, and when with 20,000 men he attacked Arklow on June 9, he was driven back with heavy loss. On June 21 he was again beaten at Vinegar Hill. He fled to Wexford, and from there to Kilkenny, committing fearful outrages; but his followers dispersed in the Wicklow Mountains, and he was captured and hanged on June 26. Murphy was by far the ablest of the Irish rebel leaders, but also the most inhuman and unscrupulous among them.

Murray, James Stuart, Earl of, was the illegitimate son of James V., and the half-brother of Mary Queen of Scots. On the return of his sister from France (1561), Murray, up to that time Prior of St. Andrews, took a chief share in the government, proving himself a moderate and able statesman. In 1562 he married a daughter of the Earl Marischal, and was created Earl of Mar, a title which he soon changed for that of Murray. During the same year he accompanied his sister in her royal progress to the north, when the contest with Huntly took place. Vehemently opposed to the marriage with Darnley, he headed the combination of lords against the queen and her wretched husband, chiefly on the ground that the Protestant religion, of which he was a strong supporter, was in danger of annihilation. In 1567, shortly after the murder of Darnley, he went to France, only to be recalled by the tidings that he had been appointed regent on the abdication of his sister. After an interview with the queen in Lochleven Castle, Murray set himself vigorously to the task of governing Scotland, his first act being to bring to trial all the murderers of Darnley on whom he could lay hands. On Mary's escape (1568) he hastily collected a body of troops, and defeated her at Langside, immediately afterwards sending a special envoy to London to watch Elizabeth's conduct with regard to the Scottish queen. He was one of the Commissioners for James VI. at York, and on the close of the Commission at Hampton Court (1567), was accused by Lesley, Bishop of Ross, of having himself been a party to the murder of Darnley. This charge needed no refutation, and Murray returned to Scotland with his hands much strengthened by the support of England. His implacable enemies, the Hamiltons, soon, however, found means to gather a combination against him, and measures were freely canvassed for bringing back Mary and ousting the regent. Murray seized the chief conspirators, amongst whom were Lethington and Balfour, and was then obliged to give his attention to quieting the Border, where he took prisoner the Earl of Northumberland. On Feb. 23, 1570, before the regent had time to consummate his plans, he was assassinated by James Hamilton of

Pauli, REINHOLD (b. 1823, d. 1882), was the son of a pastor of Berlin. After passing the greater part of his boyhood at Bremen, he entered upon the study of history under Ranke at Berlin, and of classical philology at Bonn. In 1847 he became tutor in a Scottish family, but after a year gave himself up entirely to the study of English history. In 1849 he entered the house of Bunsen, the Prussian ambassador, as private secretary. His first work, a Life of Alfred the Great, appeared in 1850, and immediately gave him a great reputation, so that Lappenberg entrusted to him the continuation of his own History of England, for the Heeren and Ukert series. Of this the third (Pauli's first) volume, beginning with Henry II., was published in 1853, the fourth in 1855, the fifth, concluding with the death of Henry VII., in 1858. In 1857 he became Professor of History at Rostock, moving in 1859 to Tübingen, where he remained till 1867. In 1867 he passed to a professorship at Marburg; this he exchanged for one at Göttingen in 1870, and here he remained till his death. Among his more important works were his Pictures of Old England (1860), Simon de Montfort, Creator of the House of Commons (1867), both of which, together with his Alfred, have been translated, and his Geschichte von England seit 1815 (1864-75), of which the last volume reached to 1852. Few modern historians have surpassed Dr. Pauli in intimate knowledge of the original materials for English history, and in sound critical judgment in using them. His greatest work, which has not been translated into English, is by far the best general history of England in the later Middle Ages.

Peace Preservation Act (Ireland). On March 17, 1870, this Act was introduced by Mr. Chichester Fortescue, in order to prevent outrages in Mayo, chiefly directed against cattle. There was no opposition, and it received the royal assent on April 4. By this Act the use of firearms without a licence was forbidden, under heavy penalties, in any proclaimed district. The grand jury was also empowered to levy a cess on districts where outrages had been committed, to compensate the victims. Domiciliary visits were authorised, and persons loitering about at night might be seized by the police. In 1875 Sir Michael Hicks-Beach asked for a continuance of the Act, making it, however, less stringent. The Irish members strenuously but in vain opposed it. The Act was allowed to expire by Mr. Gladstone's government in 1880.

Pentland Hills, THE BATTLE OF THE (Nov. 28, 1666), was fought between the royal troops and the Covenanters. The latter, harassed by the heavy fines and cruel punishments inflicted on them, rose and marched on Edinburgh, which they hoped to surprise; but finding the gates closed they were obliged to retreat, and being met by a Royalist force they were defeated on the Pentland Hills, a large number of them being taken prisoners and subsequently executed.

Perrot, SIR JOHN (b. 1527, d. 1591), is supposed by some to have been a natural son of Henry VII. In 1570 he was the first Lord President of Munster, and concluded the war against Fitz-Maurice, that leader submitting to him at Kilmallock in 1571. In 1584 he became Lord Deputy, and as he treated English and Irish with equal severity his administration was on the whole successful. Some disrespectful remarks about the queen caused his recall in 1588. In 1591 he was accused of treason, found guilty, and sentenced to death, but died in the Tower before the execution of the sentence.

Petty, SIR WILLIAM (b. 1623, d. 1687), was educated abroad, and became a Fellow of Brasenose College, Oxford. In 1652 he was First Physician of the Irish Army, and afterwards as Surveyor-General he surveyed the forfeited estates in Ireland, and was secretary to Henry Cromwell. By buying up the claims of the soldiery to the forfeited lands he acquired large estates. In 1661 he was knighted by Charles II. He published several works, among them his valuable Political Arithmetic and a Political Survey of Ireland. In 1688, in the first year of her widowhood, his wife was created Baroness Shelburne for life, and his eldest son Baron Shelburne. Finally both the estates and title passed to the house of Lansdowne.

Pudsey (or PUISY), HUGH DE (d. 1195), was the son of a sister of King Stephen, and in 1153 was consecrated Bishop of Durham. He did not mix much in politics till the beginning of Richard I.'s reign, when he purchased from the needy king the earldom of Northumberland and the office of Justiciar, which he exercised with the Earl of Essex, and after his death in 1190 with Longchamp. Quarrels soon broke out, and before long Hugh was ousted by his more skilful rival, on pretence of treason, and put in prison. His release speedily followed, but he failed to get back his office. He was, says Dr. Stubbs, "a great captain, a great hunter, a most splendid builder; not a very clerical character, but altogether a grand figure for nearly fifty years of English history."

Robertson, JAMES BURTON (b. 1800, d. 1877), was in 1855 appointed to the chair of Modern History in the Catholic University of Ireland. He was a voluminous writer on historical and other subjects. Among his works are Lectures on Burke (1868), Spain in the Eighteenth Century, Lectures on various subjects in Ancient and Modern History (1858), and a translation of Schlegel's Philosophy of History.

Robertson, JAMES CRAIGIE (b. 1813, d. 1882), was Professor of Ecclesiastical History at King's College, London. Among his works are Lectures on the Growth of Papacy (1875), Sketches of Church History (1855—78), and A Biography of Thomas Becket (1859). He edited the valuable Chronicles and Memorials of Thomas Becket for the Rolls Series.

Sandhurst, WILLIAM ROSE MANSFIELD, LORD (b. 1819, d. 1876), entered the army in 1835. In 1845 he was in the Sutlej campaign, and acted as aide-de-camp to Lord Gough. In 1855 he became military attaché at Constantinople. In 1857 he went to India, and was chief of the staff during the Mutiny, and served throughout the operations. He received the thanks of Parliament, and was made a K.C.B. in 1859. In 1865 he became commander-in-chief in India. In 1871 he was raised to the peerage.

Soudan. THE EXPEDITION TO THE (1884). At the close of 1883 the vast dominions of Egypt in the Soudan were in a state of complete revolt. An Egyptian army commanded by an English officer, Colonel Hicks, had been destroyed, and the Egyptian garrisons on the Red Sea littoral, and in the interior, were closely besieged. A body of Egyptian police and gendarmerie sent out to effect the relief of the towns near the Red Sea, under Baker Pasha, was almost annihilated at El Teb, in the neighbourhood of Suakim. England, having been in military occupation of Egypt since the summer of 1882, felt called upon to despatch a force to Suakim. About 4,000 English troops under General Graham were sent, and engaged the natives at El Teb (Feb. 29) and Tamanieb (March 13), defeating them with great slaughter. Leaving Suakim guarded by gun-boats and a small force, the English army retired almost immediately after these battles. With a view to assisting the Egyptian garrisons who were besieged in the interior of the Soudan, Major-General Gordon was sent out (Jan., 1884), to effect the withdrawal of the troops and inhabitants. He penetrated to Khartoum, but was himself hemmed in there, and in Sept., 1884, it became necessary to despatch an English army, under Lord Wolseley, to his assistance.

Stratford de Redcliffe, STRATFORD CANNING, VISCOUNT (b. 1786, d. 1880), was the cousin of George Canning. In 1809 he became secretary of embassy at Constantinople, and was minister plenipotentiary from 1810 to 1812. In 1814 he was sent as ambassador to Switzerland, and took some part in the revision of the Swiss constitution. From 1820 to 1823 he was minister at Washington, and in 1825 again at Constantinople. After the conclusion of the war with Turkey, he was sent in 1831 on a special mission to the Porte to settle the boundaries of the new kingdom of Greece. For nine years he held no diplomatic post, but entered Parliament and supported Sir Robert Peel. In the year 1841, he was for the third time sent as ambassador to Constantinople, where he remained seventeen years, exercising considerable influence in Eastern questions, and largely contributing to determine the policy of England against Russia. He resigned his office in 1858, and never again held any public post. He had been created a viscount in 1852.

Wolseley, GENERAL GARNET JOSEPH, LORD, SON OF Major Wolseley, was born in 1833, served in the Burmese (1852—53) and Crimean Wars, in the Indian Mutiny and the Chinese War. In 1867, he was appointed to the command of the Red River Expedition, and in 1873, as major-general, commanded the troops in the Ashantee War. Upon his return, General Wolseley was thanked by Parliament, and a grant conferred upon him. In 1875 he was sent to administer Natal, and in 1876 became a member of the Council of India. In 1878 he was appointed High Commissioner in Cyprus, and in 1879 returned to Natal as governor, and reduced Secoceni to submission. In 1882 he commanded the Egyptian expedition, won the victory of Tel-el-Kebir, and was rewarded by a barony. In Sept., 1884, he was appointed to lead an expedition to Khartoum for the relief of General Gordon.

Zululand. In January, 1879, a war broke out between the British and the Zulu king, Cetewayo, owing to the refusal of the latter to make reparation for the raids by his subjects upon Natal. A British force under Lord Chelmsford crossed the frontier, but was surprised and attacked at Isandhlwana (Jan. 22, 1879), and defeated with the slaughter of several hundred British troops. The war was continued, and on July 4, 1880, Cetewayo was completely defeated at Ulundi, was taken prisoner by the English, and was sent to Capetown. Zululand was divided into a number of small principalities under the native chiefs, and a "Reserve" territory on the borders of Natal, with a British Resident to watch over the country, was instituted. In 1883 Cetewayo was allowed to visit England, and subsequently was replaced (Jan. 26, 1883) in possession of a large part of his dominions. The result, after some months of continual fighting between Cetewayo and the most powerful of his rivals, Usibepu, was that Cetewayo was driven from his throne (July, 1883), and soon afterwards died (Feb. 8, 1884). Zululand remained in a state of considerable disorder, owing to civil war among the chiefs, aided by adventurers from the Transvaal.

INDEX.

[This index refers to subjects on which separate articles are not given, but to which some allusion will be found under the titles here printed in italics. In cases where the reader is in doubt as to the heading under which an article he is in search of may be placed, he will find it useful to refer to this index. For instance, there is no article on "Lord Bacon;" but a glance at the index will show that Bacon is treated under the title "St. Albans." The numbers in this index stand for the pages in the body of the work on which the matter referred to is to be found, and the letters a and b signify the first and second columns of the pages. Thus, the entry "Abeysance, Peerage, 807, b," indicates that reference is made to Abeysance in the article PEERAGE, on the second column of page 807.]
